Munch came from a distinguished musical background. He was born in Strasbourg, the fifth child in a family of six children, two daughters and four sons. One of his sisters married a brother of Albert Schweitzer. Munch had to interrupt his budding career in 1914 when he was drafted into the German army. Four years later, after being gassed and wounded as a sergeant of artillery, he was demobilized.

One of his brothers is also a distinguished musician who, during the 1952 Congress of Cultural Progress organized by Vladimir Nabokov, brought his Strasbourg chorus to Paris to sing in the historic old Church of St. Roch on the Rue St. Honore.

Every conductor has his preferences in orchestral repertory. Munch has immersed himself completely all his career in French music and, under the concentration of his baton, glory has been reflected in equal measure on the music and its interpreter.

Munch married Genevieve Maury, a granddaughter of one of the founders of the Nestle chocolate firm, in 1933. They had met the year he was studying violin in Paris with Lucien Capet, and corresponded during World War I through the International Red Cross. Munch did not conduct his first concert until 1932, when he was 41 years old.

"It was much easier for me to make a living as a violinist. I just could not afford to direct an orchestra earlier; when I was able to, it was because of her."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,[illegible]
NOV 7 1968 New England

MERCURY (e)
MEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 8,200
NOV 7 1968 New England

BOSTON — The haunting, wistful strains of Gabriel Faure's "The Death of Melisande" will float through acoustically supurb Symphony Hall tonight with deeper sentiment than usual.

Eric Leinsdorf selected the music as a program opening memorial for Charles Munch, his predecessor as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died Tuesday night in a Virginia hotel.

POST (E.)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 380,764
NOV 7 [illegible]

Charles Munch Dies

Charles Munch, music director of the Orchestra de Paris, and for 13 years music director director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra died Tuesday 77. He is survived by a brother, night in Richard, Va. He was a sister and two nephews. His wife, Genevieve Maury, died in 1956.

POST (M)
WASH., D. C
CIRC. 455,850
NOV 7 1968

Conductor Charles Munch Dies

By Paul Hume
Washington Post Staff Writer

Charles Munch, who conducted the new Orchestra of Paris in Constitution Hall on Oct. 29, died in his sleep early yesterday. His valet found Dr. Munch dead in his bed in the John Marshall Hotel in Richmond where he was to have conducted the orchestra in a concert last night.

CHARLES MUNCH

The volatile musician is best remembered in this country for his 13-year tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony, a position from which he resigned in 1962. During his seasons with that orchestra, Dr. Munch displayed his German and French backgrounds with equal affection and enthusiasm, conducting the great German orchestral staples with a vigorous personal freedom and the grand French repertoire, especially the largest works of Berlioz, with a fiery impulse that carried them to heights not often previously attained in this country.

Born in Strasbourg in 1891, Dr. Munch was the son of a noted choral conductor in that city, Ernst Munch. He was related to the famous physician-theologian - musician - humanitarian Albert Schweitzer, whose brother married Dr. Munch's sister. It was this background, plus violin study with Karl Flesch and work as a student of conducting under Wilhelm Furtwangler that gave Dr. Munch a strong sense of the German romantic tradition.

On the French side, he listed violin coaching with Lucien Capet, and his long conducting experience in Paris, beginning with his 1932 appointment as conductor of the Straram Orchestra. Succeeding years saw him at the head of the Lamoureux Orchestra, the Paris Philharmonic, which was his own ensemble for three years, and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, which he left for the Boston post in 1946.

Members of the Boston Symphony often said no Munch concert was ever predictable, since the conductor was very likely to adopt tempos and dynamics in performance that varied widely from those prepared in rehearsals. But they agreed that no Munch program ever approached dullness.

Intensely alert, the elegant musician often seemed almost to run to the podium where his downbeat came the instant he turned from acknowledging an audience's applause. Even in the quietest passages, Dr. Munch projected a sense of energy that made his work unusually alive. And at the climax of some orgiastic page of Berlioz or Ravel, he would often work himself and his musicians into a frenzy that approached, though never actually touched, uncontrolled pandemonium.

From the superlative series of recordings he made with the orchestras of Boston and Philadelphia, as well as those few with his new Orchestra of Paris, Charles Munch will be long and warmly remembered.

DAILY OKLAHOMAN
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA
175,904 Circ.

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,350

NOV 7 1968 New

Date

Charles Munch Dies at 77, Boston Symphony Conductor

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Charles Munch, eminent French conductor, died in his sleep Tuesday night in Richmond, Va., while on tour with his new Orchestre de Paris. He was 77.

He was to conduct a concert last night.

His body was discovered by his valet.

All of Munch's American engagements as guest conductor were cancelled last summer because of pneumonia. He was scheduled for major concerts at Tanglewood, Saratoga Performing Arts Center, and Blossom Hill (Cleveland) festivals, among others.

Boston Symphony

Munch succeeded the late Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1949. He held that post for 13 years, making his final appearance with the Boston Symphony, as regular conductor, in August of 1962.

Following his performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Munch received one of the greatest ovations in Tanglewood history.

Munch appeared in Worcester but once with the Boston Symphony. It was on March 10, 1958, on the Civic Music series.

The program was Handel's "Water Music" Suite, the Prelude and Love Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

After his retirement from the Boston Symphony in 1962, Erich Leinsdorf was appointed to succeed him. Leinsdorf will yield the baton to William Steinberg in September 1969.

Munch continued his career as guest conductor of many orchestras throughout the world.

Scheduled in Hub

He was scheduled to guest-conduct the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Feb. 14, 15, 18 and 20, 1969. The programs were to be announced.

Munch was highly respected and admired by members of the Boston Symphony.

When things went wrong at rehearsal, he was capable of enough humility to say to the men, "Help me." He frequently went backstage to compliment other conductors on their performances.

Unlike some other conductors, Munch did not fire players capriciously over alleged inefficiencies or the crossing of personal paths.

The thought of firing men was horrifying to him. He thought, as do many Europeans, that a symphony job should be a job for life.

In an interview with Harry Shapiro, horn player for 30 years with the Boston Symphony, Shapiro said.

Pro Orchestra

"Munch considered us as a 'pro' orchestra and would not treat us like students. He wanted music to speak for itself. tempos changed from rehearsal to performance, and he tended to play too fast."

"But," Shapiro added, "he put us on our toes so that we could follow any beat and tempo at any time."

Charles Munch

Munch came to the Boston Symphony in the prime of his musical life, with an illustrious European career to commend him.

He was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father. His first teacher was his father, Ernest Munch, director of the Saint-Guillaume Chorus is Strasbourg.

At the age of 28 he was made professor at the Strasbourg conservatory and conductor of its orchestra.

Munch first came to this country in December 1946, when he made his American debut conducting the Boston Symphony, as guest.

His last appearance in Boston was two weeks ago, Oct. 23, marking the Boston debut of his new Orchestre de Paris.

The 100-member orchestra was recruited in lengthy auditions from the finest players of former French orchestras. Its framework was the now disbanded Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

Munch was recently nominated music director of the new orchestra by the French General Assembly, which is responsible for the creation of the Orchestre de Paris.

French Music

His specialty was French music of the romantic and impressionistic eras. He was also a zealous champion of new American music.

For his Boston and touring program with the Orchestre de Paris, Munch selected Debussy's "La Mer," Samuel Barber's "Medea's Meditation and Dance of Vengeance," and Brahms' First Symphony.

The American public knew Munch as a completely dedicated conductor, a musician oblivious to outward show. He was not only absorbed by the music he conducted but possessed by it.

Many felt that he could penetrate and communicate music as perhaps no other conductor.

Paris Leader Of Symphony Found Dead

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Charles Munch, 77-year-old musical director and conductor of the Paris symphony orchestra was found dead in his hotel room Wednesday.

Munch's body was found in bed by his valet when he tried to awaken Munch, who was to conduct the orchestra in a concert Wednesday night.

Medical examiners said the cause of death was acute coronary deficiency. Munch had a history of heart attacks, doctors said.

The native of Alsace had been conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1948 until 1963 when he was selected to head the Orchestra de Paris.

When Hitler came to power in the 1930's Munch left Germany for Paris where he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, became its regular conductor and in 1938 became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

He continued to conduct during the German occupation of France in World War II but turned his salary over to the underground and used his position to protect French musicians.

After the war the liberated French government made him an officer of the Legion of Honor.

His body will be sent to France for burial.

Charles Munch Dies; Symphony Conductor

Charles Munch, who came to the United States unheralded in 1946 and became the conductor and music director of the Boston Symphony, died in his sleep early yesterday in Richmond. His valet found him dead in his bed in the John Marshall Hotel.

The 77-year-old conductor had been scheduled to lead a concert of the 120-member Orchestre de Paris in Richmond last night. Mr. Munch helped form the group for the French government and the city of Paris, and was named its director last year. He led the orchestra in Constitution Hall here a week ago, on the group's first tour of the United States, in a typical Munch program — works by Berlioz, Duelleux, and Ravel.

CHARLES MUNCH

Son of Organist

Mr. Munch was born in Strasbourg in Alsace-Lorraine, which was then a German province. His mother was the daughter of a clergyman, and his father was Ernest Munch, an organist who founded the choir of St. Guillaume. His brother, Fritz, also became a noted musician.

After studying violin at the Strasbourg Conservatory and in Berlin and Paris, he returned to Strasbourg to become a professor at the conservatory and the city orchestra's concert master.

In Leipzig, Germany, he studied conducting under Wilhelm Furtwaengler, and was a violinist, concertmaster and apprentice conductor at the Gewandhaus there. He became leader of the orchestra in 1926.

Took Permanent Post

Making his French debut in 1932, he performed for the first time in Paris the next year, conducting the Staram Orchestra.

He also conducted the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris.

From 1935 to 1938 he was named permanent conductor of the Orchestre de la Societe Philharmonique, another Paris orchestra he helped found.

He also was the leading conductor at the International Society for Contemporary Music, a series of programs performed at the Paris Exposition of 1937.

Mr. Munch was named director of the Orchestre du Conservatoire, the city's oldest orchestra, in 1938.

Led BBC Orchestra

In World War II, during the German occupation of Paris he continued to conduct the orchestra, but he gave his fees to the French resistance and was able, he said, to prevent the Nazis from removing orchestra members because of race or religion.

The first French conductor invited to conduct in England after the war, he led the British Broadcasting Co. orchestra and also orchestras in Switzerland, the Netherlands, and Belgium. He also appeared at the International Festival of Music in Zurich in 1946 and also at festivals in Prague and Strasbourg.

Making his American debut with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in 1947 after appearances as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony, he was hailed by the critics.

In October 1949 he succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony. He continued as conductor of the orchestra until 1962, also serving as music director for the last two years.

Acclaimed for his recordings, he was awarded the Grand Prix du Disque eight times between 1949 to 1961, and received awards from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences in 1960 and 1962.

Mr. Munch was decorated a chevalier in the Legion of Honor. He also was a member of the French Order of Arts and Letters and the Order of the Cedar of Lebanon.

He leaves a brother and a sister.

Burial will be in France.

Munch Earned Music Lovers' Esteem In Symphony Hall, Tanglewood Concerts

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Many people who frequent Symphony Hall in Boston or Tanglewood in Lenox probably can recite the names of the conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as they can recall the names of our presidents or of the English kings. Within the memory of a multitude of such a category of music lovers, the name of Charles Munch, who died in Richmond, Va., will be remembered with affection.

Munch followed Serge Koussevitzky on the Boston Orchestra's podium and stayed 13 years, from 1949 to 1962. The task of replacing a man like Koussevitzky, as in the analogous case when Arturo Toscanini left the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, was a formidable one but Munch, different in nearly every aspect of his skills, soon established himself as a personage worthy of the eminence the job imposes.

Koussevitzky had been a fastidious leader, a man of taste and penetrating musical insight. Not that Munch was lacking in any such quality, but he was more the open-field runner, looking for an opening to carry the ball for an emotional gain. He was a spontaneous performer—a pattern which carried him and the orchestra, and the audience, to sweeps of giddy exhilaration, and flights of imaginative poetry but also, on occasion, to mild if unobserved pitfalls.

Retiring as Person

He was a large and heavy man without any suggestion of embonpoint; dignified and courteous to his audiences and individuals, but shy and retiring. Before his orchestra he could be completely unaware of exhibitionism and without inhibitions, but in the privacy of a living room he was the least desirous to take the floor and dominate the company.

Munch was born in Germany in 1891, but, like Koussevitzky, who came from Russia, he was drawn to Paris by the musical magnetism there before and after World War I and became totally Gallicized. Indeed, when the Cultural Ministry, the City of Paris and the regional counties last year decided to inaugurate an orchestra which would compete on the level of the Berlin, Vienna, London, Boston and Philadelphia orchestras and rise above the orchestral mediocrity which has persisted in Paris for so many years, it was to the 76-year-old Charles Munch that Marcel Landowski, director of music attached to the Ministry, turned for a leader.

All France looks to the new Orchestre de Paris to help recoup their country's lost cultural grandeur. The permanent chief of the orchestra is Serge Baudo, a very capable and respected young conductor, but for export it was on the prestige of a man like Munch that the Ministry decided to rely, and it was while on tour here that the venerable artist was stricken.

Born to Musical Family

Munch came from a distinguished musical background. He was born in Strasbourg, the fifth child in a family of six children, two daughters and four sons. One of his sisters married a brother of Albert Schweitzer. Munch had to interrupt his budding career in 1914 when he was drafted into the German army. Four years later, after being gassed and wounded as a sergeant of artillery, he was demobilized.

One of his brothers is also a distinguished musician who, during the 1952 Congress of Cultural Progress organized by Vladimir Nabokov, brought his Strasbourg chorus to Paris to sing in the historic old Church of St. Roch on the Rue St. Honore.

Every conductor has his preferences in orchestral repertory. Munch has immersed himself completely all his career in French music and, under the concentration of his baton, glory has been reflected in equal measure on the music and its interpreter.

Munch married Genevieve Maury, a granddaughter of one of the founders of the Nestle chocolate firm, in 1933. They had met the year he was studying violin in Paris with Lucien Capet, and corresponded during World War I through the International Red Cross. Munch did not conduct his first concert until 1932, when he was 41 years old.

"It was much easier for me to make a living as a violinist. I just could not afford to direct an orchestra earlier: when I was able to, it was because of her."

MERCURY (e)
MEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 8,200

NOV 7 1968 New

BOSTON — The haunting, wistful strains of Gabriel Faure's "The Death of Melisande" will float through acoustically supurb Symphony Hall tonight with deeper sentiment than usual.

Eric Leinsdorf selected the music as a program opening memorial for Charles Munch, his predecessor as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died Tuesday night in a Virginia hotel.

STAR (E)
WASH., D. C.
CIRC. 306,200

NOV 7 1968

POST (E.)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 380,764

NOV 7 1968 E

Charles Munch Dies

Charles Munch, music director of the Orchestra de Paris, and for 13 years music director director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra died Tuesday 77. He is survived by a brother, night in Richard, Va. He was a sister and two nephews. His wife, Genevieve Maury, died in 1956.

POST (M)
WASH., D. C
CIRC. 455,850

NOV 7 1968

Conductor Charles Munch Dies

By Paul Hume
Washington Post Staff Writer

Charles Munch, who conducted the new Orchestra of Paris in Constitution Hall on Oct. 29, died in his sleep early yesterday. His valet found Dr. Munch dead in his bed in the John Marshall Hotel in Richmond where he was to have conducted the orchestra in a concert last night.

The volatile musician is best remembered in this country for his 13-year tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony, a position from which he resigned in 1962. During his seasons with that orchestra, Dr. Munch displayed his German and French backgrounds with equal affection and enthusiasm, conducting the great German orchestral staples with a vigorous personal freedom and the grand French repertoire, especially the largest works of Berlioz, with a fiery impulse that carried them to heights not often previously attained in this country.

CHARLES MUNCH

Born in Strasbourg in 1891, Dr. Munch was the son of a noted choral conductor in that city, Ernst Munch. He was related to the famous physician-theologian - musician - humanitarian Albert Schweitzer, whose brother married Dr. Munch's sister. It was this background, plus violin study with Karl Flesch and work as a student of conducting under Wilhelm Furtwangler that gave Dr. Munch a strong sense of the German romantic tradition.

On the French side, he listed violin coaching with Lucien Capet, and his long conducting experience in Paris, beginning with his 1932 appointment as conductor of the Straram Orchestra. Succeeding years saw him at the head of the Lamoureux Orchestra, the Paris Philharmonic, which was his own ensemble for three years, and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, which he left for the Boston post in 1946.

Members of the Boston Symphony often said no Munch concert was ever predictable, since the conductor was very likely to adopt tempos and dynamics in performance that varied widely from those prepared in rehearsals. But they agreed that no Munch program ever approached dullness.

Intensely alert, the elegant musician often seemed almost to run to the podium where his downbeat came the instant he turned from acknowledging an audience's applause. Even in the quietest passages, Dr. Munch projected a sense of energy that made his work unusually alive. And at the climax of some orgiastic page of Berlioz or Ravel, he would often work himself and his musicians into a frenzy that approached, though never actually touched, uncontrolled pandemonium.

From the superlative series of recordings he made with the orchestras of Boston and Philadelphia, as well as those few with his new Orchestra of Paris, Charles Munch will be long and warmly remembered.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC.

NOV 7 1968 New England

174

Charles Munch, Ex-Conductor Of Boston Symphony, 77, Dies

Special to The New York Times

RICHMOND, Nov. 5—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, was found dead this morning in the John Marshall Hotel. The 77-year-old conductor was to have led the Orchestre de Paris here tonight.

Mr. Munch's body was found in bed by his valet. Dr. A. J. Chapman, a state medical examiner, said he had died of a heart attack, apparently about 6 A.M. He said Mr. Munch had suffered previous heart attacks and had carried several kinds of medication prescribed from him by his Paris physician.

He is survived by a brother and a sister.

Tough Act to Follow

Mr. Munch succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949.

This required an assurance on a par with trying to follow Thomas Alva Edison as an inventor or Magellan as a navigator. It was, in every sense, an extremely tough act to follow.

Koussevitzky, the Russian-born autocrat who could drive his musicians at once toward the height of perfection and the edge of exasperation, had led the orchestra since 1924, the longest tenure in its history.

He won the adoration of Boston's Brahmins, among whom he moved with ease and relish, and the awe of the general population, and the orchestra acquired renown under his baton.

If that were not enough, Mr. Munch was regarded as having beaten out a rising young Koussevitzky protegé, Leonard Bernstein, for the job.

Mr. Munch, relatively a stranger in this country at the time but renowned in France, brought to the job a style quite his own.

Toward his musicians, he was genial, comradely and mostly gentle, where Koussevitsky had at times been a lightning storm of intensity and severity.

Toward patrons of the symphony, he was unfailingly pleasant, but he did not often cultivate them on an intensely personal level and, unlike Koussevitsky, he did not care to be kissed after concerts by admiring dowagers.

'His Big Family'

"He was more interested to be with his musicians than to be social," one of the Boston orchestra members said yesterday. "After the concert, he would go to some of the musicians' homes to spend a little time and relax. It was his big family."

Koussevitzky usually had a very precise idea of how a work should sound and he would drill his musicians as many times as necessary to produce exactly that sound. Mr. Munch took a less didactic approach.

He did not name his predecessor in speaking of a certain conductor who "made his men repeat the same few bars over and over again."

"He was simply disciplining them," Mr. Munch said, "for they did not play the last time any better than they had at first. And it is not funny when you are told like a schoolboy to repeat over and over again the same passage.

"After all, it is a work like any other by which you live and keep your family alive. I know. I myself have been playing in orchestras for years, and I know what can make the work pleasant, but also I know what can make it unbearable."

Brandy for an Offender

Once in Paris a trombonist who had drunk well but not wisely before a concert tore into the placidity of a Beethoven adagio with a blast fit to startle the dead. Mr. Munch shrilled out an excoriation for this trespass. The next night he walked on stage, smiling, and handed the offender a large bottle of raspberry brandy.

"I treated you pretty roughly last night," he said. "Here's some consolation."

It was that kind of touch that won him the favor of the men who followed his baton.

Bernard Zighera, who plays first harp in the Boston orchestra and is now in his 42d season there, recalled the modesty with which Mr. Munch had presented himself to the orchestra in 1949.

"He came out and stepped on the podium and in his bad English at that time he said his little speech, how proud and how happy he was to be with the orchestra and let us make beautiful music together.

"'Now, lets work, gentlemen,' he said. 'You know very well I am nothing without you.'"

Mr. Zighera said he had talked last week with some members of the Orchestre de Paris and found that "they had the same feeling toward him as we in Boston had."

The Orchestre de Paris is, in fact, the French national orchestra, brought into being in 1967 by Mr. Munch, its music director, at the request of André Malraux, the Minister of Culture.

The 120-man group was formed specifically in the desire to secure for France a symphony orchestra that would challenge the world's great orchestras for supremacy. It is on its first tour of North America and it had played in Carnegie Hall under Mr. Munch's direction Oct. 26.

Roger Voisin, former first trumpet of the Boston Symphony said of Mr. Munch yesterday: "I felt that he was like a great impressionist painter. He was interested in the color of the music. He did not concentrate so particularly on the little details — a little fast, a little slow, a little high, a little low—but it was always a question of color, a question of the great artist's sweep across the canvas.

"Sometimes it spilled over—all right, maybe it did. Some critics thought he was too fast or too much too loud. We seem to have nowadays the highly technical performer and conductor. Certainly it is flawless, but is it great interpretation?

"With Mr. Munch I was always allowed to give my own feeling, to be my own self. We know that we are bad children sometimes, we prima donnas, and we should have a governing master, but if he did not agree with me, then he would tell me why.

Mr. Munch liked to tell his friends that he was a conductor "only because I am too stupid to be anything else." He had for a time in his boyhood firmly settled on becoming a locomotive engineer.

He was born on Sept. 26, 1891, in an apartment house in Strasbourg. His father, Ernest Munch, was a professor of music at the Strasbourg Conservatory and organist at the cathedral.

On Sundays, after church and a big dinner, the whole family would gather in a parlor for hours of chamber music. Sometimes Albert Schweitzer would drop in.

He studied the violin with his father and later Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin. In 1919, he became professor of the conservatory in Strasbourg and, in 1926, he went to Leipzig as a concert master under Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

When Hitler came to power, Mr. Munch left Germany and settled in Paris. The next year he married Genevieve Maury, Nestlé chocolate heiress, who had recently paid for the hall and the musicians that afforded him his debut as a conductor. She died in 1956.

Mr. Munch came into almost immediate demand as a guest conductor in England and on the Continent. He founded the Paris Philharmonic in 1935 and succeeded Philippe Gaubert as head of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire in 1938. He led the noted Conservatory Orchestra in Paris during the war. He made his North American debut as a guest conductor with the Boston Symphony on Dec. 27, 1947.

"Le Beau Charles" they had called him in Paris. Once, when the French magazine Elle polled 10,000 Parisians on, "What man would you like to have dinner with tonight if you could make your own choice?" Mr. Munch ran second—to Winston Churchill.

He was hardly less popular in Boston, as conductor of the symphony and director of the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass.

Koussevitzky's Successor Served From 1949 to 1962 — Formed Orchestre de Paris at Malraux's Request

THE NEW YORK TIMES, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1968

Constantine Manos—Magnum

Charles Munch while he was conductor of the Boston Symphony

Munch's Ideals: Clarity and Proportion

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

Paris in the winter of 1944 was cold. Very little fuel was coming into the city and it was impossible to heat the theaters. At the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, where the famous Conservatory Orchestra gave its concerts, the musicians came on stage huddled in overcoats.

An Appraisal

The only one who displayed any warmth was the conductor, Charles Munch. He would come out, smiling and aristocratic, radiating competence, musicianship and intensity.

He was idolized by the Parisians. He had not collaborated with the enemy, and he had managed to hold his orchestra together through every kind of adversity. It was said, and later confirmed, that he had given support and money to the French Resistance movement.

Looking at his handsome face and figureETAOINSHRD obvious expertness of his conducting, taking note of his complete identification with the French repertory, more than one American in 1944 saw him as a successor to Serge Koussevitzky, the admired and venerable conductor of the Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony represented a Franco-Russian tradition. Pierre Monteux had been musical director in the early nineteen-twenties, and then Koussevitzky, a specialist in music of the French school, had succeeded him. When the trustees of the Boston Symphony approached Mr. Munch, it was with a realization that certain traditions of the Boston Symphony would be maintained.

Mr. Munch started making appearances as a guest conductor in the United States in 1946 and was an immediate success. One of the laws of nature is that a great conductor not only projects his force forward to the orchestra but also backward to the audience. Mr. Munch had a strong aura, and his personality seized everyone who was listening to him.

Not everybody, however, agreed with his musical ideas. It was universally conceded that in French music he was all but unapproachable. There he had elegance, a subtle rhythm and a fine ear for color. He was especially partial to the music of Arthur Honegger, his close friend, and he introduced many Honegger works to this country.

In German music some found him less convincing. Like all conductors of his generation, he was not fully aware of the implications of musicological research into performance practice. He conducted Bach, Mozart and Haydn much the same way as conductors of the 19th century. In Beethoven and Brahms, he brought undisputed elegance to the music, but there again his tempos were considered somewhat fast.

At his best, he was a conductor representative of the French ideals of clarity and proportion. In many respects he also was an inspirational conductor. He always was dependable, but he inspired, and at those times he was one of the great conductors of the century.

Deaths

Charles Munch, 77, Dies; Led Boston Symphony

Charles Munch, 77, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in his sleep early Tuesday in Richmond, Va., while on a national tour as conductor of the newly-formed Orchestre de Paris.

A native of Strasbourg, Alsace, he became conductor of the Boston orchestra in 1949, succeeding Serge Koussevitzky, and remained until 1962. He was in Boston Oct. 23 when he conducted a performance of the Orchestra de Paris at Symphony Hall.

Munch, who resided in Milton while serving as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first came to the United States in 1939 when he conducted the St. Louis Symphony. His first appearance in Boston was on Dec. 27, 1946 when he served as guest conductor for the Boston orchestra. The success of this appearance coupled with one as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, led to his appointment as head of the Boston Symphony.

CHARLES MUNCH

LONG CAREER

During his long and distinguished career Munch conducted many of the world's leading symphony orchestras and was noted, especially during his Boston years, for his devotion to the works of contemporary composers.

Inheriting his musical talents from his father who was an organist and professor of music at the Strasbourg Conservatory, his first training was as a violinist and in 1912 he gave his first public performance. Following service in the German Army in World War I he resumed his musical career and in 1925 became concertmaster of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig. Upon the advent of Adolph Hitler he left for Paris and made his debut as a conductor there in 1932.

During the German occupation of France in World War II he resisted all efforts to make him collaborate with the Nazis artistic policy and contributed large sums of money to the Resistance movement.

In his memory the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its programs at Symphony Hall over the weekend with "The Death of Melisande," from Faure's Peleas and Melisande. This work was long a favorite of Munch's and his personal selection as memorial music.

ROCHESTER TIMES UNION
Thursday, November 7, 1968

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250

NOV 7 New England

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

NOV 7 New England

Munch tribute at Symphony

In tribute to Charles Munch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who passed on Tuesday, the programs at Symphony Hall tonight and on the weekend will be changed to include a work known as one Mr. Munch wished to be played in his memory. It is "The Death of Mélisande" from Fauré's "Pelléas et Mélisande." Some other changes also will be made in tribute to Mr. Munch, who had just achieved his latest success with the first American tour of the new Orchestre de Paris.

Obituary

Dr. Charles Munch, 77, Boston Symphony Director

Charles Munch, best remembered for his 13-year tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony, a post he left in 1962, died in his sleep yesterday at the John Marshall Hotel in Richmond. He was to have conducted the new Orchestra of Paris in a Richmond concert last night. The 77-year-old musician appeared at Constitution Hall last Tuesday.

DR. MUNCH

With the Boston Symphony he was able to accent his German and French backgrounds, particularly the works of Berlioz. Born in Strasbourg, Germany, Dr. Munch was the son of a noted choral conductor in that city. He was also related to Albert Schweitzer, physician-theologian - musician - humanitarian, whose brother married Dr. Munch's sister.

Known for his unpredictable performances, members of the Boston Symphony said the Munch concerts often adopted different tempos in performance that were not previously rehearsed.

He was influenced greatly by French violin coach Lucien Capet when he conducted the Lamoureux Orchestra, the Paris Philharmonic, before going to Boston in 1946.

NEWS
WASH D. C.
CIRC. 25

NOV 7 New England

ITEM (e)
LYNN, MASS.
CIRC. 34,100

NOV 7 1968 New England

175

Conductor Munch Dead at 77

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Globe Music Critic

CHARLES MUNCH . . . in 1955

Charles Munch, 77, French orchestra conductor who was music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, died in his sleep in Richmond, Va., Wednesday morning.

He was on tour with the Orchestre de Paris, founded last year by him at the direction of the French Ministry of Culture. He had expected to conduct a Wednesday night concert.

A medical examiner listed "acute coronary deficiency" as the cause of death.

MUNCH Page 30

9

SUDDEN END TO U. S. TOUR

Beloved Maestro Munch Dies at 77

Charles Munch, 77-year-old conductor of the Paris Symphony Orchestra and for 13 years conductor of the Boston Symphony, died Wednesday in Richmond, Va., during a U. S.-Canada tour.

The tall, white-haired maestro was so beloved in Boston music circles that he was given an 11-minute standing ovation when he "retired" in 1961.

According to a report, Munch had been in apparent good health before he was found dead in bed by his valet. Munch had been scheduled to conduct the 120-man Paris Symphony in Richmond Wednesday night as part of a tour that began in Canada on Oct. 20.

The French-born conductor, who was famed for his vigorous, dynamic performances, succeeded the legendary Serge Koussevitzky as head of the world-renowned Boston Symphony in 1949. It was a difficult assignment, for Koussevitzky had charmed Boston music lovers for 25 years, both by his talent and his social charm and gregariousness.

Munch changed the tone of the orchestra and isolated himself from extra-musical social activities, but he captured his audience completely. During his tenure, the orchestra made four extended tours, a transcontinental tour of the U. S. and tours abroad to Europe, Russia and the Far East.

Under his leadership, the orchestra won five New York Music Critics' Circle awards, two American-International Music Fund awards and innumerable other awards for recordings.

He retired from the Symphony here in August, 1962, succeeded by the current conductor Erich Leinsdorf. Six days after he announced his retirement, he received the singularly dramatic show of affection with the sustained, 11-minute tribute.

CHARLES MUNCH

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

NOV 7 1966

New England

Charles Munch conducted BSO for 13 seasons

9

★ MUNCH

Continued from Page 1

In his memory, Erich Leinsdorf, his successor at the Boston Symphony, will open the Symphony Hall program tonight, Friday, and Saturday, with "The Death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to Materlinck's play, "Pelleas et Melisande." The work was a Munch specialty, one he conducted often here, and it was his own choice of memorial music.

On learning of Munch's death, Leinsdorf said:

"When last January I heard the newly formed Orchestre de Paris under Charles Munch in Paris, I was again aware what a delightful and luminous man and musician he was. When such a man leaves us, an irreplaceable light has gone out. That is the way I feel today."

Charles Munch was born Sept. 26, 1891, in Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine, then part of the German Empire. His parents were Ernest Munch, organist and professor at the Strasbourg Conservatory, and Celestine Simon. Ernest Munch was accounted a distinguished musician, and a connoisseur of Bach when that was still and exceedingly rare taste. An uncle, Eugene, was an eminent musician also, though more scholarly by temperament, and an elder brother, Fritz, had a distinguished career as a choral conductor.

Munch's first training was as a violinist. He studied with his father and later with Lucien Capet, leader of one of the great string quartets of the day, and Carl Flesch. It was as a violinist, in 1912, that Munch gave his first public performance.

At the outbreak of World War I, Munch was drafted into the German army. Demobilized four years later, having been wounded, gassed, and promoted sergeant in the artillery, Munch worked as a translator for a Strasbourg insurance company, but kuickly found his way back to music, teaching at the Conservatory and playing with the Strasbourg Orchestra as concertmaster. In 1925, he became concertmaster of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig, conducted then by the great Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

In 1932, one of the first to be disturbed by the rising political stench in Germany, Munch left Leipzig for Paris, making his debut as a conductor there that year. His first concerts were with the Straram and Lamoureux orchestras and the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris. In 1935, famous and sought after, he founded the Orchestre de la Societe Philharmonique. Three years later, he became conductor of what was then the No. 1 orchestra in Paris, the Orrchestre de la Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire. He retained that post until 1946.

Throughout the occupation, Munch effectively resisted all blandishments designed to make him a showpiece of the Petain regime or to make him collaborate with Nazi artistic policy. In addition, he contributed large quantities of money to the Resistance, made his country an important way-station on the "underground railroad" that helped escaping prisoners and returned Allied plane crews to England and performed innumerable kindnesses, all dangerous to himself, on behalf of French Jewish musicians.

Munch made his United States debut with the Boston Symphony on Dec. 27, 1946. He was invited back twice during the following season, and it was during his visit in April 1948, that a hush-hush meeting at the Ritz took place with Henry B. Cabot, then the Boston Symphony's president, at which Munch was engaged to succeed Serge Koussevitzky in the Fall of 1949. His retirement was announced in the Spring of 1961, effective Summer 1962. He returned to the Boston Symphony each year since his retirement, and was scheduled to lead three concerts in February 1969. His last encounter with the Boston Symphony was in January 1968, when he led Berlioz's "L'enfance du Christ," but he was not well enough to go through with his Tanglewood engagement last Summer. He conducted a Symphony Hall concert with his own Orchestre de Paris only two weeks ago, Oct. 23, and was received with the greatest enthusiasm and affection.

Munch had conducted most of the world's important orchestras. He was a Commander of the Legion of Honor, Commander of the Order of Arts and Letters, Commander of the Order of the Cedar (Lebanon), and a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. He held honorary degrees from Boston University, Tufts, Harvard, Boston College and the New England Conservatory. He was the author of a book, "Je suis chef d'orchestre," published in English transation as "I am a conductor" (1955). He was a prolific recording artist. American record collectors knew of him first from the superbly executed accompaniments to some of pianist Alfred Cortot's and violinist Joseph Szigett's concerto performances in the '30's; his most recent record, the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony with the Orchestre de Paris, was released here on the Angel label only last week.

It is said that Munch parted company with the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra over his devotion to contemporary music, which disturbed the directors. In his Boston years, Munch, without making it a cause for special pleading, did much for recent music, especially by American and French composers.

Composer Walter Piston, Harvard Professor Emeritus, who wrote a symphony for Munch, said Wednesday: "His death is a great personal loss to me. I think he was one of the few great conductors of the old school. He had a fine understanding of the composer's message, and he felt a duty to new music. I owe him a deep personal debt."

Munch, who lived in Milton during his Boston years, is remembered here as a shy man whose life was unostentatious and fairly informal. Food and wine were always good chez Munch, and his cat, Fripon (rascal) was allowed to mooch at the lunch table. He smoked, enjoyed Scotch and a well-made martini, and played belote and golf. He liked to laugh, and was a wicked mimic himself. He detested General deGaulle for reasons unexplained — he was a great ducker of direct questions — but it may have been anti-militarist allergy, for he was no Eisenhower fan, either). He was a warm admirer of Adlai Stevenson. Munch was singularly generous to the Boston Symphony, contributing money on a large scale toward the expenses of the 1956 European-Russian tour, the new acoustic shell in the Shed at Tanglewood, and the commissions of works to celebrate the orchestra's 75th anniversary. A Renoir drawing in the Fogg Museum is a gift from him.

His greatest admirers would acknowledge that he was an uneven conductor, vaccillating unpredictably from performances that had an extraordinary way of firing up orchestras and audiences, to ones of plain absent-minded routine. He was not a highly disciplined artist, nor even one of particularly intellectual or analytical inclinations, but the fiery temperament on his good days made him one of the most popular musicians of his time.

Munch was married in 1933 to Genevieve Maury, an authoress and the French translator of Thomas Mann's "Tonio Kroeger," who died in August, 1956. He is survived by a niece, Nicole Henriot-Schmetzer, a pianist who was a Boston Symphony soloist for eight of the conductor's 13 seasons here.

BEFORE A 1950 CONCERT—President Harry Truman and Mrs. Truman visited Charles Munch at Washington's Constitution Hall.

CHARLES MUNCH IN 1955

BOSTON CONDUCTORS IN 1955—Arthur Fiedler (left) of the Boston Pops with B.S.O. musical director Charles Munch.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

NOV 6 1966

Stricken on Tour

Charles Munch Dies; Led Hub Symphony

Charles Munch, former Boston Symphony conductor, died Tuesday night in his sleep in Richmond, Va. He had been on tour with the Orchestre de Paris, which he had formed last year at the direction of the French ministry of culture. He was 77.

In his memory, the Boston Symphony has changed the music for programs Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

Munch's own choice of memorial music, "The Death of Melisande," from Faure's Incidental Music to "Pelleas and Melisande" will open the program. Eric Leinsdorf, Munch's successor in Boston, will conduct.

Munch's last appearance in Boston was on Oct. 23 when he conducted the Orchestre de Paris in Symphony Hall. He was to have returned as Boston Symphony guest conductor in mid February.

Survivors include a niece, the pianist Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer.

Munch's wife, the former Genevieve Maury died in August, 1954.

Upon retiring from the Boston Symphony in 1962, Munch made his home in Louveciennes, a suburb of Paris.

FAMED orchestra conductor Charles Munch, 77, was found dead in a Richmond, Va., hotel room last night, apparently the victim of a heart attack. Mr. Munch gained fame as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1948 to 1963. (UPI)

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,000

NOV 7 1966

176.

Charles Munch Dies at 77; Led the Boston Symphony

By McLAREN HARRIS
Herald Traveler Music Critic

Charles Munch, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in his sleep early yesterday in Richmond, Va. He was 77. Death was unexpected, although he had a history of heart trouble.

He had been touring the nation with the newly-formed Orchestre de Paris and was to conduct a concert last night in Richmond.

Munch succeeded Serge Koussevitzky in 1949 as music director of the Boston Symphony and remained until 1962, when he was followed by Erich Leinsdorf. His reign of

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

NOV 7

Charles Munch Is Dead

(Continued from First Page)

13 years was second in length only to Koussevitzky's 25 years. He had returned to Boston as guest conductor each year since his retirement and was scheduled to conduct the orchestra this season for four concerts in February. His last appearance at Symphony Hall was with the Orchestre de Paris on Oct. 23.

Munch was born on Sept. 26, 1891, in Strasbourg, Alsace, the son of an Alsatian father and a Parisian mother. At 21 he forsook a medical career for serious musical studies, which were interrupted by the outbreak of World War I. Technically a German citizen by virtue of his residence in Alsace, he was conscripted into the Kaiser's army and was wounded at Verdun.

He resumed study of the violin in 1920 and six years later became concertmaster of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig, where he played under such conductors as Wilhelm Furtwaengler and Bruno Walter. In 1920 the German government gave him a choice of becoming a German citizen or losing his Leipzig posititon. He moved immediately to Paris and began his career as a conductor in 1933, being co-founder with Alfred Cortot of L'Orchestre Symphonique de Paris and conducting the Lamoureux and Straram Concerts, later succeeding Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

During the same year, 1933, he married Genevieve Maury, heiress and granddaughter of one of the founders of the Nestle Chocolate Co. She died in August 1954.

MUNCH CONTINUED his conducting during the German occupation of World War II, turning his salary over to the French resistance. After the war the French government made him an officer in the Legion of Honor.

Munch's first visit to the United States came in 1939 when he conducted the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. His initial appearance with the Boston Symphony was on Dec. 27, 1946, and the success of his guest engagements in Boston and New York led to the announcement in the spring of 1948 of his appointment as Koussevitzky's successor.

Nicknamed "Le Beau Charles" by an adoring French public, Munch is described as having been "Gallic to his fingertips." Although he was accomplished in many idioms, a predilection for French music became more evident toward the end of his tenure in Boston. He had also a great love for Bach, gained during his early years in Alsace and demonstrated by his institution of the "Bach weekends" at Tanglewood, which are now traditional.

His baton style was unorthodox, even ragged at times. He was not reputed as a disciplinarian, and there is a familiar claim that he allowed the Boston Symphony to slip in technical precision from the days of Koussevitzky. But his sensitivity for musical meaning, for dramatic and emotional significance and his enthusiasm for orchestral effect were unequivocable.

CHARLES MUNCH

The characteristic "Munch sound" was a light, transparent orchestral tone; his renditions were given to spontaneous energy and he frequently used forceful, exhortative gestures in conducting to gain his musical ends.

HE SPREAD RECOGNITION for the Boston Symphony within and beyond the city's boundaries by proposing the orchestra's Open Rehearsal series, expanding the Tanglewood season and gaining a radio network time slot after the disbanding of the NBC Symphony. Under his direction the orchestra produced numerous successful recordings for RCA Victor.

Munch held a pronounced aversion for formal gatherings and receptions. His replies to questions at peace conferences were customarily brief, factual and without elaboration. His lack of ease was attributed to a language barrier, for while his proficiency with English increased with time it remained mostly suited to a working communication with his orchestra, and he retained a marked preference for the solitude of his residence on Brush Hill Road in Milton.

After his retirement from the Boston Symphony in 1962 he moved to Louveciennes, a suburb of Paris. The body will be transported to France for burial. Survivors include a niece, pianist Nicole Henriot-Schweitzer.

In memory of its former music director the Boston Symphony will open its programs for the next week with the "Death of Melisande" from Faure's Incidental Music to "Pelleas et Melisande," said to be Munch's own choice for funeral music. A performance of Brahms' German Requiem on Nov. 23 in New York's Carnegie Hall will also be presented as a memorial.

Munch's relationships with friends, however, were always warm and open. His Gallic charm and grace made him a sought-after favorite with Back Bay and Beacon Hill society.

CHARLES MUNCH

Richmond, Nov. 6 (AP)—Charles Munch, 77, musical director and conductor of the Paris Symphony Orchestra was found dead in his hotel room today. Medical examiners said he died of acute coronary deficiency.

Charles Munch

A native of Alsace, Munch had been conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1948 until 1963, when he was selected to head the Orchestra de Paris.

When Hitler came to power in the 1930s, Munch left Germany for Paris, where he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra. He continued to conduct during the German occupation of France in World War II, but turned his salary over to the underground and used his position to protect French musicians.

NEWS (m)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 2,122,950

NOV 7 New England

CONDUCTOR CHARLES MUNCH

Charles Munch Dies; Led Boston Symphony From 1948 to 1963

Charles Munch, 77-year-old musical director and conductor of the Paris Symphony orchestra, was found dead in his hotel room Wednesday in Richmond, Va.

Munch's body was found in bed by his valet when he tried to awaken Munch, who was to conduct the orchestra in a concert Wednesday night.

Medical examiners said the cause of death was acute coronary deficiency. Munch had a history of heart attacks, doctors said.

The native of Alsace had been conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1948 until 1963 when he was selected to head the Orchestra de Paris.

While with the Boston Symphony, Munch was a popular figure with audiences at the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

He had appeared in recent seasons as guest conductor at Tanglewood and at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Munch had been scheduled to appear at SPAC last Aug. 8 and at Tanglewood on Aug. 17 but had canceled both appearances due to illness.

When Hitler came to power in the 1930s Munch left Germany for Paris where he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, became its regular conductor and in 1938 became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

He continued to conduct during the German occupation of France in World War 2 but turned his salary over to the underground and used his position to protect French musicians. After the war the liberated French government made him an officer of the Legion of Honor.

His body will be sent to France for burial.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Thursday, November 7, 1968

French Orchestra in Finale For Beloved Maestro Munch

RICHMOND, Va. — The Orchestra de Paris performed here yesterday. There was no applause—a silent tribute to Charles Munch, the orchestra's conductor and musical director who died early yesterday morning.

The body of the 77-year-old musician was found in bed in his hotel room by his valet shortly before the concert.

Mr. Munch was known in the Albany area for his appearance as a guest conductor at Tanglewood Music Festival over the years. He was also scheduled to appear at Saratoga Performing Arts Center last summer, but cancelled the performance because of illness.

Medical examiners said the cause of death was acute coronary deficiency. Doctors said Mr. Munch had a history of heart trouble.

A native of Alsace, he conducted the Boston Symphony from 1948 until 1963, when he was selected to head the Orchestra de Paris.

The Orchestra de Paris, the French national orchestra, was created by Mr. Munch at the request of Andre Maraux, culture minister. The 120-man group was formed specifically to secure for France a symphony orchestra that could challenge the world's best.

It is on its first tour of North American and played in Carnegie Hall under Mr. Munch's direction Oct. 26.

When Hitler came to power in the 1930's, Mr. Munch left Germany for Paris, where he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, and became its first conductor. In 1938, he was named conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

He continued to conduct during the German occupation of France and turned his salary over to the underground resistance and used his position to protect French musicians.

After the war, the French government made him an officer on the Legion of Honor.

One of the members of the Boston symphony commented yesterday that Mr. Munch "was more interested to be with his musicians than to be social.

"After the concert, he would go to some of the musicians' homes to spend a little time and relax. It was his big family," the orchestra member said.

Born on Sept. 26, 1891, in Strasbourg, Mr. Munch was the son of a professor of music at the Strasbourg Conservatory and organist at the cathredral there. He liked to tell his friends he was a conductor "only because I am too stupid to be anything else."

In the early 1930's, Mr. Munch married Genevieve Maury, the Nestle chocolate heiress. She had paid for the hall and the musicians which made possible his debut as a conductor.

Mr. Munch's body will be returned to France for burial.

CHARLES MUNCH

Albany Knickerbocker News
Thursday, November 7, 1968

Munch Best in French Music

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG
© N.Y. Times News Service

New York — Paris in the winter of 1944 was cold. Very little oil or coal was coming ino the city and it was impossible to heat the theaters. At the Theater des Champs-Elysees, where the famous Conservatory Orchestra gave its concerts, the musicians came on stage huddled in overcoats. The violinists would despairingly blow on their fingers when they were not playing. The only one who displayed any warmth was the conductor, Charles Munch. He would come out, smiling and aristocratic, radiating competence, musicianship and intensity.

Dr. Munch was idolized by the Parisians, both as a man and a conductor. During the war years he had not collaborated with the enemy, and he had managed to hold his orchestra together through every kind of adversity. It was said and later confirmed, that he had given support and money to the French resistance movement.

Looking at his handsome face and figure, observing the obvious expertness of his conducting, taking note of his complete identification with the French repertory, more than one American in 1944 spoke about him as a possible successor to Serge Koussevitzky, then the admired and venerable conductor of the Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony was an orchestra that represented a Franco-Russian tradition. Pierre Monteux had been its musical director in the early 1920s, and then Koussevitzky had succeeded him. The Russian conductor was a specialist in music of the French school. When the trustees of the Boston Symphony approached Dr. Munch, it was with a realization that certain traditions of the Boston Symphony would be maintained.

Dr. Munch left the Conservatory concerts in 1946 and started making appearances as a guest conductor in the United States. His success was immediate. One of the laws of nature is that a great conductor not only projects his force forward to the orchestra, but backward to the audience. Dr. Munch had a strong aura, and his personality seized everybody who was listening to him.

Not everybody, however, agreed with his musical ideas. It was universally conceded that in French music he was all but unapproachable. There he had elegance, a subtle rhythm and a fine ear for color. His French repertory started at Berlioz and worked up through the moderns. Of the new French school, he was especially partial to the music of Arthur Honegger, his close friend, and he introduced many Honegger works to the United States.

In German music some found him less convincing. Like all conductors of his generation, he was not fully aware of the implications of performance practice. He conducted Bach, Mozart and Haydn much the same way conductors of the 19th century approached those composers. In Beethoven and Brahms, he brought undisputed elegance to the music, but there again his tempos were considered somewhat fast, and he never achieved the kind of respect in the Austro-German repertory that other conductors of his generation did.

In a way, that was surprising, for as concertmaster of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra he had played under the baton of Wilhelm Furtwaengler, a great conductor who took many rhythmic and even textual liberties with music. There was none of that in Dr. Munch's logical, fast-moving conducting. At his best, he was a conductor representative of the French ideals of clarity and proportion. In many respects he also was an inspirational conductor. He always was dependable, but there were times when he could be inspired, and at those times he was one of the great conductors of the century.

In Boston, he had an onerous schedule. He conducted most of the subscription season at Symphony Hall and then had to take charge of the Berkshire Music Festival during the summer. The work load may have been too much for him. It was no secret in musical circles that toward the end of his directorship he was too tired — some even said disinterested — to keep the orchestra on the virtuoso level at which Koussevitzky had left it. Nor was his dislike of his summer duties any secret. One of the sights of Tanglewood was Dr. Munch's car, motor running, waiting for him after the last matinee concert. He would rush into it, off to Paris as soon as possible.

He left the Boston Symphony in 1962 and spent the next few years as a guest conductor, specializing in the French music he so loved. Last year he formed the Orchestre de Paris, a group created to put at least one French orchestra, up to the highest international standards. The Orchestre de Paris made its deubt in New York only a few weeks ago. Now Charles Munch will not be around to put the finishing touches on this talented group of players.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

NOV 7 1968 New England

TROY TIMES RECORD
Friday, November 8, 1968

About People

Conductor Dies Before Concert

Charles Munch, 77, musical director and conductor of Orchestra de Paris, was found dead in his Richmond, Va., hotel room Wednesday morning, apparently the victim of a heart attack. His valet discovered the body. Munch was a native of Germany. He left when Hitler came to power. Munch conducted the Boston Symphony from 1948 to 1963 before going to the Orchestra de Paris. The orchestra was on tour and scheduled to perform Wednesday night. Munch's assistant, Serge Baudo, replaced him.

COLUMBUS CITIZEN-JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O.
A.M. - CIRC. 114,921

NOV-7--68

The Genial Musician

Most of the world thinks of Charles Munch as an orchestra conductor of international fame. We think of him as Tanglewood. Since 1951 he had been director of the Berkshire Music Center at Lenox, Mass., and conductor of summer festival concerts at Tanglewood.

The great musician once was asked how he happened to make orchestra conducting his career and he said, "Because I am too stupid to be anything else. I wanted to be a locomotive engineer."

He exaggerated. He was born into a musical family in Strasbourg 77 years ago. His father was a professor of music at Strasbourg Conservatory. Everyone in the family played musical instruments and the late Albert Schweitzer used to drop in for their musical evenings.

The conductor was a gentle, affable man, pleasant to patrons of the arts but much more interested in the members of his orchestra and their welfare.

It is said that he told them, "You know very well that I am nothing without you."

He was a popular man with musicians.

177

Charles Munch, Musician

There are many in the Capital District who remember, as one of their great moments in concert going that Sunday afternoon to Tanglewood when Charles Munch led the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a great throng of singers in the deeply moving Berlioz "Requiem."

Now a requiem sounds for Mr. Munch, musical director of the Boston Symphony from 1948 until 1963, who died in his sleep in Richmond, Va., while on a concert tour with his Paris Symphony Orchestra.

EDITORIAL

Mr. Munch was never a taskmaster nor a technician with the Boston Symphony. He was a conductor of musical mood, of color, of emotion. Some critics were inclined to believe that the orchestra, under his long direction, grew too easy-going and in his last years at Boston and Tanglewood had lost the fine honing that it had achieved. But there was ever great feeling for the music being presented. Only the harshest of critics were not frequently moved.

There was ever something princely about Mr. Munch. He was warm with his musicians, he could be austere in his relations with the public. He is no more, and the musical world is the poorer for his passing.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Friday, November 8, 1968

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
NOV 8 1968

Munch in Memoriam

By Peter M. Knapp

In a profession where aggressive, strong-willed, authoritarian and often abrasive men excel, Charles Munch was an unusual orchestral conductor. A gentle, dignified, even shy man, he was beloved by his musicians and his audiences.

Charles Munch was born Sept. 26, 1891, in Strasbourg, in Alsace-Lorraine, the much-contested German-French border province. A violinist and one-time concertmaster of the famed Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig under Fuertwaengler, Munch eventually found himself on the conductor's podium.

He came to this country in the mid-1940s, conducting the Boston Symphony in his American debut in 1946, succeeding Serge Koussevitzky in 1949 as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director. He retired from the orchestra after the Tanglewood season of 1962.

Wednesday morning in Richmond, Va., Charles Munch died in his sleep at the age of 77.

The Velvet Baton

No orchestra conductor, of course, can be adequately illuminated by biographical detail. Contrary to many conductors, Munch was a man who inspired affection. Unlike the martinet approach of others who considered the podium a throne, Munch was considerate of his players.

He was not a disciplinarian, and one never heard of him over-rehearsing. His approach was rather that of spontaneous inspiration, and Munch often could arouse a high degree of emotional fervor among his men. He communicated.

CHARLES MUNCH
(1891-1968)

The inspirational approach, however, has its drawbacks. In the later years of his BSO leadership, the orchestra often became ragged, even sloppy. Munch's performances could range from the sublime and the exciting, to the banal and untidy.

His conducting technique mirrored his musical temperament. A large, shaggy man, Munch would charge on stage, baton held before him like a sword. His conducting gestures were expansive, and as the music grew to its peak, Munch's beat — hardly precisely-defined at best — would grow more excitable and more woolly. At the climax, Munch would be transfixed in his own soundworld, right arm extended to the heavens, baton vibrating to urge ever more sound, head tilted back. Musicians often found this ardent style of emotional conducting irresistible.

Munch was a master of orchestral sound, though he paid less attention to detail and scrupulous polish. He was at his best in the romantic repertoire, and unexcelled in French music — Debussy, Ravel, Berlioz, Faure, Honegger, Saint-Saens. In Boston, he also presented a good deal of contemporary music. In baroque and classical music, his basically 19th century approach clashed with the more objective, clear and disciplined style that has become the current norm.

He reportedly was not well and fatigued at the end of his Boston Symphony leadership, but "retirement" for Munch did not result in stagnation. Indeed, relieved of the manifold burdens of the musical directorship, Munch was a busy guest conductor, regularly returning to Boston and to Tanglewood where he was always greeted with a warm ovation.

Illness forced the cancellation of his Tanglewood program last summer. His last Boston appearance found him leading a new orchestra — the Orchestre de Paris, which he founded as a French national orchestra under government auspices. He was on tour with this orchestra at the time of his death.

In memory of Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony last night performed "The Death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande." It is a work Munch performed often. Eloquent, refined and suave in its use of orchestral sonorities, it is a fitting musical tribute to a man who championed the cause of French music.

A farewell to Charles Munch

Charles Munch died on Nov. 5, 1968, at the age of 77 during a tour of the United States by the Orchestre de Paris which he had recently organized and of which he was the conductor. He had been the conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1949 to 1962. As president of the Trustees of the Orchestra I had had a part in his choice and our duties often brought us together during his tenure here in Boston.

He was a truly remarkable man and to my mind a great one, the sort of person whose friendship one coveted and which, I think, I finally achieved, in spite of his deficiencies in English and mine in French.

Music was to him the breath of life. Like the rest of us, he had his ups and downs, but when the ups took fire and kindled the orchestra the results were unforgettable. He taught us the treasures of French music in general and of Berlioz in particular. It was a wonderful 13 years. He left us largely I think because his warm heart could not tolerate the burden of telling any player that he was not up to Boston Symphony Orchestra standards (which unfortunately is one of the unpleasant jobs of a conductor).

Since leaving Boston he and I have kept in touch with each other, not by correspondence as he was the worst correspondent imaginable, but he always visited us when he was in Boston and my wife and I saw him several times in Paris. Our last meeting was about 10 days ago here in Boston. He seemed well and gave us a wonderful concert with his Orchestre de Paris. One remark, I cherish, was that his 13 years here in Boston were among the happiest of his life. He was grateful to us. We, the music lovers of Boston, are everlastingly grateful to him.

HENRY B. CABOT
Boston

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 9 1968 New England

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
NOV 8 1968 New England

Charles Munch

His name was Charles Munch, his language was music and his instrument, for a time was the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He came to us in the prime of his years and for 13 of them he lent us the fire of his imagination and the guidance of his musical wisdom. He spread the benefits and recognition of Boston's musical resources across two oceans and three continents.

When he departed it was to reap the vintage of his lifetime of learning, experience and devotion to music. His loyalty to the country of his birth called him home to France, but we were to see him again many times, for his efforts in behalf of the arts were as unstinting, as unselfish, as universal as his love for freedom, without national boundary or cultural discrimination.

In the midst of his service he has been taken from us. But each of us whose life was touched by his efforts can still sense the inspiration of his genius, the depth of his artistic vision, the gentility of his manner; and as long as orchestras play and audiences listen the ripples of his musical legacy will continue to diffuse throughout our culture.

The world is richer for his existence.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 9 1968 New England

Moving adieu to Munch opens BSO concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its farewell to Charles Munch, former music director who died Wednesday, by playing The Death of Melisande from Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande."

The piece was played by a request made by Munch himself some years ago. Erich Leinsdorf opened Thursday's and Friday's concert with it, and will do so again tonight. The audience stood during the music, as it customarily did in greeting to Munch at his recent appearances here.

Leinsdorf opened the regular part of Friday's program with Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony No. 1, played in the version for large orchestra that Schoenberg prepared in 1935.

It was an admirable performance, lucid in sonority, full of intensity and fire, and, except for the glossing over of the retard that prepares the coda, it was effectively paced. It was also an occasion for superb work from the orchestra.

Leonard Pennario, soloist in Rachmaninov's ingenious and diverting Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini is pianist enough to manage the notes with ease; however, his fluent playing was so undifferentiated, pianistically as well as musically, that he really hardly gave a performance at all.

Both he and Leinsdorf tended to rush like mad.

The concert ended with the Symphony No. 4 by Brahms.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
NOV 9 1968 New England

Charles Munch

When Charles Munch became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 19 years ago, many said he never would be another Koussevitzky. Of course they were right. The reserved, single-minded man who led the orchestra from 1949 to 1962 was nothing like the brilliant conductor-educator-showman who was Serge Koussevitzky.

But the new leader had virtues of his own: thoroughgoing musicianship with an especial affection for French music which he communicated to his audiences, a feeling for the spontaneous which on occasion could bring even the overworked warhorses of the musical repertoire to surging life, a concert-stage presence that dignified the orchestra, his calling and, indeed, the audience itself.

In Charles Munch's years with the Boston orchestra, he made a magnificent appearance on the podium. Tall and commanding, with a shock of silver hair that fell over his temples as he whipped up the strings in agitated passages, he was everybody's image of what a maestro should be. Reputedly, he was a particular favorite of female concert-goers past the meridian of life.

Yet the renowned Munch courtliness was but the outer manifestation of his own high regard for the job. He considered music-making important, and he treated his instrumentalists and audience with corresponding respect. Thereby he achieved dignity without stuffiness.

In the Berkshires as in Boston, Charles Munch was exclusively the conductor, with no time for pop publicity away from the concert stage. He believed the music itself to be the heart of the orchestral performance, and he sought each time to make it live for his listeners. He had high expectations for his art, and in many ears other than his own, he fulfilled them.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
NOV 8 1968 New England

The French gift

When Charles Munch passed on in Richmond, Virginia, he was in the midst of yet another foray in America to awaken further a love for French music. Through the Boston Symphony and its tours, and as guest conductor with other major orchestras, he revealed the flair and clarity and proportion that is the unique French gift.

If he was a missionary, he was a joyous one. He never pressed his views, neither on his musicians nor his audience. As one of his horn players said: "With Mr. Munch I was always allowed to give my own feeling, to be my own self." The audience found their response welling up within themselves spontaneously, too. This made for often greatly inspired musical evenings, with Mr. Munch the focal point for affection from player and listener alike.

Only last year Mr. Munch had assembled the Orchestre de Paris at the request of French Minister of Culture André Malraux. It was with this group that the conductor was in the midst of a triumphal American tour. Because of his work we can discern more clearly the mantle in modern French music that has passed to today's composers like Boulez and Messiaen.

177

Charles Munch, Musician

There are many in the Capital District who remember, as one of their great moments in concert going that Sunday afternoon to Tanglewood when Charles Munch led the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a great throng of singers in the deeply moving Berlioz "Requiem."

Now a requiem sounds for Mr. Munch, musical director of the Boston Symphony from 1948 until 1963, who died in his sleep in Richmond, Va., while on a concert tour with his Paris Symphony Orchestra.

EDITORIAL

Mr. Munch was never a taskmaster nor a technician with the Boston Symphony. He was a conductor of musical mood, of color, of emotion. Some critics were inclined to believe that the orchestra, under his long direction, grew too easy-going and in his last years at Boston and Tanglewood had lost the fine honing that it had achieved. But there was ever great feeling for the music being presented. Only the harshest of critics were not frequently moved.

There was ever something princely about Mr. Munch. He was warm with his musicians, he could be austere in his relations with the public. He is no more, and the musical world is the poorer for his passing.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Friday, November 8, 1968

Munch in Memoriam

By Peter M. Knapp

In a profession where aggressive, strong-willed, authoritarian and often abrasive men excel, Charles Munch was an unusual orchestral conductor. A gentle, dignified, even shy man, he was beloved by his musicians and his audiences.

Charles Munch was born Sept. 26, 1891, in Strasbourg, in Alsace-Lorraine, the much-contested German-French border province. A violinist and one-time concertmaster of the famed Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig under Fuertwaengler, Munch eventually found himself on the conductor's podium.

He came to this country in the mid-1940s, conducting the Boston Symphony in his American debut in 1946, succeeding Serge Koussevitzky in 1949 as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director. He retired from the orchestra after the Tanglewood season of 1962.

Wednesday morning in Richmond, Va., Charles Munch died in his sleep at the age of 77.

The Velvet Baton

No orchestra conductor, of course, can be adequately illuminated by biographical detail. Contrary to many conductors, Munch was a man who inspired affection. Unlike the martinet approach of others who considered the podium a throne, Munch was considerate of his players.

He was not a disciplinarian, and one never heard of him over-rehearsing. His approach was rather that of spontaneous inspiration, and Munch often could arouse a high degree of emotional fervor among his men. He communicated.

CHARLES MUNCH
(1891-1968)

The inspirational approach, however, has its drawbacks. In the later years of his BSO leadership, the orchestra often became ragged, even sloppy. Munch's performances could range from the sublime and the exciting, to the banal and untidy.

His conducting technique mirrored his musical temperament. A large, shaggy man, Munch would charge on stage, baton held before him like a sword. His conducting gestures were expansive, and as the music grew to its peak, Munch's beat — hardly precisely-defined at best — would grow more excitable and more woolly. At the climax, Munch would be transfixed in his own soundworld, right arm extended to the heavens, baton vibrating to urge ever more sound, head tilted back. Musicians often found this ardent style of emotional conducting irresistible.

Munch was a master of orchestral sound, though he paid less attention to detail and scrupulous polish. He was at his best in the romantic repertoire, and unexcelled in French music — Debussy, Ravel, Berlioz, Faure, Honegger, Saint-Saens. In Boston, he also presented a good deal of contemporary music. In baroque and classical music, his basically 19th century approach clashed with the more objective, clear and disciplined style that has become the current norm.

He reportedly was not well and fatigued at the end of his Boston Symphony leadership, but "retirement" for Munch did not result in stagnation. Indeed, relieved of the manifold burdens of the musical directorship, Munch was a busy guest conductor, regularly returning to Boston and to Tanglewood where he was always greeted with a warm ovation.

Illness forced the cancellation of his Tanglewood program last summer. His last Boston appearance found him leading a new orchestra — the Orchestre de Paris, which he founded as a French national orchestra under government auspices. He was on tour with this orchestra at the time of his death.

In memory of Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony last night performed "The Death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande." It is a work Munch performed often. Eloquent, refined and suave in its use of orchestral sonorities, it is a fitting musical tribute to a man who championed the cause of French music.

A farewell to Charles Munch

Charles Munch died on Nov. 5, 1968, at the age of 77 during a tour of the United States by the Orchestre de Paris which he had recently organized and of which he was the conductor. He had been the conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1949 to 1962. As president of the Trustees of the Orchestra I had had a part in his choice and our duties often brought us together during his tenure here in Boston.

He was a truly remarkable man and to my mind a great one, the sort of person whose friendship one coveted and which, I think, I finally achieved, in spite of his deficiencies in English and mine in French.

Music was to him the breath of life. Like the rest of us, he had his ups and downs, but when the ups took fire and kindled the orchestra the results were unforgettable. He taught us the treasures of French music in general and of Berlioz in particular. It was a wonderful 13 years. He left us largely I think because his warm heart could not tolerate the burden of telling any player that he was not up to Boston Symphony Orchestra standards (which unfortunately is one of the unpleasant jobs of a conductor).

Since leaving Boston he and I have kept in touch with each other, not by correspondence as he was the worst correspondent imaginable, but he always visited us when he was in Boston and my wife and I saw him several times in Paris. Our last meeting was about 10 days ago here in Boston. He seemed well and gave us a wonderful concert with his Orchestre de Paris. One remark, I cherish, was that his 13 years here in Boston were among the happiest of his life. He was grateful to us. We, the music lovers of Boston, are everlastingly grateful to him.

HENRY B. CABOT
Boston

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

NOV 9 1968 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

NOV 8 1968

Charles Munch

His name was Charles Munch, his language was music and his instrument, for a time was the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He came to us in the prime of his years and for 13 of them he lent us the fire of his imagination and the guidance of his musical wisdom. He spread the benefits and recognition of Boston's musical resources across two oceans and three continents.

When he departed it was to reap the vintage of his lifetime of learning, experience and devotion to music. His loyalty to the country of his birth called him home to France, but we were to see him again many times, for his efforts in behalf of the arts were as unstinting, as unselfish, as universal as his love for freedom, without national boundary or cultural discrimination.

In the midst of his service he has been taken from us. But each of us whose life was touched by his efforts can still sense the inspiration of his genius, the depth of his artistic vision, the gentility of his manner; and as long as orchestras play and audiences listen the ripples of his musical legacy will continue to diffuse throughout our culture.

The world is richer for his existence.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

NOV 8 1968 New England

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

NOV 9 1968 New England

Moving adieu to Munch opens BSO concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its farewell to Charles Munch, former music director who died Wednesday, by playing The Death of Melisande from Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande."

The piece was played by a request made by Munch himself some years ago. Erich Leinsdorf opened Thursday's and Friday's concert with it, and will do so again tonight. The audience stood during the music, as it customarily did in greeting to Munch at his recent appearances here.

Leinsdorf opened the regular part of Friday's program with Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony No. 1, played in the version for large orchestra that Schoenberg prepared in 1935.

It was an admirable performance, lucid in sonority, full of intensity and fire, and, except for the glossing over of the retard that prepares the coda, it was effectively paced. It was also an occasion for superb work from the orchestra.

Leonard Pennario, soloist in Rachmaninov's ingenious and diverting Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini is pianist enough to manage the notes with ease; however, his fluent playing was so undifferentiated, pianistically as well as musically, that he really hardly gave a performance at all.

Both he and Leinsdorf tended to rush like mad.

The concert ended with the Symphony No. 4 by Brahms.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. [illegible]

NOV [illegible] New England

Charles Munch

When Charles Munch became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 19 years ago, many said he never would be another Koussevitzky. Of course they were right. The reserved, single-minded man who led the orchestra from 1949 to 1962 was nothing like the brilliant conductor-educator-showman who was Serge Koussevitzky.

But the new leader had virtues of his own: thoroughgoing musicianship with an especial affection for French music which he communicated to his audiences, a feeling for the spontaneous which on occasion could bring even the overworked warhorses of the musical repertoire to surging life, a concert-stage presence that dignified the orchestra, his calling and, indeed, the audience itself.

In Charles Munch's years with the Boston orchestra, he made a magnificent appearance on the podium. Tall and commanding, with a shock of silver hair that fell over his temples as he whipped up the strings in agitated passages, he was everybody's image of what a maestro should be. Reputedly, he was a particular favorite of female concert-goers past the meridian of life.

Yet the renowned Munch courtliness was but the outer manifestation of his own high regard for the job. He considered music-making important, and he treated his instrumentalists and audience with corresponding respect. Thereby he achieved dignity without stuffiness.

In the Berkshires as in Boston, Charles Munch was exclusively the conductor, with no time for pop publicity away from the concert stage. He believed the music itself to be the heart of the orchestral performance, and he sought each time to make it live for his listeners. He had high expectations for his art, and in many ears other than his own, he fulfilled them.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

NOV 8 1968 New England

The French gift

When Charles Munch passed on in Richmond, Virginia, he was in the midst of yet another foray in America to awaken further a love for French music. Through the Boston Symphony and its tours, and as guest conductor with other major orchestras, he revealed the flair and clarity and proportion that is the unique French gift.

If he was a missionary, he was a joyous one. He never pressed his views, neither on his musicians nor his audience. As one of his horn players said: "With Mr. Munch I was always allowed to give my own feeling, to be my own self." The audience found their response welling up within themselves spontaneously, too. This made for often greatly inspired musical evenings, with Mr. Munch the focal point for affection from player and listener alike.

Only last year Mr. Munch had assembled the Orchestre de Paris at the request of French Minister of Culture André Malraux. It was with this group that the conductor was in the midst of a triumphal American tour. Because of his work we can discern more clearly the mantle in modern French music that has passed to today's composers like Boulez and Messiaen.

178

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1968

Weekend Symphony

The Music Was Munch's: Gentle

By McLAREN HARRIS

The weekend Symphony program bears scant resemblance to the one originally planned for this time. Only Rachmaninov remains from the first composers list of Beethoven, Rachmaninov, Weill and Liszt. A week ago it was altered to read Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Weill and Rachmaninov, and upon the death of Charles Munch the final form became Faure, Schoenberg, Rachmaninov and Brahms.

ACCORDING TO some of the Symphony players Munch had once expressed a preference that "The Death of Melisande" from Faure's Incidental Music to "Pelleas et Melisande" be performed in his memory. As was the man, so is the music — gentle, unpretentious, expressive through its intrinsic simplicity. It is a true lament, solemn but without rending tragedy, mournful more through implication than on its exterior. Faure and the memory of a conductor merged with silence; than these there could have been no greater eloquence.

Schoenberg's Kammersymphonie, Op. 9b, followed Faure. Looking back at this product of 1906 comes almost as a jolt of revelation, for what was greeted with derision and dismay 60 years ago now appears as but a step in Schoenberg's evolution and a logical extension of 19th-century Wagner and Strauss.

In expanded harmonic language and with chains of thematic fourths it is yet tonal, but now it seems that such harmony matters less than what happens to its motives and in its scoring. Through revealing soloistic writing its themes undergo very concentrated development; its phrase-structures are brief but with undiminished content so that a kaleidoscopic succession of ideas passes by in a short time. Its mood and texture change, but the chain of fourths — ascending, descending or divided among various timbres — forges a firm unity.

Opus 9b is the version for full orchestra, and the Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf performed it well, losing none of its internal facets or dynamic shape. Yet there is an inescapable alteration of tonal makeup, for where the original scoring for 16 instruments produces a more incisive, sharply transparent substance, the later version is reminiscent of Strauss in assigning solo lines to full sections. Its beauty and intensity, however, remain.

RACHMANINOV'S RHAPSODY on a Theme of Paganini, Op. 43, is one of those works whose merits it is possible to forget after some separation. One remembers its playful thematic turns and the warmly romantic melody at its center, perhaps that is all, and marks it down mentally as a sentimental trifle. But it is much more — a marvel of variation technique, a pianistic tour de force, a work of many moods whose peripatetic digressions never seem to tear quite loose from the subject at hand.

The performance of Leonard Pennario, substituting for an indisposed Jorge Bolet, was polished and captivating in moments of lightly virtuosic display, and a well-informed lyric flow warmed the interior strains. During heavier passages he was inclined to look to the pedal for support and it didn't help his articulation. Sometimes, too, Pennario and the orchestra didn't know quite what to expect from one another, but for that the Rhapsody fared with full voice and attractive flair.

To my knowledge this week brings the first Brahms Fourth Symphony Leinsdorf has conducted here since early 1962, and I much regret that it seemed to have been brought up in something of a hurry (it was originally scheduled for next Tuesday). Brahms, perhaps especially in the Fourth Symphony, does not benefit by haste.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,005

NOV 10 1968 New England

Boston Symphony music a tribute to Munch

Memorial music for Charles Munch, former Boston Symphony conductor, will be played at the orchestra's Tuesday concert and on tour programs the week of Nov. 18.

Munch, 77, died in his sleep Wednesday morning in Richmond, Va. He had been conducting the Orchestre de Paris on its first American tour.

As at the Thursday, Friday and Saturday concerts last week, "The Death of Melisande" from Faure's Incidental Music to "Pelleas and Melisande" will be the musical tribute, Munch's own choice.

Revised programs for this week, all conducted by Charles Wilson, will be as follows:

Tuesday at 8:30 — The Faure, Brahms' Symphony No. 3, the Rachmaninoff Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini (Leonard Pennario, piano), Stravinsky "Le Sacre du printemps."

Friday at 2, Saturday at 8:30 — Strauss' "Don Juan," Stravinsky's "Le Chant du rossignol," Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

The tour performances of Bach's "Wedding Cantata" and the Brahms Requiem will be dedicated to Munch.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,950

NOV 11 1968

The Human Side

Many Rhode Island concertgoers will cherish the memory of Dr. Charles Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Veterans Auditorium. There was excitement when he raised his baton and even those with little technical knowledge of music knew that while the sounds he evoked might be matched by other conductors, few could excel him in depth of feeling. He once said, "If there is a choice to be made between the artistic heights of achievement and the plain human side, let's choose the latter."

His human side somehow seemed to come through to his Providence audiences — in his bow and his smile. The accounts of his relationship with the musicians who worked under his direction are testimony to his gentleness and warmth.

For 14 years, he was musical director of the Boston Symphony, one of America's greatest orchestras. His retirement in 1962 saddened many admirers in the Boston-Providence area and took from the American orchestral scene one of its leading lights. Music-lovers then could only hope to catch one of his occasional guest appearances.

Although he was European by birth and heritage, it seems fitting that the end should come in this country where he spent so many years and where he made his most important contribution to the world of music and to those whose lives were enriched along his way.

Boston Symphony

Moving tribute to Charles Munch

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony this week paid a quiet tribute to the memory of Charles Munch, fulfilling an oft-expressed wish of his by playing Fauré's "The Death of Melisande." Recasting of the program brought us also, after intermission, the Brahms Fourth, in its own elegiac way equally commemorative, though at the other end of the emotional scale and speaking a very different language.

With this performance the concert became very much Mr. Leinsdorf's. Whoever said that the conductor's function is to convey experience probably meant to the players, some of whom, of necessity, benefit from such guidance; but Mr. Leinsdorf went further and showed the audience what they could hardly achieve for themselves — a fusion of Brahms' Vienna with life as we know it here and now.

When Mr. Leinsdorf first came to the Metropolitan Opera he was notorious among the stage hands for making Wagner last minutes longer than his predecessor had. In Boston this week he noticeably took minutes off the playing time of the Brahms Fourth, heightening the work's emotional charge and revealing its splendid design while letting every detail speak tellingly in its place. This is where experience shows, of both conductor and players (and ultimately of the audience too). The orchestra, under such direction, reaches a kind of superchamber music understanding among itself, even while its total sound meets the concept of its leader—a discreet instrumental eloquence, quite unlike the full-throated songlike sound it gave Colin Davis recently or the translucent texture it used to give Charles Munch. Yet of course there is continuity of aim and dedication, the many personnel changes notwithstanding.

Incandescence

Mr. Leinsdorf's Brahms reached heights of incandescence and depths of reflection that set this performance firmly in the memory. In passing one has to deplore an occasional intonation problem among the horns but to commend the excellence of the brass otherwise, and the overall tidy voices of the strings. The leadership of Joseph Silverstein and of his fellow principals is showing handsomely these days. The solo woodwinds do not seem as much in evidence as formerly, but Everett Firth's electrifying timpani playing does, and of course Doriot Anthony Dwyer's solo had one holding one's breath.

The program changes denied us Stravinsky's "Nightingale's Song" and a suite derived from Kurt Weill's "Threepenny Opera," but gave us the announced Schoenberg "Kammersymphonie" (in its 1935 rescored form) and the Rachmaninov Paganini rhapsody, which Leonard Pennario played at short notice (Jorge Bolet being indisposed). This Pennario-Leinsdorf partnership proved unbeatable. They took more minutes off the playing time — in fact the headlong pace increased the satanic nature of the work and heightened its balletic potential (as Charles Munch, to a very different end, used to do in the Beethoven Sixth). The clean, no-nonsense lyricism, the sharp rib-poking, the witty thematic tricks, all provided capital entertainment, and the soloist's wizard pianism recalled Rachmaninov at his own best.

'Frontier piece'

The work's startling excitement served to eclipse the meritorious Schoenberg that had preceded it, a true masterpiece of its transitional period, a brave new frontier piece. The Rachmaninov, after all, draws copiously from all directions except the future, and in so doing steals all the other man's thunder. But that's how it is. Mr. Leinsdorf is on top of it all. We shall miss him next week, but Charles Wilson promises us the Strauss "Don Juan," the Britten "Peter Grimes" interludes, and the Sibelius Second.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, November 10, 1968

Charles Munch, Conductor, 1891-1968

Charles Munch was a very French conductor. He was a musician of emotion, not a strict technician. And he was regarded as a gracious presence during his thirteen years with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tanglewood.

An interlude between the autocratic reins of Serge Koussevitsky and Erich Leinsdorf, Munch was loved by audience and musicians alike. But critics often found fault. He was not strict enough, he was not stern, in either the handling of his music or in the handling of his musicians. He played what he felt and that was not often exactly what was dictated by the score. But to those who followed him, his music was well loved.

In his last peformance in this area, he conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center in a program of Berlioz and Ravel. It could be considered a typical Munch concert.

The "Symphonie Fantastique" rumbled and crashed with emotion and the Ravel piano concerto bounded. The audience was smallish but responded in warm volume. It was a heart-felt rapport with a musician of a passing school.

Munch was to have returned again, not only to Saratoga but to his only American home, the Boston Symphony, this past summer. Illness prevented his making this last tour of a summer festival area that once was run almost solely under his influence, in the days before the advent of Eugene Ormandy at Saratoga and Pablo Casals at Marlboro.

He died Wednesday in Richmond, Va., hours before he was to have conducted his year-old Orchestre de Paris in a concert there.

—JOAN SIMMONS

State Funeral Today For Munch

BOSTON (UPI)—The French government will hold a state funeral in Paris Tuesday for Charles Munch, retired musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died last Wednesday at Richmond, Va.

Munch, 77, will be accorded a state funeral because of his honorary post as a Grand Officer of the Legion of Honor.

The Boston Symphony will be represented by Erich Leinsdorf, Munch's successor, and Thomas D. Perry Jr., the orchestra manager.

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 56,000

NOV 12 1968 New England

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

NOV 11 1968 New England

Music Notables In Last Tribute To Charles Munch

PARIS — The Paris musical community joined yesterday in paying last respects to Charles Munch, director of the Paris Orchestra, who died last week in Richmond, Va.

Among those at the funeral services at the Protestant Temple de L'Oratorie were Andre Malreaux, minister of state for cultural affairs; Marcel Landowski, director of music at the mininsty; Maurice Doublet, prefect governor of the Paris region; Eric Leinsdorf, who succeeded Munch as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Lubn Yordanov, first violin of the Paris Orchestra.

The Rev. Georges Marchal conducted the religious ceremony, and Landowski gave a brief eulogy.

Associated Press

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

NOV 13 1968 New England

Berkshire Music Lovers Recall Symphony Conductor

By ED TOOLE
Union Staff Writer

PITTSFIELD — Music lovers of the Berkshires Monday recalled with affection Charles Munch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, who died of a heart attack in Richmond, Va., last week.

Arrived in 1950

Patrons of the Tanglewood concerts in Lenox traveled from wide spread areas to hear his often inspired orchestra arrangements and interpretations.

From his first appearance at the Berkshire Music Festival in the summer of 1950 until his final performance — the Beethoven Ninth Symphony in 1962 — Munch held the esteem of orchestra members, music lovers, and vacationers who became familiar with classical music after attending a few of his concerts.

Others remembering him are those who had the opportunity of watching him work in rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Unfortunately few could witness the impact of the warmth of his personality while he was conducting.

Interest in Golf

Following a concert he departed quickly from the Tanglewood Music Shed. On Sunday afternoons he could be seen teeing off alone for a few holes of golf at the Stockbridge Golf Club. After a midweek night concert he would visit the Red Lion Inn, often entering and leaving unnoticed.

James Stagliano and Harry Shapiro of the orchestra gave him his interest in the game of golf, and golf pro Jack White, of Springfield, instructed him.

He often relaxed in the flower gardens at Elm Court in Lenox where he stayed. He spent many hours strolling with his old friend Pierre Monteux, who often was guest conductor with the BSO at Tanglewood.

Trip to Russia

With now retired BSO manager George Judd, Munch added tremendously to the orchestra's stature. The organization reached a peak during his directorship. The European tour of 1952 that took the BSO to Russia, and transcontinental and Far East tours of 1953 and 1960 made for an international reputation.

From the first season at Tanglewood, Munch was recognized as a musician who was absorbed by the music he was conducting and one who could communicate it better than any other conductor of his day.

While he was a student of Bach's music, he was also a noted interpreter of the themes of Berlioz. He closed the Tanglewood season most years with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in a manner that electrified his audiences. He always hurried off stage to seclusion, especially after his greatest triumphs.

Reached Zenith

Many concert goers first became serious music lovers after hearing the symphony perform Ravel's "Bolero" under the baton of Munch.

That the orchestra under Munch reached its zenith at Tanglewood during those dozen years he reigned is undeniable.

Last summer Berkshire music lovers eagerly awaited his return as guest conductor at Tanglewood, but illness canceled his return.

Pierre Monteux, right, a familiar guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, is shown with his close friend Charles Munch, who died in Richmond, Va.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450

NOV 14 1968 New

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 56,000

NOV 13 1968 New

NEWS (E)
MILFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 10,000

NOV 13 1968 New

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

NOV 13 1968 New

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 133,800

NOV 13 1968 New

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

NOV 13 1968 New England

Memorial rites set for Munch

BOSTON (UPI) — Memorial services will be held at noon Thursday at Trinity Church for Charles Munch, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and several college music groups will participate in the service for Munch, who died unexpectedly last Wednesday in Richmond, Va.

The 77-year-old conductor was on tour with the Orchestre de Paris when he did.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650

NOV 13 1968 New

HERALD NEWS (e)
FALL RIVER, MASS.
CIRC. 41,700

NOV 13 1968 New

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,401

NOV 13 1968 New

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 96,932

NOV 13 1968 New

COLUMBUS CITIZEN-JOURNAL
COLUMBUS, O.
A.M. - CIRC. 114,921

NOV-13-68

0-47

Notes on Music, Dance: Boston Symphony Honors Charles Munch

179.

In memory of Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 until 1962, several changes have been made in the fall season of the orchestra by Erich Leinsdorf, his successor.

Most of the substitutions will be French music, the area of Munch's specialization. Most of his conducting career was in Paris and he was the conductor of the L'Orchestre de Paris at the time of his death in Richmond, Va., a week ago.

Among the substitutions is "The Death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to "Peleas and Melisande" which will replace the Overture to "The Marriage of Fiagro" in the concert to be given in Springfield, Mass. on Monday night.

Speaking of Munch's death Leinsdorf said: "When last January I heard the newly formed Orchestre de Paris under Charles Munch in Paris, I was agin aware what a delightful and luminous man and musician he was. When such a man leaves us, an irreplaceable light has gone out."

* * *

SHARLES MUNCH

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 88,913 SUN. 129,006

NOV 15 1968

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,401

NOV 12 1968 New England

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250

NOV 14 1968 New England

Service to Honor Munch Scheduled Today in Boston

Special to The New York Times

BOSTON, Nov. 13—A memorial service for Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, will be held at noon tomorrow in Trinity Episcopal Church, in Copley Square. Mr. Munch died last Wednesday.

The service, which will be largely musical, will be conducted by the Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity. A group of musicians from the symphony, under the direction of Charels Wilson, will play.

Others taking part will be members of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, the New England Conservatory Chorus and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

Memorial Rites For Munch at Trinity Church

A memorial service for the late Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, will be held today at noon at Trinity Church, Copley Square. The service, largely musical, will be open to the public. Charles Wilson will conduct.

Participants, in addition to members of the Boston Symphony, include the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, the New England Conservatory Chorus and Berj Zamkochian, organist. The Rev. Theodore Ferris will officiate for the service.

The musical portion of the service will consist of Barber's Adagio for Strings, the Shepherd's Farewell from Berlioz' "L'Enfance du Christ," Brahms' "How Lovely Is Thy Dwelling Place" from the German Requiem, and a Bach chorale, "O Lord, thy little angel send," from the St. John Passion.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

NOV 14 1968 New England

High Tribute Paid to Music Great

Munch Memorial Rites Thronged

By CHARLES LEVERONI

Trinity Church in Copley Square was filled yesterday at a memorial service for Dr. Charles Munch, a great and distinguished musician who died Nov. 6 in Richmond, Va.

Dr. Munch was music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962. A music program appropriate to the occasion performed by his former associates was part of the service.

Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity and a trustee of the Boston Symphony, in a tribute said Dr. Munch lived for his music and made his music come alive.

"I knew him to be a gentle, affectionate but shy man who did not like crowds but loved people. I like to think that the longer Dr. Munch lived near us that the more he came to love us."

MUSIC WAS provided by a group of 35 Boston Symphony members. Other participants were the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, New England Conservatory Chorus and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony conducted. Selections included: "Adagio for Strings" by Barber; the "Shepherd's Farewell from L'Enfance du Christ" by Berlioz; "How Lovely is Thy Dwelling Place" from the German Requiem by Brahms; "O Lord, Thy Little Angel Send," from the St. John Passion by Bach and the Bach chorale prelude, "When We Are in The Greatest Need."

Elliot Forbes conducted the Harvard and Radcliffe groups and Lorna Cooke De Varon conducted the conservatory chorus.

Those attending included Arthur Fiedler; Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony; Talcott Banks, president of the BSO board of trustees; French Consul General and Mrs. Jacques Massenet; Antonio Malva Gomez, Brazilian vice consul; Nicholas Webster, representing the New York Philharmonic; the Rev. Palfrey Perkins, minister-emeritus of Kings Chapel, and Mrs. G. Wallace Woodworth.

(Herald Traveler Staff Photo by Warren Patriquin)

MEMORIAL SERVICE for Boston Symphony conductor, Charles Munch, was held in Trinity Church yesterday. BSO musicians and Harvard, Radcliffe and New England Conservatory choral groups participated.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

NOV 15 1968 New England

180.

OBITUARIES

MUSICAL TRIBUTE — Charles Wilson conducts members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and chorus at memorial service for Charles Munch.

Boston Gives Its Music, Heart in Munch Tribute

Boston paid its respects Thursday to the memory of a man who for 13 seasons had been at the heart of its musical activities.

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, was honored in a noontime memorial service held in Trinity Church, and the tribute was rendered by musical forces intimately associated with Mr. Munch during his long tenure here.

Conductor Charles Wilson led the Boston Symphony in Samuel Barber's Adagio for strings, while the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and the New England Conservatory Chorus joined the orchestra in selections from "L'Enfance du Christ" by Berlioz, "Ein deutsches Requiem" by Brahms, and the St. John Passion by Bach.

Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony, offered prayers, scriptural text and an appreciation. Organist Berj Zamkochian concluded the service with Bach's chorale prelude "Wenn wir in hoechsten Noeten sein."

Mr Munch had only a short time ago— Oct. 23—returned to the local musical scene, this time as music director of the Orchestre de Paris, a group he had formed two years ago at the request of the French government.

He honored Boston by choosing it as the site of his first North American appearance with the Orchestre. Boston had in turn honored him on the occasion with ovations of unusual warmth and affection.

Only two weeks later the international musical community was shocked to learn of his death, at 77, in Richmond, Va., while still on tour with the Ochestre.

A Grand Officer of the Legion of Honor, he was given a state funeral in Paris Tuesday. The Boston Symphony was represented by its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, and its manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr.

Thursday's public service was attended by dignitaries who included members of the Symphony's board of trustees and the French Consulate. Former members of the orchestra also paid their respects. One was a double-bassist who began his Boston Symphony career under Pierre Monteux in 1920.

But the hundreds of people attending were mostly those who had never known Mr. Murch, and whose respect for the man grew out of admiration for his musical attributes.

The fact was in keeping with the character of a person eulogized by Rev. Mr. Ferris as one who "... never came very close to many of us. He didn't have to. Music mattered more than anything else to him and if we loved the music, and listened to it, that was all he asked and all we needed."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

NOV 15 1968 New

The Eulogy For Munch

Following is the text of the eulogy offered by Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, in the memory of Charles Munch:

"We are here to remember Charles Munch, the kind of man he was, the music he made for us, and the place he made for himself in our hearts.

"He never came very close to many of us. He didn't have to. Music mattered more than anything else to him and if we loved the music, and listened to it, that was all he asked and all we needed.

'We could see that he made music for the joy of making it; we could tell that by watching him when he was conducting. His back and shoulders rose and fell with the music when it began to surge; and when the climax came, his face, if you could see it, was like the shining sun.

"He was a simple man. He went to the peak of fame, but was never a prima donna. He had thousands of admirers, but never held court and never had a cult of idolizers.

"He was a shy man and was never at ease in a crowd. But he loved people and enjoyed the company of his friends, especially if they spoke French or loved music. They were his family and glowed in the warmth of his affection and fun.

"He was a quiet man, but in his own way he loved life—not noisily, boisterously, but quietly, heartily. He enjoyed a good meal, a good story, and above everything else, a good trip—especially with the orchestra. Every four years the spirit moved him and the road called, first to France, then to Russia, finally to Japan. But never alone; always his music-makers went with him and shared his excitement and joy.

"He was a gentle man. He could be stern if he had to be, but he didn't like to be. It wasn't his nature. It was natural for him to be kind, thoughtful, considerate and understanding. Seldom has a great artist been at the same time so tender and so gentle.

"There is no regret, no sadness in our memories of this man; only gratitude. We are thankful that he came our way; that for thirteen seasons, under increasing difficulties, he gave us the music he loved. We like to think the longer he stayed with us, the better he liked us. We know that our affection for him grew with the years.

"We cannot be sad for him. He had no fear of death, and he died quitely without a single distortion of his body or soul. He had put down his baton after the final chord of D major and walked off the stage of life onto the wings where he is free to be himself, to sing, to soar."

OBITUARIES

Paris Rites for Munch; Hub Honor on Thursday

A state funeral was held in Paris today for Dr. Charles Munch, music director and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 until 1962, who died last week in Richmond, Va., while on tour with the Orchestre de Paris.

Mr. Munch founded the Paris orchestra two years ago at the request of the French Government. He was a Grand Officer of the Legion of Honor of France and, as such, was accorded today's honors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was represented by its present music director and conductor Erich Leinsdorf and manager Thomas D. Perry Jr.

A memorial service for the late music authority will be held here in Boston, Thursday noon, at Trinity Church, Copley sq.

Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will officiate.

The service, largely musical, is open to the public. Charles Wilson will conduct.

In addition to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, other participating in the memorial service, all of whom had had close musical associations with Dr. Munch, will be the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, New England Conservatory Chorus and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

The musical portion of the memorial service to Dr. Munch will inculde "Adagio for Strings," by Barber and performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; "Shepherd's Farewell," from "L'Enfance du Christ," by Berlioz, by the combined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; "How Lovely is They Dwelling Place," from a German Requiem, by Brams, with the New England Conservatory Chorus; "O Lord, Thy Little Angel Send," from Bach's Passion According to St. John (English text) by the chorale and an Organ Postlude by Berj Zamochian.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

NOV 12 1968 New

1000 Pay Respects to Munch During Trinity Church Rites

Music filled Trinity Church this noon at a memori l service for Dr. Charles Munch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nearly 1000 persons attended to pay final respects to Dr. Munch, music director of the B.S.O. from 1949 until 1962. He died Nov. 6 in Richmond, Va.

The service was largely musical, with members of the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the New England Conservatory Chorus massed before the altar.

The orchestra, conducted by Charles Wilson, played Barber's "Adagio for Strings," and accompanied the Harvard-Radcliffe groups in "The Shepherd's Farewell" by Berlioz and the conservatory chorus in Brahms' "How Lovely is Thy Dwelling Place."

Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, the rector, delivered the eulogy to Dr. Munch, saying, "Music mattered more to him than anything else. If we listened, that was all he asked and all we needed."

He characterized Dr. Munch as "a gentleman, kind, thoughtful and considerate," and said, "Seldom has a great artist been so gentle and tender."

"We feel no sorrow, only gratitude to him," Dr. Ferris said. "He died quietly. He put down his baton on the final chord of D major and walked offstage into the wings — free to sing and soar."

Members of the orchestra other than the 35 who took part were in attendance, along with the orchestra staff, some of whom served as ushers.

Aslo present were Thomas Perry, orchestra manager, and Mrs. Perry; Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler; Talcott Banks, president of the orchestra trustees, and other members of the board, and French Consul General and Mrs. Jacques Massenet.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

NOV 14 1968

Music Memorializes Munch

Boston — (AP) — A largely musical memorial service to the late Charles Munch, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was held in Trinity Church yesterday.

Those attending included members of the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

The service was conducted by the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church and a trustee of the symphony orchestra.

Dr. Munch, who was music director of the orchestra from 1949 to 1962, died Nov. 6 in Richmond, Va., while touring with the Orchestre de Paris, which he founded two years ago at the request of the French government.

He was given a state funeral Tuesday in Paris. Erich Leinsdorf, who succeeded Dr. Munch as music director of the Boston Symphony, went to Europe for the funeral and did not attend yesterday's memorial.

The orchestra was conducted by Charles Wilson, assistant conducter, at the memorial service.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

NOV 15 1968 New England

MUSIC FILLED Trinity Church this noon where a memorial service was held for Dr. Charles Munch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Members of the Symphony and three choruses massed on the altar for the tribute which included Brahms' "How Lovely Is Thy Dwelling Place." (Globe photo by Paul Connell.) See story on Page 51.

Munch Rites Held in Boston

BOSTON (AP) — The memory of Charles Munch, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was celebrated in a vocal and instrumental ceremony at Trinity Episcopal Church Thursday.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra, led the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and the New England Conservatory Chorus in musical selections. The Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of the church, conducted the service.

Dr. Munch was music director of the orchestra from 1949 to 1962. He died Nov. 6 and was given a state funeral Tuesday in Paris. He was conductor of the Paris Symphony Orchestra when he died.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

NOV 15 1968 New

'In full glory'

Henry B. Cabot's farewell to Charles Munch spoke for us all, but I would like to add my own personal tribute to a superb musician, a wonderful human being and, above all, a great friend. His last memory of Symphony Hall must have given him such happiness, for the outpouring of affectionate and admiring ovations warmed his heart at his concert with his Orchestre de Paris, just two weeks before his death. And, in the midst of our sorrow at losing him, we can rejoice in the words of Nadia Boulanger: "He has departed at the height of his activity, in full glory, and that is a consolation for his friends."

WINIFRED H. JOHNSTONE
Boston

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

NOV 1[illegible] 19[illegible] New England

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

NOV 14 1968 New

180.

OBITUARIES

MUSICAL TRIBUTE — Charles Wilson conducts members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and chorus at memorial service for Charles Munch.

Boston Gives Its Music, Heart in Munch Tribute

Boston paid its respects Thursday to the memory of a man who for 13 seasons had been at the heart of its musical activities.

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, was honored in a noontime memorial service held in Trinity Church, and the tribute was rendered by musical forces intimately associated with Mr. Munch during his long tenure here.

Conductor Charles Wilson led the Boston Symphony in Samuel Barber's Adagio for strings, while the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and the New England Conservatory Chorus joined the orchestra in selections from "L'Enfance du Christ" by Berlioz, "Ein deutsches Requiem" by Brahms, and the St. John Passion by Bach.

Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony, offered prayers, scriptural text and an appreciation. Organist Berj Zamkochian concluded the service with Bach's chorale prelude "Wenn wir in hoechsten Noeten sein."

Mr Munch had only a short time ago— Oct. 23—returned to the local musical scene, this time as music director of the Orchestre de Paris, a group he had formed two years ago at the request of the French government.

He honored Boston by choosing it as the site of his first North American appearance with the Orchestre. Boston had in turn honored him on the occasion with ovations of unusual warmth and affection.

Only two weeks later the international musical community was shocked to learn of his death, at 77, in Richmond, Va., while still on tour with the Ochestre.

A Grand Officer of the Legion of Honor, he was given a state funeral in Paris Tuesday. The Boston Symphony was represented by its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, and its manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr.

Thursday's public service was attended by dignitaries who included members of the Symphony's board of trustees and the French Consulate. Former members of the orchestra also paid their respects. One was a double-bassist who began his Boston Symphony career under Pierre Monteux in 1920.

But the hundreds of people attending were mostly those who had never known Mr. Murch, and whose respect for the man grew out of admiration for his musical attributes.

The fact was in keeping with the character of a person eulogized by Rev. Mr. Ferris as one who "... never came very close to many of us. He didn't have to. Music mattered more than anything else to him and if we loved the music, and listened to it, that was all he asked and all we needed."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

NOV 15 1968 New

The Eulogy For Munch

Following is the text of the eulogy offered by Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, in the memory of Charles Munch:

"We are here to remember Charles Munch, the kind of man he was, the music he made for us, and the place he made for himself in our hearts.

"He never came very close to many of us. He didn't have to. Music mattered more than anything else to him and if we loved the music, and listened to it, that was all he asked and all we needed.

'We could see that he made music for the joy of making it; we could tell that by watching him when he was conducting. His back and shoulders rose and fell with the music when it began to surge; and when the climax came, his face, if you could see it, was like the shining sun.

"He was a simple man. He went to the peak of fame, but was never a prima donna. He had thousands of admirers, but never held court and never had a cult of idolizers.

"He was a shy man and was never at ease in a crowd. But he loved people and enjoyed the company of his friends, especially if they spoke French or loved music. They were his family and glowed in the warmth of his affection and fun.

"He was a quiet man, but in his own way he loved life—not noisily, boisterously, but quietly, heartily. He enjoyed a good meal, a good story, and above everything else, a good trip—especially with the orchestra. Every four years the spirit moved him and the road called, first to France, then to Russia, finally to Japan. But never alone; always his music-makers went with him and shared his excitement and joy.

"He was a gentle man. He could be stern if he had to be, but he didn't like to be. It wasn't his nature. It was natural for him to be kind, thoughtful, considerate and understanding. Seldom has a great artist been at the same time so tender and so gentle.

"There is no regret, no sadness in our memories of this man; only gratitude. We are thankful that he came our way; that for thirteen seasons, under increasing difficulties, he gave us the music he loved. We like to think the longer he stayed with us, the better he liked us. We know that our affection for him grew with the years.

"We cannot be sad for him. He had no fear of death, and he died quitely without a single distortion of his body or soul. He had put down his baton after the final chord of D major and walked off the stage of life onto the wings where he is free to be himself, to sing, to soar."

OBITUARIES

Paris Rites for Munch; Hub Honor on Thursday

A state funeral was held in Paris today for Dr. Charles Munch, music director and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 until 1962, who died last week in Richmond, Va., while on tour with the Orchestre de Paris.

Mr. Munch founded the Paris orchestra two years ago at the request of the French Government. He was a Grand Officer of the Legion of Honor of France and, as such, was accorded today's honors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was represented by its present music director and conductor Erich Leinsdorf and manager Thomas D. Perry Jr.

A memorial service for the late music authority will be held here in Boston, Thursday noon, at Trinity Church, Copley sq.

Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will officiate.

The service, largely musical, is open to the public. Charles Wilson will conduct.

In addition to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, other participating in the memorial service, all of whom had had close musical associations with Dr. Munch, will be the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, New England Conservatory Chorus and Berj Zamkochian, organist.

The musical portion of the memorial service to Dr. Munch will inculde "Adagio for Strings," by Barber and performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; "Shepherd's Farewell," from "L'Enfance du Christ," by Berlioz, by the combined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; "How Lovely is They Dwelling Place," from a German Requiem, by Brams, with the New England Conservatory Chorus; "O Lord, Thy Little Angel Send," from Bach's Passion According to St. John (English text) by the chorale and an Organ Postlude by Berj Zamochian.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

NOV 12 1968 New

1000 Pay Respects to Munch During Trinity Church Rites

Music filled Trinity Church this noon at a memori l service for Dr. Charles Munch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nearly 1000 persons attended to pay final respects to Dr. Munch, music director of the B.S.O. from 1949 until 1962. He died Nov. 6 in Richmond, Va.

The service was largely musical, with members of the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the New England Conservatory Chorus massed before the altar.

The orchestra, conducted by Charles Wilson, played Barber's "Adagio for Strings," and accompanied the Harvard-Radcliffe groups in "The Shepherd's Farewell" by Berlioz and the conservatory chorus in Brahms' "How Lovely is Thy Dwelling Place."

Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, the rector, delivered the eulogy to Dr. Munch, saying, "Music mattered more to him than anything else. If we listened, that was all he asked and all we needed."

He characterized Dr. Munch as "a gentleman, kind, thoughtful and considerate," and said, "Seldom has a great artist been so gentle and tender."

"We feel no sorrow, only gratitude to him," Dr. Ferris said. "He died quietly. He put down his baton on the final chord of D major and walked offstage into the wings—free to sing and soar."

Members of the orchestra other than the 35 who took part were in attendance, along with the orchestra staff, some of whom served as ushers.

Aslo present were Thomas Perry, orchestra manager, and Mrs. Perry; Pops conductor Arthur Fiedler; Talcott Banks, president of the orchestra trustees, and other members of the board, and French Consul General and Mrs. Jacques Massenet.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

NOV 14 1968

Music Memorializes Munch

Boston — (AP) — A largely musical memorial service to the late Charles Munch, former music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was held in Trinity Church yesterday.

Those attending included members of the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

The service was conducted by the Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church and a trustee of the symphony orchestra.

Dr. Munch, who was music director of the orchestra from 1949 to 1962, died Nov. 6 in Richmond, Va., while touring with the Orchestre de Paris, which he founded two years ago at the request of the French government.

He was given a state funeral Tuesday in Paris. Erich Leinsdorf, who succeeded Dr. Munch as music director of the Boston Symphony, went to Europe for the funeral and did not attend yesterday's memorial.

The orchestra was conducted by Charles Wilson, assistant conducter, at the memorial service.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

NOV 15 1968 New England

MUSIC FILLED Trinity Church this noon where a memorial service was held for Dr. Charles Munch, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Members of the Symphony and three choruses massed on the altar for the tribute which included Brahms' "How Lovely Is Thy Dwelling Place." (Globe photo by Paul Connell.) See story on Page 51.

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

NOV 14 1968 New

Munch Rites Held in Boston

BOSTON (AP) — The memory of Charles Munch, former director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was celebrated in a vocal and instrumental ceremony at Trinity Episcopal Church Thursday.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra, led the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and the New England Conservatory Chorus in musical selections. The Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of the church, conducted the service.

Dr. Munch was music director of the orchestra from 1949 to 1962. He died Nov. 6 and was given a state funeral Tuesday in Paris. He was conductor of the Paris Symphony Orchestra when he died.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

NOV 15 1968 New

'In full glory'

Henry B. Cabot's farewell to Charles Munch spoke for us all, but I would like to add my own personal tribute to a superb musician, a wonderful human being and, above all, a great friend. His last memory of Symphony Hall must have given him such happiness, for the outpouring of affectionate and admiring ovations warmed his heart at his concert with his Orchestre de Paris, just two weeks before his death. And, in the midst of our sorrow at losing him, we can rejoice in the words of Nadia Boulanger: "He has departed at the height of his activity, in full glory, and that is a consolation for his friends."

WINIFRED H. JOHNSTONE
Boston

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 565,095

NOV 17 1968 New England

Boston Symphony Concert To Honor Munch's Memory

NEW BRUNSWICK — A special gymnasium concert at Rutgers University, in memory of Charles Munch, will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday, Nov. 21, at 8:30 p.m.

Munch, one of the outstanding musical figures of modern time, retired in 1962 after 13 years as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director. He died Nov. 6.

The concert, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, features performances by the Rutgers University Choir and soloists Saramae Endich, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

The program consists of Bach's Cantata No. 202 and Brahms' German Requiem.

Also that week, Nov. 19, the celebrated Hungarian Quartet will perform the first of five weekly recitals of all of Beethoven's string quartets. The concerts will be held weekly on Tuesday evenings at 8:30 p.m. in Voorhees Chapel at Douglass College. The Beethoven cycle is heralded as one of the most important musical events of the Rutgers concert season.

Under Munch's tenure, the Boston Symphony made its first tours abroad. Munch also restored a policy of permitting the public to hear rehearsals. Munch gave strong support to the music of contemporary composers and introduced much music from the French repertoire.

Miss Endich, who frequently appears with the Boston Symphony, has sung with major orchestras on both sides of the Atlantic and throughout the United States, Canada and Mexico. She is as well known as an opera singer and recitalist as she is as an orchestral soloist.

Mr. Milnes, who started late on his professional career, is now a regular member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. He has made several recordings and has appeared outside the United States at the operas in Venice, Florence, Milan and Mexico City.

The Rutgers University Choir, which has a long record of fine performances with major symphonies, will be directed by F. Austin Walter.

Tickets for the special concert and the Beethoven cycle are available from the University Concerts Office, 542 George St.

RED BANK, N.J.
REGISTER
D. 23,000

NOV 13 1968

Tributes to Charles Munch, Julius Fleischmann

Two recent deaths, those of conductor Charles Munch and philanthropist Julius Fleischmann, have marked unfortunate losses to the world of the arts.

Mr. Munch passed on recently in Richmond, Va., where he was on tour with the newly-formed Orchestra de Paris. He is known to area music-lovers, of course, as the conductor for a number of years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During his tenure in Symphony Hall, he was famous for his readings of French music — notably Berlioz, Ravel, Debussy, Faure, Bizet — and, among the members of the orchestra, for his warm personality. One Boston Symphony player once told me that Mr. Munch was the kindest man for whom he had ever worked.

With his white hair, his tall figure, his mobile face, his straight back, he was an impressive figure. And, as we know from his book, "I Am a Conductor," he was a dedicated and erudite musician,

As for Mr. Fleischmann, scion of the brewers' and bakers' yeast family, he was, a decade or so ago, a familiar figure on Cape Cod, notably at the Cape Playhouse inasmuch as he and Richard Aldrich, former Playhouse producer, were close friends. Mr. Fleischmann was a genial man who carried his enormous wealth unobtrusively. Much interested in the theater, he produced with Mr. Aldrich and Mr. Myers the 1946 revival on Broad way of "Pygmalion" and also revivals of "The Devil's Disciple" and "Caesar and Cleopatra."

Mr. Fleischmann was also in on the founding of the Cape Cod Melody Tent in Hyannis, was a former director of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, a director of the Metropolitan Opera, a fellow of London's Royal Society of the Arts, and a former member of the executive committee of UNESCO.

Mr. Fleischmann was particularly proud of one special accomplishment and could be most entertaining about it. He owned the first diesel-driven ship, the yacht Carmago and took it around the world in 1931. The trip included such events as rescuing three castaways, fighting a monsoon, and entertaining Queen Marie of Rumania and King Proejadhipok of Siam.

I have one special memory of Mr. Fleischmann. Always a natty dresser, he was the first man I ever knew to wear a plaid evening jacket.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

NOV 17 1968 New England

Memorial to Munch Added to BSO Program

In addition to its published program for tonight in Municipal Auditorium, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer, in memory of Dr. Charles Munch, Gabriel Faure's "The Death of Melisande" from the incidental music to Maeterlinck's tragedy, "Pelleas and Melisande."

Dr. Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, died in Richmond, Va., two weeks ago while on tour with the new French orchestra, L'Orchestre de Paris.

'The Death of Melisande' comprises the fourth movement of the suite, which was composed in 1898. Charles Munch conducted it with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in November, 1949, in memory of Ginette Neveu, the French violinist who was killed in a plane crash en route to the United States for performances.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

NOV 18 New

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

NOV 20 1968 New

No and Footnotes

TOP BILLING: John G. W. Mahanna, former Eagle editor and friend of the late Charles Munch when he conducted the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, writes that when Munch led the Paris Orchestra in Washington, D.C., just before his death, "I worried about him because when he mounted the podium he didn't seem to have the control of himself we witnessed at Tanglewood. It became obvious to me after a few minutes why an iron railing was placed about the podium, because more than once he had to hold onto it, else he would have fallen. He looked gray, tired and rather thin. Afterward we visited him in the Green Room, where he sat in a chair mopping his brow, and was really all in." Death already was near . . . In answer to our request for reader reaction to the paper's letter columns, Mrs. H[illegible] Brown, 1 Eld[illegible] Worthing[illegible]

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

NOV 24 1968 New

B[illegible] pla[illegible] [illegible]ntral work, the "Fantastique Symphony."

THE LATE CHARLES Munch himself selected the music himself selected the music played by the Boston Symphony and Erich Leinsdorf of Nov. 7 to commemorate Munch's death two days before in Richmond, Va.

While conductor of the Boston Symphony (1949-1962) Munch had frequently expressed to members of the orchestra that "The Death of Melisande" from the incidental music to Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" should be played to commemorate his death, when the time came.

Munch's first program as Boston Symphony conductor, Oct. 7, 1949, was the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto in D minor, Opus 7, No. 4, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

His last program as conductor at Tanglewood, Aug. 4, 1962, was Copland's "Quiet City" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Leinsdorf paid Munch the following tribute:

"When last January I heard the newly formed Orchestre de Paris under Charles Munch in Paris, I was again aware what a delightful and luminous man and musician he was. When such a man leaves us, an irreplaceable light has gone out. That is the way I feel today."

IN CASE THERE'S any doubt as to how far electronic [illegible] has progressed [illegible]

VICTOR O. JONES

Here's another reason to fume over France

I see by the headlines that France's franc is in some trouble, and maybe it serves 'em right for trying a while back to get our dollar into trouble. I don't understand international finance, but do strongly believe in retribution.

And here's another note on current U.S.-French relations, courtesy of Leonard Burkat, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music administrator during Charles Munch's conductorship of the B.S.O. Burkat is now a vice president of CBS and attended Munch's state funeral in Paris earlier this month:

Neither the pastor of the Protestant Oratoire nor France's Director of Music in Malraux's Ministry of Culture, mentioned in their sermon and eulogy that Munch had ever been conductor of the B.S.O. His 13 seasons in Boston, his many guest appearances with other American orchestras, his Paris concerts with the B.S.O., his several U.S. concerts with the new Orchestre de Paris—all unmentioned.

Maybe it's time again for our martini drinkers to switch back again to Italian vermouth!

★

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

NOV 26 1968 New

At Charles Munch's funeral

I don't know how a story about me and Charles Munch's funeral got into the Victor O. Jones A.M. column on Nov. 26. The last communication between us took place about 25 years ago, when I was a part-time music critic for the Globe.

On the sidewalk outside the Temple de l'Oratoire, after the funeral service, another of the half dozen Americans present wondered aloud at the omission of any reference to Munch's years in Boston, to his broad experience and high reputation in this country. I think it was Erich Leinsdorf who replied immediately and quite correctly that we had attended a state ceremony, in the presence of a Cabinet Minister and other high government officials, honoring a French citizen who had died while in the service of his country.

It would certainly have pleased us if public notice had been taken of Charles Munch's life and work in the United States but it is easy to understand why this was not done. He had given the last years of his life to a governmental effort for the creation of a great new cultural institution for his country, and he had died in the service of that institution. He was buried not as a private citizen, not even as a renowned public figure, but as a hero of the nation. I go into all this only so that any friends I have left in Boston may know that my Francophilia is undiminished (even though my French accent has deteriorated).

On the day before the funeral, some friends and I paid a call on Charles Munch's (and Albert Schweitzer's) nephew, Jean-Jacques Schweitzer, at the country estate some 45 minutes outside Paris where the Schweitzer family occupies one house and Charles Munch occupied another. I drove from the city with Thomas Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ronald Wilford of Columbia Artists Management, Inc., who had taken care of Mr. Munch's professional affairs in this country since his retirement from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We met Mr. Schweitzer in the salon of the Munch house, a room in which none of us had ever before known anything but great joy. This time, candles, flowers and a coffin occupied most of it. Mr. Schweitzer's first words were to make the following day's silence on the subject insignificant for me: "It is so good of you three to come. He so much loved Boston and the spirit and life of all your country."

LEONARD BURKAT
New York, N.Y.

(Mr. Burkat is now a vice president of CBS.—Ed.)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

DEC 7 1968 New

Boston Plays Brahms 'Requiem'

Staff Correspondent

NEW YORK — Brahms was in the air in another noted music establishment over the weekend. The Boston Symphony under Erich Leisdorf presented the "German Requiem" Saturday night at Carnegie Hall in a manner that aroused a huge audience to something close to ecstasy. The program was announced as a memorial to the late Dr. Charles Munch, who led the Boston during one of its most successful periods.

Much of the evening's success could be attributed to the

Newark Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 278,235 SUN. 423,157

NOV 25 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MUNCH TRIBUTE

It was a fine gesture for Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to dedicate their Carnegie Hall concert on Saturday night to the memory of the orchestra's late music director, Charles Munch. The major work on the program was the Brahms "German Requiem."

Mr. Leinsdorf has this music in his bones and as he led the work it became a worthy tribute to his predecessor. By weighting the etxture in favor of the upper winds and strings, Mr. Leinsdorf achieved a crystalline clarity and lean orchestral sonority that would warm the heart of any Toscanini devotee.

The Rutgers University Choir abetted the conductor's conception by producing a full yet precisely focused choral tone. Adding to the list of excellences were the floating soprano of Saramae Endich and Sherrill Milnes's virile declamation of the baritone solos.

The Requiem was preceded by Bach's Cantata No. 202, delightfully sung by Miss Endich. Mr. Leinsdorf's handpicked chamber ensemble provided wonderfully clean and stylish accompaniments.

PETER G. DAVIS.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 810,496 SUN. 1,494,704

NOV 26 1968

182

MUSIC

The End Of A Chapter

By JOHN THORNTON

EARLY IN the afternoon of Nov. 6, Jack Murphy, telegraph editor on our sister paper, the Portland Evening Express, called me to his desk and handed me a bulletin that had just moved on the wire. It read: "NEW YORK (AP) — Charles Munch, 77 year old conductor of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, died in his sleep in Richmond, Va., during a tour . . . Munch, apparently in good health, was found dead in bed by his valet at the John Marshall Hotel in Richmond. He had been scheduled to conduct his 120 man orchestra in Richmond tonight."

The passing of this great musician represents the closing of a chapter in the history of Boston Symphony Orchestra that witnessed the careers of three giants, Monteux, Koussevitzky, and finally Munch.

From 1920 through until 1962, a period of 42 years, the BSO was moulded and developed by this trio to become one of the greatest orchestras in the world.

It was Monteux, in the troubled days of his five years, who gave the orchestra needed professional glow. In 1925 Koussevitzky came, to stay for 25 years, setting a record that is unlikely to be equalled.

The Russian, although not nearly so polished a conductor as Monteux, brought with him an aura of excitement and dynamic purpose.

Koussevitzky liked a fiery, bright tone and had the BSO tune to 444 instead of the customary 440 "A," thus giving to the orchestra its famous overall brilliance of sound.

NO MATTER WHAT his early failings were (he had to take private lessons in score reading during his first few years at Boston) Koussevitzky had an astonishing magnetic attraction. Like Stokowski, he loved to indulge in orchestral color. It was Koussevitzky who championed Sibelius, who gave Walter Piston his first opportunities to have his symphonic scores played by the BSO. The quarter century of his tenure must go down as the most vital period in the orchestra's experience.

Koussevitzky, according to many informants, wanted Bernstein to succeed him but the trustees appointed Munch, who had impressed them when he guested at Boston in December of 1946.

In nearly every way, he was completely opposite to Koussevitzky in conducting techniques, and especially in rehearsal behavior. In a sense, he relaxed the tone. The orchestra became more fluid under his amiable direction.

For years, after Friday afternoon concerts, Koussevitzky had welcomed admirers to the "Green Room," the conductor's large office on the second floor at Symphony Hall. Friends and concert-goers would form a long line and pass through, voicing their praises.

Munch immediately put an end to that. Shunning society, painfully uncomfortable at large formal receptions and annoyed by adulation, he yet loved being with his musicians away from the podium.

He would often spend evenings with his men, playing cards and talking, and he adored their children. James Stagliano, first horn of the BSO was his friend and Louis Speyer, the English Horn at Boston for over 40 years, was also very close to the conductor.

THIS HISTORIC photograph by John Brook shows the three BSO giants, Monteux, Koussevitzky and Munch.

It was in December, 1951, during a concert at Carnegie Hall, that Munch was stricken with a severe heart attack while conducting. At intermission, when he was pale and in obvious pain, concertmaster Richard Burgin begged to be allowed to direct the remainder of the program, but Munch insisted on finishing. He was hospitalized immediately afterwards and could not return to the podium for nearly six months.

On recovery, he took the orchestra on its first European tour in the spring of 1952 and four years later directed on the BSO's trip to Russia, the first time a Western orchestra had visited the USSR.

During these years there developed between Munch and his men an unusual devotion, the same kind of deep affection that had endured between Monteux and the musicians he conducted.

Munch was no calculating machine on podium. He had no interest in clinical examination of a score, nor was he a demon for perfection of ensemble execution. Rather he was a man of passion. He exhilerated in conducting. So it was that his concerts were not marked by consistency. His conducting enjoyed peaks and valleys. But when he was at his best, he generated something very rare.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

NOV 24 1968

WHILE HIS YEARS at Boston brought him new fame, hosts of new admirers and an international reputation of high degree, he never changed in his attitudes, nor did publicity affect him in the slightest.

I talked with Speyer shortly after the news of Munch's death and found the veteran musician deeply saddened.

"His modesty and his love for his colleagues was perhaps his greatest gift to the music world," Speyer wrote later. "He was a musician among musicians, always ready to help in any way. Anyone could see and speak to him."

Speyer, recalling the friendship that developed between Munch and Piston, describes an amusing incident between them in 1954.

Munch met the composer backstage and reminded him about a score he had requested especially for Speyer.

"He asked Walter in his amusing French," Speyer says, " 'Comment va ton truc pour Cor Anglais?' (What about your thing for English horn?) . . Since then, that has become its title!"

Last September Speyer visited Munch at his beautiful home near Versailles.

"He was happy with his new orchestra," Speyer relates, "and the idea of coming to Boston was a real joy. We were all worried however, after his last sickness, about the hardship of a long tour. He never learned to spare himself and always gave all he had to a concert."

Charles Munch, "Le Beau Charles, Le Grand Charles," brought to the Boston Symphony a warmth and genuineness that its players should never forget. His devotion to his art is best summed up in his own words:

"Music is the art of expressing the inexpressible. It rises far above what words can mean or the intelligence define. Its domain is the imponderable and impalpable land of the unconscious. Man's right to speak this language is for me the most precious gift that heaven has bestowed upon us."

Conducting, To Charles Munch, Was 'Priesthood, Not Profession'

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

When Charles Munch succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949, he was reported to have stepped onto the podium and in hesitant English made a little speech in which he told how happy he was and proud to be with this orchestra. "Now, let's work, gentlemen. You know very will, I am nothing without you!"

This was "le beau Charles," as the Parisians called him, and who inspired "les Munchettes," bobby-soxers who followed his every concert and his every move when he conducted his own orchestra, the Paris Philharmonic in 1935.

He also once polled second only to Winston Churchill when a famed Parisian magazine tabulated the answers to the question: "What man would you like to have dinner with tonight?"

Munch conducted the Bostonians for 13 years and remade the orchestra in his image. He went back to France, but returned in appearances with the French National Orchestra.

★ ★ ★

On Nov. 6, in a lonely hotel room in Richmond, Va., Mr. Munch, 77, died of a heart attack. He was to have led the

CHARLES MUNCH
'A dream on every note'

Orchestre de Paris, formed in 1967 at the request of Andre Malraux, the French minister of culture.

Munch was one of those conductors whom one worshiped, or dismissed, with some wry remark, for he was a conductor who inflicted on musicians and audiences alike his own enthusiasm, his own exhilarating and overflowing joy of making music.

In a little book, "I am a Conductor," which he was persuaded to write in 1955 (Oxford University Press), he referred to his work as "a priesthood, not a profession." He thought of a conductor's task as releasing the super-human potential of the music and the musicians rather than merely seeing to it that the notes were sounded, the players kept together, the audience satisfied.

"A conductor," he avowed, "can re-create the thought and emotion of an unknown person, the composer, which can be a transfiguring experience . . . The public will not strain itself to hang a dream on every note. It is for us to facilitate the task. Concert time is when feelings must be made to reach an extreme of intensity. This is a fundamental mission. Every musical interpreter must be capable of a kind of complete confession."

Note the words mission, confession.

★ ★ ★

His personality was strong —forward to the musicians and backward to the audiences— and it often seized all who would listen. It was this man who advised our own Toledo Symphony Orchestra's conductor, Serge Fournier, to go to the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass., and it was this man who in 1960-62 secured him a scholarship.

Two years before, Mr. Fournier told me, he had played the flute in the orchestra which Munch conducted at the summer festival in Vichy.

"I am the No. 1 fan of Munch," Fournier said, "ever since I first saw him conduct, around 1950, and I remember the occasion like yesterday. It was at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees with the Orchestre Nationale. I sneaked in with the players and will never forget his face when he conducted Brahms' Second Symphony.

"I saw him again when he conducted the same orchestra for radio but with no audience. This time it was Berlioz' 'Romeo and Juliette.' He was dressed in floating pink pajamas and fell asleep while the announcer was introducing the concert somewhat too lengthily. But then he jumped up suddenly and was with it."

Fournier continued:

"He was a most natural man, no pretensions, always honest, fabulous. He was always taking risks with his orchestras, but then he fascinated them as he did the audience, who couldn't resist his power. It was a unique thing to come under his spell — it was a psychological reaction.

Mr. Fournier admitted that he had managed to "obtain" one of Munch's batons, a well-balanced long stick. Munch questioned him frequently as to where he got such a good one. "I use it now — but only for performances," Fournier smiled.

★ ★ ★

Taking risks, Munch was accused of not paying enough attention to the little details in the music. He was more interested in the grand sweep of the tonal canvas. It was indeed the color, rather than the flawlessness, which he sought to project. And if his German music sounded less convincing, it was nevertheless persuasive, elegant, and propulsive. He was French to his fingertips, for clarity and proportionateness mattered above all.

Munch was born on September 26, 1891, in Strasbourg. His father was a teacher at the local conservatory and organist at the cathedral. House-music with his 3 brothers and 2 sisters was the big thing in the Munch home; sometimes Albert Schweitzer would join the happy family. He studied the violin with his father, later with Lucien Capet in Paris, then Carl Flesch in Berlin.

In 1919 he joined the faculty of the conservatory in Strasbourg, and in 1926, he went to Leipzig as a concertmaster under Wilhelm Furtwaengler and Bruno Walter. When Hitler came to power, Munch returned to Paris, where he later actively supported the French Resistance movement.

He married Genevieve Maury, Nestle chocolate heiress, an author and translator, who had made it possible for him to make his debut as a conductor locally. She died in 1956.

He immediately became one of the most demanded guest-conductors on the continent.

In 1935, he founded the Paris Philharmonic and in 1938 succeeded Philippe Gaubert as head of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatorie. Somehow he managed to keep that orchestra together during the war.

He made his North American debut with the Bostonians on Dec. 27, 1947. Two years later, he was invited to take over the famed Boston Symphony, no little task after the giant Serge Koussevitzky had permeated the area with his musical ideas.

But by his modesty, his exhilaration, his devotion, his vision he slowly made friends for his kind of music-making.

Of course, there were those Brahmins who never forgave him for trying to change some of the time-honored traditions of the Boston Orchestra. When he left Boston in 1962, all was not well by any means.

Munch was to have been the guest conductor of the Toledo Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 7 and 8, 1969. He is no more and he will be greatly missed, but his spirit will endure. He admonishes us to listen not only with our ears but also with our hearts:

"If artists can no longer be sensitive," he wrote in his book, "why not require that scholars behave like idiots?"

The gift and the power of communication was his to a degree that few other conductors possess and for this we shall always be grateful.

TOLEDO B
P.M. CIRC. 175,448
SUN. CIRC. 195,817

Boston Symphony Concert To Honor Munch's Memory

NEW BRUNSWICK — A special gymnasium concert at Rutgers University, in memory of Charles Munch, will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday, Nov. 21, at 8:30 p.m.

Munch, one of the outstanding musical figures of modern time, retired in 1962 after 13 years as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director. He died Nov. 6.

The concert, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, features performances by the Rutgers University Choir and soloists Saramae Endich, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

The program consists of Bach's Cantata No. 202 and Brahms' German Requiem.

Also that week, Nov. 19, the celebrated Hungarian Quartet will perform the first of five weekly recitals of all of Beethoven's string quartets. The concerts will be held weekly on Tuesday evenings at 8:30 p.m. in Voorhees Chapel at Douglass College. The Beethoven cycle is heralded as one of the most important musical events of the Rutgers concert season.

Under Munch's tenure, the Boston Symphony made its first tours abroad. Munch also restored a policy of permitting the public to hear rehearsals. Munch gave strong support to the music of contemporary composers and introduced much music from the French repertoire.

Miss Endich, who frequently appears with the Boston Symphony, has sung with major orchestras on both sides of the Atlantic and throughout the United States, Canada and Mexico. She is as well known as an opera singer and recitalist as she is as an orchestral soloist.

Mr. Milnes, who started late on his professional career, is now a regular member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. He has made several recordings and has appeared outside the United States at the operas in Venice, Florence, Milan and Mexico City.

The Rutgers University Choir, which has a long record of fine performances with major symphonies, will be directed by F. Austin Walter.

Tickets for the special concert and the Beethoven cycle are available from the University Concerts Office, 542 George St.

RED BANK, N.J.
REGISTER
D. 23,000

NOV 13 1968

Tributes to Charles Munch, Julius Fleischmann

Two recent deaths, those of conductor Charles Munch and philanthropist Julius Fleischmann, have marked unfortunate losses to the world of the arts.

Mr. Munch passed on recently in Richmond, Va., where he was on tour with the newly-formed Orchestra de Paris. He is known to area music-lovers, of course, as the conductor for a number of years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During his tenure in Symphony Hall, he was famous for his readings of French music — notably Berlioz, Ravel, Debussy, Faure, Bizet — and, among the members of the orchestra, for his warm personality. One Boston Symphony player once told me that Mr. Munch was the kindest man for whom he had ever worked.

With his white hair, his tall figure, his mobile face, his straight back, he was an impressive figure. And, as we know from his book, "I Am a Conductor," he was a dedicated and erudite musician,

As for Mr. Fleischmann, scion of the brewers' and bakers' yeast family, he was, a decade or so ago, a familiar figure on Cape Cod, notably at the Cape Playhouse inasmuch as he and Richard Aldrich, former Playhouse producer, were close friends. Mr. Fleischmann was a genial man who carried his enormous wealth unobtrusively. Much interested in the theater, he produced with Mr. Aldrich and Mr. Myers the 1946 revival on Broad way of "Pygmalion" and also revivals of "The Devil's Disciple" and "Caesar and Cleopatra."

Mr. Fleischmann was also in on the founding of the Cape Cod Melody Tent in Hyannis, was a former director of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, a director of the Metropolitan Opera, a fellow of London's Royal Society of the Arts, and a former member of the executive committee of UNESCO.

Mr. Fleischmann was particularly proud of one special accomplishment and could be most entertaining about it. He owned the first diesel-driven ship, the yacht Carmago and took it around the world in 1931. The trip included such events as rescuing three castaways, fighting a monsoon, and entertaining Queen Marie of Rumania and King Proejadhipok of Siam.

I have one special memory of Mr. Fleischmann. Always a natty dresser, he was the first man I ever knew to wear a plaid evening jacket.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

NOV 17 1968 New England

Memorial to Munch Added to BSO Program

In addition to its published program for tonight in Municipal Auditorium, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will offer, in memory of Dr. Charles Munch, Gabriel Faure's "The Death of Melisande" from the incidental music to Maeterlinck's tragedy, "Pelleas and Melisande."

Dr. Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, died in Richmond, Va., two weeks ago while on tour with the new French orchestra, L'Orchestre de Paris.

'The Death of Melisande' comprises the fourth movement of the suite, which was composed in 1898. Charles Munch conducted it with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in November, 1949, in memory of Ginette Neveu, the French violinist who was killed in a plane crash en route to the United States for performances.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

NOV 18 New

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

NOV 20 1968 New

No and Footnotes

TOP BILLING: John G. W. Mahanna, former Eagle editor and friend of the late Charles Munch when he conducted the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, writes that when Munch led the Paris Orchestra in Washington, D.C., just before his death, "I worried about him because when he mounted the podium he didn't seem to have the control of himself we witnessed at Tanglewood. It became obvious to me after a few minutes why an iron railing was placed about the podium, because more than once he had to hold onto it, else he would have fallen. He looked gray, tired and rather thin. Afterward we visited him in the Green Room, where he sat in a chair mopping his brow, and was really all in." Death already was near . . . In answer to our request for reader reaction to the paper's letter columns, Mrs. H[illegible] Brown, 1 Eld[illegible] Worthing[illegible]

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

NOV 24 1968 New

B[illegible] pla[illegible] [illegible]ation of his major orchestral work, the "Fantastique Symphony."

THE LATE CHARLES Munch himself selected the music himself selected the music played by the Boston Symphony and Erich Leinsdorf of Nov. 7 to commemorate Munch's death two days before in Richmond, Va.

While conductor of the Boston Symphony (1949-1962) Munch had frequently expressed to members of the orchestra that "The Death of Melisande" from the incidental music to Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" should be played to commemorate his death, when the time came.

Munch's first program as Boston Symphony conductor, Oct. 7, 1949, was the Overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," Handel's Organ Concerto in D minor, Opus 7, No. 4, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

His last program as conductor at Tanglewood, Aug. 6, 1962, was Copland's "Quiet City" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Leinsdorf paid Munch the following tribute:

"When last January I heard the newly formed Orchestre de Paris under Charles Munch in Paris, I was again aware what a delightful and luminous man and musician he was. When such a man leaves us, an irreplaceable light has gone out. That is the way I feel today."

IN CASE THERE'S any doubt as to how far electronic [illegible] has progressed [illegible]

VICTOR O. JONES

Here's another reason to fume over France

I see by the headlines that France's franc is in some trouble, and maybe it serves 'em right for trying a while back to get our dollar into trouble. I don't understand international finance, but do strongly believe in retribution.

And here's another note on current U.S.-French relations, courtesy of Leonard Burkat, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music administrator during Charles Munch's conductorship of the B.S.O. Burkat is now a vice president of CBS and attended Munch's state funeral in Paris earlier this month:

Neither the pastor of the Protestant Oratoire nor France's Director of Music in Malraux's Ministry of Culture, mentioned in their sermon and eulogy that Munch had ever been conductor of the B.S.O. His 13 seasons in Boston, his many guest appearances with other American orchestras, his Paris concerts with the B.S.O., his several U.S. concerts with the new Orchestre de Paris—all unmentioned.

Maybe it's time again for our martini drinkers to switch back again to Italian vermouth!

★

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

NOV 26 1968 New

At Charles Munch's funeral

I don't know how a story about me and Charles Munch's funeral got into the Victor O. Jones A.M. column on Nov. 26. The last communication between us took place about 25 years ago, when I was a part-time music critic for the Globe.

On the sidewalk outside the Temple de l'Oratoire, after the funeral service, another of the half dozen Americans present wondered aloud at the omission of any reference to Munch's years in Boston, to his broad experience and high reputation in this country. I think it was Erich Leinsdorf who replied immediately and quite correctly that we had attended a state ceremony, in the presence of a Cabinet Minister and other high government officials, honoring a French citizen who had died while in the service of his country.

It would certainly have pleased us if public notice had been taken of Charles Munch's life and work in the United States but it is easy to understand why this was not done. He had given the last years of his life to a governmental effort for the creation of a great new cultural institution for his country, and he had died in the service of that institution. He was buried not as a private citizen, not even as a renowned public figure, but as a hero of the nation. I go into all this only so that any friends I have left in Boston may know that my Francophilia is undiminished (even though my French accent has deteriorated).

On the day before the funeral, some friends and I paid a call on Charles Munch's (and Albert Schweitzer's) nephew, Jean-Jacques Schweitzer, at the country estate some 45 minutes outside Paris where the Schweitzer family occupies one house and Charles Munch occupied another. I drove from the city with Thomas Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Ronald Wilford of Columbia Artists Management, Inc., who had taken care of Mr. Munch's professional affairs in this country since his retirement from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

We met Mr. Schweitzer in the salon of the Munch house, a room in which none of us had ever before known anything but great joy. This time, candles, flowers and a coffin occupied most of it. Mr. Schweitzer's first words were to make the following day's silence on the subject insignificant for me: "It is so good of you three to come. He so much loved Boston and the spirit and life of all your country."

LEONARD BURKAT
New York, N.Y.

(Mr. Burkat is now a vice president of CBS.—Ed.)

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

DEC 7 1968 New

Boston Plays Brahms 'Requiem'

Staff Correspondent

NEW YORK — Brahms was in the air in another noted music establishment over the weekend. The Boston Symphony under Erich Leisdorf presented the "German Requiem" Saturday night at Carnegie Hall in a manner that aroused a huge audience to something close to ecstasy. The program was announced as a memorial to the late Dr. Charles Munch, who led the Boston during one of its most successful periods.

Much of the evening's success could be attributed to the

Newark Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 278,235 SUN. 423,157

NOV 25 1968

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MUNCH TRIBUTE

It was a fine gesture for Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to dedicate their Carnegie Hall concert on Saturday night to the memory of the orchestra's late music director, Charles Munch. The major work on the program was the Brahms "German Requiem."

Mr. Leinsdorf has this music in his bones and as he led the work it became a worthy tribute to his predecessor. By weighting the texture in favor of the upper winds and strings, Mr. Leinsdorf achieved a crystalline clarity and lean orchestral sonority that would warm the heart of any Toscanini devotee.

The Rutgers University Choir abetted the conductor's conception by producing a full yet precisely focused choral tone. Adding to the list of excellences were the floating soprano of Saramae Endich and Sherrill Milnes's virile declamation of the baritone solos.

The Requiem was preceded by Bach's Cantata No. 202, delightfully sung by Miss Endich. Mr. Leinsdorf's handpicked chamber ensemble provided wonderfully clean and stylish accompaniments.

PETER G. DAVIS.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. [illegible] SUN. 1,094,704

NOV 26 1968

182

MUSIC

The End Of A Chapter

By JOHN THORNTON

EARLY IN the afternoon of Nov. 6, Jack Murphy, telegraph editor on our sister paper, the Portland Evening Express, called me to his desk and handed me a bulletin that had just moved on the wire. It read: "NEW YORK (AP) — Charles Munch, 77 year old conductor of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, died in his sleep in Richmond, Va., during a tour . . . Munch, apparently in good health, was found dead in bed by his valet at the John Marshall Hotel in Richmond. He had been scheduled to conduct his 120 man orchestra in Richmond tonight."

The passing of this great musician represents the closing of a chapter in the history of Boston Symphony Orchestra that witnessed the careers of three giants, Monteux, Koussevitzky, and finally Munch.

From 1920 through until 1962, a period of 42 years, the BSO was moulded and developed by this trio to become one of the greatest orchestras in the world.

It was Monteux, in the troubled days of his five years, who gave the orchestra needed professional glow. In 1925 Koussevitzky came, to stay for 25 years, setting a record that is unlikely to be equalled.

The Russian, although not nearly so polished a conductor as Monteux, brought with him an aura of excitement and dynamic purpose.

Koussevitzky liked a fiery, bright tone and had the BSO tune to 444 instead of the customary 440 "A," thus giving to the orchestra its famous overall brilliance of sound.

NO MATTER WHAT his early failings were (he had to take private lessons in score reading during his first few years at Boston) Koussevitzky had an astonishing magnetic attraction. Like Stokowski, he loved to indulge in orchestral color. It was Koussevitzky who championed Sibelius, who gave Walter Piston his first opportunities to have his symphonic scores played by the BSO. The quarter century of his tenure must go down as the most vital period in the orchestra's experience.

Koussevitzky, according to many informants, wanted Bernstein to succeed him but the trustees appointed Munch, who had impressed them when he guested at Boston in December of 1946.

In nearly every way, he was completely opposite to Koussevitzky in conducting techniques, and especially in rehearsal behavior. In a sense, he relaxed the tone. The orchestra became more fluid under his amiable direction.

For years, after Friday afternoon concerts, Koussevitzky had welcomed admirers to the "Green Room," the conductor's large office on the second floor at Symphony Hall. Friends and concert-goers would form a long line and pass through, voicing their praises.

Munch immediately put an end to that. Shunning society, painfully uncomfortable at large formal receptions and annoyed by adulation, he yet loved being with his musicians away from the podium.

He would often spend evenings with his men, playing cards and talking, and he adored their children. James Stagliano, first horn of the BSO was his friend and Louis Speyer, the English Horn at Boston for over 40 years, was also very close to the conductor.

THIS HISTORIC photograph by John Brook shows the three BSO giants, Monteux, Koussevitzky and Munch.

It was in December, 1951, during a concert at Carnegie Hall, that Munch was stricken with a severe heart attack while conducting. At intermission, when he was pale and in obvious pain, concertmaster Richard Burgin begged to be allowed to direct the remainder of the program, but Munch insisted on finishing. He was hospitalized immediately afterwards and could not return to the podium for nearly six months.

On recovery, he took the orchestra on its first European tour in the spring of 1952 and four years later directed on the BSO's trip to Russia, the first time a Western orchestra had visited the USSR.

During these years there developed between Munch and his men an unusual devotion, the same kind of deep affection that had endured between Monteux and the musicians he conducted.

Munch was no calculating machine on podium. He had no interest in clinical examination of a score, nor was he a demon for perfection of ensemble execution. Rather he was a man of passion. He exhilerated in conducting. So it was that his concerts were not marked by consistency. His conducting enjoyed peaks and valleys. But when he was at his best, he generated something very rare.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 107,251

NOV 24 1968

WHILE HIS YEARS at Boston brought him new fame, hosts of new admirers and an international reputation of high degree, he never changed in his attitudes, nor did publicity affect him in the slightest.

I talked with Speyer shortly after the news of Munch's death and found the veteran musician deeply saddened.

"His modesty and his love for his colleagues was perhaps his greatest gift to the music world," Speyer wrote later. "He was a musician among musicians, always ready to help in any way. Anyone could see and speak to him."

Speyer, recalling the friendship that developed between Munch and Piston, describes an amusing incident between them in 1954.

Munch met the composer backstage and reminded him about a score he had requested especially for Speyer.

"He asked Walter in his amusing French," Speyer says, " 'Comment va ton truc pour Cor Anglais?' (What about your thing for English horn?) . . Since then, that has become its title!"

Last September Speyer visited Munch at his beautiful home near Versailles.

"He was happy with his new orchestra," Speyer relates, "and the idea of coming to Boston was a real joy. We were all worried however, after his last sickness, about the hardship of a long tour. He never learned to spare himself and always gave all he had to a concert."

Charles Munch, "Le Beau Charles, Le Grand Charles," brought to the Boston Symphony a warmth and genuineness that its players should never forget. His devotion to his art is best summed up in his own words:

"Music is the art of expressing the inexpressible. It rises far above what words can mean or the intelligence define. Its domain is the imponderable and impalpable land of the unconscious. Man's right to speak this language is for me the most precious gift that heaven has bestowed upon us."

Conducting, To Charles Munch, Was 'Priesthood, Not Profession'

By BORIS NELSON
Blade Music Critic

When Charles Munch succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1949, he was reported to have stepped onto the podium and in hesitant English made a little speech in which he told how happy he was and proud to be with this orchestra. "Now, let's work, gentlemen. You know very will, I am nothing without you!"

This was "le beau Charles," as the Parisians called him, and who inspired "les Munchettes," bobby-soxers who followed his every concert and his every move when he conducted his own orchestra, the Paris Philharmonic in 1935.

He also once polled second only to Winston Churchill when a famed Parisian magazine tabulated the answers to the question: "What man would you like to have dinner with tonight?"

Munch conducted the Bostonians for 13 years and remade the orchestra in his image. He went back to France, but returned in appearances with the French National Orchestra.

★ ★ ★

On Nov. 6, in a lonely hotel room in Richmond, Va., Mr. Munch, 77, died of a heart attack. He was to have led the

CHARLES MUNCH
'A dream on every note'

Orchestre de Paris, formed in 1967 at the request of Andre Malraux, the French minister of culture.

Munch was one of those conductors whom one worshiped, or dismissed, with some wry remark, for he was a conductor who inflicted on musicians and audiences alike his own enthusiasm, his own exhilarating and overflowing joy of making music.

In a little book, "I am a Conductor," which he was persuaded to write in 1955 (Oxford University Press), he referred to his work as "a priesthood, not a profession." He thought of a conductor's task as releasing the super-human potential of the music and the musicians rather than merely seeing to it that the notes were sounded, the players kept together, the audience satisfied.

"A conductor," he avowed, "can re-create the thought and emotion of an unknown person, the composer, which can be a transfiguring experience . . . The public will not strain itself to hang a dream on every note. It is for us to facilitate the task. Concert time is when feelings must be made to reach an extreme of intensity. This is a fundamental mission. Every musical interpreter must be capable of a kind of complete confession."

Note the words mission, confession.

★ ★ ★

His personality was strong —forward to the musicians and backward to the audiences— and it often seized all who would listen. It was this man who advised our own Toledo Symphony Orchestra's conductor, Serge Fournier, to go to the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass., and it was this man who in 1960-62 secured him a scholarship.

Two years before, Mr. Fournier told me, he had played the flute in the orchestra which Munch conducted at the summer festival in Vichy.

"I am the No. 1 fan of Munch," Fournier said, "ever since I first saw him conduct, around 1950, and I remember the occasion like yesterday. It was at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees with the Orchestre Nationale. I sneaked in with the players and will never forget his face when he conducted Brahms' Second Symphony.

"I saw him again when he conducted the same orchestra for radio but with no audience. This time it was Berlioz' 'Romeo and Juliette.' He was dressed in floating pink pajamas and fell asleep while the announcer was introducing the concert somewhat too lengthily. But then he jumped up suddenly and was with it."

Fournier continued:

"He was a most natural man, no pretensions, always honest, fabulous. He was always taking risks with his orchestras, but then he fascinated them as he did the audience, who couldn't resist his power. It was a unique thing to come under his spell — it was a psychological reaction.

Mr. Fournier admitted that he had managed to "obtain" one of Munch's batons, a well-balanced long stick. Munch questioned him frequently as to where he got such a good one. "I use it now — but only for performances," Fournier smiled.

★ ★ ★

Taking risks, Munch was accused of not paying enough attention to the little details in the music. He was more interested in the grand sweep of the tonal canvas. It was indeed the color, rather than the flawlessness, which he sought to project. And if his German music sounded less convincing, it was nevertheless persuasive, elegant, and propulsive. He was French to his fingertips, for clarity and proportionateness mattered above all.

Munch was born on September 26, 1891, in Strasbourg. His father was a teacher at the local conservatory and organist at the cathedral. House-music with his 3 brothers and 2 sisters was the big thing in the Munch home; sometimes Albert Schweitzer would join the happy family. He studied the violin with his father, later with Lucien Capet in Paris, then Carl Flesch in Berlin.

In 1919 he joined the faculty of the conservatory in Strasbourg, and in 1926, he went to Leipzig as a concertmaster under Wilhelm Furtwaengler and Bruno Walter. When Hitler came to power, Munch returned to Paris, where he later actively supported the French Resistance movement.

He married Genevieve Maury, Nestle chocolate heiress, an author and translator, who had made it possible for him to make his debut as a conductor locally. She died in 1956.

He immediately became one of the most demanded guest-conductors on the continent.

In 1935, he founded the Paris Philharmonic and in 1938 succeeded Philippe Gaubert as head of the Societe des Concerts du Conservatorie. Somehow he managed to keep that orchestra together during the war.

He made his North American debut with the Bostonians on Dec. 27, 1947. Two years later, he was invited to take over the famed Boston Symphony, no little task after the giant Serge Koussevitzky had permeated the area with his musical ideas.

But by his modesty, his exhilaration, his devotion, his vision he slowly made friends for his kind of music-making.

Of course, there were those Brahmins who never forgave him for trying to change some of the time-honored traditions of the Boston Orchestra. When he left Boston in 1962, all was not well by any means.

Munch was to have been the guest conductor of the Toledo Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 7 and 8, 1969. He is no more and he will be greatly missed, but his spirit will endure. He admonishes us to listen not only with our ears but also with our hearts:

"If artists can no longer be sensitive," he wrote in his book, "why not require that scholars behave like idiots?"

The gift and the power of communication was his to a degree that few other conductors possess and for this we shall always be grateful.

TOLEDO, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 175,218
SUN. - CIRC. 185,817

DEC-8-68

183.

Tribute To A Great Conductor

By Mark A. Stuart

WHEN the time came for the Boston Symphony to choose a music director to succeed the great Serge Koussevitzky, the backyards of the Brahmins were abuzz with speculation. Koussevitzky had replenished the faith of Boston in itself as the heart of cultural America, building the symphony orchestra to a peak it had never enjoyed when the great conductors were operating in New York with the Philharmonic.

It roiled Boston to play second fiddle to New York in any cultural endeavor, and especially in matters musical. Along came the tiny Russian maestro to bully, cajole, and coerce the Cabots, the Lodges, the Saltonstalls, and the rest of the Beacon Hill bunch into paying for topflight players. That's the way to build a fine symphony. Prior to Koussevitzky, the Brahmins felt playing in Boston was pay enough.

How do you replace Mickey Mantle when he calls it quits? How do you get a superstar to replace a superstar?

Boston's answer was Charles Munch.

Born into a distinguished musical family in Strasbourg, Munch had started to be a doctor. But music reclaimed his soul even as he entered medical school, and before the year was out, he was studying the violin instead of the viscera.

After service in World War I, Munch settled in Paris and founded the Orchestre Symphonique and conducted the Lamoureux Concerts. He traveled around Europe as guest conductor until his appointment in 1937 as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, on whose podium he established a worldwide reputation.

HIS first visit to the United States came in 1946 and fittingly his first appearance was with the Boston Symphony. The papers raved. Koussevitzky had scoured the country for his successor and couldn't come up with anyone who fitted his exacting terms. In Munch he found his man and the Frenchman was engaged to begin as musical director of the Boston with the 1949-50 season.

It wasn't all peaches and cream at first. The purists are always toughest on the guy who follows their idol, even if he is as good. No one said Munch was better than Koussevitzky, but in the years between 1949 and 1962, most critics acknowledged that Charles Munch had done nothing to tarnish the image of the Boston Symphony as a first rate music-making group.

Munch broke a lot of molds with the Boston. He took it on its first tour of Europe in 1952. In 1956 he took the orchestra to Moscow and Leningrad, the first visit of a western orchestra to the U. S. S. R. In 1960 Munch took the group to Japan.

After his retirement in 1962, Munch went back to France where the French government honored him in 1967 by subsidizing an orchestra for the first time and naming him conductor.

It was this Orchestre de Paris which he was leading on a tour of the U.S. when he died in his sleep on Nov. 6 in Richmond, Va. He had last conducted a concert two days earlier in Raleigh, N. C.

On Oct. 23 he had led the new orchestra in a concert in Boston to a tumultuous welcome. Characteristically, the program had been made up of a typical Munch melange: Debussy's "La mer", followed by "Medea's meditation and dance of vengeance" by Samuel Barber, and Brahms First, pieces of the old, the new, and the middle.

Erich Leinsdorf, himself playing out his last season as head of the Boston, was to conduct his orchestra in Carnegie Hall Nov. 23 as part of the Boston's regular winter visit to New York. The death of Munch caused a change in the original program. In memory of Munch, Leinsdorf selected the Brahms "Deutsches Requiem".

TO AUGMENT the orchestra, the Rutgers University Choir was chosen. Soloists were Saramae Endich, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

Miss Endich, who also performed in the first part of the program in the "Wedding Cantata" by Bach, had a ready, thin sound to her voice which didn't go off too well in the first number that night. She had less to do in the Requiem.

As for Mr. Milnes, he was simply magnificent. His rich, soaring voice captured the mood of the moment exactly. You could see the audience turn heads to glance at each other when he opened his mouth.

Mr. Leinsdorf was at his self-effacing best in both pieces. But in the Requiem his control was overwhelming. The chorus responded to his every finger flick. His players in the orchestra were plainly moved by the moment and they responded magnificently. Taken with Mr. Milnes' great solo passages, it was an unforgettable evening and a fitting tribute to the great conductor in whose memory it was being sung and played.

In the "Wedding Cantata" by Bach, a word about the orchestral soloists. Joseph Silverstein on violin, Ralph Gomberg oboe, Charles Wilson on the harpsichord, Jules Eskin on the cello, Henry Portnoi on the bass, and Sherman Walt on the bassoon showed why the Boston is such a great orchestra—it possesses great players.

THE SUNDAY RECORD-CALL
January 12, 1969 —

▶ L'Orchestre de Paris (Europe's newest major orchestra, founded only last year) made an impressive American debut—although that debut, tragically, marked the final appearances of conductor Charles Munch (from 1949 to 1962 conductor of the Boston Symphony). Munch died a few weeks later of a heart attack in Richmond, Va., while leading the orchestra's tour of other U. S. cities. His final New York concert was in every respect a personal triumph, proving again how rare he was in generating musical excitement in a concert hall. It will surely be many, many years before any other conductor gives such electrifying performances of Ravel and Berlioz as Munch did in his final appearances.

RCA Victor
Munch—final triumph

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1.293.800

JAN 10 1969

The conductor who couldn't face the music

Charles Munch was a shy man. He detested receptions with their surfeit of adulation and twittering small talk — the informal yet formal gatherings at which a new conductor was supposed to rub shoulders with his audience.

During the 1948 season, shortly after the genial Frenchman had assumed his duties at Symphony Hall, I received a telephone call. George Judd, the extraordinary manager of the Boston Symphony, knowing that I was bound for New York, suggested that I might accompany Munch in his drawing room since he was making the trip on the same day. Trustees are supposed to make themselves useful. I accepted, but pointed out that there could be a language barrier. Munch I knew to be none too fluent in English, and my Harvard French was hit or miss.

Boarding the train at the Back Bay Station, I found the conductor already installed in the seat by the window. After an exchange of pleasantries, I settled down and awaited developments. We sat in silence as the train moved out through Readville and beyond marshy area below Blue Hill. A pair of mallards jumped up from a drainage ditch and wheeled off into an autumn sky. After careful deliberation I suggested that the scene had "resemblance d'une peinture de Corot." Good old Harvard French! Munch's nodding smile assured me that my thought had penetrated.

With a gesture toward the golden - brown landscape he replied, in French, lentement, for my benefit. I recognized "marais" as marsh and "herbe" as grass, and then I had it. He had said that Van Gogh would have been delighted with the yellow grass of the marsh.

With that he picked up a magazine and we resumed our silence and respected it until we were approaching Providence. It was there, during the brief pause at the station, that he told me of his greatest ambition to take his wonderful orchestra to perform in countries where it had never before been heard. The ultimate reality of this dream now stands in the record. He was to become a global conductor who would, on the magic carpet of air-borne travel, delight audiences in Ireland, Great Britain, Scandinavia, the countries of Continental Europe, Russia, Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, Australia and New Zealand. It is doubtful that any future conductor will surpass his musical Odyssey.

He Said Good-bye — To my surprise, as we approached the 125th Street Station he left his seat and took down his coat and hat. Thinking that perhaps he was unfamiliar with New York's railroad plan, I explained that Grand Central was 10 minutes distant. He smiled, thanked me, and when the train came to a halt, said good-bye.

At Grand Central a few minutes later, the mystery was solved. A welcoming committee, obviously with prior knowledge of Munch's car number, stood expectant on the platform. The porter, after explaining that he had left the train at 125th Street, turned to me for corroboration. One of the ladies exclaimed in anguish "Oh dear it is his birthday. We have a cake, testimonials and champagne all set up in a private hotel room."

Here was music that even a great conductor couldn't face! And from a reliable witness I learned that the birthday boy dined alone in a Child's restaurant, demolishing a stack of pancakes.

In June, 1952, by good fortune my wife and I were in London on the day when the B.S.O. was scheduled to perform at Royal Festival Hall. We anticipated a feeling of pride at hearing our great orchestra so far from home. To obtain tickets we reached George Judd on the telephone.

"Don't come early," he warned and told us of a minor disaster. After a concert in France the night before, the lorry which carried the orchestras' instruments had been stymied behind a French bicycle race. So dear is this sport to the French public that it is doubtful that the Pope himself could pass. Certainly not the Boston Symphony! The channel boat was missed. The musical impedimenta had to be flown in the next day.

Two Hours Late — The concert was two hours late, yet the British audience which sat through the long wait was enthusiastic. Afterward we were invited to participate in a London - to - Boston Broadcast over the B.B.C. Well after midnight we returned to the Savoy with Munch, Judd, and Todd Perry, then the assistant manager. Munch always enjoyed a sandwich and a glass of wine after a concert. Service in the cafe had shut down at midnight. Perry went scurrying out to a restaurant returning with a stack of sandwiches in a napkin.

The echo of Charles Munch's music, especially of the French master works he loved and performed with such sensitivity will long be heard when there are silences at Symphony Hall.

During the interim, Munch told of his many visits to London with French orchestras. And for the first time I heard on the difficult acoustics in Royal Albert Hall. It is an old chestnut among musicians.

"Here," said Munch, "the audience gets a bargain. They hear the concert twice; first when it is performed, and a second time from the echo."

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,600

FEB 28 1969

New England

& Times, Beverly Mass. 3-1-'69

by Francis W. Hatch, Trustee of B.S.O.

183.

Tribute To A Great Conductor

By Mark A. Stuart

WHEN the time came for the Boston Symphony to choose a music director to succeed the great Serge Koussevitzky, the backyards of the Brahmins were abuzz with speculation. Koussevitzky had replenished the faith of Boston in itself as the heart of cultural America, building the symphony orchestra to a peak it had never enjoyed when the great conductors were operating in New York with the Philharmonic.

It roiled Boston to play second fiddle to New York in any cultural endeavor, and especially in matters musical. Along came the tiny Russian maestro to bully, cajole, and coerce the Cabots, the Lodges, the Saltonstalls, and the rest of the Beacon Hill bunch into paying for topflight players. That's the way to build a fine symphony. Prior to Koussevitzky, the Brahmins felt playing in Boston was pay enough.

How do you replace Mickey Mantle when he calls it quits? How do you get a superstar to replace a superstar?

Boston's answer was Charles Munch.

Born into a distinguished musical family in Strasbourg, Munch had started to be a doctor. But music reclaimed his soul even as he entered medical school, and before the year was out, he was studying the violin instead of the viscera.

After service in World War I, Munch settled in Paris and founded the Orchestre Symphonique and conducted the Lamoureux Concerts. He traveled around Europe as guest conductor until his appointment in 1937 as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, on whose podium he established a worldwide reputation.

HIS first visit to the United States came in 1946 and fittingly his first appearance was with the Boston Symphony. The papers raved. Koussevitzky had scoured the country for his successor and couldn't come up with anyone who fitted his exacting terms. In Munch he found his man and the Frenchman was engaged to begin as musical director of the Boston with the 1949-50 season.

It wasn't all peaches and cream at first. The purists are always toughest on the guy who follows their idol, even if he is as good. No one said Munch was better than Koussevitzky, but in the years between 1949 and 1962, most critics acknowledged that Charles Munch had done nothing to tarnish the image of the Boston Symphony as a first rate music-making group.

Munch broke a lot of molds with the Boston. He took it on its first tour of Europe in 1952. In 1956 he took the orchestra to Moscow and Leningrad, the first visit of a western orchestra to the U. S. S. R. In 1960 Munch took the group to Japan.

After his retirement in 1962, Munch went back to France where the French government honored him in 1967 by subsidizing an orchestra for the first time and naming him conductor.

It was this Orchestre de Paris which he was leading on a tour of the U.S. when he died in his sleep on Nov. 6 in Richmond, Va. He had last conducted a concert two days earlier in Raleigh, N. C.

On Oct. 23 he had led the new orchestra in a concert in Boston to a tumultuous welcome. Characteristically, the program had been made up of a typical Munch melange: Debussy's "La mer", followed by "Medea's meditation and dance of vengeance" by Samuel Barber, and Brahms First, pieces of the old, the new, and the middle.

Erich Leinsdorf, himself playing out his last season as head of the Boston, was to conduct his orchestra in Carnegie Hall Nov. 23 as part of the Boston's regular winter visit to New York. The death of Munch caused a change in the original program. In memory of Munch, Leinsdorf selected the Brahms "Deutsches Requiem".

TO AUGMENT the orchestra, the Rutgers University Choir was chosen. Soloists were Saramae Endich, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

Miss Endich, who also performed in the first part of the program in the "Wedding Cantata" by Bach, had a ready, thin sound to her voice which didn't go off too well in the first number that night. She had less to do in the Requiem.

As for Mr. Milnes, he was simply magnificent. His rich, soaring voice captured the mood of the moment exactly. You could see the audience turn heads to glance at each other when he opened his mouth.

Mr. Leinsdorf was at his self-effacing best in both pieces. But in the Requiem his control was overwhelming. The chorus responded to his every finger flick. His players in the orchestra were plainly moved by the moment and they responded magnificently. Taken with Mr. Milnes' great solo passages, it was an unforgettable evening and a fitting tribute to the great conductor in whose memory it was being sung and played.

In the "Wedding Cantata" by Bach, a word about the orchestral soloists. Joseph Silverstein on violin, Ralph Gomberg oboe, Charles Wilson on the harpsichord, Jules Eskin on the cello, Henry Portnoi on the bass, and Sherman Walt on the bassoon showed why the Boston is such a great orchestra—it possesses great players.

THE SUNDAY RECORD-CALL
January 12, 1969 —

▶ L'Orchestre de Paris (Europe's newest major orchestra, founded only last year) made an impressive American debut—although that debut, tragically, marked the final appearances of conductor Charles Munch (from 1949 to 1962 conductor of the Boston Symphony). Munch died a few weeks later of a heart attack in Richmond, Va., while leading the orchestra's tour of other U. S. cities. His final New York concert was in every respect a personal triumph, proving again how rare he was in generating musical excitement in a concert hall. It will surely be many, many years before any other conductor gives such electrifying performances of Ravel and Berlioz as Munch did in his final appearances.

RCA Victor
Munch—final triumph

SCHOLASTIC MAGAZINE
SENIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1.293.800

JAN 10 1969

The conductor who couldn't face the music

Charles Munch was a shy man. He detested receptions with their surfeit of adulation and twittering small talk — the informal yet formal gatherings at which a new conductor was supposed to rub shoulders with his audience.

During the 1948 season, shortly after the genial Frenchman had assumed his duties at Symphony Hall, I received a telephone call. George Judd, the extraordinary manager of the Boston Symphony, knowing that I was bound for New York, suggested that I might accompany Munch in his drawing room since he was making the trip on the same day. Trustees are supposed to make themselves useful. I accepted, but pointed out that there could be a language barrier. Munch I knew to be none too fluent in English, and my Harvard French was hit or miss.

Boarding the train at the Back Bay Station, I found the conductor already installed in the seat by the window. After an exchange of pleasantries, I settled down and awaited developments. We sat in silence as the train moved out through Readville and beyond marshy area below Blue Hill. A pair of mallards jumped up from a drainage ditch and wheeled off into an autumn sky. After careful deliberation I suggested that the scene had "resemblance d'une peinture de Corot." Good old Harvard French! Munch's nodding smile assured me that my thought had penetrated.

With a gesture toward the golden - brown landscape he replied, in French, lentement, for my benefit. I recognized "marais" as marsh and "herbe" as grass, and then I had it. He had said that Van Gogh would have been delighted with the yellow grass of the marsh.

With that he picked up a magazine and we resumed our silence and respected it until we were approaching Providence. It was there, during the brief pause at the station, that he told me of his greatest ambition to take his wonderful orchestra to perform in countries where it had never before been heard. The ultimate reality of this dream now stands in the record. He was to become a global conductor who would, on the magic carpet of air-borne travel, delight audiences in Ireland, Great Britain, Scandinavia, the countries of Continental Europe, Russia, Japan, Formosa, the Philippines, Australia and New Zealand. It is doubtful that any future conductor will surpass his musical Odyssey.

He Said Good-bye — To my surprise, as we approached the 125th Street Station he left his seat and took down his coat and hat. Thinking that perhaps he was unfamiliar with New York's railroad plan, I explained that Grand Central was 10 minutes distant. He smiled, thanked me, and when the train came to a halt, said good-bye.

At Grand Central a few minutes later, the mystery was solved. A welcoming committee, obviously with prior knowledge of Munch's car number, stood expectant on the platform. The porter, after explaining that he had left the train at 125th Street, turned to me for corroboration. One of the ladies exclaimed in anguish "Oh dear it is his birthday. We have a cake, testimonials and champagne all set up in a private hotel room."

Here was music that even a great conductor couldn't face! And from a reliable witness I learned that the birthday boy dined alone in a Child's restaurant, demolishing a stack of pancakes.

In June, 1952, by good fortune my wife and I were in London on the day when the B.S.O. was scheduled to perform at Royal Festival Hall. We anticipated a feeling of pride at hearing our great orchestra so far from home. To obtain tickets we reached George Judd on the telephone.

"Don't come early," he warned and told us of a minor disaster. After a concert in France the night before, the lorry which carried the orchestras' instruments had been stymied behind a French bicycle race. So dear is this sport to the French public that it is doubtful that the Pope himself could pass. Certainly not the Boston Symphony! The channel boat was missed. The musical impedimenta had to be flown in the next day.

Two Hours Late — The concert was two hours late, yet the British audience which sat through the long wait was enthusiastic. Afterward we were invited to participate in a London - to - Boston Broadcast over the B.B.C. Well after midnight we returned to the Savoy with Munch, Judd, and Todd Perry, then the assistant manager. Munch always enjoyed a sandwich and a glass of wine after a concert. Service in the cafe had shut down at midnight. Perry went scurrying out to a restaurant returning with a stack of sandwiches in a napkin.

The echo of Charles Munch's music, especially of the French master works he loved and performed with such sensitivity will long be heard when there are silences at Symphony Hall.

During the interim, Munch told of his many visits to London with French orchestras. And for the first time I heard on the difficult acoustics in Royal Albert Hall. It is an old chestnut among musicians.

"Here," said Munch, "the audience gets a bargain. They hear the concert twice; first when it is performed, and a second time from the echo."

by Francis W. Hatch, Trustee of B.S.O.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,600

Times, Beverly Mass. 3-1-'69

FEB 28 1969

New England

BLANK PAGE

184.

185

FRANK HRUBY

Who Gets the Baton?

The appointment of Pittsburgh's William Steinberg as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in 1969 ordinarily would be regarded as simply another move in the game of musical chairs (or podiums) which customarily goes on in the world of symphony orchestras.

San Francisco's Joseph Krips resigns, Seiji Ozawa signs up. St. Louis' Eleazar de Carvalho resigns, Walter Susskind signs up. George Cleve, formerly on the conductorial staff of the Cleveland Orchestra, will be musical director of the Winnipeg Symphony, and the Cleveland Philharmonic's Zoltan Rosznyai moves to the San Diego Symphony.

But Steinberg's Boston post is more complicated than these because he will not be leaving Pittsburgh; he will be conductor and musical director of both the Pittsburgh and Boston symphonies.

At a time when most organizations are passionately singing the praises of youth and are only too happy to move the "mature" leaders up to chairman of the board status, this is decidedly a reversal of policy. Steinberg is 68.

Columbia Artists Management, which serves as agent to most of the major conductors appearing in this country, has a roster of 75. There are some on the list that would not be available to assume permanent duties with a principal orchestra. There are, however, many with good reputations and musical stature who would be glad of a chance to prove their worth.

It recalls the announcement earlier in the year that George Szell will become musical advisor to the New York Philharmonic in 1969 while remaining as musical director and principal conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. Thus at that time there will be two men vitally influential in the affairs of four of the nation's half-dozen or so top symphonies.

These announcements were made possible by the resignations of Leonard Bernstein and Eric Leinsdorf from New York and Boston, respectively.

Interestingly, these latter two men are leaving their posts because of the heavy load they have been required to carry as conductors of their orchestras.

That their complaints were valid is reflected in the fact that neither the Boston nor the New York orchestras will require as much of Steinberg or Szell as they did of the others (both younger). And it must be noted that Szell will, as advisor, and "senior guest conductor" be expected to conduct only eight weeks of concerts, not the full load by any means.

It raises more questions about the conditions existing in the symphony world. Are the younger conductors not capable of handling the reins of a major orchestra? And, outside of the meteoric rise of Bernstein to the front ranks of conductors, where are the American conductors when it comes to the major posts?

Do the fortunes of orchestras rest only with established great names? Are boards of trustees reluctant to entrust their orchestras to more youthful, adventurous musicians in fear of alienating conservative-minded audiences?

The Cleveland Press
D. 389,695

JUN 8 1968

Steinberg to Repeat Role As Commuting Conductor

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music

An unprecedented move in American musical history places William Steinberg in the unique position as conductor of two major United States symphony orchestras.

Two months ago, Steinberg was appointed regular conductor of the Boston Symphony for a three-year term, beginning in September, 1969. He will succeed Erich Leinsdorf.

Steinberg has signed an "unlimited contract" with the Pittsburgh Symphony, an orchestra he has conducted for the past 16 years.

Until now, the Pittsburgh Symphony has issued new contracts at the expiration of current terms. Steinberg's present one ends after the 1968-69 season.

Future Moves

Ever since the announce of his new post with the Boston Symphony, there has been considerable conjecture in Pittsburgh and nationally as to Steinberg's future relations with the orchestra in the "steel city."

Steinberg's Boston contract requires him to conduct about half the winter season concerts and "a number of the Boston Symphony's summer concerts at Tanglewood."

Under his new contract in Pittsburgh, Steinberg agrees to "hold himself available for all rehearsals, performances, recordings and broadcasts of the Pittsburgh Symphony throughout the entire concert season, but he may not be required to conduct more than 57 concerts during a period of not more than 16 weeks."

The orchestral commuting between Pittsburgh and Boston will not be a new experience for the 68-year-old Steinberg. In 1958 and 1959, he commuted regularly between Pittsburgh and London when he was commissioned with the task of re-establishing the London Philharmonic when that orchestra had fallen considerably from grace.

Early Rumors

A few months ago, it was rumored that Steinberg might be leaving the Pittsburgh Symphony.

At that time he issued a statement that gave a clue to the present situation:

"We are too closely wed, the Pittsburgh orchestra and I, to contemplate any divorce. I have spent 16 years educating these men to share my own feeling of responsibility to the composers, to the audience and to the orchestra.

Important Commissions

"With the sense of ensemble we have developed together, the spirit and flexibility, I think it would be inconceivable for me to leave this orchestra."

The Serge Koussevitzky Foundation in the Library of Congress has awarded grants to nine composers —four in the United States and five in other countries — to write new works of chamber and symphonic music.

Their original manuscripts will later come to the Library of Congress.

American composers are Leslie Bassett, Edward Miller, Fredric Myrow, and George Perle. The others are Tadeusz Baird (Poland), Paul Dessau (Germany), Franco Donatoni (Italy), Murray Schafer (Canada), and Noam Sheriff (Israel).

These awards bring to 157 the total number of works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, founded in 1950.

Perle appeared at Clark University's Festival of Contemporary Arts in April, 1966. He gave an illustrated talk on Alban Berg's provocative opera, "Lulu."

Old Favorite

Detroit Symphony's concert master Mischa Mischakoff's performance of the Bruch Violin Concerto last October brought his long Worcester Festival services to a brilliant close.

Mischakoff has chosen a nostalgic "old chestnut" with which to leave a last impression with the orchestra in Michigan. Wednesday night, June 19, he will solo at the orchestra's "Symphony Under the Stars" series at the Michigan State Fairgrounds music shell, conducted by Valter Poole, conductor of the Worcester Festival's Concert for Young People.

His number is the "Meditation" from Massenet's "Thais."

Hokanson Recital

Worcester pianist Leonard Hokanson is coming from his present home in Germany for a recital in Westboro High School auditorium on Wednesday evening, June 26, at 8:15 p.m.

He is being presented by the Corrugated Paper Corporation in observance of the company's 25th year in Westboro. Admission is by invitation.

Hokanson's program includes Schumann's "Symphonic Studies," Chopin ballades, and Prokofieff's Third Piano Sonata.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

JUN 16 1968 New England Newsclip

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERIKANISCHE SCHWEIZER ZEITUNG
W. 2,000

JUL 3 1968

Steinberg's dual role in Boston, Pittsburgh

William Steinberg, the newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, has recently signed an unlimited contract with the Pittsburgh Symphony. This means that beginning with the 1969-70 season, Steinberg will assume the rather unique position of directing two major orchestras simultaneously.

Under the new contract, Steinberg agrees to "hold himself available for all rehearsals, performances, recordings, and broadcasts of the Pittsburgh Symphony throughout the entire season . . . but he may not be required to conduct more than 57 concerts during a period of not more than 16 weeks." In an effort to reconcile Steinberg's Boston and Pittsburgh duties, the contract further stipulates that his weeks of employment will be scheduled "in conjunction with his commitment to any other major orchestra with which he may have a contract as conductor or music director."

The new pact marks two further departures from precedent. Not only was it the first time Pittsburgh had signed a contract with a conductor for a period of more than three years, but the signing was done considerably prior to the expiration of Steinberg's present contract, which runs to the end of the 1968-69 season. Presumably the action was taken now in order to silence rumors of doubt about the future of Steinberg's relations with the Pittsburgh orchestra.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JUN 18 1968 New England Newsclip

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

JUN 1968

APPOINTMENTS William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra since 1952, will also be music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three years starting with the 1969-70 season. He will conduct about one half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-week winter season and will lead some concerts at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home . . . George Szell, music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, has been named interim principal conductor of the New York Philharmonic following the resignation of Leonard Bernstein effective at the conclusion of the 1968-69 season . . .

THE COMING SEASON

VISITOR
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
WEEKLY CIRC. 69,200

JUL 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Passing the Baton

Rhode Islanders have long had an interest in the doings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra because of a happy association with that group that goes back donkey's years. We have long depended on the BSO as the nearest dispenser of fine music performed in the grand manner.

The retirement of Erich Leinsdorf from the podium is being greeted with mixed reactions. Some believe that as a perfectionist of the Viennese School, Mr. Leinsdorf arranged his programming so that French and Russian music got something amounting to short shrift. But Mr. Leinsdorf was in many ways, the captive of a traditional preference for German music that can be traced back to the days of Karl Muck. He also had to contend with the largely Nineteenth Century taste of his prominent Boston subscribers.

The baton is being passed to William Steinberg, some years his predecessor's senior, but rather similarly trained and not wholly different in musical outlook. Boston, usually careful of its tradition, seems to be carrying on.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

JUL 1968

Musical chairs, continued: Boston and Baltimore announce new conductors

Two of the country's leading conducting positions have now been filled: in the fall of 1969 William Steinberg takes over the Boston Symphony, following the resignation of Erich Leinsdorf. He has been signed up for a period of three years, and will remain chief conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony. In Baltimore, Roumanian-born Sergiu Comissiona has been named to head the Baltimore Symphony, also beginning with the 1969–70 season; the 1968–69 season will be in the hands of Englishman Brian Priestman.

185

FRANK HRUBY

Who Gets the Baton?

The appointment of Pittsburgh's William Steinberg as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in 1969 ordinarily would be regarded as simply another move in the game of musical chairs (or podiums) which customarily goes on in the world of symphony orchestras.

San Francisco's Joseph Krips resigns, Seiji Ozawa signs up. St. Louis' Eleazar de Carvalho resigns, Walter Susskind signs up. George Cleve, formerly on the conductorial staff of the Cleveland Orchestra, will be musical director of the Winnipeg Symphony, and the Cleveland Philharmonic's Zoltan Rosznyai moves to the San Diego Symphony.

But Steinberg's Boston post is more complicated than these because he will not be leaving Pittsburgh; he will be conductor and musical director of both the Pittsburgh and Boston symphonies.

At a time when most organizations are passionately singing the praises of youth and are only too happy to move the "mature" leaders up to chairman of the board status, this is decidedly a reversal of policy. Steinberg is 68.

Columbia Artists Management, which serves as agent to most of the major conductors appearing in this country, has a roster of 75. There are some on the list that would not be available to assume permanent duties with a principal orchestra. There are, however, many with good reputations and musical stature who would be glad of a chance to prove their worth.

It recalls the announcement earlier in the year that George Szell will become musical advisor to the New York Philharmonic in 1969 while remaining as musical director and principal conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. Thus at that time there will be two men vitally influential in the affairs of four of the nation's half-dozen or so top symphonies.

These announcements were made possible by the resignations of Leonard Bernstein and Eric Leinsdorf from New York and Boston, respectively.

Interestingly, these latter two men are leaving their posts because of the heavy load they have been required to carry as conductors of their orchestras.

That their complaints were valid is reflected in the fact that neither the Boston nor the New York orchestras will require as much of Steinberg or Szell as they did of the others (both younger). And it must be noted that Szell will, as advisor, and "senior guest conductor" be expected to conduct only eight weeks of concerts, not the full load by any means.

It raises more questions about the conditions existing in the symphony world. Are the younger conductors not capable of handling the reins of a major orchestra? And, outside of the meteoric rise of Bernstein to the front ranks of conductors, where are the American conductors when it comes to the major posts?

Do the fortunes of orchestras rest only with established great names? Are boards of trustees reluctant to entrust their orchestras to more youthful, adventurous musicians in fear of alienating conservative-minded audiences?

The Cleveland Press
D. 339,695

JUN 8 1968

Steinberg to Repeat Role As Commuting Conductor

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music

An unprecedented move in American musical history places William Steinberg in the unique position as conductor of two major United States symphony orchestras.

Two months ago, Steinberg was appointed regular conductor of the Boston Symphony for a three-year term, beginning in September, 1969. He will succeed Erich Leinsdorf.

Steinberg has signed an "unlimited contract" with the Pittsburgh Symphony, an orchestra he has conducted for the past 16 years.

Until now, the Pittsburgh Symphony has issued new contracts at the expiration of current terms. Steinberg's present one ends after the 1968-69 season.

Future Moves

Ever since the announce of his new post with the Boston Symphony, there has been considerable conjecture in Pittsburgh and nationally as to Steinberg's future relations with the orchestra in the "steel city."

Steinberg's Boston contract requires him to conduct about half the winter season concerts and "a number of the Boston Symphony's summer concerts at Tanglewood."

Under his new contract in Pittsburgh, Steinberg agrees to "hold himself available for all rehearsals, performances, recordings and broadcasts of the Pittsburgh Symphony throughout the entire concert season, but he may not be required to conduct more than 57 concerts during a period of not more than 16 weeks."

The orchestral commuting between Pittsburgh and Boston will not be a new experience for the 68-year-old Steinberg. In 1958 and 1959, he commuted regularly between Pittsburgh and London when he was commissioned with the task of re-establishing the London Philharmonic when that orchestra had fallen considerably from grace.

Early Rumors

A few months ago, it was rumored that Steinberg might be leaving the Pittsburgh Symphony.

At that time he issued a statement that gave a clue to the present situation:

"We are too closely wed, the Pittsburgh orchestra and I, to contemplate any divorce. I have spent 16 years educating these men to share my own feeling of responsibility to the composers, to the audience and to the orchestra.

Important Commissions

"With the sense of ensemble we have developed together, the spirit and flexibility, I think it would be inconceivable for me to leave this orchestra."

The Serge Koussevitzky Foundation in the Library of Congress has awarded grants to nine composers —four in the United States and five in other countries — to write new works of chamber and symphonic music.

Their original manuscripts will later come to the Library of Congress.

American composers are Leslie Bassett, Edward Miller, Fredric Myrow, and George Perle. The others are Tadeusz Baird (Poland), Paul Dessau (Germany), Franco Donatoni (Italy), Murray Schafer (Canada), and Noam Sheriff (Israel).

These awards bring to 157 the total number of works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, founded in 1950.

Perle appeared at Clark University's Festival of Contemporary Arts in April, 1966. He gave an illustrated talk on Alban Berg's provocative opera, "Lulu."

Old Favorite

Detroit Symphony's concert master Mischa Mischakoff's performance of the Bruch Violin Concerto last October brought his long Worcester Festival services to a brilliant close.

Mischakoff has chosen a nostalgic "old chestnut" with which to leave a last impression with the orchestra in Michigan. Wednesday night, June 19, he will solo at the orchestra's "Symphony Under the Stars" series at the Michigan State Fairgrounds music shell, conducted by Valter Poole, conductor of the Worcester Festival's Concert for Young People.

His number is the "Meditation" from Massenet's "Thais."

Hokanson Recital

Worcester pianist Leonard Hokanson is coming from his present home in Germany for a recital in Westboro High School auditorium on Wednesday evening, June 26, at 8:15 p.m.

He is being presented by the Corrugated Paper Corporation in observance of the company's 25th year in Westboro. Admission is by invitation.

Hokanson's program includes Schumann's "Symphonic Studies," Chopin ballades, and Prokofieff's Third Piano Sonata.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

JUN 16 1968 New England Newsclip

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERIKANISCHE SCHWEIZER ZEITUNG
WL 2,000

JUL 3 1968

Steinberg's dual role in Boston, Pittsburgh

William Steinberg, the newly appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, has recently signed an unlimited contract with the Pittsburgh Symphony. This means that beginning with the 1969-70 season, Steinberg will assume the rather unique position of directing two major orchestras simultaneously.

Under the new contract, Steinberg agrees to "hold himself available for all rehearsals, performances, recordings, and broadcasts of the Pittsburgh Symphony throughout the entire season . . . but he may not be required to conduct more than 57 concerts during a period of not more than 16 weeks." In an effort to reconcile Steinberg's Boston and Pittsburgh duties, the contract further stipulates that his weeks of employment will be scheduled "in conjunction with his commitment to any other major orchestra with which he may have a contract as conductor or music director."

The new pact marks two further departures from precedent. Not only was it the first time Pittsburgh had signed a contract with a conductor for a period of more than three years, but the signing was done considerably prior to the expiration of Steinberg's present contract, which runs to the end of the 1968-69 season. Presumably the action was taken now in order to silence rumors of doubt about the future of Steinberg's relations with the Pittsburgh orchestra.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 192,400

JUN 18 1968 New England Newsclip

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

JUN 1968

APPOINTMENTS William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra since 1952, will also be music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three years starting with the 1969-70 season. He will conduct about one half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-week winter season and will lead some concerts at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home . . . George Szell, music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, has been named interim principal conductor of the New York Philharmonic following the resignation of Leonard Bernstein effective at the conclusion of the 1968-69 season . .

THE COMING SEASON

VISITOR
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
WEEKLY CIRC. 69,000

JUL 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Passing the Baton

Rhode Islanders have long had an interest in the doings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra because of a happy association with that group that goes back donkey's years. We have long depended on the BSO as the nearest dispenser of fine music performed in the grand manner.

The retirement of Erich Leinsdorf from the podium is being greeted with mixed reactions. Some believe that as a perfectionist of the Viennese School, Mr. Leinsdorf arranged his programming so that French and Russian music got something amounting to short shrift. But Mr. Leinsdorf was in many ways, the captive of a traditional preference for German music that can be traced back to the days of Karl Muck. He also had to contend with the largely Nineteenth Century taste of his prominent Boston subscribers.

The baton is being passed to William Steinberg, some years his predecessor's senior, but rather similarly trained and not wholly different in musical outlook. Boston, usually careful of its tradition, seems to be carrying on.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

JUL 1968

Musical chairs, continued: Boston and Baltimore announce new conductors

Two of the country's leading conducting positions have now been filled: in the fall of 1969 William Steinberg takes over the Boston Symphony, following the resignation of Erich Leinsdorf. He has been signed up for a period of three years, and will remain chief conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony. In Baltimore, Roumanian-born Sergiu Comissiona has been named to head the Baltimore Symphony, also beginning with the 1969–70 season; the 1968–69 season will be in the hands of Englishman Brian Priestman.

FADED TEXT

186

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

JUL 1968

MUSIC MAKERS

BY ROLAND GELATT

Bruckner and a Loewe-Bennett Fair Lady From Pittsburgh

At right, seated: conductor Steinberg (with pipe); composer Bennett; Command producer Byrne. Below, Mr. Bennett chats with "Music Makers" man Roland Gelatt.

EVERY APRIL, along with the robins and magnolia blossoms, Command Records returns to Pittsburgh for a few days of intensive recording with the Pittsburgh Symphony. This year was no exception. Only the repertoire was exceptional. It ran the gamut from Anton Bruckner's Seventh Symphony to Frederick Loewe's My Fair Lady.

Both were conducted by William Steinberg, Pittsburgh's longtime music director and a man of decidedly unfettered tastes. Last year, after recording Robert Russell Bennett's "symphonic picture" of Porgy and Bess, Dr. Steinberg was heard to observe that he considered My Fair Lady the finest work for the American musical theatre since Gershwin's time. This remark stuck in the vigilant mind of Loren Becker, a onetime singer turned businessman who functions as impresario and general factotum of Command Records. If Gershwin could be transformed into acceptable symphonic fare, Becker mused, why not Loewe? Back in New York, he popped the question to Robert Russell Bennett. Would he consider doing for My Fair Lady what he had done for Porgy and Bess? Bennett agreed to try, and in due course received an official commission from the Pittsburgh Symphony—the same orchestra that had given the first performance of his Porgy synthesis back in the regime of Fritz Reiner a quarter century ago. Only one stipulation was attached. The music had to be ready in time for the orchestra's April recording sessions, and it was.

When I arrived on the scene, Bruckner's Seventh was still the order of business. The first and third movements had been completed the previous day; now it was time for the second and fourth. While the instrumentalists trooped into Soldiers and Sailors Hall, a dowdy but acoustically responsive edifice built to commemorate Pittsburgh's fighting men in the Civil War, I managed to have a chat with Bob Byrne, the producer who has been in charge of Command's Pittsburgh sessions since 1961. A genial, affably unruffled man in his late forties, Byrne has spent most of his professional career in the pop field—first as trombonist in the Jimmy Dorsey Orchestra, later as leader of his own band, and for the last eight years as Command's artist and repertoire director. Byrne's original training was classical, however, and it became apparent as the sessions progressed that he had an extraordinarily acute ear for Brucknerian detail. Like most producers today, Byrne can thread his way easily through the arcana of electronics, but he leaves the engineering at Command sessions to a seasoned crew from Fine Recording in New York. The Fine engineers bring their own equipment, including two huge Westrex 35-mm film recorders.

Over the three Altec-Lansing monitor speakers one could hear the orchestra tuning up. Then Steinberg began the first take. "I hope you won't find the level too high," Byrne warned. "I have to listen for detail, and you can only catch it when the sound really hits you." I confess I did find the sound excruciatingly loud, and when Steinberg unleashed a tumultuous triple forte I fled from the room. Fortunately, the conductor asked to hear the playback at a normal volume. Almost immediately he began to shake his head. "Can a record listener stand such a slow tempo?" Steinberg asked the first desk men who had assembled in the control room. Before they could answer, he had his own reply. "In a concert it works. But there's a difference between the right tempo for a concert and the right tempo for a record." He listened for another minute or so. "Yes, it's too slow. If I were a record listener, this would make me nervous." The playback was stopped, and everybody filed out to try it again at a faster tempo.

Continued on page 22

After a long day of recording, all of Bruckner was "in the can." By then, Robert Russell Bennett and his wife had joined the party. Encountering him without forewarning, you would never take him for a musician. A chairman of the board, perhaps, a prominent civic leader, a retired Ivy League professor, but certainly not a composer. Appearances can be deceiving. Robert Russell Bennett is one of the great orchestral craftsmen of our time. He began writing arrangements for music publishers almost half a century ago and has been in high demand ever since as an orchestrator for Broadway shows.

"At one time," he reminisced over a pre-session breakfast, "I was working on more than twenty shows a season. People often ask me how many musicals I've orchestrated. I lost count years ago. It must be something like 250. But," he added, not without a touch of irony, "I have to tell you that I'm a real snob. I'm forever selling Broadway short. My musical education was rigorously traditional, and I always turn to the classics when I listen for my own pleasure. If a piece is signed Serge Prokofiev, I'll pay strict attention to it...even though the music may be worse than Irving Berlin's." Right now Robert Russell Bennett is hard at work on an opera, for which he has also written the libretto. His great ambition is to see it produced at the Metropolitan Opera.

Everyone agreed that Loewe-Bennett would be a cinch after the reefs and shoals of Bruckner. But it didn't turn out that way at all. To record My Fair Lady and its companion piece (a similar Bennett synthesis of Sound of Music) necessitated almost two hours of overtime—at $3,000 an hour. Part of the problem lay in the seating of the instrumentalists. What had previously worked out well for Beethoven, Brahms, and Bruckner did not work out at all well for Bennett. But eventually the pieces were completed to the composer's and conductor's satisfaction, and the results will be available this month on the Command label.

NOT LONG after the Pittsburgh sessions, Dr. Steinberg was appointed music director of the Boston Symphony, succeeding Erich Leinsdorf, who announced last December that he would resign at the end of the 1968-69 season because the orchestra's trustees had refused to reduce his workload. Steinberg's Boston contract runs for three seasons, beginning in September 1969. He will conduct about half of the orchestra's regular winter concerts and will also be on hand at Tanglewood for at least part of the summer season. At the same time, the Pittsburgh Symphony let it be known that Steinberg will continue at the helm for an indefinite number of seasons to come, providing over-all musical guidance and conducting a certain number of concerts. That would seem like quite an assignment for a man who will be seventy next summer, but the stocky Dr. Steinberg is celebrated for his stamina and reliable professionalism. Certainly, he doesn't appear a bit bothered at the prospect of carrying the artistic burden of two large orchestras on his shoulders.

The Boston Symphony's announcement ended a long period of speculation over who would be named Leinsdorf's successor. The world is full of glamorous young conductors today, and they were all rumored at one time or another as potential candidates for the Boston post. Britain's Colin Davis came up repeatedly as the most likely possibility, and there is good reason to believe that he was offered the job and turned it down. Similarly, there had been intense speculation over the successor to Leonard Bernstein, who also resigns—as music director of the New York Philharmonic—at the end of next season. The New York rumors were temporarily stilled by the appointment of George Szell as "music advisor and senior guest conductor" for an indefinite interim period. Dr. Szell too will continue to hold down his current responsibilities as music director of the Cleveland Orchestra, though he will be turning over an increasing number of concerts in the years ahead to guest conductor Pierre Boulez. At press time, the Chicago Symphony had yet to reveal the name of its next music director, but unofficial word had it that the job was going to fifty-six-year-old Georg Solti, who would conduct about half of the season's concerts. Chicago's earlier negotiations with Herbert von Karajan reportedly broke down over money.

The moral of all this would seem to be that the young conductors of whom we hear so much these days either cannot or will not assume the arduous responsibilities of directing a major American orchestra on a full-season basis. One of them, who shall remain nameless, told me that he considered this kind of life both personally onerous and musically debilitating. "No man," he insisted, "can be expected to bring a fresh, imaginative approach to so much music at so many concerts. It just doesn't make any sense." If this attitude is as general as it appears to be among the under-fifty generation of conductors, we are going to have to revise our notions about the future role of the music director in the American orchestral establishment. Meanwhile, a handful of veterans from Central Europe are temporarily holding the major fort.

SPOTLIGHT

William Steinberg's recent appointment as Music Director of the Boston Symphony, on top of his permanent niche in Pittsburgh, puts him in the seemingly uncomfortable position of having to wear two hats at once. But Steinberg is no stranger to dual assignments. In 1958 and '59, he commuted regularly from Pittsburgh to London, while he was engaged in restoring the London Symphony's position after its fall from grace. Steinberg's reputation as an orchestra doctor is certainly merited. Among the orchestras that look to him as a major influence in their developments are the Israeli Philharmonic, the NBC Symphony, Buffalo, London, Pittsburgh, and now Boston. In a modest refusal to accept the title of "father" of the Israeli Philharmonic, Steinberg said, "Since it was Hubermann (the co-founder) who collected the money, I consider him the father. I, who delivered the orchestra, am actually the mother!" In reference to his wide-spread success as an orchestra builder, Steinberg only said, "I have never encountered an orchestra that wanted to play badly." His knowledge, skill, wit and impeccable courtesy to the members of any orchestra (he refers to them as "ladies and gentlemen" at all times, and always comes to rehearsal prepared) have brought him the respect of more orchestras than most conductors could shake a baton at. Added to these gifts is his modest approach to the role of the conductor. Steinberg dreams of conducting an entire concert with a screen around the podium, so that the audience would listen to the "front of the music" rather than watch his back. In these days of "glamor boy" conductors, the belief that only the orchestra needs to see him sets Steinberg apart from his contemporaries. Steinberg constantly reaffirms his faith in American audiences and American orchestras and it is no case of unrequited love. "My correspondence," he notes, "is chiefly turning down invitations."

BOSTON SHARES CONDUCTOR. In what is regarded as a strategic holding operation, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have asked William Steinberg to divide himself between the musical directorships of the BSO and the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, at least through June 1972. Steinberg, who has spent the last sixteen years lifting Pittsburgh to the top of this country's second-echelon orchestras, will succeed Erich Leinsdorf in 1969. In addition to providing overall guidance for the Boston Symphony, he will conduct about one-half of the orchestra's thirty-week winter season and some concerts at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Massachusetts. Steinberg has a new, unlimited contract with Pittsburgh.

MUSIC EDUCATORS
JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000

SEP 1968

187

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 856,621 SUN. 1,145,695

AUG 18 1968

Music

William Steinberg's Quest for Invisibility

BY ALBERT GOLDBERG

As everyone knows by this time, William Steinberg is one of the least "sensational" — in the opprobrious sense of the word—of all conductors. He indulges in no histrionics and his technique—although he professes to abhor the word—is nearly as economical and effortless as it is possible to be.

Yet this modest and self-effacing conductor proposes to try an experiment next season that may well prove to be the most controversial since Leopold Stokowski first focused an overhead spotlight on his golden mane and sinuous hands.

"I have suggested to the management that I conduct at least one of my Carnegie Hall concerts from behind a screen so that people can learn again to listen with their ears instead of their eyes," Steinberg said during his recent Hollywood Bowl visit.

"It is one way of making myself exceedingly unpopular with other conductors, but I have no axes to grind. People either have confidence in me or they do not. I wouldn't try it in Lincoln Center, where audiences are oriented to the latest sensation. But in Carnegie Hall it might be accepted."

Steinberg ruefully admits that he was not always so restrained as he is today.

"I was very wild when I was young—but not so wild as most young conductors are today. If I had indulged in such shenanigans my mother would have hit me over the head and said 'Don't behave like a fool!' Once when we were watching an acrobatic conductor she remarked 'He climbs out of his dress suit!' After it was decided that I should become a professional conductor she would tell me over and over 'I hope people will never have to say that you wear well tailored clothes.'

"I was very wild when I was young, but not as wild as today's young conductors"

"So the more my younger colleagues dance, the quieter I will be. I learned to economize because jumping distracts from the music. It is also ugly and unaesthetic. People forget that of all the great conductors not one did any dancing. Even the one with the greatest reputation for showmanship made every movement count. Toscanini's' showmanship consisted of no showmanship at all. The more a conductor jumps around the more he detracts from the music. A concert should demonstrate the music, not the conductor. A conductor must serve two masters—the music and the orchestra. If in the process the audience gets something out of it that is not too bad.

"Even circus acrobats try not to make their feats seem difficult. The thrill comes because their stunts look so easy. Why should the conductor, of all public performers, look ugly and labored? When Heifetz, Horowitz and Rubinstein play they make it seem incredibly easy. It may look easy when I conduct, but it is not. The greater the artist the more effortless his work should appear.

"And generally the less effort the better an orchestra plays. In Cologne when I was starting out I used to stamp my feet. Then one day the orchestra got sick of it and started stamping back. There I learned my first lesson.

"What is an orchestra looking for? Simply the best way to play well. All orchestras want to play well and are grateful if you show them how. A conductor is there not only to invoke the greatest potential. He must also show the players how to do things the easiest way. Then sometimes orchestras play beyond themselves.

"I remember the British conductor who, after conducting a third-rate orchestra, told the ladies at the after-concert tea 'The dear chaps played as well as they could.' Some time later I conducted the same orchestra and I told the ladies 'The dear chaps played better than they can.' But if you would ask me how they did it I could not explain. That is one of the eternal, unexplainable realities of conducting that makes each orchestra sound different under each conductor.

"Mozart said that the most important things are not in the music. I believe in stars over a performance. If the stars are not in the sky you can try as hard as you can and it will not go right. A conductor must discover for himself the important things and convert them into reality.

"People seem to think the magic of conducting depends upon the diagrams the conductor draws. I have found out that orchestras don't care what kind of diagrams are waved before their noses. They just find out by what method they can play best. If a performance is good the orchestra is apt to get the credit. If it is bad the conductor is blamed. The only people who can't be fooled are the players. You can fool critics or audiences, but not players. The orchestra knows before the first downbeat with whom it has to deal.

"How can a conductor win an orchestra's confidence? It is a secret that can never be put into words. Either it is there or it is not. There is nothing in between. In my younger years I said that conducting means conveying experience. But by experience I mean more than the musical or technical aspects. I also mean the human aspects. A conductor must also be a spiritual leader.

"But sometimes an orchestra has more experience than the conductor. Few conductors are able to look at things on the same eye-level as the players. Some conductors are too much above the level of the players and cannot communicate with them. An orchestra might fear such a conductor but it will not respect him. If a conductor exerts fear he must be evil, and if he is evil he cannot make music. I believe this strongly. I believe in being on good terms with players but not in being a back-slapper. Conducting is an autocratic business. One must lead and the other must follow: Otherwise there is anarchy.

"A conductor must have humility—toward the music, the orchestra and the audience. If he comes with a feeling of humility he knows what is expected of him. If he comes filled with conceit he will lose everything. I can count on the fingers of one hand the personalities who are able to rise above all the hazards—and I am not sure I will need to use my fifth finger.

WILLIAM STEINBERG—EARS OVER EYES.

"I make a distinction between the German terms Dirigent and Kappellmeister. The Dirigents are the ones who make rabbits fly out of the hat. The Kappellmeister—the master of the band—doesn't do anything but establish the music and the performance through his mastery. Thus I call Toscanini the greatest Kappellmeister.

"I do not believe that conducting can be taught. One cannot learn how to become a conductor—one simply must be one. And I do not think the art can be learned by mere observation. It can be learned only by conducting a live orchestra. The trouble in this country is that there are not enough orchestras on which a young conductor can perfect his gifts—if any. That is where Europe has the advantage in many small opera houses each of which needs a number of conductors. Under those conditions a conductor can earn his spurs by starting at the bottom and working up.

"Conducting is an autocratic business. One must lead and the others follow"

"My case was rather special for I started in a big theater at Cologne. Otto Klemperer had heard me play accompaniments for orchestra players at auditions and called me to be his assistant. With Klemperer I did all the menial jobs—coaching, giving off-stage cues, lining up the singers for curtain calls, 'carrying the music' as they say. I learned everything I needed to learn, besides profiting from Klemperer's criticism. For one wrong tempo at a rehearsal he would not speak to me for weeks.

"Toscanini was like that, too. I was planning a program with him that I was to conduct with the NBC Symphony and he said 'You must do some Wagner. You do it so well.' Naturally I was flattered and we agreed upon the "'Tannhäuser' Overture.

"I thought it went passably at the concert but I was hardly back in the dressing room when the phone rang. Did you look at the score of "Tannhäuser?" the maestro's voice boomed. 'Yes, I did' I replied meekly. 'And what does it say at the beginning?' I felt quite sure of myself. 'Andante maestoso,' I said. 'What else?' he asked. 'A quarter note equals 50 on the metronome.' 'Yes—50,' he shouted. 'And you played it 55. You have betrayed me'

"For that crime—and do you realize how slight the difference is between 50 and 55?—I was banished from his good graces for a long time."

Beginning with the 1969-70 season Steinberg will become the musical director of both the Pittsburgh Symphony (with which he has a unique lifetime contract) and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Arranging the complicated schedule became a managerial game of chess," Steinberg said. "I will open both seasons — Pittsburgh, then Boston. People were concerned that I do exactly half of each season, though as it works out Pittsburgh will have 16 weeks and Boston 15.

"Otherwise my time will be equally divided—not a lump in each place at the beginning or end of each season. I will be commuting back and forth all the time. I will have 15 different programs in Pittsburgh as compared to 12 in Boston. This is because in Pittsburgh the Syria Mosque seats 4,000 and we are able to take care of the subscribers in a pair of concerts. In Boston, where the capacity of Symphony Hall is not so large, each program is played four times."

After beginning his Pittsburgh-Boston routine Steinberg intends to accept only one outside engagement—an invitation from Pablo Casals to conduct at his festival in Puerto Rico. There may be one other exception—if the Pittsburgh Symphony should tour Europe under State Department auspices. The coming 1968-69 season will find Steinberg mainly in Pittsburgh, though he will do four midwinter weeks with the Chicago Symphony and six weeks in Europe.

When, if ever under this formidable schedule, will he get to Los Angeles again? Steinberg twinkled at the question.

"Hollywood Bowl is hard," he said. "The rehearsals in the hot sun, the noise, and all that. For 30 years I promised myself that I would not come back to the Bowl—and I have always broken the promise."

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 516,640 SUN. 936,135

AUG 25 1968

Steinberg: 2 batons

Veteran conductor Takes Boston post

By DANIEL WEBSTER
Of The Inquirer Staff

LENOX, Mass. — The air is clear and the atmosphere serene at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony Orchestra goes through its routine of rehearsal and performance, its players relaxed beside the intense and shaggy students at the Berkshire Music Center. Things look much as they have for years.

But Tanglewood in not the same and there is very near that serene surface a bubbling sense of impending change, maybe even revolution.

The obvious reason is the scheduled change of music directors, but to anyone walking around the manicured grounds at Tanglewood, that change will contribute to the status quo, not to any revolution. William Steinberg, the 70-year old conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will add the BSO to his duties after next season. Passed over in 1961 when Erich Leinsdorf was appointed in Boston, Steinberg will guide the BSO for three years at least and his role has been clarified by BSO officers.

RETHINKING POSITION

Thomas D. Perry, Jr., the symphony's manager, said, "Obviously we will have to be thinking about a successor to Steingerg. We are delighted to have him: We wanted someone who would maintain the orchestra and for this he will be excellent. He is a master. We need his kind of genius now because we are rethink-

Continued on Page 5, Column 5

Pittsburgh podium Shares his skills

By ALBERT GOLDBERG
Special to The Inquirer And Los Angeles Times

As everyone knows by this time, William Steinberg is one of the least "sensational" — in the opprobrious sense of the word — of all conductors. He indulges in no histrionics and his technique — although he professes to abhor the word — is nearly as economical and effortless as it is possible to be.

Steinberg is about to become conductor of both the Pittsburgh and Boston Symphony Orchestras.

This modest conductor proposes to try an experiment next season that may well prove to be the most controversial since Leopold Stokowski first focused an overhead spotlight on his golden mane and sinuous hands.

SEEKS A RETURN

"I have suggested to the management that I conduct at least one of my Carnegie Hall concerts from behind a screen so that people can learn again to listen with their ears instead of their eyes," Steinberg said during his recent Hollywood Bowl visit.

"It is one way of making myself exceedingly unpopular with other conductors, but I have no axes to grind. People either have confidence in me or they do not. I wouldn't try it in Lincoln Center, where audiences are oriented to the latest sensation. But in Carnegie Hall it might be accepted."

Steinberg admits that he

Continued on Page 6, Column 4

over over

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, August 31, 1968

YOUNGSTOWN, VINDICATOR
YOUNGSTOWN, O. 44501
P.M. CIRC. 101,812
SUN. CIRC. 161,859

SEP-1-68

188

Steinberg takes two podiums

Continued from First Page

ing the whole role of the symphony in our time and we may very well get lost in the woods."

"We wonder if the symphony can go on doing what it has been doing for generations, and if it is the central musical institution in American cities — and it is — we wonder if it doesn't have to adapt itself to contrmporary life."

Perry noted that Tanglewood was the scene his summer of concerts by innovative rock groups and singers, a series entitled "Contemporary Trends." In urging this series, Gunther Schuller, head of Tanglewood's Contemporary Music activities, said that audiences and musicians have been exposed to music from many cultures and that "an interesting process of cross-breeding with so-called serious music has developed."

LARGE AUDIENCE

The concerts brought a large and new audience and, as Perry noted with some relief, an orderly, young audience there for the message as well as the medium. The idea may be repeated next summer if, Perry stressed, the best innovators are available. "We are not going to present the best we can get; we will present the best or nothing at all, but this, too, is something that needs a lot of thought.

"This is a very confused and interesting time. We have a lot of thinking to do about our Symphony, not just as an institution of 106 men, but as an entity. We have to think about the Symphony's role in education, we have to decide about its role in television. Television straight and television crazy. And we must know what its role will be in facing mixed media, in electronics, in rock, if you will.

"We think the Symphony must find a position in the developments that are taking place. I'm fascinated by the possibilities of mixed media. Some of the young people here at Tanglewood are showing us things that take your breath away. I think the symphony — as an institution — must get into the things that are happening.

YOUTH'S CHALLENGE

"It's been terribly stimulating for us to sit at the table here with the young people in the Berkshire Music Center. They challenge every aspect of the symphony's existence — and they are such damned good musicians, too.

"We don't even know what a music director should be. Will the music director of the future be a conductor trained in the usual way. Will he even be a musician? Maybe he'll be a manager who can run up a balance sheet and sell tickets or maybe he'll be a man trained in communications, in theater. I don't know.

STEINBERG'S ROLE

"But if we are to have an orchestra that is anything but a museum, we must find answers to these questions. This inability to justify the symphony's traditional role is what keeps bothering Leonard Bernstein and it keeps bothering us, too. We may find it impossible to adapt the symphony to all that's going on around us, but if that happens we will have failed to meet our responsibilities.

As he spole, the BSO was playing the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 5 under Sixten Ehrling's baton,

"We can play that until we're black in the face," Perry said, "but we will be missing half the world."

So Steinberg will move in to maintain stability while the Boston Symphony Orchestra tries to find a direction as it nears the end of its first hundred years.

each is a continuation from a double article from the Phila. Inquirer which starts on the other side of this page.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

SEP 25 1968

New England Newsclip

Veteran conductor Will add Boston to Pittsburgh post

Continued from First Page

was not always so restrained as he is today.

"I was very wild when I was young — but not as wild as most young conductors are today. If I had indulged in such shenanigans my mother would have hit me over the head and said 'don't behave like a fool!'

LEARNED TO ECONOMIZE

"So the more my younger colleagues dance, the quieter I will be. I learned to economize because jumping distracts from the music. It is also ugly and unaesthetic. People forget that of all the great conductors not one did any dancing. Even the one with the greatest reputation for showmanship made every movement count. Toscanini's showmanship consisted of no showmanship at all. A conductor must serve two masters — the music and the orchestra. If in the process the audience gets something out of it that is not too bad.

FEATS SEEM EASY

"Even circus acrobats try not to make their feats seem difficult. The thrill comes because their stunts look so easy. Why should the conductor, of all public performers, look ugly and labored? When Heifetz, Horowitz and Rubinstein play they make it seem incredibly easy. It may look easy when I conduct, but it is not.

"And generally, the less effort the better an orchestra plays. In Cologne when I was starting out I used to stamp my feet. Then one day the orchestra got sick of it and started stamping back. There I learned my first lesson.

"What is an orchestra looking for? Simply the best way to play well. All orchestras want to play well and are grateful if you show them how. A conductor is there not only to invoke the greatest potential, he must also show the players how to do things the easiest way. Then sometimes orchestras play beyond themselves.

"I remember the British conductor who, after conducting a third rate orchestra, told the ladies at the after-concert tea 'the dear chaps played as well as they could.' Some time later I conducted the same orchestra and I told the ladies 'the dear chaps played better than they can.' But if you would ask me how they did it I could not explain. That is one of the eternal, unexplainable realities of conducting that makes each orchestra sound different under each conductor.

BELIEVES IN STARS

"Mozart said that the most important things are not in the music. I believe in stars over a performance. If the stars are not in the sky you can try as hard as you can and it will not go right. A conductor must discover for himself the important things and convert them into reality.

"People seem to think the magic of conducting depends upon the diagrams the conductor draws. I have found out that orchestras don't care what kind of diagrams are waved before their noses. They just find out by what method they can play best. If a performance is good the orchestra is apt to get the credit. If it is bad the conductor is blamed. The only people who can't be fooled are the players. You can fool critics or audiences, but not players.

"How can a conductor win an orchestra's confidence? It is a secret that can never be put into words. Either it is there or it is not. There is nothing in between. In my younger years I said that conducting means conveying experience. But by experience I mean more than the musical or technical aspects. I also mean the human aspects. A conductor must also be a spiritual leader.

LEVELS IMPORTANT

"But sometimes an orchestra has more experience than the conductor. Few conductors are able to look at things on the same eye-level as the players. Some conductors are too much above the level of the players and cannot communicate with them. An orchestra might fear such a conductor but it will not respect him. If a conductor exerts fear he must be evil, and if he is evil he cannot make music. I believe in being on good terms with players but not in being a back-slapper. Conducting is an autocratic business. One must lead and the other must follow: Otherwise there is anarchy.

"A conductor must have humility — toward the music, the orchestra and the audience. If he comes with a feeling of humility he knows what is expected of him. If he comes filled with conceit he will lose everything. I can count on the fingers of one hand the personalities who are able to rise above all the hazards — and I am not sure I will need to use my fifth finger.

STARTED IN CALOGUE

"I do not believe that conducting can be taught. One cannot learn how to become a conductor — one simply must be one. And I do not think the art can be learned by mere observation. It can be learned only by conducting a live orchestra. The trouble in this country is that there are not enough orchestras on which a young conductor can perfect his gifts — if any. That is where Europe has the advantage in many small opera houses each of which needs a number of conductors.

"My case was rather special for I started in a big theater at Cologne. Otto Klemperer had heard me play accompaniments for orchestra players at auditions and called me to be his assistant. With Klemperer I did all the menial jobs — coaching, giving off-stage cues, lining up the singers for curtain calls, 'carrying the music' as they say. I learned everything I needed to learn, besides profiting from Klemperer's criticism. For one wrong tempo at a rehearsal he would not speak to me for weeks."

HEADS TWO ORCHESTRAS

Beginning with the 1969-70 season Steinberg will become the musical director of both the Pittsburgh Symphony (with which he has a unique lifetime contract) and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Arranging the complicated schedule became a managerial game of chess," Steinberg said. "I will open both seasons — Pittsburgh, then Boston. People were concerned that I do exactly half of each season, though as it works out Pittsburgh will have 16 weeks and Boston 15.

"Otherwise my time will be equally divided — not a lump in each place at the beginning or end of each season. I will be commuting back and forth all the time. I will have 15 different programs in Pittsburgh as compared to 12 in Boston. This is because in Pittsburgh the Syria Mosque seats 4,000 and we are able to take care of the subscribers in a pair of concerts. In Boston, where the capacity of Symphony Hall is not so large, each program is played four times."

After beginning his Pittsburgh-Boston routine Steinberg intends to accept only one outside engagement — an invitation from Pablo Casals to conduct at his festival in Puerto Rico. There may be one other exception — if the Pittsburgh Symphony should tour Europe under State Department auspices. The 1968-69 season will find Steinberg mainly in Pittsburgh, though he will do four midwinter weeks with the Chicago Symphony and six weeks in Europe.

Steinberg's 'Elektra' marvelous

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

PITTSBURGH — William Steinberg, who becomes Music Director of the Boston Symphony a year from now, opened the 42nd season of the Pittsburgh Symphony, whose Music Director he has been since 1952, with a concert performance of Strauss's "Elektra." Apart from the lavish cuts he makes, Steinberg conducts "Elektra" really marvelously. I very much hope, therefore, that he will soon bring it to his new orchestra — Boston, that swinging citadel of culture, that other Athens, has not had a performance of Strauss's tragedy since the Hammerstein company gave it in March 1910. Would, incidentally, we could be as confident now of seeing an important new opera within 18 months of its completion!

Let me dispose of the question of the cuts first. The two male servants and the tutor of Orest were dropped, presumably to save engaging extra singers, and there certainly is every reason for not having the singers of Orest and Aegisth double in the smaller roles.

Their intrusions have more of a theatrical purpose than a musical one, but it was a pity to lose these effective breaks of pace and texture.

In addition, Steinberg made the standard cuts that are unfortunately so familiar from the New York and Vienna stagings and from

The ARTS

Karl Boehm's recording. One is always told that Strauss himself authorized these cuts, indeed made them in performances he conducted in his later years, but that does not make them any better. Taste and artistic judgment should make Strauss the cutter-conductor defer to Strauss the composer.

One of the cuts is vilely stupid to an especial degree, the omission of the passage in which Elektra, grimly cool, describes to Klytemnaestra that the course of her death must run parallel to Agamemmon's. None of the others brings so incredible a loss; nevertheless, each — those in Elektra's scenes with Klytemnaestra and Orest more than those in her dialogue with Chrysothemis — does significant dramatic and musical damage, particularly in diluting climaxes by hurrying their arrival (I think especially of the music just before Klytemnaestra's exit).

Threatening tedium is supposed to be the justification, but I find that hard to believe in, given conducting and singing of the intelligence and intensity of what was heard here Friday. Steinberg paced the drama superbly, and he was particularly good at projecting a sense of large rhythmic and structural units, giving tremendous drive to the whole performance. The Pittsburgh Symphony is not an orchestra to play with much refinement — that is perhaps not a quality Steinberg evokes from any orchestra — but their work was clean, colorful, energetic, and generally effective.

Gerda Lammers, a tall woman with a face that is plain, animated, and intelligent, was excellent as Elektra. She is not Nilsson's equal in brilliance and power of sound, but her interpretation has perhaps more variety. Her considerable resources include keen word sense and fine feeling for irony and restraint.

Regina Resnik was extraordinary as Klytemnaestra, resolutely refusing to overplay, and, through her vocal and facial play, brilliantly effective at projecting the presence of the guilt — and — terror-consumed queen. Except for the young Welitsch on the Beecham record, Eileen Schauler was by miles the best Chrysothemis in my experience. Her soprano is concentrated and radiant — I want to hear that sound as Ariadne — and she used its strength, her clarity with the text, and her sense of long rythmic paragraphs to give a performance that was not at all the standard sappy kid sister. She managed, in fact, to make all that E flat carrying on about having babies into something exciting and really tore us apart with her final cries of "Orest! Orest!"

Benjamin Rayson, a New York City Opera baritone who looks rather like King George IV, used a resonant voice to sing a dramatically powerful Orest. Robert Nagy was effective in his brief moment as Aegisth. The various servants, trainbearers, and so forth, were done by soprano Margaret Neal Mann and Barbara Ann Liberasky and mezzos Carol Durkin, Julia Lerner, and Anne Cobb, with more vocal steadiness and verbal clarity than one generally gets in those roles, and excellently together.

ELEKTRA, tragedy by von Hofmannsthal (after Sophocles) with music by Richard Strauss, given Friday evening in concert form for the opening of the 42d season of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra in the Syria Mosque, Pittsburgh, conducted by William Steinberg, and with the following cast:

Elektra ..... Gerda Lammers
Klytemnaestra .... Regina Resnik
Chrysothemis .... Ellen Schauler
Aegisth ..... Robert Nagy
Orest ..... Benjamin Rayson
Maidservants, etc ..... Carol Durkin, Margaret Neal Mann, Julia Lerner, Barbara Ann Liberasky, Anne Cobb

189.

STAMFORD ADVOCATE, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1969.

World Of Music

Steinberg To Conduct In Boston

NEW YORK (AP) — Music circles have been calling it the Great Conductor Hunt and predicting that the three conductors to be found at the end of it will be very young men with a dramatic way with a baton and sex appeal for ladies in the audience.

Top job in three of the country's most prestigious orchestras recently became vacant. Leonard Bernstein is leaving the New York Philharmonic to write music. Erich Leinsdorf has resigned from the Boston Symphony because of overwork. Jean Martinon, under fire in Chicago, already has left the Chicago Symphony to conduct in Paris. So far the junior Bernsteins have not gotten their jobs.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

Chicago is negotiating with Georg Solti, 56, of Covent Garden. The New York Philharmonic has hired Georg Szell, 71, music director of the Cleveland Symphony, as musical adviser and senior guest conductor, while it continues to look around.

The Boston Symphony has hired William Steinberg, 69, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, as its music director — making him the first conductor ever to be music director of two major U.S. orchestras at the same time.

Steinberg will conduct 15 of the Boston Symphony's 30 winter weeks, under a three-year contract to start next fall. Pittsburgh, perhaps as a show of appreciation, perhaps to keep Steinberg from moving to Boston, has given him a new contract with an unlimited duration. It calls for 16 weeks of conducting each season.

He was hired for Boston, Steinberg says frankly, partly for his opinion. All the conductors that Boston would consider hiring at the end of Steinberg's three years will be invited to be guest conductors and the board of directors wants to know what Steinberg thinks of them. "They want to be guided by my judgment. You can see what kind of responsibility this is."

And what about Pittsburgh, where he has been since 1952, is its board also asking Steinberg to recommend a future successor? "Nobody has ever asked me," he says, smiling. "In Pittsburgh nobody believes I will ever stop. If I'm out, they close."

Steinberg is pleased that New York, Boston and Chicago did not rush into hiring some of the flashy young men on the international conducting scene.

"The translation of the word 'conducting' for me is 'experience.' It does not mean only learning repertoire but also maturity in order to approach the human angle from the proper side. No doubt that's the most difficult problem of our profession — how to approach an orchestra and get from the players the best they have.

"Toscanini used to say they always still have something in their pocket, but they don't want to give it and you have to get it. No man in the orchestra wants to give his last best, but that is where Toscanini succeeded. He got it.

"In the flamboyant approach to music. I always translate 'flamboyant' as 'wrong tempi.' These are my translations, understand.

"It is only to be hoped that audiences find their way back to music and forget about the visual aspects. Toscanini appeared with all his unbelievable simplicity as doing a job which everybody could have done. Bruno Walter was uneventful to look at compared to the young chaps now who dance in front of the audience. I'm told I'm just as uninteresting."

But if one thought that Steinberg would go farther and suggest that a listener play recordings at home, so the conductor wouldn't be visible at all, one would be wrong.

He says, "There is no substitute for any live performance. A person gets more out of a live performance, by feeling the physical proximity of the executors, by having your nervous system and theirs in the same room."

Steinberg, who was born in Cologne, conducted at the Cologne Opera at 21, was director of the German Theater in Prague from 25 to 29 and guest conductor at the Berlin State Opera from 27 to 29, and directed the Frankfurt Opera from 29 to 34.

"No doubt I was too young," he says, "the way I look at it now. It seemed logical at the time. And it might have been more logical than it would be today. I started with all the menial tasks and I went through the musical theater, in Prague. Even Mahler started in theaters. I had some opportunity to grow and develop in opera houses. I was spared a little.

In Germany there is no difference between an opera conductor and an orchestra conductor. They have big concert cycles in the opera houses. Only here is there a difference. And America has actually only two and a half opera houses to be training grounds for young conductors — do not ask me which one the half is."

Steinberg met Arturo Toscanini after he and some musicians went from Germany to Palestine in 1937, where they formed the nucleus of the Palestine Symphony. Toscanini was guest conductor at the first concert and a friendship began between the two men. Toscanini invited Steinberg to the United States in 1938 as assistant conductor of his NBC Symphony.

Steinberg says that he anticipates no special conducting problems in Boston. He has been a guest there and he and the orchestra know each other. "And we want the same — to bring good performances. I've never found an orchestra yet which wanted to play badly."

In the Russian Republic proper, which alone is much larger than the United States, there are only 186 service stations.

ADVOCATE
STAMFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 31,000
JAN 4 1969
New England Newsclip

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Steinberg Opens Pittsburgh Series

Two awesome intellects collaborated last night at Carnegie Hall to make the all-Brahms program played by the Pittsburgh Symphony memorable: music director William Steinberg on the podium, and French pianist Robert Casadesus in the Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat Major.

Steinberg, genial and relaxed but immensely impressive, will next year be music director of the Boston Symphony, and yet remain ultimary head of the Pittsburghians. If anybody can be successful as a double Titan, it's he. Tales of his limitless ability to digest new scores quickly and well; of his power to command love as well as respect from his musicians; of his gift for uniting achievement with personal warmth and humility, are proverbial.

He opened the concert, the first in a series of three the Pittsburgh ensemble will present here this season, with the "Tragic Overture," and followed it with the Symphony No. 3 in F Major.

It would be carping to fault these performances which were a union of technical aplomb and suavity of interpretation. They represented a wonderfully sympathetic understanding of Brahms sturdy beauty and architectural grandeur.

He was, in a way, like a new Steinberg, putting behind him past miscalculations and facing the future with supreme confidence. He has lived a long life of trial and error in art, and has matured magnificently. Toscanini bet on the right man, when after Steinberg had chosen and trained the Palestine Symphony in 1936, he engaged him to organize and train the NBC Symphony.

For an astringent, Gallic approach to Brahms, combined with a superb musicianship and formidable virtuosity, Casadesus has no peer. His conception of the B Flat Concerto is neat, precise, swift and dynamic. There was no doubt that he made the big-scale structure seem more taut than many a more reflective artist. It seemed shorter and more exciting in a breathless way, as if we were driven through the music by a giant whose command was not to be disputed for a second.

Steinberg, a first-class concerto collaborator, was wth him all the way. And never has the important cello solo in the "Andante," seemed more of a contribution than as played by the orchestra's first cellist, Michael Grebanier. His style had an aristocratic tonal beauty that compensated for the lack of this quality in Casadesus' keyboard approach.

After the concert, Henry B. Steinway, president of Steinway and Sons, presented the pianist with an engraved silver tray in commemoration of his forthcoming 70th birthday and his association with the Steinway piano for more than 40 years.

The next concert of the Pittsburgh Symphony in this series will be Feb. 19, an all-Mahler program; the final event, Apr. 23, all-Bruckner.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497
NOV 21 1968

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JAN 8 1969
New England Newsclip

Quotes

It is only to be hoped that audiences find their way back to music and forget about the visual aspects. Toscanini's unbelievable simplicity led the audience to believe that he was doing a job which everybody could have done. Bruno Walter was uneventful to look at compared to today's young chaps who dance in front of the audience. I'm told I'm just as uninteresting.

—William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, who also will be music director of the Boston Symphony on a three-year contract.

ATTICA HUB
ATTICA, O.
W. CIRC. 1,340
DEC-5--68

intelligent human beings.

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony has accepted a similar position with the Boston Symphony while keeping his work with the Pittsburgh Orchestra. He was in New York when the news broke, but he refused to talk with news reporters. Asked his reason, he replied, "I've just been appointed in Boston where the Cabots speak only to the Lowells, the Lowells speak only to God, and the Steinbergs haven't quite decided to whom to speak."

Georgy Sandor was scheduled to play a Chopin Concerto with a Mexican orchestra this past summer. A sudden failure of the electricity left everyone in darkness for nearly a half hour. When the audience began to grow restless, Sandor groped his way to the piano and played a Chopin Nocturne. The delighted audience called for an encore, so he began the first movement of Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata. As the lights did not come on, he played the entire number. Just as he finished, the lights blazed on to show groups of electricians in the wings. The lights had been fixed when he began the sonata, they told him, but were afraid to put them on because they might disturb his playing.

LOOK MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
E. O. WEEK 7,671,000
DEC 24 1968

Cologne-born conductor William Steinberg (above) must be twins. He is the first U.S. maestro to be music director of two major American orchestras at one time: the Pittsburgh Symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The double conductor, who averages an implausible 120 to 140 concerts a year, is taking the Pittsburghers to Carnegie Hall for an all-Mahler program (February 19) and an all-Bruckner breakout with the Rutgers Choir (April 23).

THE DAILY NEWS
PORT CLINTON, O.
P.M. (NO SAT.) CIRC. 5,375
JAN-3--69

TROY TIMES RECORD
Saturday, January 4, 1969

NEWBURGH BEACON NEWS
Saturday, January 11, 1969

OCEAN COUNTY
DAILY OBSERVER
Brick Town, N.J.
M-8,085
JAN 6 1969

William Steinberg To Advise, Conduct Boston Symphony

By MARY CAMPBELL

NEW YORK (AP) — Music circles have been predicting that the three conductors to be found at the end of the Great Conductor Hunt will be very young men with a dramatic way with a baton and sex appeal for ladies in the audience.

Top job in three of the country's most prestigious orchestras recently became vacant. Leonard Bernstein is leaving the New York Philharmonic to write music. Erich Leinsdorf has resigned from the Boston Symphony because of overwork. Jean Martinon, under fire in Chicago, already has left the Chicago Symphony to conduct in Paris. So far the junior Bernsteins have not gotten their jobs.

Chicago is negotiating with Georg Solti, 56, of Covent Garden. The New York Philharmonic has hired Georg Szell, 71, music director of the Cleveland Symphony, as musical adviser and senior guest conductor, while it continues to look around.

The Boston Symphony has hired William Steinberg, 69, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, as its music director —making him the first conductor ever to be music director of two major United States orchestras at the same time.

Steinberg will conduct 15 of the Boston Symphony's 30 winter weeks, under a three-year contract to start next fall. Pittsburgh, perhaps as a show of appreciation, perhaps to keep Steinberg from moving to Boston, has given him a new contract with an unlimited duration. It calls for 16 weeks of conducting each season.

He was hired by Boston, Steinberg says frankly, partly for his opinion. All the conductors that Boston would consider hiring at the end of Steinberg's three years will be invited to be guest conductors and the board of directors wants to know what Steinberg thinks of them. "They want to be guided by my judgment. You can see what kind of responsibility this is."

And what about Pittsburgh, where he has been since 1952. Is its board also asking Steinberg to recommend a future successor? "Nobody has ever asked me," he says, smiling. "In Pittsburgh nobody believes I will ever stop. If I'm out, they close."

Steinberg is pleased that New York, Boston and Chicago did not rush out and hire some of the flashy young men on the international conducting scene.

"The translation of the word 'conducting' for me is 'experience.' It does not mean only learning repertoire but also maturity in order to approach the human angle from the proper side. No doubt that's the most difficult problem of our profession—how to approach an orchestra and get from the players the best they have.

"In the flamboyant approach to music, I always translate 'flamboyant' as 'wrong tempi.' These are my translations, understand.

"It is only to be hoped that audiences find their way back to music and forget about the visual aspects. Toscanini's unbelievable simplicity led the audience to believe that he was doing a job which everybody could have done. Bruno Walter was uneventful to look at compared to today's young chaps who dance in front of the audience. I'm told I'm just as uninteresting."

But if one thought that Steinberg would go farther and suggest that a listener play recordings at home, so the conductor wouldn't be visible at all, one would be wrong.

He says, "There is no substitute for any live performance. A person gets more out of a live performance, by feeling the physical proximity of the executors, by having your nervous system and theirs in the same room."

Steinberg says that he anticipates no special conducting problems in Boston. He has been a guest there and he and the orchestra know each other. "And we want the same—to bring good performances. I've never found an orchestra yet which wanted to play badly."

UTICA OBSERVER DISPATCH
Sunday, January 19, 1969

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 134,700
JAN 26 1969
New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE-TELEGRAM
ELYRIA, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 29,086
JAN-12-69

WICHITA FALLS, TEXAS
TIMES
D. 19,000 S. 44,000
JAN 5 1969

STAMFORD ADVOCATE, SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1969.

World Of Music

Steinberg To Conduct In Boston

NEW YORK (AP) — Music circles have been calling it the Great Conductor Hunt and predicting that the three conductors to be found at the end of it will be very young men with a dramatic way with a baton and sex appeal for ladies in the audience.

Top job in three of the country's most prestigious orchestras recently became vacant. Leonard Bernstein is leaving the New York Philharmonic to write music. Erich Leinsdorf has resigned from the Boston Symphony because of overwork. Jean Martinon, under fire in Chicago, already has left the Chicago Symphony to conduct in Paris. So far the junior Bernsteins have not gotten their jobs.

WILLIAM STEINBERG

Chicago is negotiating with Georg Solti, 56, of Covent Garden. The New York Philharmonic has hired Georg Szell, 71, music director of the Cleveland Symphony, as musical adviser and senior guest conductor, while it continues to look around.

The Boston Symphony has hired William Steinberg, 69, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, as its music director — making him the first conductor ever to be music director of two major U.S. orchestras at the same time.

Steinberg will conduct 15 of the Boston Symphony's 30 winter weeks, under a three-year contract to start next fall. Pittsburgh, perhaps as a show of appreciation, perhaps to keep Steinberg from moving to Boston, has given him a new contract with an unlimited duration. It calls for 16 weeks of conducting each season.

He was hired for Boston, Steinberg says frankly, partly for his opinion. All the conductors that Boston would consider hiring at the end of Steinberg's three years will be invited to be guest conductors and the board of directors wants to know what Steinberg thinks of them. "They want to be guided by my judgment. You can see what kind of responsibility this is."

And what about Pittsburgh, where he has been since 1952, is its board also asking Steinberg to recommend a future successor? "Nobody has ever asked me," he says, smiling. "In Pittsburgh nobody believes I will ever stop. If I'm out, they close."

Steinberg is pleased that New York, Boston and Chicago did not rush into hiring some of the flashy young men on the international conducting scene.

"The translation of the word 'conducting' for me is 'experience.' It does not mean only learning repertoire but also maturity in order to approach the human angle from the proper side. No doubt that's the most difficult problem of our profession — how to approach an orchestra and get from the players the best they have.

"Toscanini used to say they always still have something in their pocket, but they don't want to give it and you have to get it. No man in the orchestra wants to give his last best, but that is where Toscanini succeeded. He got it.

"In the flamboyant approach to music. I always translate 'flamboyant' as 'wrong tempi.' These are my translations, understand.

"It is only to be hoped that audiences find their way back to music and forget about the visual aspects. Toscanini appeared with all his unbelievable simplicity as doing a job which everybody could have done. Bruno Walter was uneventful to look at compared to the young chaps now who dance in front of the audience. I'm told I'm just as uninteresting."

But if one thought that Steinberg would go farther and suggest that a listener play recordings at home, so the conductor wouldn't be visible at all, one would be wrong.

He says, "There is no substitute for any live performance. A person gets more out of a live performance, by feeling the physical proximity of the executors, by having your nervous system and theirs in the same room."

Steinberg, who was born in Cologne, conducted at the Cologne Opera at 21, was director of the German Theater in Prague from 25 to 29 and guest conductor at the Berlin State Opera from 27 to 29, and directed the Frankfurt Opera from 29 to 34.

"No doubt I was too young," he says, "the way I look at it now. It seemed logical at the time. And it might have been more logical than it would be today. I started with all the menial tasks and I went through the musical theater, in Prague. Even Mahler started in theaters. I had some opportunity to grow and develop in opera houses. I was spared a little.

In Germany there is no difference between an opera conductor and an orchestra conductor. They have big concert cycles in the opera houses. Only here is there a difference. And America has actually only two and a half opera houses to be training grounds for young conductors — do not ask me which one the half is."

Steinberg met Arturo Toscanini after he and some musicians went from Germany to Palestine in 1937, where they formed the nucleus of the Palestine Symphony. Toscanini was guest conductor at the first concert and a friendship began between the two men. Toscanini invited Steinberg to the United States in 1938 as assistant conductor of his NBC Symphony.

Steinberg says that he anticipates no special conducting problems in Boston. He has been a guest there and he and the orchestra know each other. "And we want the same — to bring good performances. I've never found an orchestra yet which wanted to play badly."

In the Russian Republic proper, which alone is much larger than the United States, there are only 186 service stations.

ADVOCATE
STAMFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 31,000
JAN 4 1969
New England Newsclip

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Steinberg Opens Pittsburgh Series

New York Post
D. 629,146 S.N.T. 851,497
NOV 21 1968

Two awesome intellects collaborated last night at Carnegie Hall to make the all-Brahms program played by the Pittsburgh Symphony memorable: music director William Steinberg on the podium, and French pianist Robert Casadesus in the Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat Major.

Steinberg, genial and relaxed but immensely impressive, will next year be music director of the Boston Symphony, and yet remain virtual head of the Pittsburghians. If anybody can be successful as a double Titan, it's he. Tales of his limitless ability to digest new scores quickly and well; of his power to command love as well as respect from his musicians; of his gift for uniting achievement with personal warmth and humility, are proverbial.

He opened the concert, the first in a series of three the Pittsburgh ensemble will present here this season, with the "Tragic Overture," and followed it with the Symphony No. 3 in F Major.

It would be carping to fault these performances which were a union of technical aplomb and suavity of interpretation. They represented a wonderfully sympathetic understanding of Brahms sturdy beauty and architectural grandeur.

He was, in a way, like a new Steinberg, putting behind him past miscalculations and facing the future with supreme confidence. He has lived a long life of trial and error in art, and has matured magnificently. Toscanini bet on the right man, when after Steinberg had chosen and trained the Palestine Symphony in 1936, he engaged him to organize and train the NBC Symphony.

For an astringent, Gallic approach to Brahms, combined with a superb musicianship and formidable virtuosity, Casadesus has no peer. His conception of the B Flat Concerto is neat, precise, swift and dynamic. There was no doubt that he made the big-scale structure seem more taut than many a more reflective artist. It seemed shorter and more exciting in a breathless way, as if we were driven through the music by a giant whose command was not to be disputed for a second.

Steinberg, a first-class concerto collaborator, was with him all the way. And never has the important cello solo in the "Andante," seemed more of a contribution than as played by the orchestra's first cellist, Michael Grebanier. His style had an aristocratic tonal beauty that compensated for the lack of this quality in Casadesus' keyboard approach.

After the concert, Henry B. Steinway, president of Steinway and Sons, presented the pianist with an engraved silver tray in commemoration of his forthcoming 70th birthday and his association with the Steinway piano for more than 40 years.

The next concert of the Pittsburgh Symphony in this series will be Feb. 19, an all-Mahler program; the final event, Apr. 23, all-Bruckner.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JAN 8 1969
New England Newsclip

Quotes

It is only to be hoped that audiences find their way back to music and forget about the visual aspects. Toscanini's unbelievable simplicity led the audience to believe that he was doing a job which everybody could have done. Bruno Walter was uneventful to look at compared to today's young chaps who dance in front of the audience. I'm told I'm just as uninteresting.

—William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, who also will be music director of the Boston Symphony on a three-year contract.

LOOK MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
E. O. WEEK 7,671,000
DEC 24 1968

Cologne-born conductor William Steinberg (above) must be twins. He is the first U.S. maestro to be music director of two major American orchestras at one time: the Pittsburgh Symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The double conductor, who averages an implausible 120 to 140 concerts a year, is taking the Pittsburghers to Carnegie Hall for an all-Mahler program (February 19) and an all-Bruckner breakout with the Rutgers Choir (April 23).

ATTICA HOT
ATTICA, O.
W. CIRC. 1,340
DEC-5--68

intelligent human beings.

William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony has accepted a similar position with the Boston Symphony while keeping his work with the Pittsburgh Orchestra. He was in New York when the news broke, but he refused to talk with news reporters. Asked his reason, he replied, "I've just been appointed in Boston where the Cabots speak only to the Lowells, the Lowells speak only to God, and the Steinbergs haven't quite decided to whom to speak."

Georgy Sandor was scheduled to play a Chopin Concerto with a Mexican orchestra this past summer. A sudden failure of the electricity left everyone in darkness for nearly a half hour. When the audience began to grow restless, Sandor groped his way to the piano and played a Chopin Nocturne. The delighted audience called for an encore, so he began the first movement of Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata. As the lights did not come on, he played the entire number. Just as he finished, the lights blazed on to show groups of electricians in the wings. The lights had been fixed when he began the sonata, they told him, but were afraid to put them on because they might disturb his playing.

THE DAILY NEWS
PORT CLINTON, O.
P.M. (NO SAT.) CIRC. 5,375
JAN-3--69

TROY TIMES RECORD
Saturday, January 4, 1969
NEWBURGH BEACON NEWS
Saturday, January 11, 1969

OCEAN COUNTY
DAILY OBSERVER
Brick Town, N.J.
M-8,085
JAN 6 1969

William Steinberg To Advise, Conduct Boston Symphony

By MARY CAMPBELL

NEW YORK (AP) — Music circles have been predicting that the three conductors to be found at the end of the Great Conductor Hunt will be very young men with a dramatic way with a baton and sex appeal for ladies in the audience.

Top job in three of the country's most prestigious orchestras recently became vacant. Leonard Bernstein is leaving the New York Philharmonic to write music. Erich Leinsdorf has resigned from the Boston Symphony because of overwork. Jean Martinon, under fire in Chicago, already has left the Chicago Symphony to conduct in Paris. So far the junior Bernsteins have not gotten their jobs.

Chicago is negotiating with Georg Solti, 56, of Covent Garden. The New York Philharmonic has hired Georg Szell, 71, music director of the Cleveland Symphony, as musical adviser and senior guest conductor, while it continues to look around.

The Boston Symphony has hired William Steinberg, 69, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, as its music director —making him the first conductor ever to be music director of two major United States orchestras at the same time.

Steinberg will conduct 15 of the Boston Symphony's 30 winter weeks, under a three-year contract to start next fall. Pittsburgh, perhaps as a show of appreciation, perhaps to keep Steinberg from moving to Boston, has given him a new contract with an unlimited duration. It calls for 16 weeks of conducting each season.

He was hired by Boston, Steinberg says frankly, partly for his opinion. All the conductors that Boston would consider hiring at the end of Steinberg's three years will be invited to be guest conductors and the board of directors wants to know what Steinberg thinks of them. "They want to be guided by my judgment. You can see what kind of responsibility this is."

And what about Pittsburgh, where he has been since 1952. Is its board also asking Steinberg to recommend a future successor? "Nobody has ever asked me," he says, smiling. "In Pittsburgh nobody believes I will ever stop. If I'm out, they close."

Steinberg is pleased that New York, Boston and Chicago did not rush out and hire some of the flashy young men on the international conducting scene.

"The translation of the word 'conducting' for me is 'experience.' It does not mean only learning repertoire but also maturity in order to approach the human angle from the proper side. No doubt that's the most difficult problem of our profession—how to approach an orchestra and get from the players the best they have.

"In the flamboyant approach to music, I always translate 'flamboyant' as 'wrong tempi.' These are my translations, understand.

"It is only to be hoped that audiences find their way back to music and forget about the visual aspects. Toscanini's unbelievable simplicity led the audience to believe that he was doing a job which everybody could have done. Bruno Walter was uneventful to look at compared to today's young chaps who dance in front of the audience. I'm told I'm just as uninteresting."

But if one thought that Steinberg would go farther and suggest that a listener play recordings at home, so the conductor wouldn't be visible at all, one would be wrong.

He says, "There is no substitute for any live performance. A person gets more out of a live performance, by feeling the physical proximity of the executors, by having your nervous system and theirs in the same room."

Steinberg says that he anticipates no special conducting problems in Boston. He has been a guest there and he and the orchestra know each other. "And we want the same—to bring good performances. I've never found an orchestra yet which wanted to play badly."

UTICA OBSERVER DISPATCH
Sunday, January 19, 1969
TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 131,700
JAN 26 1969
New England Newsclip

CHRONICLE-TELEGRAM
ELYRIA, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 29,086
JAN-12-69

WICHITA FALLS, TEXAS
TIMES
D. 19,000 S. 44,000
JAN 5 1969

190.

Steinberg to Conduct 5-Day Beethoven Festival

6 to Lead BSO Next Year

A five-day Beethoven festival in April 1970 will be one of the highlights of the 89th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under William Steinberg, who assumes duties as music director in September. Steinberg will conduct approximately half the Symphony's regular schedule, dividing his time between orchestra seasons in Boston and Pittsburgh.

The Beethoven festival, a series of five non-subscription concerts honoring the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth, will open with Isaac Stern as soloist in the Violin Concerto. Rudolf Serkin will play the five Piano Concertos during the next three concerts and the concluding evening will be given to a performance of the Missa Solemnis. The festival will replace the orchestra's usual extended spring tour.

Five guest conductors will share podium duties with Steinberg next season. Besides current music director Erich Leinsdorf, they include Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini and Seiji Ozawa. Except for the spring tour the orchestra's schedule will remain the same as in past season with 24 Friday-Saturday pairs of concerts and five shorter series on Tuesdays and Thursdays. The orchestra will also give concerts in New York, Washington ,Baltimore, Philadelphia, Englewood (N.J.), New Haven, Hartford, and at the following schools: Rutgers, Villanova, the universities of Virginia and New Hampshire.

Soloists with the orchestra next season will include six pianists, three violinists, three cellists and nine vocalists. Among major works contemplated for 1969-70 are Mahler's "Das Lied von der rde" and his Symphony No. 10, Liszt's Faust Symphony, Bartok's "Bluebeard's Castle," Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," Robert Starer's Double Concerto for violin and cello, the "Carmina Burana" of Carl Orff, Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2 and Symphonies Nos. 1 and 2 by Edward Elgar. The season will open Sept. 26-27.

On Dec. 17 Arthur Fiedler will conduct a special non-subscription Symphony concert in honor of his 75th birthday. Fiedler has been associated with the orchestra since 1915. Program and soloists for the concert will be announced later.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
MAR 25 1969
New England Newsclip

William Steinberg . . . conductor

Pittsburgh Symphony One of Greatest in U.S.

The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra rose to national prominence under the direction of the late Fritz Reiner during the 1940s and since 1952 under the musical supervision of Dr. William Steinberg.

The symphony includes 101 musicians who have been described as constituting one of the six great orchestras of the United States. The orchestra has performed in many foreign countries.

German-born, co-founder in 1936 of the Palestine Symphony Orchestra (now the Israel Philharmonic), Steinberg was brought to the United States by the late Arturo Toscanini in 1938 to assist in the creation and training of the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

Famous for his operatic as well as his symphonic work in Germany, Steinberg was soon a regular conductor of the San Fancisco Opera and guest of many of the major symphonies before his appointment in 1947 as music director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra.

• • •

Since 1952, when he became music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, he also has appeared as guest with the Chicago, New York, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Philadelphia and Boston Symphonies. During the 1964-65 season, he was guest conductor at the Metropolitan Opera.

As of the beginning of this season, Dr. Steinberg is the only conductor to be music director of two of the world's greatest orchestras. Having accepted the head post of the Boston Symphony, and with a lifetime contract with the Pittsburgh Symphony, he divides his time between the two organizations.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM
SUN. 52,500
MAR 2 1969

Steinberg plans B.S.O. Beethoven festival

WILLIAM STEINBERG
. . . first season

A week-long Beethoven Festival will be one of the highlights of William Steinberg's first season as music director of the Boston Symphony.

Steinberg takes over in September from conductor Erich Leinsdorf. Leisdorf will return as guest conductor. Other guest conductors are Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini and Seiji Ozawa.

The Beethoven Festival in April 1970, will observe the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. During the five - concert, non - subscription series, Isaac Stern will play the violin concerto and Rudolph Serkin all five concertos. The Missa Solemnis completes the festival.

Guest artists during the orchestra's 89th season will include pianists Robert Casadesus, Rudolf Firkusny, Alexis Weissenberg, Ingrid Haebler and Theodore Lettvin. Guest violinists are Edith Peinemann and the orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein. Cellists are Gregor Piatagorsky, Zara Nelsova and the orchestra's principal, Jules Eskin. Silverstein and Eskin will play Robert Starer's Double Concerto.

Among the special works of the season are Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" (mezzo Maureen Forrester, tenor Jon Vickers) and the Derryk Cooke performing version of Mahler's 10th Symphony; Liszt's "Faust" Symphony; the Bartok "Bluebeard's Castle" (mezzo Regina Resnick, basso Arnold Voketatis); and Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast" (basso Vern Shinall, Harvard Glee Club - Radcliffe Choral Society). These will be conducted by Steinberg.

Ozawa's program includes Orff's "Carmina Burana" (soprano Evelyn Mandac, tenor Stanley Volk, baritone Sherill Milnes). Davis' programs will offer Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2 and Elgar's Symphony No. 1. Steinberg will conduct the Elgar 2d Symphony.

The Boston Pops' music director Arthur Fiedler will conduct the B.S.O. on Dec. 17, his 75th birthday. The concert will benefit the Fiedler Fund.

The orchestra's season opens with the Friday-Saturday concerts of Sept. 26-27. Steinberg is to conduct 12 of the 24 Friday-Saturday programs. Each guest conductor will lead one of the Thursday evening open rehearsals.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
MAR 25 1969 New
EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923
MAR 25 1969 New England
SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
MAR 30 1969 New England
BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
MAR 29 1969 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543
MAR 24 1969 New England

STEINBERG JOINS CASALS AT FETE

Cellist Finds He 'Was Right' in His Prophecy of '29

By HENRY RAYMONT
Special to The New York Times

SAN JUAN, P. R., June 7—In the spring of 1929, a young German conductor who had just taken over Frankfurt's Museumsgesellschaft Orchestra, saw a dream come true. The world's most celebrated cellist appeared as one of his soloists.

After the concert the cellist said to the conductor: "Young man, you have great talent and you will go far."

The speaker was Pablo Casals, whose prediction about the conductor, Wiiliam Steinberg, was, if anything, an understatement.

The 92-year-old Casals and Mr. Steinberg, 69, have met again for the first time in 40 years at the Casals Festival here.

The Spanish-born cellist was at hand during Friday5s, concert to hear Mr. Steinberg lead the festival orchestra in compositions by Mozart, Strauss and Wagner before a capacity audience at the University of Puerto Rico's amphitheater.

"You are a marvelous musician," Casals said in his heavily accented English as he embraced Mr. Steinberg while the audience cheered its approval. "You see, my prediction was right."

Mr. Steinberg, after a long career as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will also take charge of the Boston Symphony this fall—the first conductor to head two major symphonies on a full-time basis.

Earlier this week, a younger musician brought tears to Casal's eyes with a performance of the Elgar cello concerto, a work he had performed in London in the early 1920's before King George V.

Here it was Jacqueline du Pré, the 23-year-old English cellist, who performed the difficult piece, with Daniel Barenboim, her 26-year-old Israeli husband, conducting the orchestra.

Miss du Pré, a tall girl with long wavy fair hair, was called back to the stage six times by a standing ovation. Backstage, after the concert, the two young artists were embraced by Casals, who had listened to the performance from a high-backed chair placed in the wings.

"I always said you can't be English with such a temperament," he told the beaming Miss du Pré. "Of course it must come from your father's French ancestors. It was beautiful, beautiful. Every note in its place and every emphasis so right. Beautiful."

GIVE TO FRESH AIR FUND.

Highlights Announced By Boston Symphony

BOSTON — With announcement of highlights of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969-70 season, plans for the next 18 months have become reasonably clear. The transition from the Erich Leinsdorf regime to that of William Steinberg includes the following steps:

On April 19, Leinsdorf will conduct his last Boston concert as leader of the Symphony, and on Aug. 24 will conclude his directing at Tanglewood. Usual spring events meanwhile bring the "Pops" from April 28, to June 28, and two weeks of the popular Esplanade Concerts.

Principal Conductor

As recently announced, Tanglewood in 1970 will have Seiji Ozawa as principal conductor, Leonard Bernstein as advisor, and Gunther Schuller as head of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Boston Symphony today announced noteworthy events of its 89th season, starting in Symphony Hall on Sept. 26, and bringing Steinberg to the podium for the first time in the role of conductor for a three-year term.

Steinberg, who still retains his post as conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, will conduct slightly more than half of the Boston concerts at Symphony Hall this coming season. Guest conductors will be Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini and Seiji Ozawa. Leinsdorf will also return as a guest conductor.

J.F.K.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
MAR 25 1969

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
APR 19 1969

New Symphony season

The Boston Symphony will open its 1969-70 season on September 26 with William Steinberg conducting his first concert as music director. There will be 24 Friday and Saturday concerts, a Tuesday and a Thursday series, of five concerts each, and seven open rehearsals in the new season. Five special non-subscription concerts during the week of April 6, 1970, will celebrate the Beethoven bicentennial. Guest conductors will be Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Giulini, and Seiji Ozawa. Erich Leinsdorf will also return as a guest conductor. Some of the works to be performed next year are Bartok's "Bluebeard's Castle," Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde," Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast," Orff's "Carmina Burana," and Liszt's "Faust" symphony.

The Sound of Music

Symphonic Musings

Symphonygoers anxious to know the details of new BSO music director William Steinberg's first year in Boston now have something to muse over during the summer. Highlights of the 1969-70 Boston Symphony season were announced yesterday.

"Specials" of the 89th season include a Beethoven festival, a large roster of guest conductors and guest artists, and a special concert conducted by Arthur Fiedler on his 75th birthday.

According to plans announced earlier, Steinberg and the guest conductors will share conducting duties. The new music director will lead about half of the programs.

In addition, each of the seven open rehearsals scheduled will have a different conductor. Next season's guest conductors can be considered prime candidates during the quest for a permanent BSO music director.

They include Claudio Abbado, Colin Davis, Carlo Maria Guilini and Seiji Ozawa. Erich Leinsdorf will return to guest-conduct after his retirement from the BSO this year.

The week of April 6, 1970, will be devoted to a Beethoven Festival, with Steinberg conducting the orchestra in five special concerts celebrating the Beethoven bicentennial. The series, which replaces part of the orchestra's annual touring schedule, opens with a concert in which Isaac Stern is soloist in the violin concerto. On the next three nights, Rudolf Serkin will play the five piano concerti. The fifth concert will be a performance of the "Missa Solemnis."

Other soloists scheduled to appear during the season are pianists Robert Casadesus, Rudolf Firkusny, Alexis Weissenberg, Ingrid Haebler and Theodore Lettvin; violinists Edith Peinemann and Joseph Silverstein; cellists Gregor Piatigorsky, Zara Nelsova and Jules Eskin, and singers Evelyn Lear, Evelyn Mandac, Maureen Forrester, Regina Resnick, Jon Vickers, Stanley Volk, Sherrill Milnes, Arnold Voketatis and Vern Shinall.

Special works included in the season's repertoire are Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" and Symphony No. 10; Liszt's "Faust" Symphony; Bartok's "Bluebeard's Castle"; Walton's "Belshazzar's Feast"; Robert Starer's Double Concerto for Violin and Cello; Orff's "Carmina Burana"; Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 2, and Symphonies No. 1 and 2 by Elgar.

The Arthur Fiedler concert will be on Dec. 17 and will be a benefit for the Fiedler Fund.

The Rise and Decline of the Boston Symphony

IT HASN'T BEEN THE SAME SINCE THE DAYS OF KOUSSEVITZKY. CAN STEINBERG BRING BACK THE OLD GLORY?

By Abram Chasins

Everyone knows the story about the Boston lady who was wearing one of those shapeless, flappy, and indomitable black hats that will forever survive and who was stopped during a stroll on Beacon Street by an inquisitive stranger. "Where did you ever buy that hat?" asked the stranger.

"In Boston," she was told, "we don't buy our hats. We inherit them."

And so it once was with season subscriptions to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Like Standard Oil of New Jersey, like U. S. citizenship itself, they were to keep and bequeath, not to sell and buy. They belonged inherently to rock-ribbed tradition—to Boston as "the hub of the universe," resting on its most redoubtable institutions: the Athenaeum, Harvard University, and the Symphony. As a Cleveland reporter wrote during a 1906 BSO tour on its twenty-fifth anniversary, "In Boston, the leader of the orchestra is a good deal bigger man than the mayor." I'll say. The conductor was Karl Muck. Who was the mayor?

Forty years later, the social and intellectual elite of Boston were still making their weekly pilgrimages to Symphony Hall. There was none of Carnegie Hall's red plush on the seats or in the austere little refectory off the second balcony, where Friday-afternoon devotees compared tastes and distastes over a hurried intermission cup of tea. But somehow everything in the world and in the week was peripheral to "symphony." For a Bostonian, even today, to speak of "going to the symphony" sounds as awkward as for anyone, on a Sunday morning, to talk of "going to the church."

To Bostonians, their own was either the only thing of its kind or surely the best. This pertained to the hundred musicians on the stage, but was personalized—between 1924 and 1949—in one hero, one elegant man, who faced his players, who mesmerized and inspired them into being, with him, the unsurpassed Boston Symphony—Serge Koussevitzky.

That was quite a feat during the first decade of Koussevitzky's tenure in Boston, when Arturo Toscanini reigned in New York and Leopold Stokowski ruled in Philadelphia. The three orchestras of these cities were supreme in the world, for in no time at all the romantic and daring and brilliant magician in Boston had rebuilt and reconsecrated his orchestra into a sovereign body of musicians. Each of the three great orchestras was strikingly different, yet really above comparison. Nevertheless, an honest New Yorker or perhaps even a Philadelphian, caught off guard, might have admitted that the Boston was primus inter pares—first among equals.

Since 1949, times have changed. But Boston changed more acutely, because Koussevitzky retired and Boston's conductors have changed. First, Charles Munch replaced Koussevitzky. Then, in 1962, Erich Leinsdorf replaced Munch. Now another change looms: still another top-notch musician, William Steinberg, who since 1952 has built a wonderful orchestra in Pittsburgh, will divide himself, beginning next fall, between Boston and Pittsburgh. Dual duties evidently intrigue him. One decade ago he commuted regularly for a year between Pittsburgh and London, whose symphony he was invited to "rescue."

Why has all this aroused so much interest, not only in the United States but internationally? The answer is a child of our time. If an orchestra is the brightest luminary of a city's artistic constellation, if America is the musical center of the world—and it is—then the state of our musical treasury is a matter of vital national concern. To many millions, this symbol of our culture has connotations no less important than the course of our politics, our social well-being, and our economy, and most of them believe that there are no inferior orchestras, there are only inferior conductors.

From a musical point of view, they're wrong, for the changes in Boston concerned conductors of extraordinary excellences and superior esthetic qualities. But what those changes wrought was not only professional but personal, psychological, and in no small sense even chemical.

Charles Munch was internationally admired for his gentlemanly, Gallic blend of charm, poetic intensity, and self-effacement; but never did he possess the power to arouse audiences to frenzied response. His death early last November, while he was on a warmly greeted American tour with the newly formed Orchestre de Paris, leaves an artistic void. Six years ago in Boston, he was succeeded by Erich Leinsdorf, who is a musical executive of astonishing mental discipline, with a remarkable repertoire and an impressive control over every aspect of orchestral procedure. But neither man ever courted the glamour gimmicks, and the public has always, sooner or later, deserted symphonic series that didn't provide colorful conductors to worship.

The fatal fact is that the chemical and the psychological play life-and-death roles in conducting. Despite the further fact that audiences for music have grown prodigiously everywhere, they have been drawn mainly by the magic of personality driving the artistry. The absence of that magic in Boston's band led many old subscribers and recent ones (after years on the waiting list) to give up season tickets, to grow apathetic, to stop wanting to go, and finally to stop going.

One former subscriber said to me, "Ever since Serge Koussevitzky left the Boston, all that remains are unforgettable memories and recordings. Munch to me was strangely lacking in personality, as well as appearing to my untutored ears to miss the point of so many pieces he conducted. I can't say I was actually dissatisfied or displeased—it's just that I never got that hot flame, that kind of rich color and final authority that I used to get with almost every piece at almost every Koussevitzky concert. I just got bored."

A crucial effect of this slippage from love to respect to boredom has shown up in the comparative sales of Boston Symphony records. In an American market pinched by lower-cost European orchestras, the Boston has declined relatively to the New York, Philadelphia, and Cleveland issues.

The crucial problem of the Boston Symphony today more than partially results from the almost esoteric affinity that previously existed between the orchestra and its public. Currently, it's not easy to find people who care about it as of yore. This decline in identification, loyalty, and pride has been more painfully conspicuous because of the opposite trend in Leonard Bernstein's New York, while the Philadelphia rolls sumptuously on, like a monumental museum, for a full half-century under the indelible influence of Stokowski and the benignly long curatorship of Eugene Ormandy.

Have the programs in Boston been "awful," as many of the deserters continually complain? I don't think that's it at all. Audiences always talk this way, at the drop of almost any piece that doesn't hit them in the midriff. Does Leinsdorf do the "wrong things" with the classics and romantics? There has also been carping over an "overabundance of concertized opera." But Leinsdorf is essentially a terrific opera man. He is most dramatic to me when he enlists the most eloquent of instruments, the human voice. I think the problem has been not what has happened as what hasn't. To / turn to page 144

McCALL'S MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 8,567,000

MAR 1969

The rise and decline of the Boston Symphony

continued from page 34

understand all this, we must realize that the conductor's job is the most complicated one in the musical world. We ask him for technical and auditory objectivity. However, unless at the same time he shows flamboyant power and subjectivity, he's a deady with his orchestra and audience. Somehow, he must brew together musicianship, scholarship, and showmanship. It's a miraculous combination, and one glance toward the early years of the Boston Symphony will show what a difference such men—and one in particular—have made.

Standing behind them all, from the beginning, was a wealthy, wise, visionary young sponsor, Henry Lee Higginson. Trained as a musician and flourishing in business, Higginson started the orchestra, in 1881, in a Boston already rich in education and the arts. He guided the orchestra, chose its conductors, built its library, and paid its deficits for almost forty years. It was not by chance that the Boston, under Koussevitzky, was by many years the last major American orchestra to become unionized.

The first of the early, and invariably German, conductors was Georg Henschel, more experienced as a singer than as a conductor, yet gifted and personable enough to carry the orchestra for three years while it was still a fashionable novelty. Wilhelm Gericke (1884-1889) then built the orchestra with Teutonic persistence, returning somewhat mellowed ten years later.

But meanwhile Arthur Nikisch, a young lion of already glowing reputation, who was later to lead the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra into new eminence, came to shape the Boston Symphony with his magnetic and imaginative flair, and reportedly exclaimed at his first rehearsal, "All I have to do is poetize!" A burning drama rather than discipline was Nikisch's forte; and he left inescapable influences, later to be gratefully observed in the great "American triumvirate," Toscanini, Stokowski, and Koussevitzky.

The other most important man of the pre-Koussevitzky years was Karl Muck, conservative compared to Nikisch, yet an exacting master with flashy fire. His second term ended sadly, in 1918, in the face of rampant anti-German sentiment. Ironic, as Muck was a Swiss national.

After the First World War, the orchestra's sorry residue changed flavor from German to French, and Pierre Monteux did his plucky best to remake an instrument. But political and economic conditions, as well as the casualties to personnel, made the task almost insuperable. The one hero equal to it was still offstage, in Paris, receiving in his characteristic way the highest honors of the French government.

In 1910, the 35-year-old Serge Koussevitzky had started his career in Moscow, building a great orchestra and inviting the leading (and in some cases emerging) composers and conductors to contribute to its performances. It was characteristic that he cajoled Claude Debussy to stay with him for three weeks, not alone to conduct but also to annotate every one of his scores for the conductor! Other composers were Rimsky-Korsakov, Musorgski, Scriabin, Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Hindemith, Ravel, Honegger, Strauss, and Schönberg. Nikisch appeared on the podium every year, and such soloists as Rachmaninoff, Godowsky, Schnabel, Busoni, Kreisler, and the young Heifetz were also in evidence.

This was the experienced, prophetic, and pioneering Koussevitzky who came to Boston in 1924, as a Slav, a postwar Parisian, a master of the classics, a dramatizer of the supposedly dull baroque (which since then has spread all the way into jazz). He came with a Byronic temperament, the profile of a Barrymore, and the wardrobe of a Beau Brummel. Above all, he came as an almost instant American, alert to contemporary trends on both sides of the Atlantic, an American in whom were reborn Gericke's discipline and Nikisch's poetry and who was soon to sprinkle into his programs the unfamiliar names of Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, Walter Piston, and others with whom he fraternized happily in his delicious accent.

But when Koussevitzky came to Boston, what did he find? In his own words, an orchestra "of abominable standards" and many men who had outlived their usefulness. He had to be ruthless. And the painful process reminded him, he later told me, of his experience with the visit of a government inspector to look over the opera in Saint Petersburg—a political appointee with an encyclopedic ignorance about music. Standing in front of the orchestra, he pointed at the nearest section. "Who are these people?" he haughtily asked Koussevitzky.

"They are the first violins."

"And who are those people?," pointing to a neighboring section.

"They are the second violins."

Whereupon the apoplectic official roared, "What? Second violins in the Imperial Orchestra? Throw them all out!"

"Little did I then know," Koussevitzky told me, "how nearly I would have to do just that when I came to Boston." But it paid off.

One of the superb instrumentalists whom he then brought in, the oboist Fernand Gillet, commented once, during a rehearsal break, on the honor of being a member of the BSO. "You know, Mr. Chasins, if we had to choose between wearing the ribbon of the Légion d'Honneur and playing in the Boston Symphony, I don't think any of us would hesitate to choose a seat in this orchestra."

Any soloist who appeared with the symphony would ordinarily be invited for a preliminary couple of days' stay at the Koussevitzky home in suburban Brookline, and I was fortunate enough to have this experience. It was during the 1939-1940 season, and I was to be piano soloist with the orchestra in an all-Gershwin program. Koussevitzky went over the score with me note by note, listening for the interpretation rather than trying to dictate it, learning eagerly about this new idiom without ever relinquishing his pride in the orchestra and its international repertoire.

At the first rehearsal on Thursday morning, he worked at the Concerto in F as though it were the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, looking almost continually toward me, as if to ask with his eyes, "Is that it?" He stopped the orchestra once with the plea, "Gentlemen, please. Mr. Chasins will think we have never played together before." That afternoon, at his home again, the doorbell began ringing, and according to his hospitable custom, several of the orchestra men dropped in, instruments and music in hand, to discuss and play over doubtful passages. Koussevitzky's communication lines were open not only to new ideas but, wisely, to the men through whom he had to share them.

→

The Rise and Decline of the Boston Symphony

IT HASN'T BEEN THE SAME SINCE THE DAYS OF KOUSSEVITZKY. CAN STEINBERG BRING BACK THE OLD GLORY?

By Abram Chasins

Everyone knows the story about the Boston lady who was wearing one of those shapeless, flappy, and indomitable black hats that will forever survive and who was stopped during a stroll on Beacon Street by an inquisitive stranger. "Where did you ever buy that hat?" asked the stranger.

"In Boston," she was told, "we don't buy our hats. We inherit them."

And so it once was with season subscriptions to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Like Standard Oil of New Jersey, like U. S. citizenship itself, they were to keep and bequeath, not to sell and buy. They belonged inherently to rock-ribbed tradition—to Boston as "the hub of the universe," resting on its most redoubtable institutions: the Athenaeum, Harvard University, and the Symphony. As a Cleveland reporter wrote during a 1906 BSO tour on its twenty-fifth anniversary, "In Boston, the leader of the orchestra is a good deal bigger man than the mayor." I'll say. The conductor was Karl Muck. Who was the mayor?

Forty years later, the social and intellectual elite of Boston were still making their weekly pilgrimages to Symphony Hall. There was none of Carnegie Hall's red plush on the seats or in the austere little refectory off the second balcony, where Friday-afternoon devotees compared tastes and distastes over a hurried intermission cup of tea. But somehow everything in the world and in the week was peripheral to "symphony." For a Bostonian, even today, to speak of "going to the symphony" sounds as awkward as for anyone, on a Sunday morning, to talk of "going to the church."

To Bostonians, their own was either the only thing of its kind or surely the best. This pertained to the hundred musicians on the stage, but was personalized—between 1924 and 1949—in one hero, one elegant man, who faced his players, who mesmerized and inspired them into being, with him, the unsurpassed Boston Symphony—Serge Koussevitzky.

That was quite a feat during the first decade of Koussevitzky's tenure in Boston, when Arturo Toscanini reigned in New York and Leopold Stokowski ruled in Philadelphia. The three orchestras of these cities were supreme in the world, for in no time at all the romantic and daring and brilliant magician in Boston had rebuilt and reconsecrated his orchestra into a sovereign body of musicians. Each of the three great orchestras was strikingly different, yet really above comparison. Nevertheless, an honest New Yorker or perhaps even a Philadelphian, caught off guard, might have admitted that the Boston was primus inter pares—first among equals.

Since 1949, times have changed. But Boston changed more acutely, because Koussevitzky retired and Boston's conductors have changed. First, Charles Munch replaced Koussevitzky. Then, in 1962, Erich Leinsdorf replaced Munch. Now another change looms: still another top-notch musician, William Steinberg, who since 1952 has built a wonderful orchestra in Pittsburgh, will divide himself, beginning next fall, between Boston and Pittsburgh. Dual duties evidently intrigue him. One decade ago he commuted regularly for a year between Pittsburgh and London, whose symphony he was invited to "rescue."

Why has all this aroused so much interest, not only in the United States but internationally? The answer is a child of our time. If an orchestra is the brightest luminary of a city's artistic constellation, if America is the musical center of the world—and it is—then the state of our musical treasury is a matter of vital national concern. To many millions, this symbol of our culture has connotations no less important than the course of our politics, our social well-being, and our economy, and most of them believe that there are no inferior orchestras, there are only inferior conductors.

From a musical point of view, they're wrong, for the changes in Boston concerned conductors of extraordinary excellences and superior esthetic qualities. But what those changes wrought was not only professional but personal, psychological, and in no small sense even chemical.

Charles Munch was internationally admired for his gentlemanly, Gallic blend of charm, poetic intensity, and self-effacement; but never did he possess the power to arouse audiences to frenzied response. His death early last November, while he was on a warmly greeted American tour with the newly formed Orchestre de Paris, leaves an artistic void. Six years ago in Boston, he was succeeded by Erich Leinsdorf, who is a musical executive of astonishing mental discipline, with a remarkable repertoire and an impressive control over every aspect of orchestral procedure. But neither man ever courted the glamour gimmicks, and the public has always, sooner or later, deserted symphonic series that didn't provide colorful conductors to worship.

The fatal fact is that the chemical and the psychological play life-and-death roles in conducting. Despite the further fact that audiences for music have grown prodigiously everywhere, they have been drawn mainly by the magic of personality driving the artistry. The absence of that magic in Boston's band led many old subscribers and recent ones (after years on the waiting list) to give up season tickets, to grow apathetic, to stop wanting to go, and finally to stop going.

One former subscriber said to me, "Ever since Serge Koussevitzky left the Boston, all that remains are unforgettable memories and recordings. Munch to me was strangely lacking in personality, as well as appearing to my untutored ears to miss the point of so many pieces he conducted. I can't say I was actually dissatisfied or displeased—it's just that I never got that hot flame, that kind of rich color and final authority that I used to get with almost every piece at almost every Koussevitzky concert. I just got bored."

A crucial effect of this slippage from love to respect to boredom has shown up in the comparative sales of Boston Symphony records. In an American market pinched by lower-cost European orchestras, the Boston has declined relatively to the New York, Philadelphia, and Cleveland issues.

The crucial problem of the Boston Symphony today more than partially results from the almost esoteric affinity that previously existed between the orchestra and its public. Currently, it's not easy to find people who care about it as of yore. This decline in identification, loyalty, and pride has been more painfully conspicuous because of the opposite trend in Leonard Bernstein's New York, while the Philadelphia rolls sumptuously on, like a monumental museum, for a full half-century under the indelible influence of Stokowski and the benignly long curatorship of Eugene Ormandy.

Have the programs in Boston been "awful," as many of the deserters continually complain? I don't think that's it at all. Audiences always talk this way, at the drop of almost any piece that doesn't hit them in the midriff. Does Leinsdorf do the "wrong things" with the classics and romantics? There has also been carping over an "overabundance of concertized opera." But Leinsdorf is essentially a terrific opera man. He is most dramatic to me when he enlists the most eloquent of instruments, the human voice. I think the problem has been not what has happened as what hasn't. To / turn to page 144

McCALL'S MAGAZINE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 2,567,000

MAR 1969

The rise and decline of the Boston Symphony

continued from page 34

understand all this, we must realize that the conductor's job is the most complicated one in the musical world. We ask him for technical and auditory objectivity. However, unless at the same time he shows flamboyant power and subjectivity, he's a deady with his orchestra and audience. Somehow, he must brew together musicianship, scholarship, and showmanship. It's a miraculous combination, and one glance toward the early years of the Boston Symphony will show what a difference such men—and one in particular—have made.

Standing behind them all, from the beginning, was a wealthy, wise, visionary young sponsor, Henry Lee Higginson. Trained as a musician and flourishing in business, Higginson started the orchestra, in 1881, in a Boston already rich in education and the arts. He guided the orchestra, chose its conductors, built its library, and paid its deficits for almost forty years. It was not by chance that the Boston, under Koussevitzky, was by many years the last major American orchestra to become unionized.

The first of the early, and invariably German, conductors was Georg Henschel, more experienced as a singer than as a conductor, yet gifted and personable enough to carry the orchestra for three years while it was still a fashionable novelty. Wilhelm Gericke (1884-1889) then built the orchestra with Teutonic persistence, returning somewhat mellowed ten years later.

But meanwhile Arthur Nikisch, a young lion of already glowing reputation, who was later to lead the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra into new eminence, came to shape the Boston Symphony with his magnetic and imaginative flair, and reportedly exclaimed at his first rehearsal, "All I have to do is poetize!" A burning drama rather than discipline was Nikisch's forte; and he left inescapable influences, later to be gratefully observed in the great "American triumvirate," Toscanini, Stokowski, and Koussevitzky.

The other most important man of the pre-Koussevitzky years was Karl Muck, conservative compared to Nikisch, yet an exacting master with flashy fire. His second term ended sadly, in 1918, in the face of rampant anti-German sentiment. Ironic, as Muck was a Swiss national.

After the First World War, the orchestra's sorry residue changed flavor from German to French, and Pierre Monteux did his plucky best to remake an instrument. But political and economic conditions, as well as the casualties to personnel, made the task almost insuperable. The one hero equal to it was still offstage, in Paris, receiving in his characteristic way the highest honors of the French government.

In 1910, the 35-year-old Serge Koussevitzky had started his career in Moscow, building a great orchestra and inviting the leading (and in some cases emerging) composers and conductors to contribute to its performances. It was characteristic that he cajoled Claude Debussy to stay with him for three weeks, not alone to conduct but also to annotate every one of his scores for the conductor! Other composers were Rimsky-Korsakov, Musorgski, Scriabin, Prokofiev, Stravinsky, Hindemith, Ravel, Honegger, Strauss, and Schönberg. Nikisch appeared on the podium every year, and such soloists as Rachmaninoff, Godowsky, Schnabel, Busoni, Kreisler, and the young Heifetz were also in evidence.

This was the experienced, prophetic, and pioneering Koussevitzky who came to Boston in 1924, as a Slav, a postwar Parisian, a master of the classics, a dramatizer of the supposedly dull baroque (which since then has spread all the way into jazz). He came with a Byronic temperament, the profile of a Barrymore, and the wardrobe of a Beau Brummel. Above all, he came as an almost instant American, alert to contemporary trends on both sides of the Atlantic, an American in whom were reborn Gericke's discipline and Nikisch's poetry and who was soon to sprinkle into his programs the unfamiliar names of Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, Walter Piston, and others with whom he fraternized happily in his delicious accent.

But when Koussevitzky came to Boston, what did he find? In his own words, an orchestra "of abominable standards" and many men who had outlived their usefulness.

He had to be ruthless. And the painful process reminded him, he later told me, of his experience with the visit of a government inspector to look over the opera in Saint Petersburg—a political appointee with an encyclopedic ignorance about music. Standing in front of the orchestra, he pointed at the nearest section. "Who are these people?" he haughtily asked Koussevitzky.

"They are the first violins."

"And who are those people?," pointing to a neighboring section.

"They are the second violins."

Whereupon the apoplectic official roared, "What? Second violins in the Imperial Orchestra? Throw them all out!"

"Little did I then know," Koussevitzky told me, "how nearly I would have to do just that when I came to Boston." But it paid off.

One of the superb instrumentalists whom he then brought in, the oboist Fernand Gillet, commented once, during a rehearsal break, on the honor of being a member of the BSO. "You know, Mr. Chasins, if we had to choose between wearing the ribbon of the Légion d'Honneur and playing in the Boston Symphony, I don't think any of us would hesitate to choose a seat in this orchestra."

Any soloist who appeared with the symphony would ordinarily be invited for a preliminary couple of days' stay at the Koussevitzky home in suburban Brookline, and I was fortunate enough to have this experience. It was during the 1939-1940 season, and I was to be piano soloist with the orchestra in an all-Gershwin program. Koussevitzky went over the score with me note by note, listening for the interpretation rather than trying to dictate it, learning eagerly about this new idiom without ever relinquishing his pride in the orchestra and its international repertoire.

At the first rehearsal on Thursday morning, he worked at the Concerto in F as though it were the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, looking almost continually toward me, as if to ask with his eyes, "Is that it?" He stopped the orchestra once with the plea, "Gentlemen, please. Mr. Chasins will think we have never played together before." That afternoon, at his home again, the doorbell began ringing, and according to his hospitable custom, several of the orchestra men dropped in, instruments and music in hand, to discuss and play over doubtful passages. Koussevitzky's communication lines were open not only to new ideas but, wisely, to the men through whom he had to share them.

→

192.

Years later, when there was new research into baroque ornamentation, Koussevitzky was planning a performance of Bach's B Minor Mass (he had already made this composer a familiar and dramatic box-office attraction). He invited me to give a series of lectures in Tanglewood on the stylistic problems to the orchestra, the soloists, and the chorus (then as always from Harvard and Radcliffe), explaining his position to me as follows: "Don't expect me, at my age and with my limited time, to do what you say—and what I am convinced is right. But I want you to teach my orchestra and my soloists, so they will know how to do it right; and I will learn from them."

In this spirit of inquiry, he had been the first conductor to introduce analytical program notes. Among other innovations was his immediate appointment of virtuoso Jesús María Sanromá as the first official pianist of orchestral history. That is how, in such works as Stravinsky's Petrouchka, where the piano part is extremely demanding, the artistic results were so uniquely realized.

Koussevitzky, like Nikisch, did have his ups and downs, and also like his mentor, he was quite incapable of dullness. As the cellist Piatigorsky once observed, "His every day was a festival." At the same time you could trust the catholicity of his taste and his selective receptivity to new music. Time, after all, is not space; when one piece comes onto a program, another has to go. It was his decisions in that process, and his wholehearted commitment to them, that so marvelously deepened the value of his leadership and so strengthened his contribution to American music. Incidentally, during one succession of 52 programs, he never repeated a single work.

Not to be forgotten, either, is Koussevitzky the educator. The Berkshire Festival soon grew to include his dream of Tanglewood (or "Thonglefoot," as it became in his unique dialect), at which young musicians could hear the best music played and learn from the men who played it. Koussevitzky's instinct for education was irrepressible, and through his deep emotional and tonal needs he was always managing, even on the most antiseptically academic occasion, to impart and to convince. This skill was no doubt kin to his lyric and virtuosic achievements on the double bass. In Rome, after he had fled the Soviets and was soloizing through Europe, a critic wrote, "Koussevitzky is such an artist that if, instead of his double bass, he were given a mattress stuffed with hay, he would contrive to draw magical sounds from it."

After Koussevitzky's retirement, Charles Munch came with his own command of orchestral music, his stature, his dedication—to performance, not to rehearsal. His greatest success, no doubt, was as a guest conductor. And though he could rise to brilliant heights, it could be said he guest-conducted the Symphony for twelve seasons. His rehearsals were brief. The Symphony was never his, as it had been Koussevitzky's.

Just imagine an orchestra in the full plentitude of its powers, acclaimed as the finest orchestra in the world, each member holding a personal pride as he toured to New York and everywhere else. It was at this point that Munch arrived; and with all his gifts, he wasted the treasure—including Tanglewood, which drifted more or less rudderlessly.

A former member of the orchestra under its three latest conductors has summed up his feelings as follows: "Serge was a genius, a genuine genius. I think Munch had a tremendous talent—for everything but work. Personally, he was a grand guy, a good golfer, and a swell sport. As a conductor, he made a nervous wreck out of me and a lot of other men, too. When he communicated with 'inspiration,' he was in such a state of unbalanced excitement that he was out of control—of himself and of his men—while the audience stayed pretty cool, and some of us musicians froze inside, fearing a catastrophe. I think everybody finally lost confidence in him—management, audience, even those critics who were with him at the beginning. When the fact finally came out that in the midst of the biggest recording boom in history, the BSO records weren't selling, it was a real blow to pocketbook and pride and to the orchestra's morale.

"When Leinsdorf took over, things began to pick up, but evidently not enough. Leinsdorf is a terrific taskmaster and pulled a lot of things back into shape, but he's not exactly a good candidate for a popularity contest, and that goes for orchestra as well as audience. It's true that Toscanini, Stokowski, and Szell are also not going to go down in history as beloved father images to their men—but boy! even while the hottest warfare was being waged, the musical worship remained intact. Under Leinsdorf, finger-wiggling discipline, intellect, integrity, plenty. But no wizardry, no goose bumps."

Erich Leinsdorf was brought in to rescue Tanglewood as much as the orchestra itself, and with or without goose bumps, he must be given credit for bringing the highest intellectual vitality and standards to the summer operation. As for the orchestra, though he scrubbed out the cobwebs and, in Mozart and Mendelssohn especially, produced an admirable sheen and a sunny glow, the comments quoted suggest that this conductor, for quite different reasons from Munch, didn't solve the chemistry problem. Nobody ever hypnotized an audience with the Magic Flute or Midsummer Night's Dream.

Another way of analyzing the chemistry of conductorial change is to sift out the show-biz and non-show-biz elements. When Erich Leinsdorf came to Boston, he chose consciously or otherwise the non-show-biz side. What he did with opera was too symphonic, it was said, and what he did with the symphonic staples simply didn't reveal their drama in a blazing light.

And now what can be expected with William Steinberg at the helm? No one who has heard and observed Steinberg's achievements with the Pittsburgh since 1952 could expect anything short of superb craftmanship, scholarship, fidelity to the text and to the spirit of the music. Such a venture as his best-selling My Fair Lady records points to the potential presence of showmanship, as well.

But more yet is needed, and desperately, one might say, and has on more than a few occasions been handsomely realized by Steinberg. I think, however, that it has happened mainly when he has lost himself intellectually only to find himself emotionally. He once wrote that the conductor who can tell us what a piece of music means, who has sufficient judgment and perception to reveal what music signifies, "is only he who is capable of making the work speak entirely for itself."

That phrase has always aroused my apprehension. In my opinion, if music could speak for itself, it would cry out, "For heaven's sake, interpret me!" As Richard Strauss put it, "A printed page of music is an imperfect blueprint of a conception. It is merely a lifeless diagram that awaits resurrection by an interpreter . . . whose recreative powers must remain relevant to the spirit and substance of a work."

That's more like it. In fact, that's it. Toscanini said it another way: "Any asino can conduct, but to make music, eh? That is difficult!" And having long ago laid his hands upon Steinberg (in Israel and later at NBC), the Maestro earned for Steinberg the purple right to be called a "conductor's conductor."

Bravo indeed! However, what audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are waiting to swoon over is a leader who also has "that thing"—who so illumines a composition, who so fires his orchestra and inflames his auditors that he will revive wondrous beauties so long famous and so long absent, through throbbing readings of great musical works and highly personal revelations of their truths.

What these audiences await, in other words, is a man with that elusive, indefinable glow known these days as charisma. Is that something to be born with? With those Bostonian benefactors Nikisch and Koussevitzky, apparently yes. The Koussevitzky protégé, Bernstein on the other hand, picked his up with a front-paged bath when he pinch-hit for the ailing Bruno Walter. And, incidentally, before Sputnik, where was the Cliburn charisma?

Steinberg, with all his artistic and personal distinction, cannot yet be said to have acquired his. But perhaps this is his moment. Perhaps his arrival will inspire Bostonians—and the entire musical world—to care in the old way about "symphony." Only time and chemistry will tell, and, most important, whether a seat to "symphony" will be the easiest or the toughest ticket in town, any town.

THE END

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 25 1969

Notes and Footnotes

SUCH A disquieting article in March McCall's by musician-author Abram Chasins entitled, "The Rise and Decline of the Boston Symphony." A sub-title adds, "It hasn't been the same since the days of Koussevitzky. Can Steinberg (to replace Leinsdorf) bring back the old glory?"

Chasins tells how the late, flamboyant Koussevitzky glamorized the orchestra from 1924 to 1939. "He mesmerized the 100 musicians and inspired them into being, with him, the unsurpassed Boston Symphony."

The author pegs the "decline" to the reduced sale of recordings "relatively to the New York, Philadelphia and Cleveland record issues." In Boston, he claims, music-lovers' reaction has slipped "from love, to respect, to boredom." This he sees as caused by the conductor, "whom we ask for technical and auditory objectivity. But unless at the same time he shows flamboyant power and subjectivity, he's a deady with his orchestra and audience."

Charles Munch, who succeeded Koussevitzky, Chasins sees as representing a "gentlemanly, Gallic blend of charm, poetic intensity and self-effacement, but never the power to arouse audiences to frenzied response." Six years ago he was succeeded by Erich Leinsdorf, "a musical executive of astonishing mental discipline . . . and impressive control over every aspect of orchestra procedure. But neither man ever courted glamor gimmicks, and the public always, sooner or later, deserted symphonic series that didn't provide colorful conductors to worship."

No mention is made of Tanglewood, where summer attendance apparently has suffered not at all under Koussevitzky's successors. Legends still cluster about his name, and it is said he arrived on the grounds from his nearby home in a chauffeured red Packard for matinees, and a black Packard for evening programs. That's glamor at work, all right.

ACCORDING to an early Colonial pamphlet, students should bind peppermint leaves to their foreheads to sharpen the brain. A similar effect was said to be achieved by steeping the plant in boiling water and inhaling the vapors. Sounds better than marijuana.

OF ALL THINGS, Baltimore was the first American city to have a street illuminated by gas lights. They were turned on Feb. 17, 1817, and the citizens were afraid to touch the lead-in pipes for fear they'd be burned.

THOUGHT for today. Harry Truman said, "The responsibility of the great states is to serve and not dominate the world." It's a lesson yet to be learned.

RICHARD V. HAPPEL.

192.

Years later, when there was new research into baroque ornamentation, Koussevitzky was planning a performance of Bach's B Minor Mass (he had already made this composer a familiar and dramatic box-office attraction). He invited me to give a series of lectures in Tanglewood on the stylistic problems to the orchestra, the soloists, and the chorus (then as always from Harvard and Radcliffe), explaining his position to me as follows: "Don't expect me, at my age and with my limited time, to do what you say—and what I am convinced is right. But I want you to teach my orchestra and my soloists, so they will know how to do it right; and I will learn from them."

In this spirit of inquiry, he had been the first conductor to introduce analytical program notes. Among other innovations was his immediate appointment of virtuoso Jesús María Sanromá as the first official pianist of orchestral history. That is how, in such works as Stravinsky's Petrouchka, where the piano part is extremely demanding, the artistic results were so uniquely realized.

Koussevitzky, like Nikisch, did have his ups and downs, and also like his mentor, he was quite incapable of dullness. As the cellist Piatigorsky once observed, "His every day was a festival." At the same time you could trust the catholicity of his taste and his selective receptivity to new music. Time, after all, is not space; when one piece comes onto a program, another has to go. It was his decisions in that process, and his wholehearted commitment to them, that so marvelously deepened the value of his leadership and so strengthened his contribution to American music. Incidentally, during one succession of 52 programs, he never repeated a single work.

Not to be forgotten, either, is Koussevitzky the educator. The Berkshire Festival soon grew to include his dream of Tanglewood (or "Thonglefoot," as it became in his unique dialect), at which young musicians could hear the best music played and learn from the men who played it. Koussevitzky's instinct for education was irrepressible, and through his deep emotional and tonal needs he was always managing, even on the most antiseptically academic occasion, to impart and to convince. This skill was no doubt kin to his lyric and virtuosic achievements on the double bass. In Rome, after he had fled the Soviets and was soloizing through Europe, a critic wrote, "Koussevitzky is such an artist that if, instead of his double bass, he were given a mattress stuffed with hay, he would contrive to draw magical sounds from it."

After Koussevitzky's retirement, Charles Munch came with his own command of orchestral music, his stature, his dedication—to performance, not to rehearsal. His greatest success, no doubt, was as a guest conductor. And though he could rise to brilliant heights, it could be said he guest-conducted the Symphony for twelve seasons. His rehearsals were brief. The Symphony was never his, as it had been Koussevitzky's.

Just imagine an orchestra in the full plentitude of its powers, acclaimed as the finest orchestra in the world, each member holding a personal pride as he toured to New York and everywhere else. It was at this point that Munch arrived; and with all his gifts, he wasted the treasure—including Tanglewood, which drifted more or less rudderlessly.

A former member of the orchestra under its three latest conductors has summed up his feelings as follows: "Serge was a genius, a genuine genius. I think Munch had a tremendous talent—for everything but work. Personally, he was a grand guy, a good golfer, and a swell sport. As a conductor, he made a nervous wreck out of me and a lot of other men, too. When he communicated with 'inspiration,' he was in such a state of unbalanced excitement that he was out of control—of himself and of his men—while the audience stayed pretty cool, and some of us musicians froze inside, fearing a catastrophe. I think everybody finally lost confidence in him—management, audience, even those critics who were with him at the beginning. When the fact finally came out that in the midst of the biggest recording boom in history, the BSO records weren't selling, it was a real blow to pocketbook and pride and to the orchestra's morale.

"When Leinsdorf took over, things began to pick up, but evidently not enough. Leinsdorf is a terrific taskmaster and pulled a lot of things back into shape, but he's not exactly a good candidate for a popularity contest, and that goes for orchestra as well as audience. It's true that Toscanini, Stokowski, and Szell are also not going to go down in history as beloved father images to their men—but boy! even while the hottest warfare was being waged, the musical worship remained intact. Under Leinsdorf, finger-wiggling discipline, intellect, integrity, plenty. But no wizardry, no goose bumps."

Erich Leinsdorf was brought in to rescue Tanglewood as much as the orchestra itself, and with or without goose bumps, he must be given credit for bringing the highest intellectual vitality and standards to the summer operation. As for the orchestra, though he scrubbed out the cobwebs and, in Mozart and Mendelssohn especially, produced an admirable sheen and a sunny glow, the comments quoted suggest that this conductor, for quite different reasons from Munch, didn't solve the chemistry problem. Nobody ever hypnotized an audience with the Magic Flute or Midsummer Night's Dream.

Another way of analyzing the chemistry of conductorial change is to sift out the show-biz and non-show-biz elements. When Erich Leinsdorf came to Boston, he chose consciously or otherwise the non-show-biz side. What he did with opera was too symphonic, it was said, and what he did with the symphonic staples simply didn't reveal their drama in a blazing light.

And now what can be expected with William Steinberg at the helm?

No one who has heard and observed Steinberg's achievements with the Pittsburgh since 1952 could expect anything short of superb craftmanship, scholarship, fidelity to the text and to the spirit of the music. Such a venture as his best-selling My Fair Lady records points to the potential presence of showmanship, as well.

But more yet is needed, and desperately, one might say, and has on more than a few occasions been handsomely realized by Steinberg. I think, however, that it has happened mainly when he has lost himself intellectually only to find himself emotionally. He once wrote that the conductor who can tell us what a piece of music means, who has sufficient judgment and perception to reveal what music signifies, "is only he who is capable of making the work speak entirely for itself."

That phrase has always aroused my apprehension. In my opinion, if music could speak for itself, it would cry out, "For heaven's sake, interpret me!" As Richard Strauss put it, "A printed page of music is an imperfect blueprint of a conception. It is merely a lifeless diagram that awaits resurrection by an interpreter . . . whose recreative powers must remain relevant to the spirit and substance of a work."

That's more like it. In fact, that's it. Toscanini said it another way: "Any asino can conduct, but to make music, eh? That is difficult!" And having long ago laid his hands upon Steinberg (in Israel and later at NBC), the Maestro earned for Steinberg the purple right to be called a "conductor's conductor."

Bravo indeed! However, what audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are waiting to swoon over is a leader who also has "that thing"—who so illumines a composition, who so fires his orchestra and inflames his auditors that he will revive wondrous beauties so long famous and so long absent, through throbbing readings of great musical works and highly personal revelations of their truths.

What these audiences await, in other words, is a man with that elusive, indefinable glow known these days as charisma. Is that something to be born with? With those Bostonian benefactors Nikisch and Koussevitzky, apparently yes. The Koussevitzky protégé, Bernstein on the other hand, picked his up with a front-paged bath when he pinch-hit for the ailing Bruno Walter. And, incidentally, before Sputnik, where was the Cliburn charisma?

Steinberg, with all his artistic and personal distinction, cannot yet be said to have acquired his. But perhaps this is his moment. Perhaps his arrival will inspire Bostonians—and the entire musical world—to care in the old way about "symphony." Only time and chemistry will tell, and, most important, whether a seat to "symphony" will be the easiest or the toughest ticket in town, any town.

THE END

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 25 1969

Notes and Footnotes

SUCH A disquieting article in March McCall's by musician-author Abram Chasins entitled, "The Rise and Decline of the Boston Symphony." A sub-title adds, "It hasn't been the same since the days of Koussevitzky. Can Steinberg (to replace Leinsdorf) bring back the old glory?"

Chasins tells how the late, flamboyant Koussevitzky glamorized the orchestra from 1924 to 1939. "He mesmerized the 100 musicians and inspired them into being, with him, the unsurpassed Boston Symphony."

The author pegs the "decline" to the reduced sale of recordings "relatively to the New York, Philadelphia and Cleveland record issues." In Boston, he claims, music-lovers' reaction has slipped "from love, to respect, to boredom." This he sees as caused by the conductor, "whom we ask for technical and auditory objectivity. But unless at the same time he shows flamboyant power and subjectivity, he's a deady with his orchestra and audience."

Charles Munch, who succeeded Koussevitzky, Chasins sees as representing a "gentlemanly, Gallic blend of charm, poetic intensity and self-effacement, but never the power to arouse audiences to frenzied response." Six years ago he was succeeded by Erich Leinsdorf, "a musical executive of astonishing mental discipline . . . and impressive control over every aspect of orchestra procedure. But neither man ever courted glamor gimmicks, and the public always, sooner or later, deserted symphonic series that didn't provide colorful conductors to worship."

No mention is made of Tanglewood, where summer attendance apparently has suffered not at all under Koussevitzky's successors. Legends still cluster about his name, and it is said he arrived on the grounds from his nearby home in a chauffeured red Packard for matinees, and a black Packard for evening programs. That's glamor at work, all right.

ACCORDING to an early Colonial pamphlet, students should bind peppermint leaves to their foreheads to sharpen the brain. A similar effect was said to be achieved by steeping the plant in boiling water and inhaling the vapors. Sounds better than marijuana.

OF ALL THINGS, Baltimore was the first American city to have a street illuminated by gas lights. They were turned on Feb. 17, 1817, and the citizens were afraid to touch the lead-in pipes for fear they'd be burned.

THOUGHT for today. Harry Truman said, "The responsibility of the great states is to serve and not dominate the world." It's a lesson yet to be learned.

RICHARD V. HAPPEL.

193.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

JUN 6 1969

Boston Symphony gets assistant conductor

Michael Tilson Thomas, young pianist, conductor, and winner of the 1968 Koussevitsky conducting prize at Tanglewood will be the new assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony. In the past he was conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, and was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez at the Beyreuth Festival in 1966. In 1968 he was conductor of the Ojai Festival in California and will return to the festival as conductor this summer. As the Boston Symphony assistant conductor, he will also perform as a member of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

MAY 24 1969

Michael Thomas Named Assistant Conductor for BSO

Michael Tilson Thomas has been appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning in September. The 24-year-old Californian joins the orchestra at the same time William Steinberg becomes music director. Thomas replaces Charles Wilson, assistant conductor for three seasons, who will rejoin the New York City Opera next fall.

Thomas, who is also a pianist, will serve in that capacity with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. He has served as conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, associated with the Los Angeles Music Center, and performed both as conductor and soloist in premieres of works by Stravinsky, Boulez, Stockhausen, Foss and Ingolf Dahl. He was assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez at the 1966 Bayreuth Festival and in 1967 at California's Ojai Festival, where last year he became principal conductor.

Thomas conducted the premiere of "Elephant Steps," an "occult opera" by Stanley Silverman and Richard Forman, last summer at Tanglewood, and was awarded the Berkshire Music Center's Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. He also directed the final concert of the Boston Philharmonia's 1968-69 season.

Thomas, 24, Assistant Symphony Conductor

The Boston Symphony has named Michael Tilson Thomas, 24, as assistant conductor of the orchestra and pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Thomas joins the orchestra in the Fall, when William Steinberg becomes the BSO's new music director.

Born in Hollywood, Thomas is a member of the noted theatrical family, the Thomashefskys. While still a high school junior he entered the University of California in 1962 with advanced standing, studying piano there with John Crown and conducting with Ingolf Dalh.

For four years Thomas was conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, associated with the Los Angeles Music Center. During this period he was conductor and piano soloist in premieres by and with composers Igor Stravinsky, Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhauser, Lucas Foss and Ingolf Dalh.

MICHAEL THOMAS
. . . named by BSO

Boulez appointed Thomas assistant conductor for the 1966 Bayreuth Festival. Serving as assistant conductor of California's Ojai Festival, he became chief in 1968 and will head it again this Summer.

A conducting fellow at Tanglewood in 1968, Thomas won the Koussevitzky Prize. His Boston debut was here in April when he led the Boston Philharmonia.

At the Boston Symphony he succeeds Charles Wilson who is rejoining the New York City Opera.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAY 24 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239

MAY 29 1969 New England

Koussevitzky Winner

BSO Names Assistant Conductor

Michael Tilson Thomas, 1968 winner of the Koussevitzky conducting prize at Tanglewood, has been appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thomas, who last summer worked with Gunther Schuller, head of contemporary music activities at the Berkshire Music Center, and conducted the premiere at Tanglewood of the Stanley Silverman-Richard Forman occult opera, "Elephant Steps," will assume his new position in September.

The 24-year-old artist replaces Charles Wilson, who will re-join the New York City Opera Company as principal conductor. Thomas has also been invited by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphohny, to serve as pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Highly Praised

Both Erich Leinsdorf, who retires as music director of the BSO and as director of the Berkshire Music Center this summer, and his successor, William Steinberg, have commented most favorably on Thomas' talent.

Thomas was born in Hollywood and received the alumni prize as the most outstanding student at his graduation from the University of California. He has been a conductor and piano soloist in premieres with such composers as Igor Stravinsky, Pierre Boulez and Karhlheinz Stockhuasen.

Festival Leader

For the second year, the Californian has been named conductor of his state's Ojai Festival.

In the past, Thomas has served as conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra which is associated with the Los Angeles Music Center, participated in the classes of Gregor Piatigorsky, and was assistant conductor at the 1966 Bayreuth Festival.

Thomas, who was in the accelerated program of the Los Angeles city schools and simultaneously attended the University of California during his last two years of high school, began his formal musical training at the age of 10.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

JUN 1 1969

Michael Tilson Thomas named to B.S.O. post

The Boston Symphony's new assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, will make his debut with the orchestra Oct. 10-11. He also is expected to conduct during the shorter Tuesday and Thursday series.

Thomas, 24, succeeds Charles Wilson, who is returning to the New York City Opera conducting staff. Thomas also has been named pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

Last Summer, Thomas won the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting at the orchestra's Berkshire Music Center. His Boston debut was in April as guest conductor of the Boston Philharmonia.

A member of the noted theatrical family, the Thomashefskys, Thomas was born in Hollywood. Attending the University of California during his last two years of high school, he studied piano with Hohn Crown and conducting with Ingolf Dahl.

For four years, Thomas was conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra, associated with the Los Angeles Music Center. He was conductor and piano soloist during this period in premieres by and with composers Igor Stravinsky Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Lukas Foss and Ingolf Dahl. He also participated as pianist in the master classes of cellist Gregor Piatagorsky and prepared the orchestra for the Heifetz-Piatagordsky Concerts.

Following an appointment as assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez at the 1966 Bayreuth Festival, Thomas became assistant, then principal conductor of California's Ojai Festival.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 66,100

MAY 24 1969

Hub Symphony Gets Assistant Conductor, 23

Boston — (UPI) — Michael Tilson Thomas, a 23-year-old Californian, has been appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effective in September, it was announced yesterday.

Thomas replaces Charles Wilson, who is returning to the New York City Opera Company.

Thomas, born into a theatrical family in Hollywood, is a talented pianist and was awarded the Berkshire Music Center's Koussevitzky Prize in conducting for his work at Tanglewood last summer.

Assistant, 23, Named by BSO

BOSTON (UPI)—Michael Tilson Thomas, a 23-year - old Californian, has been appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effective in September, it was announced Friday.

Thomas replaces Charles Wilson, who is returning to the New York City Opera Company.

Thomas, born into a theatrical family in Hollywood, Calif., is a talented pianist and was awarded the Berkshire Music Center's Koussevitzky Prize in conducting for his work at Tanglewood during the summer of 1968.

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 6,100

MAY 24 1969

Californian Named Assistant Conductor Of Hub Symphony

BOSTON (UPI) — Michael Tilson Thomas, 23-year-old Californian, has been appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, effective in September. Thomas, a talented pianist who was born into a theatrical family in Hollywood, replaces Charles Wilson, who is returning to the New York City Opera Company.

UNION LEADER (M) & (E)
MANCHESTER, N. H.
CIRCULATION 55,103

MAY 24 1969 New England

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

MAY 27 1969

BULLETIN (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 147,900

MAY 24 1969 New England Newsc

Thomas Named to Orchestra Post

BOSTON (UPI) — Michael Tilson Thomas, 23-year-old Californian, will become assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in September. Thomas will replace Charles Wilson, who is returning to the New York City Opera Company.

Thomas, born into a theatrical family in Hollywood, also is a pianist and was awarded the Berkshire Music Center's Koussevitzky prize in conducting for his work at Tanglewood during the summer of 1968.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 917,082 SUN. 1,219,382

JUN 4 1969

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

JUN 3 1969 New England

New BSO Assistant

Michael Tilson Thomas, a 24-year-old California-born conductor-pianist, has been appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will join the orchestra in September when William Steinberg becomes Music Director.

He replaces Charles Wilson, who will rejoin the New York City Opera Company in the fall as a principal conductor.

Thomas, a native of Hollywood, was conductor of the Young Musicians Foundation Debut Orchestra of the Los Angeles Music Center, assistant conductor to Pierre Boulez at the 1966 Bayreuth Festival, and conductor of California's Ojai Festival in 1968, a position he will hold again this summer.

Last summer he conducted at Tanglewood and won the Berkshire Music Center's Koussevitzky Prize in conducting.

Thomas Will Join BSO in September

Michael Tilson Thomas will become assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in September this year, it was announced today.

The 24-year-old native of California will join the orchestra at the same time William Steinberg becomes music director. He replaces Charles Wilson, who has held the position for three seasons and who will rejoin the New York City Opera Company this fall as a principal conductor. Mr. Thomas, who is notably talented as a pianist, will also serve as pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

MAY 28 1969 New

Michael Tilson Thomas, a 24-year-old Californian, has been appointed assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

SEP 14 1969

SYMPHONY PIANIST NAMED

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced the appointment of Michael T. Thomas, 24, as assistant conductor and pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

MAY 25 1969

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 88,850

MAY 26 1969

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 121

Tanglewood

1969

TANGLEWOOD - 1969

Table of Contents

General Festival Announcements and Commentary---
Promotional publicity that includes Tanglewood as a part of the Berkshire area or that mentions or features Tanglewood as one of the summer festivals, as well as the promotional material of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

A. Pre-Season.....pp. 1-24

B. Continuing General Promotion and Commentary (incl. post season commentary).....pp. 25-32

C. Radio & Television General Announcements.....pp. 33-34 326

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Concerts:

1st Week.....p. 35
2nd Week.....p. 38
3rd Week.....p. 42
4th Week.....p. 47
5th Week.....p. 56
6th Week.....p. 61
7th Week.....p. 66
8th Week.....p. 71

Personnel

Leinsdorf Farewell Concert & commentary on Leinsdorf.....pp. 74-83
B. S. O. and Tanglewood personnel.....p. 84

POPS at Tanglewood.....pp. 85-94

Money and Management

Tanglewood Friends.....pp. 95&97
Tanglewood for political conventions? .....p. 96
Tent Club.....pp. 98&99
Orchestra Heads meet at Blossom Center.....p. 100

Society and Music.....pp. 101-3
Benefit for Berkshire Medical Center.....pp. 104-6

Berkshire Chorus Auditions - local chorus used in conjunction with Tanglewood choir.....p. 107

Berkshire Music Center

Pre-season announcements.....p. 108

Opening Exercises.....p. 109

Fellowship announcements, activities and events.....pp. 110-14 & 126

Berkshire Boys Choir.....p. 115

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Tanglewood Institute.....pp. 117-21
Totenberg - Hanson recital.....p. 122

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY Institute.....p. 123

Tanglewood on Parade.....p. 125

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC.....pp. 127-33

Music Critics Association Meeting at Tanglewood.....pp. 134-40

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS Concerts.....pp. 141-54

Tanglewood - 1970

The Coming of Bernstein, Ozawa and Schuller.....pp. 155-59
Special articles about Ozawa.....p. 160 + 165
" " " Bernstein.....pp. 160-63
" " " Schuller.....p. 164

Table of Contents

General Festival Announcements and Commentary--
Promotional [illegible] officially that includes Tanglewood as a part of the Berkshire Area of [illegible] Tent and Tent and Tanglewood as one of the [illegible] Festivals, [illegible] as the promotional [illegible] of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A. Pre-Season.....pp. 1-44

B. Continuing General Promotion and Commentary.....pp. [illegible]-34

C. Radio & Television General Announcements.....pp. 35-[illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Concerts:

1st Week.....p. 3 — 5th Week.....p. [illegible]
2nd Week.....p. 3 — 6th Week.....p. [illegible]
3rd Week.....p. 42 — 7th Week.....p. [illegible]
4th Week.....p. [illegible] — 8th Week.....p. [illegible]

Seasons

Leinsdorf's Farewell Concert & commentary on Leinsdorf.....pp. [illegible]-5
B. S. O. and Tanglewood [illegible].....p. [illegible]

B.S.O. at Tanglewood.....pp. [illegible]-4

Money and Management

Tanglewood Friends.....pp. [illegible]
Tanglewood [illegible] conventions.....p. [illegible]
Tent City.....pp. 80
Orchestra Rehearsal [illegible] Center.....p. 104

Society and Music.....pp. [illegible]-8
Benefit for Berkshire Medical Center.....pp. 104-[illegible]

Berkshire Choral Institute - [illegible] choral [illegible] Tanglewood [illegible].....p. [illegible]

Berkshire Music Center

Pre-[illegible] chamber concerts.....p. [illegible]

Opening Exercises.....p. 10

Fellowship announcements, [illegible] events.....pp. [illegible]

Berkshire Boys' Choir.....p. [illegible]

BOSTON UNIVERSITY Tanglewood Benefit [illegible].....pp. [illegible]-42
Rosenberg [illegible].....p. [illegible]

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY Department.....p. 103

Tanglewood on Parade.....p. [illegible]

FESTIVAL OF CONTEMPORARY MUSIC.....pp. [illegible]-3

Music Studies Association Seminar [illegible] Program.....pp. [illegible]-4

SCHOLIA CHAMBER [illegible].....p. [illegible]

Tanglewood - 1970

The Opening of Bernstein, [illegible] Boston [illegible].....pp. [illegible]
Special articles [illegible] Tanglewood.....pp. [illegible]
" " " Bernstein.....p. [illegible]
" " " [illegible].....p. [illegible]

TangleWood

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL
LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS
JULY 4 — AUGUST 24, 1969

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

From SHOWBILL

The First Annual Chronicle of the Performing Arts may be the start of something unusual.

The booming, burgeoning Performing Arts scene is becoming everyone's concern. And, the generally affluent, mobile "layman" is less interested in the "state of the arts" with its correlary theorizing than he is in "Where are these new arts meccas?" and, "What is happening at these meccas?"

Consequently, the Chronicle encompasses a representative selection of Performing Arts Centers and Festivals and you'll find the "guidelines" and salient features and facts lucidly spelled out.

The "Centers" chosen for special attention express the precious diversity of the Performing Arts movement in both form and content. It's a delight to witness how the creative spirit is manifest in both programming, and always, the architecture of the "Centers." A true Performing Arts Center, as you'll see, is a total environment. It builds and relies initially upon the presence of community, topography, climate and artistic objectives to rearrange and reinterpret its special idiom for all of us.

In the business sphere SHOWBILL is known as the nation's leading publisher of Performing Arts program magazines. The staff of SHOWBILL labors with the great "Centers" to produce the daily program magazines. If these "every-performance" magazines are the "key" to special and memorable evenings at Performing Arts centers we hope that the Chronicle will be the "key" to the entertaining arts throughout the United States.

Summer Arts, U.S.A.:
6 "Let Them Be Cultural Supermarkets." by Clive Barnes
10 Magnificent Blossom by Frank E. Joseph
13 Map of Blossom Music Center
14 Focus on Blossom
15 Around Blossom
Garden State Arts Center
16 A First Season Triumph by Arthur S. Harris, Jr.
19 Map of Garden State Arts Center
20 Focus on Garden State
21 Guide to 1969 Summer Performing Arts with Map of U.S.A.
25 Around Garden State
27 Saratoga A Legend Renewed by Frank Sullivan
32 Map of Saratoga Performing Arts Center
33 Around Saratoga
34 A Plea for Patrons by Charles S. Dake
The American Original
36 Tanglewood The Berkshire Music Festival by Marvin Schofer
39 Map of Tanglewood
39 Around Tanglewood

First Annual Chronicle (T)
Summer Performing Arts
1969

Robert W. Slocum, president and publisher
Gilbert C. Munroe, executive vice president
Don Lester Gordon, advertising director
Marcia Bates Smith, editor
John D. Adams, managing editor
C. J. Hepburn Associates, art direction

The Chronicle* is published by the SHOWBILL Division of Slocum House Inc., 39 West 55th Street, New York, N.Y. 10019.

Copyright © Slocum House. All rights reserved.
Single issue price $1.00.

* (T) Trademark

TEN
FESTI
featur
Yugos artists
Oth
clude
VAL
CARA
ah, N
MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Lake Placid, New York.

New England Region

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, presenting two weeks of chamber music and six weeks of full orchestra with guest conductors and soloists. Other events include open rehearsals, and concerts by students and faculty of Berkshire Music Center. July and August.

CASTLE HILL FESTIVAL ●, Ipswich, Massachusetts, Friday and Saturday concerts on the Castle Hill estate. July and August.

THE CHARLES RIVER ESPLANADE CONCERTS ●, Boston, Massachusetts, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Hatch Memorial Shell, conducted by Arthur Fiedler and Harry Ellis Dickson two weeks in July.

HOPKINS CENTER CONGREGATION OF THE ARTS ●, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, symphony and chamber ensemble concerts, repertory theatre, art shows, films and exhibitions, Mario di Bonaventura, music director. July and August.

MACDOWELL FESTIVAL OF AMERICAN MUSIC ●, New London, Connecticut, sponsored by the Eastern Connecticut Symphony. July.

MARLBORO MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Marlboro, Vermont, under the artistic direction of Rudolf Serkin, presents weekend concerts of varied chamber music ensembles. Pablo Casals, guest conductor. July and August.

MUSIC MOUNTAIN ●, Falls Village, Connecticut, Sunday afternoon

The American Original
TANGLEWOOD
The Berkshire Festival

by Marvin Schofer,
Director of Press and Public Information for
The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tanglewood, an estate of over one hundred acres, located in the most scenic part of the Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived here while writing The House of Seven Gables and The Wonder Book, and his house is reconstructed on the Tanglewood grounds. Tanglewood and the region surrounding it—Berkshire County, the city of Pittsfield, the towns of Lenox, Stockbridge, and Williamstown—are rich in natural beauty and in history.

Side by side at Tanglewood are the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center, the two summer activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Berkshire Festival is a series of twenty-four concerts by the Orchestra, each Friday, Saturday, and Sunday for eight successive weeks, and a series of chamber music programs.

The Berkshire Music Center, founded as the fulfillment of a long-cherished dream by Serge Koussevitzky, the Orchestra's Music Director for twenty-five years, is a summer academy for the advanced study of music. Here each summer come talented young musicians, both men and women, from all parts of the United States and abroad. They study with a faculty of outstanding teachers and virtuoso members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

American conductors will include the Orchestra's Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, David Zinman, who had a great success with the audience at the 1968 Festival, and Henry Lewis, the recently appointed conductor of the New Jersey Symphony. Mr. Lewis' wife, Marilyn Horne, will also be heard at Tanglewood in the summer of 1969. American pianists

Composers' Forums are also presented. In 1969 the Berkshire Music Center will again sponsor "Contemporary Trends" concerts, with guest artists representative of significant movements in American popular music. Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet, Don Ellis and The Association were heard in 1968. Ravi rvices for cafeteria

d menu adequate.
ng on the e an ex-
ere is a n Browning,

olm Frager,
e Berkshires. conduct a h symphony istinguished
d by Beverly with George rformance of n from the Center offers students and ys a series of cted by the he Berkshire onducted by d guest con-

h Leinsdorf.
cal recitals,

Ashl

NGE

From SHOWBILL

The First Annual Chronicle of the Performing Arts may be the start of something unusual.

The booming, burgeoning Performing Arts scene is becoming everyone's concern. And, the generally affluent, mobile "layman" is less interested in the "state of the arts" with its correlary theorizing than he is in "Where are these new arts meccas?" and, "What is happening at these meccas?"

Consequently, the Chronicle encompasses a representative selection of Performing Arts Centers and Festivals and you'll find the "guidelines" and salient features and facts lucidly spelled out.

The "Centers" chosen for special attention express the precious diversity of the Performing Arts movement in both form and content. It's a delight to witness how the creative spirit is manifest in both programming, and always, the architecture of the "Centers." A true Performing Arts Center, as you'll see, is a total environment. It builds and relies initially upon the presence of community, topography, climate and artistic objectives to rearrange and reinterpret its special idiom for all of us.

In the business sphere SHOWBILL is known as the nation's leading publisher of Performing Arts program magazines. The staff of SHOWBILL labors with the great "Centers" to produce the daily program magazines. If these "every-performance" magazines are the "key" to special and memorable evenings at Performing Arts centers we hope that the Chronicle will be the "key" to the entertaining arts throughout the United States.

Summer Arts, U.S.A.:
6 "Let Them Be Cultural Supermarkets." by Clive Barnes
10 Magnificent Blossom by Frank E. Joseph
13 Map of Blossom Music Center
14 Focus on Blossom
15 Around Blossom
Garden State Arts Center
16 A First Season Triumph by Arthur S. Harris, Jr.
19 Map of Garden State Arts Center
20 Focus on Garden State
21 Guide to 1969 Summer Performing Arts with Map of U.S.A.
25 Around Garden State
27 Saratoga A Legend Renewed by Frank Sullivan
32 Map of Saratoga Performing Arts Center
33 Around Saratoga
34 A Plea for Patrons by Charles S. Dake
The American Original
36 Tanglewood The Berkshire Music Festival by Marvin Schofer
39 Map of Tanglewood
39 Around Tanglewood

First Annual Chronicle (T)
Summer Performing Arts
1969

Robert W. Slocum, president and publisher
Gilbert C. Munroe, executive vice president
Don Lester Gordon, advertising director
Marcia Bates Smith, editor
John D. Adams, managing editor
C. J. Hepburn Associates, art direction

The Chronicle* is published by the SHOWBILL Division of Slocum House Inc., 39 West 55th Street, New York, N.Y. 10019.

Copyright © Slocum House. All rights reserved.
Single issue price $1.00.
* (T) Trademark

TEN
FESTI
featur
Yugos artists
Oth
clude
VAL
CARA
ah, N
MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Lake Placid, New York.

New England Region

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, presenting two weeks of chamber music and six weeks of full orchestra with guest conductors and soloists. Other events include open rehearsals, and concerts by students and faculty of Berkshire Music Center. July and August.

CASTLE HILL FESTIVAL ●, Ipswich, Massachusetts, Friday and Saturday concerts on the Castle Hill estate. July and August.

THE CHARLES RIVER ESPLANADE CONCERTS ●, Boston, Massachusetts, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Hatch Memorial Shell, conducted by Arthur Fiedler and Harry Ellis Dickson two weeks in July.

HOPKINS CENTER CONGREGATION OF THE ARTS ●, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, symphony and chamber ensemble concerts, repertory theatre, art shows, films and exhibitions, Mario di Bonaventura, music director. July and August.

MACDOWELL FESTIVAL OF AMERICAN MUSIC ●, New London, Connecticut, sponsored by the Eastern Connecticut Symphony. July.

MARLBORO MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Marlboro, Vermont, under the artistic direction of Rudolf Serkin, presents weekend concerts of varied chamber music ensembles. Pablo Casals, guest conductor. July and August.

MUSIC MOUNTAIN ●, Falls Village, Connecticut, Sunday afternoon

to the Gideon, bring your imagination.

We're a great big resort hotel with all the modern conveniences — plus golf, swimming, horse racing — you name it.

But lots of places can offer you these.

What makes the Gideon unique is something else again. For want of a better word, you might call it "pedigree".

For example, the story of our founding is an actual legend of derring-do. Our history is the history of glamorous Saratoga. And peopled with the same star-studded cast.

Our present retains the same bird-songy, tree-shaded charm that made us famous. We're still a one minute walk from the world famous Spa — whose mineral waters and baths are free to our guests.

We're within strolling distance of the magnificent new Performing Arts Center — Summer home of the Philadelphia Symphony and New York City Ballet.

There's a championship golf course just a 9 iron away. Our own free par 29 course right beside it. And an excellent private course within a few minutes drive.

Saratoga's renowned thoroughbred track is nearby. And also night harness racing at Saratoga Raceway. Swimming and tennis are easily accessible. Nightlife abounds.

Food? Famous — especially our Sunday International Buffets — with six or more hot courses, and some 60 different items from all over the world.

All in all, the Gideon's the kind of place that can half-convince you you're some celebrated figure living in an earlier, more peaceful era. All it takes is a few days and a little imagination. Very little. Ask your travel agent for details.

The Gideon Putnam Hotel
Saratoga Spa,
Saratoga Springs, N. Y.
Phone: 1-584-3000

Ravi Shankar at a Contemporary Concert at Tanglewood

The 1969 Berkshire Festival will continue the tradition of presenting distinguished international artists in concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The brilliant Russian-born virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy will appear; Germany will be represented by Christoph Eschenbach, another pianist who, though only in his mid-twenties, has won extraordinary acclaim for his playing; France by conductor-composer Pierre Boulez, an acknowledged leader of the avant garde, and by another famed conductor, Georges Prêtre. Hungarian-born Istvan Kertesz will make his debut with the Orchestra at Tanglewood 1969, as will the Israeli Daniel Barenboim and his immensely talented young English wife, cellist Jacqueline Du Pré. The American conductors will include the Orchestra's Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, David Zinman, who had a great success with the audience at the 1968 Festival, and Henry Lewis, the recently appointed conductor of the New Jersey Symphony. Mr. Lewis' wife, Marilyn Horne, will also be heard at Tanglewood in the summer of 1969. American pianists include Van Cliburn, John Browning, Claude Frank and Malcolm Frager, all of them favorites in the Berkshires.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct a performance of the Ninth symphony of Beethoven, with a distinguished quartet of soloists, headed by Beverly Sills, who will also star with George Shirley in a concert performance of Mozart's The abduction from the seraglio.

The Berkshire Music Center offers public concerts by both students and faculty. Its orchestra plays a series of programs, some conducted by the Conducting Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center, some conducted by faculty and distinguished guest conductors including Erich Leinsdorf.

Chamber music, vocal recitals, choral programs and Composers' Forums are also presented. In 1969 the Berkshire Music Center will again sponsor "Contemporary Trends" concerts, with guest artists representative of significant movements in American popular music. Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet, Don Ellis and The Association were heard in 1968. Ravi rvices for cafeteria

d menu
adequate.
ng on the e an ex-
ere is a

Ashl

NGE

[1]

From THE EDITORS

The First Annual Chronicle of the Performing Arts may be the start of something unusual.

The booming, burgeoning Performing Arts scene is becoming everyone's concern. And, the generally affluent, mobile "layman" is less interested in the "state of the arts" with its correlary theorizing than he is in "Where are these new arts meccas?" and, "What is happening at these meccas?"

Consequently, the Chronicle encompasses a representative selection of Performing Arts Centers and Festivals and you'll find the "guidelines" and salient features and facts lucidly spelled out.

The "Centers" chosen for special attention express the precious diversity of the Performing Arts movement in both form and content. It's a delight to witness how the creative spirit is manifest in both programming, and always, the architecture of the "Centers." A true Performing Arts Center, as you'll see, is a total environment. It builds and relies initially upon the presence of community, topography, climate and artistic objectives to rearrange and reinterpret its speci[illegible] of us.

In the business sp[illegible] is known as the [illegible] publisher of Perfor[illegible] gram magazines. Th[illegible] BILL labors with th[illegible] to produce the daily [illegible] zines. If these "eve[illegible] magazines are the [illegible] and memorable even[illegible] ing Arts centers w[illegible] Chronicle will be t[illegible] entertaining arts [illegible] United States.

TEM[illegible] FESTI[illegible] featur[illegible] Yugos[illegible] artists[illegible]

Oth[illegible] clude [illegible] VAL [illegible] CARA[illegible] ah, N[illegible] MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Lake Placid, New York.

New England Region

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, presenting two weeks of chamber music and six weeks of full orchestra with guest conductors and soloists. Other events include open rehearsals, and concerts by students and faculty of Berkshire Music Center. July and August.

CASTLE HILL FESTIVAL ●, Ipswich, Massachusetts, Friday and Saturday concerts on the Castle Hill estate. July and August.

THE CHARLES RIVER ESPLANADE CONCERTS ●, Boston, Massachusetts, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Hatch Memorial Shell, conducted by Arthur Fiedler and Harry Ellis Dickson two weeks in July.

HOPKINS CENTER CONGREGATION OF THE ARTS ●, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, symphony and chamber ensemble concerts, repertory theatre, art shows, films and exhibitions, Mario di Bonaventura, music director. July and August.

MACDOWELL FESTIVAL OF AMERICAN MUSIC ●, New London, Connecticut, sponsored by the Eastern Connecticut Symphony. July.

MARLBORO MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Marlboro, Vermont, under the artistic direction of Rudolf Serkin, presents weekend concerts of varied chamber music ensembles. Pablo Casals, guest conductor. July and August.

MUSIC MOUNTAIN ●, Falls Village, Connecticut, Sunday afternoon

FIRST ANNUAL CHRONICLE OF THE PERFORMING ARTS 1969

Summer Arts, U.S.A.: "Let Them Be Cultural Supermarkets." by Clive Barnes — 6

Magnificent Blossom by Frank E. Joseph — 10

Map of Blossom Music Center — 13

Focus on Blossom — 14

Around Blossom — 15

Garden State Arts Center A First Season Triumph by Arthur S. Harris, Jr. — 16

Map of Garden State Arts Center — 19

Focus on Garden State — 20

Guide to 1969 Summer Performing Arts with Map of U.S.A. — 21

Around Garden State — 25

Saratoga A Legend Renewed by Frank Sullivan — 27

Map of Saratoga Performing Arts Center — 32

Around Saratoga — 33

A Plea for Patrons by Charles S. Dake — 34

The American Original Tanglewood The Berkshire Music Festival by Marvin Schofer — 36

Map of Tanglewood — 39

William Steinberg guest conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood

Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan were heard in concert and were in residence to teach.

Tanglewood is also the location of the annual Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in association with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Some of the most startling and innovative music to be heard anywhere is performed during this "festival within a festival," for which new works are commissioned each year. Contemporary Music Activities are under the direction of composer Gunther Schuller, one of America's best-known composers, and president of the New England Conservatory of Music.

Tanglewood, with its Saarinen-designed buildings is unique. As a place for music, it is unsurpassed. As a place of study and inspiration, it is unequalled. Two generations of young musicians have gone on to become the conductors, orchestra players, soloists, critics, teachers, and composers of today's music.

The Berkshire Festival was the first, the original, great American summer music festival. The Berkshire Music Center is an educational venture unlike any other. From July 4 through August 24, they welcome you.

Persons wishing additional information about the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood should address correspondence to: Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240.

Continued from page 34

and memorable forms of art for them to enjoy when the temporary frenzy of rock has left them exhausted at age twenty-nine.

We sincerely hope that this exposure to the classical Arts and fine artists will be passed on by them to succeeding generations.

Don't write off this younger generation; they too can succumb to the enchantment of well-played music. I remember only too well watching some Youth Corps boys cleaning up the Saratoga Performing Arts Center shell during rehearsals of The Philadelphia Orchestra. These were so-called underprivileged children, yet they couldn't resist stopping work during the

Continued on page 40

to the Gideon, bring your imagination.

We're a great big resort hotel with all the modern conveniences — plus golf, swimming, horse racing — you name it.

But lots of places can offer you these.

What makes the Gideon unique is something else again. For want of a better word, you might call it "pedigree".

For example, the story of our founding is an actual legend of derring-do. Our history is the history of glamorous Saratoga. And peopled with the same star-studded cast.

Our present retains the same bird-songy, tree-shaded charm that made us famous. We're still a one minute walk from the world famous Spa — whose mineral waters and baths are free to our guests.

We're within strolling distance of the magnificent new Performing Arts Center — Summer home of the Philadelphia Symphony and New York City Ballet.

There's a championship golf course just a 9 iron away. Our own free par 29 course right beside it. And an excellent private course within a few minutes drive.

Saratoga's renowned thoroughbred track is nearby. And also night harness racing at Saratoga Raceway. Swimming and tennis are easily accessible. Nightlife abounds.

Food? Famous — especially our Sunday International Buffets — with six or more hot courses, and some 60 different items from all over the world.

All in all, the Gideon's the kind of place that can half-convince you you're some celebrated figure living in an earlier, more peaceful era. All it takes is a few days and a little imagination. Very little. Ask your travel agent for details.

The Gideon Putnam Hotel
Saratoga Spa,
Saratoga Springs, N. Y.
Phone: 1-584-3000

Around TANGLEWOOD

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Music Shed at Tanglewood has seating for over six thousand patrons and thousands more can listen while sitting on the sweeping lawns outside the shed.

Tanglewood supplies ample parking facilities and near the main gate provides easily accessible services for its patrons which include a cafeteria serving a straightforward menu which is wholesome and adequate. Many patrons find picnicking on the lawns before a performance an exhilarating experience. There is a

to the Gideon, bring your imagination.

We're a great big resort hotel with all the modern conveniences — plus golf, swimming, horse racing — you name it.

But lots of places can offer you these.

What makes the Gideon unique is something else again. For want of a better word, you might call it "pedigree".

For example, the story of our founding is an actual legend of derring-do. Our history is the history of glamorous Saratoga. And peopled with the same star-studded cast.

Our present retains the same bird-songy, tree-shaded charm that made us famous. We're still a one minute walk from the world famous Spa — whose mineral waters and baths are free to our guests.

We're within strolling distance of the magnificent new Performing Arts Center — Summer home of the Philadelphia Symphony and New York City Ballet.

There's a championship golf course just a 9 iron away. Our own free par 29 course right beside it. And an excellent private course within a few minutes drive.

Saratoga's renowned thoroughbred track is nearby. And also night harness racing at Saratoga Raceway. Swimming and tennis are easily accessible. Nightlife abounds.

Food? Famous — especially our Sunday International Buffets — with six or more hot courses, and some 60 different items from all over the world.

All in all, the Gideon's the kind of place that can half-convince you you're some celebrated figure living in an earlier, more peaceful era.

All it takes is a few days and a little imagination. Very little. Ask your travel agent for details.

The Gideon Putnam Hotel
Saratoga Spa,
Saratoga Springs, N. Y.
Phone: 1-584-3000

Summer Arts, U.S.A.:
6 "Let Them Be Cultural Supermarkets." by Clive Barnes
10 Magnificent Blossom by Frank E. Joseph
13 Map of Blossom Music Center
14 Focus on Blossom
15 Around Blossom
Garden State Arts Center
16 A First Season Triumph by Arthur S. Harris, Jr.
19 Map of Garden State Arts Center
20 Focus on Garden State
21 Guide to 1969 Summer Performing Arts with Map of U.S.A.
25 Around Garden State
27 Saratoga A Legend Renewed by Frank Sullivan
32 Map of Saratoga Performing Arts Center
33 Around Saratoga
34 A Plea for Patrons by Charles S. Dake
The American Original
36 Tanglewood The Berkshire Music Festival by Marvin Schofer
39 Map of Tanglewood

William Steinberg guest conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood

Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan were heard in concert and were in residence to teach.

Tanglewood is also the location of the annual Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in association with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Some of the most startling and innovative music to be heard anywhere is performed during this "festival within a festival," for which new works are commissioned each year. Contemporary Music Activities are under the direction of composer Gunther Schuller, one of America's best-known composers, and president of the New England Conservatory of Music.

Tanglewood, with its Saarinen-designed buildings is unique. As a place for music, it is unsurpassed. As a place of study and inspiration, it is unequalled. Two generations of young musicians have gone on to become the conductors, orchestra players, soloists, critics, teachers, and composers of today's music.

The Berkshire Festival was the first, the original, great American summer music festival. The Berkshire Music Center is an educational venture unlike any other. From July 4 through August 24, they welcome you.

Persons wishing additional information about the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood should address correspondence to: Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240.

Continued from page 34

and memorable forms of art for them to enjoy when the temporary frenzy of rock has left them exhausted at age twenty-nine.

We sincerely hope that this exposure to the classical Arts and fine artists will be passed on by them to succeeding generations.

Don't write off this younger generation; they too can succumb to the enchantment of well-played music. I remember only too well watching some Youth Corps boys cleaning up the Saratoga Performing Arts Center shell during rehearsals of The Philadelphia Orchestra. These were so-called underprivileged children, yet they couldn't resist stopping work during the music store and reception room on the grounds as well as a first aid station.

Continued on page 40

When one is not listening to the music at Tanglewood, there are a variety of interesting places to visit in the immediate area.

Directly across the road is AVALOCH, a country inn with charming rooms, excellent food in the Five Reasons Steak & Ale House and all resort facilities including pool, water-skiing, tennis and golf.

Or one might choose to continue north on Routes 7 & 20 to Lenox. On East Street is the BLANTYRE, a castle which houses a gracious and bountiful restaurant for dinner and after-concert festivities.

An attractive restaurant on the Pittsfield-Lenox Road in Pittsfield is THE YELLOW ASTER, which features a varied menu and home-like atmosphere, open for lunch and dinner.

Turning east on Route 9 in Pittsfield and traveling five miles to Dalton, one finds the CRANE MUSEUM which features the progress of paper-making from Revolutionary times to the present.

Back in Pittsfield, is the BERKSHIRE MUSEUM with exhibitions of art, science and history. Associated with it is the LITTLE CINEMA which shows first run movies, classic revivals and children's matinees.

Further north on Route 7, in Williamstown, is LE COUNTRY RESTAURANT which features continental food and decor, open for dinner and buffet luncheons.

Williamstown also boasts a fine summer theatre which stages plays that range from ancient tragedies to contemporary dramas. Any visit should include a stop at the STERLING AND FRANCINE CLARK ART INSTITUTE.

Leaving Tanglewood and heading south on Route 7, one comes to the quaint town of Stockbridge, home of the BERKSHIRE THEATRE FESTIVAL. On Main St. is the 7 ARTS ANTIQUES one of the many shops fun for browsing or buying. Just outside Stockbridge on Route 183 is CHESTERWOOD, the barn gallery and studio of Daniel Chester French, sculptor of the Lincoln Memorial.

Continuing south on Route 7 toward Great Barrington is JENIFER HOUSE, a red barn New England gift shop.

Turn south on Route 23 at Great Barrington to the intersection of Route 41 for JUG END, where hospitality prevails in its dining rooms and year-round resort facilities are available. GREAT BARRINGTON POTTERY is located north on Route 41 and features pottery displays and a Japanese wood-burning kiln.

Traveling north on Route 41 to the intersection of Route 20 and turning west, one finds the HANCOCK SHAKER VILLAGE, a unique farm-and-craft settlement dating from 1790; and the MT. LEBANON SHAKER VILLAGE where teenagers are restoring this historic site.

Back to Route 41 and continuing northward to Route 295 near Canaan, N.Y. is LES PYRENEES, on Queechy Lake, specializing in French cuisine.

The Berkshire area, with the festival at Tanglewood its hub, is truly a vacation area for a day or a season.

Continued from page 38

interesting and exciting passages. They were not just ducking work; they could not withstand the charm of beautiful music well played.

In today's world, we have too few millionaires to be the Patrons of the Arts; therefore, we need millions of people to give their money and time. These are the millions of people who have become the Patrons of the Arts in the modern sense. Support the Arts in its various forms and you will find being a Patron of the Arts opens a whole new world to you. Try it and see.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

From SHOWBILL

The First Annual Chronicle of the Performing Arts may be the start of something unusual.

The booming, burgeoning Performing Arts scene is becoming everyone's concern. And, the generally affluent, mobile "layman" is less interested in the "state of the arts" with its correlary theorizing than he is in "Where are these new arts meccas?" and, "What is happening at these meccas?"

Consequently, the Chronicle encompasses a representative selection of Performing Arts Centers and Festivals and you'll find the "guidelines" and salient features and facts lucidly spelled out.

The "Centers" chosen for special attention express the precious diversity of the Performing Arts movement in both form and content. It's a delight to witness how the creative spirit is manifest in both programming, and always, the architecture of the "Centers." A true Performing Arts Center, as you'll see, is a total environment. It builds and relies initially upon the presence of community, topography, climate and artistic objectives to rearrange and reinterpret its special idiom for all of us.

In the business sphere SHOWBILL is known as the nation's leading publisher of Performing Arts program magazines. The staff of SHOWBILL labors with the great "Centers" to produce the daily program magazines. If these "every-performance" magazines are the "key" to special and memorable evenings at Performing Arts centers we hope that the Chronicle will be the "key" to the entertaining arts throughout the United States.

FIRST ANNUAL CHRONICLE OF THE PERFORMING ARTS 1969

Summer Arts, U.S.A.:
6 "Let Them Be Cultural Supermarkets." by Clive Barnes
10 Magnificent Blossom by Frank E. Joseph
13 Map of Blossom Music Center
14 Focus on Blossom
15 Around Blossom
Garden State Arts Center
16 A First Season Triumph by Arthur S. Harris, Jr.
19 Map of Garden State Arts Center
20 Focus on Garden State
21 Guide to 1969 Summer Performing Arts with Map of U.S.A.
25 Around Garden State
27 Saratoga A Legend Renewed by Frank Sullivan
32 Map of Saratoga Performing Arts Center
33 Around Saratoga
34 A Plea for Patrons by Charles S. Dake
The American Original
36 Tanglewood The Berkshire Music Festival by Marvin Schofer
39 Map of Tanglewood
39 Around Tanglewood

First Annual Chronicle (T)
Summer Performing Arts
1969

Robert W. Slocum, president and publisher
Gilbert C. Munroe, executive vice president
Don Lester Gordon, advertising director
Marcia Bates Smith, editor
John D. Adams, managing editor
C. J. Hepburn Associates, art direction

The Chronicle* is published by the SHOWBILL Division of Slocum House Inc., 39 West 55th Street, New York, N.Y. 10019.

Copyright © Slocum House. All rights reserved.
Single issue price $1.00.

* (T) Trademark

TEM
FESTI feature Yugosl
artists
Oth
clude
VAL
CARA
ah, N
MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Lake Placid, New York.

New England Region

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, presenting two weeks of chamber music and six weeks of full orchestra with guest conductors and soloists. Other events include open rehearsals, and concerts by students and faculty of Berkshire Music Center. July and August.

CASTLE HILL FESTIVAL ●, Ipswich, Massachusetts, Friday and Saturday concerts on the Castle Hill estate. July and August.

THE CHARLES RIVER ESPLANADE CONCERTS ●, Boston, Massachusetts, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Hatch Memorial Shell, conducted by Arthur Fiedler and Harry Ellis Dickson two weeks in July.

HOPKINS CENTER CONGREGATION OF THE ARTS ●, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, symphony and chamber ensemble concerts, repertory theatre, art shows, films and exhibitions, Mario di Bonaventura, music director. July and August.

MACDOWELL FESTIVAL OF AMERICAN MUSIC ●, New London, Connecticut, sponsored by the Eastern Connecticut Symphony. July.

MARLBORO MUSIC FESTIVAL ●, Marlboro, Vermont, under the artistic direction of Rudolf Serkin, presents weekend concerts of varied chamber music ensembles. Pablo Casals, guest conductor. July and August.

MUSIC MOUNTAIN ●, Falls Village, Connecticut, Sunday afternoon

The American Original

TANGLEWOOD

The Berkshire Festival

by Marvin Schofer, Director of Press and Public Information for The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tanglewood, an estate of over one hundred acres, located in the most scenic part of the Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived here while writing The House of Seven Gables and The Wonder Book, and his house is reconstructed on the Tanglewood grounds. Tanglewood and the region surrounding it—Berkshire County, the city of Pittsfield, the towns of Lenox, Stockbridge, and Williamstown—are rich in natural beauty and in history.

Side by side at Tanglewood are the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center, the two summer activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Berkshire Festival is a series of twenty-four concerts by the Orchestra, each Friday, Saturday, and Sunday for eight successive weeks, and a series of chamber music programs.

The Berkshire Music Center, founded as the fulfillment of a long-cherished dream by Serge Koussevitzky, the Orchestra's Music Director for twenty-five years, is a summer academy for the advanced study of music. Here each summer come talented young musicians, both men and women, from all parts of the United States and abroad. They study with a faculty of outstanding teachers and virtuoso members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

American conductors will include the Orchestra's Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, David Zinman, who had a great success with the audience at the 1968 Festival, and Henry Lewis, the recently appointed conductor of the New Jersey Symphony. Mr. Lewis' wife, Marilyn Horne, will also be heard at Tanglewood in the summer of 1969. American pianists choral programs and Composers' Forums are also presented. In 1969 the Berkshire Music Center will again sponsor "Contemporary Trends" concerts, with guest artists representative of significant movements in American popular music. Judy Collins, the Modern Jazz Quartet, Don Ellis and The Association were heard in 1968. Ravi

rvices for cafeteria
d menu
adequate.
ng on the e an ex-
ere is a n Browning,

olm Frager,
e Berkshires. conduct a h symphony
istinguished
d by Beverly with George formance of n from the Center offers students and ys a series of cted by the he Berkshire

onducted by d guest con-
h Leinsdorf.

cal recitals,

Ashl

NGE

[1]

2.

NEW HAMPSHIRE
MASSACHUSETTS
CONNECTICUT
RHODE ISLAND
Boston
Worcester
Springfield
Hartford
Providence
Lowell
Lawrence
Fall River
New Bedford
Pittsfield
Northampton
Amherst
Greenfield
Lenox
Stockbridge
Great Barrington
Lee
Pittsfield
Williamstown
North Adams
Manchester
Concord
Portsmouth
Newport
Block Island
Nantucket Island
Martha's Vineyard
Cape Cod National Seashore
Plymouth Plantation
Sandwich Glass
Chatham
Thousand Pots
Ocean Bluff
Marshfield
Quincy
Brockton
Attleboro
Norton
Mystic
Essex
Danbury
New Haven
Waterbury
Bristol Litchfield
Cornwall Bridge
Sharon
Stratford
Norwalk
Mystic Seaport
Stowe
Jaffrey
Keene
Rindge
Mashpee
Wellesley
Worcester
Amherst
Deerfield
Northampton
Springfield
Old Sturbridge
Storrs
Willimantic
New Britain
Wickford
Kingston
Narragansett
Newport
Block Island
Nantucket Island
Martha's Vineyard
Summer Resort
Ocean Bluff
Marshfield
Plymouth
Sandwich
Chatham
Provincetown
Lenox
Stockbridge
Great Barrington
Lee
Pittsfield
Williamstown
North Adams
Manchester
Concord
Portsmouth

2.

©1969 The Christian Science Publishing Society. All rights reserved

SUMMERTIME AT THE SKI RESORTS

For many families, the best ... to head for a ski ... skiing—

The Berkshires, Massachusetts. Tent-pitchers or backpackers, swimmers or antiquers, your family will find all it wants to fill summer days and nights at ski resort areas in the Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts. You can watch internationally-renowned dance troupes, join in lively folk singing, hear the best jazz, enjoy Broadway stars in top-notch summer theater, and take great side trips from Highway 7 which is the north-south backbone of this region.

Let the kids clomp through two rare covered bridges and climb around the prehistoric rock garden at Bartholomew's Cobble. Go shopping for Early American items at Jenifer House in Great Barrington, and stroll along Norman Rockwell's Main Street in Stockbridge, home of the "Berkshire Theater Festival."

Try the fishing and swimming in October Mountain State Forest near Lee, and enjoy a dance program at Ted Shawn's Jacob's Pillow. Even if you're not a longhair music buff, visit Tanglewood near Lenox, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Picnics are great in the hemlock gardens. Dip into history at reconstructed Hancock Shaker Village near Pittsfield and the Herman Melville exhibit in the town's Athenaeum.

It's all great family fare—and popular—so write well ahead for reservations to: Berkshire Hills Conference, Pittsfield, Massachusetts 01201.

Continued

BETTER HOMES AND GARDENS
DES MOINES, IOWA
MONTHLY 3,000
APR 1969

Berkshires' Welkin Rings Mostly in Tune

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,415,507
JUN 8 1969

PITTSFIELD, Mass. — The spotlight on vacation attractions in the Berkshire country this summer will be focused once again on culture. This includes the Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate in Lenox, the Jacobs Pillow Dance Festival near Lee, the multimillion-dollar Clark Art Institute in Williamstown, the Berkshire Theater Festival in Stockbridge and the Berkshire Museum here in Pittsfield.

In Lenox, Tanglewood, which last summer attracted more than 220,000 patrons, has added a ninth week to its annual stand. This year's concert program will start on July 4 and last until Aug. 31, with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra winding up the season.

Buses to Tanglewood

New bus service to Tanglewood will be available year. Buses will leave daily from Boston, Worcester, Natick and Springfield, arriving at Tanglewood one hour before all matinee and evening concerts. The return trip will start about 30 minutes after each performance.

For Jacobs Pillow devotees, a 10-week season will start on June 26 with a performance by the Boston Ballet. Outstanding performers from the American Ballet Theater, plus Maria Alba and her Spanish dance company, will be featured later in the season. For the final program on Aug. 28, 29 and 30, Edward Villella and Patricia McBride will dance.

At the Clark Art Institute, the Acoustiguide system for visitors will be available for the first time. The system involves the use of an electronic tape-recording device about the size of a camera.

Another innovation at the institute will be free conducted tours. They will start at 3 P.M. daily, and last for about an hour.

A New Play

The summer theater season at Stockbridge will open with "John and Abigail," a new play by William Gibson. The drama deals with the life of John Adams and his wife Abigail from 1774 through 1778. Anne Bancroft, who has starred in three other plays by Gibson—"Two for the Seesaw," "The Miracle Worker" and "A Cry of Players"—will play the role of Abigail.

For the 21st season, the Berkshire Museum, which annually plays host to 100,000 persons, will feature art films in its Little Cinema theater.

Hundreds of tourists passing through Pittsfield on U.S. 7 and 20 are unaware of the museum's Historical Room. The room houses, among other things, the first alternating current transformer. It was built by William Stanley in 1885, and it was used originally to light the streets of downstate Great Barrington. Also in the room are a life mask of Abraham Lincoln and Civil War muskets manufactured in Pittsfield.

Ballets at Beaupre

New this season in Stockbridge will be the David McLain Dance Theater, which will present ballets at the Beaupre School from July 2 through 6.

The ownership of the almost 200-year-old Red Lion Inn in Stockbridge is new. The rambling old hostelry, which has been refurbished but continues to emphasize early New England atmosphere in its decor and cuisine, was purchased last fall by Mr. and Mrs. John H. Fitzpatrick.

The new owners are prepared to abandon the summers-only operation of the famous resort and restore it as a year-round establishment. When originally built in 1797, the inn was a tavern and stagecoach relay station on the Boston-Albany route.

In upstate Williamstown, the Williamstown Summer Theater opens an eight-week schedule on July 3. Seven plays and one musical show are on the agenda.

—MICHAEL STRAUSS.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,415,507
MAY 25 1969

GLAMOUR
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 814,000
MAY

...ay-
...rf-
...ay

...much attention to you.

music festivals—all kinds!

Tanglewood, near Lenox in the Berkshires of western Massachusetts, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony. The special acoustics of an outdoor amphitheater allow consistently superb concerts to be heard throughout the estate's gardens and lawns. The program of music (July through August) is tremendously varied. Write to Lenox for tickets. The Contemporary Trends Concerts feature outstanding jazz, folk, Oriental and rock musicians. Nearby, the Berkshire Music Barn presents such greats as Carlos Montoya and Brubeck.

Newport, Rhode Island, is home of the most famous jazz festival (July 3-6) and a renowned folk festival (July 16-20). Everybody knows about Newport; crowds flock every year to hear the likes of Dylan, Baez and Stan Getz. One sour note—sleeping overnight on the Newport beaches is no longer tolerated. Reserve a hotel room.

Aspen, Colorado, the beautiful ski resort nestled high in the Rocky Mountains ... tracts hundreds of musicians ... (July and August) ... from the ...

A Flourish of Festivals

By RAYMOND ERICSON

THE advent of the Mississippi River Festival, which will be the St. Louis Symphony's summer activity from (hopefully) now on, points up a situation that has been developing rapidly in the past few years. With so many of America's leading orchestras functioning during the summer, there is now a sizable market for concert soloists. They no longer have to endure a forced estivation, and in the case of foreign artists with sufficient prestige they can get enough bookings to make it worth their while to come here in what used to be the desultory summer months.

In the old days the symphony orchestra series of any consequence could be counted on one hand: Lewisohn Stadium, where the orchestra was largely the New York Philharmonic; Robin Hood Dell, where it was largely the Philadelphia Orchestra; the Berkshire Music Festival, with the Boston Symphony; the Ravinia Festival, with the Chicago Symphony; and Hollywood Bowl, with an orchestra that was largely the Los Angeles Philharmonic. The Stadium concerts no longer exist, but today the Philharmonic keeps busy on its own, so that an equivalent five series may be said to be still in existence.

Within the last five years, nine festivals have sprung up, generally in the wake of contracts that require orchestras to keep occupied most of the year. The Detroit Symphony set up at Meadow Brook in Oakland, Mich.; the Philadelphians moved up to Saratoga, N. Y., for the month of August; the Cleveland Orchestra has a summer home at Blossom Center between Akron and Cleveland; the Washington (D. C.) National Symphony goes to the Merriweather Post Pavilion in nearby Columbia, Md.; Daytona Beach is host to the London Symphony; miscellaneous orchestras keep alive New Jersey's two young festivals at the Garden State Arts Center and Waterloo Village; Temple University has imported the Zagreb Philharmonic for its year-old festival at its Ambler campus outside of Philadelphia; and now the St. Louis Symphony has moved to the Edwardsville campus of Southern Illinois University.

*

A curious feature of this summer's musical scene is the appearance of several peripatetic series. Along with other beer companies, Schaefer has turned music patron and it is sponsoring the Hudson Valley Philharmonic in concerts throughout the Hudson Valley and other New York State regions. The Clearwater, a replica of the famous Hudson River sloops of the 19th century, is sailing from Portland, Me., on June 28, expecting to arrive in Manhattan on Aug. 1. On the way, Pete Seeger and the Hudson River Sloop Singers, who have raised money in concerts to fund the vessel, will put the boat in at various New England harbors to give more concerts. Then, both the Adirondack (N. Y.) and New Hampshire Music Festivals have outlets in several locales. The system is not new, but it seems to be spreading.

Otherwise the summer music scene remains a busy one. For every festival that dies, another—or even two—springs up in its place. Which is all to the good: according to most reports, the festivals attract people who normally do not go to concerts during the winter.

SARATOGA SARATOGIAN
Saturday, May 3, 1969

—Tanglewood? The Boston Symphony will be back in its huge Music Shed surrounded by lawn for summer concerts from early July to mid-August. It's Lenox in western Massachusetts, just across the New York State line (almost all the way by Thruway).

—Pennsylvania's Dutch

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543
APR 5 1969

The French studio shows windows and skylight designed for natural illumination.

Chesterwood Accepted by National Trust

Sculptor's Estate

By HARVEY RAYNER

clared a ... in 1966 and a Massach... Landmark a year later.

French's daughter, Mrs. William Penn Cresson, who had established the foundation, included an endowment with her gift to the National Trust.

Chesterwood in its new role will be an asset to the Berkshire region that offers the summer Music Festival at Tanglewood, summer theaters in Stockbridge and Lenox, and autumn's lovely foliage. The view from the studio porch, looking across the Housatonic River Valley to the mountains, is a treat in itself.

Four Seasons Vacationland in Western Massachusetts

Berkshire Hills

Summer with its vacations is almost here, and whereas it used to be a season when there was little or no musical activity, more and more concerts are being scheduled every where. Even if you don't leave home, you can go to the Hartford Festival Concerts as I told you last week.

Also in Connecticut are the musical activities sponsored by Yale out at Norfolk. These have a lengthy tradition and are very enjoyable. The season runs from July 4 to Aug. 23.

Then there is Tanglewood, up at Lenox, Mass. Again the opening date is July 4, and there is something doing through Aug. 24. The Boston Symphony Concerts occur on weekends, but there are numerous other events every day. You can get a membership for the season that saves you money.

Just a little north of Lenox is Marlboro, Vt. Here there is a famous festival run by Rudolph Serkin, with Pablo Casals frequently lending a hand. This gets under way June 25, and continues through the 17th of August.

Not to be outdone by Vermont, New Hampshire offers two series of musical events, about which I know noth- ... a series of concerts held during July and August at Center Harbor. There is also a series at Hanover offering music at intervals between June 28 and Aug. 24.

Maine has a very good series of concerts at Hancock, from Aug. 8 to Aug. 27. This series was originally founded by the late Pierre Monteux who ... his summer home ... continues under ... the Mon...

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
JUN 16 1969
New England

... July ... 22. These are free, of course, and there are too many others concerts to mention.

The big New York festival, comparable to Tanglewood, is at Saratoga. The Philadelphia plays here, and during the few years it has been running, it has made quite a dent in the attendance at the Massachusetts event. Buffalo has a Bach festival between June 23 and Aug. 1, while nearby Chatauqua schedules music from Aug. 2 to Aug. 20.

Opera is also to be heard in the state, though it is not so good as the productions we get in Hartford; but then outdoor opera is always a problem. In any event there is an Opera Festival at Glens Falls running from July 14 to Aug. 16. There is also opera to be heard at the Caramoor Festival in Katonah; this has a better reputation. Dates are June 21 to ... 13.

... up in northern New York ... festivals at Schroon ... Lake Placid, ... now nothing. ... during ... Oct.

sity also has concerts between June 23 and Aug. 3.

Washington offers opera during July and August. To tell the truth, it isn't of first rank but Washingtonians don't seem to know the difference. In nearby Columbia, Md., there is also a music festival, but I don't know anything about it. It probably features the Baltimore orchestra, which is pretty good.

There are music festivals in North Carolina at both Brevard and Greensboro, if you happen to be going that way. Both are likely to be unmercifully hot in the summer, so don't go out of your way for either.

Lots of people go to Florida in the summer, I know, although I don't care for the state in hot weather. However there is music to be heard at Daytona Beach from July 24 to Aug. 10 and Daytona is not as hot as some of the other Florida towns.

If you're headed west, there is the lengthy Blossom Music Festival outside Cleveland. It is already in progress and will last through Aug. 31. Cincinnati has a famous opera series, held in the zoo, of all places; this runs from July 2 to July 27 and is well worth while.

There are also musical functions at Lakeside and Oberlin, Ohio, but I know nothing about them. If you're interested, inquire in the vicinity.

Indiana boasts a good series at the state university in Bloomington. It is rather short, lasting only from July 26 to Aug. 2.

In Illinois there are always the summer concerts by the Chicago, held outside the city at Ravinia Park. They've already started and will continue through Sept. 16. In town, there are band concerts that are very good at Grant Park, starting June 24 and lasting ... Aug. 25.

... offers music at ... from July 18 to 27 ... sort of fes- ... Ephraim ... near ... could

Auto Adventure Through Berkshire ... per Housatonic Valley ... inating for Visitors

... fourth and final ... direct-to-home ... designed es- ... Connecticut ... tours are ... with ... In-

Bear east and remain on Route 8 to ...

4m. BECKET, adjacent to October Mountain State Forest. You can explore Schermerhorn Gorge by road or trail. Continue north through Hinsdale, past Tully Mountain, to the next stop.

7m. DALTON. The ... Crane Paper Company ... the old stone ... ency has ...

proceed south on Route 7A and U.S. 7 to ...

8m. STOCKBRIDGE. Here the Berkshire Playhouse presents evening performances June to September. Naumkeag Gardens, on Prospect Street, the former Choate estate, contains formal gardens and forests around an outstanding ... home. Of special ... est is the ... Main Str...

... Oct. 13 ... 7 ... 7A ... 20 ... 4 to ... Turn north ... reservoirs ... 12 miles to ... Tolland ... Berkshire ... Southwest ... 183 lies ... home of the ... Orchestra. You will see a replica of the cottage where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived while he wrote The House of the Seven Gables. The Hemlock Gardens are favored picnic spots before and after Berkshire Music Festival concerts given in the great Music Shed. Return to Lenox and ...

... Oak 'N Spr... ...th Lee designed its ... be slope with rope tow ... the "Social Skier."

Across from Tanglewood where strains of music performed by Boston's Symphony Orchestra fill the air all Summer, the screams of delight from happy skiers, toboganners and ice skaters at Avaloch Inn take over the rarified air of Lenox for the Winter season.

Nearby at Eastover, ... formal resort for yo... ... more Be...

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849
MAY 18 1969

Azaleas Due to Brighten Berkshires Scene

Pittsfield, Mass. (Special)—Music fills the Berkshire air every summer, via the famed Music Festival at Tanglewood and the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival. As a prelude to the music and dance presentations, floral beauty is expected to dominate the scene from Memorial Day to mid-June, the usual blooming period for the 4,000-acre azalea display at the Berkshire State Forest, centered around 11-acre Berry Pond on Berry Mountain. Both pond and mountain are named after William Berry, a Revolutionary War soldier who ditinguished himself in the Battle of Bennington. He received the tract of land for his services.

Azaleas Tower

The tract includes 100 acres on the summit of the ... Range, and it is ... Berry ... achieved ... himself ... azaleas ... bushes ... two ... The ... to ... ...

... Pittsfield State Forest, north of this town, is almost 3,000 acres ... Farmington River ... Reservoir. Continue north across the Massachusetts Turnpike. Nearby, on U.S. 20, at Jacob's Pillow is Ted Shawn's famous School of the Dance.

JAN 19 1969
SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(M) 152,525 (S) 198,160
JUN 22 1969
New England Newclip

Recreation and the arts flourish side by side in this hill and lake region of breathtaking, kaleidoscopic beauty and variety that changes with a turn of the road, the season or the visitor's interest. Sixteen state parks encompassing 80,000 acres of forest, beckon the lover of the outdoors with streams and wooded slopes, while music fills the cool mountain air at numerous concerts and festivals, including the world-famous one held annually by The Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. Summer theatres, art museums and ballet programs at the renowned Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, carry on a 150-year-old creative tradition.

Sports and entertainment are unlimited in the Berkshires: fourteen beautiful and challenging golf courses with a background of mountain splendor . . . many excellent tennis courts . . . crystal-clear lake waters and heated resort pools for aquatic pleasures — swimming, sailing, water-skiing and thoroughbred racing. Fishermen will revel in the 90 lakes and ponds and 274 trout streams dotting the majestic landscape . . . and hunters in the bounty of partridge, pheasant and deer. For the horsemen there are miles of country roads and trails through peaceful valleys and lazy mountains. The camping family will find hundreds of wooded lakeside campsites, many with secluded beaches and boat landings. And for the gift and antique shopper the Berkshires abound in intriguing gift and antique shops.

Skiing ranks as the most exciting of the winter sports in the Berkshires. More than 20 areas, and literally hundreds of trails with miles and miles of downhill skiing offer a wide challenge on carefully groomed mountain sides. Truly fine lift facilities include chairlifts, T-bars, J-bars, Poma lifts and rope tows, eliminate the wasting of precious time in line. Snow-making equipment assures good skiing, weather or not, in this, the largest snow making region in the country. Beginner, refresher or perfectionist will find the most up-to-date ski instruction available.

Tobogganing, sleigh-riding, outstanding indoor and outdoor skating, snow-mobiling, dog sled racing . . . these are but a few of the activities which the Berkshires offer for those who enjoy a varied Winter program. Mt. Greylock, Mt. Everett, Monument Mountain and the northern end of the famous Mohawk Trail unfold views of incomparable scenic beauty the year 'round. But in Autumn the countryside ignites in a blaze of fiery red, brilliant orange and flaming bronze and gold, painting a spectacle unsurpassed by any. Interwoven with the fascinating scenic, cultural and historic attractions, numberless fine restaurants, country inns, modern hotels and fascinating resorts point up the versatility of the Berkshires. Ingenuity and warm hospitality abound everywhere, from small cosy, inexpensive inns to deluxe motels to gay and exciting resorts.

Part of the Berkshires' heritage are the historic shrines . . . birthplaces and homes of famous Americans such as Herman Melville's Arrowhead, where he wrote "Moby Dick." Artist Norman Rockwell chose the Berkshires for his home and studio because the authentic old New England atmosphere still prevails. Quiet towns, still dressed in their village greens and embellished by old Colonial homes and country churches, take one back to a peaceful and historic era.

These are only a few of the things which contribute to the fascinating heritage the Berkshires proudly offer its visitors.

Four Seasons Vacationland in Western Massachusetts

Berkshire Hills

Published by the Division of Tourism
Massachusetts Department of Commerce and Development
State Office Building, Boston, Massachusetts 02202

Summer with its vacations is almost here, and whereas it used to be a season when there was little or no musical activity, more and more concerts are being scheduled every. where.. Even if you don't leave home, you can go to the Hartford Festival Concerts as I told you last week.

Also in Connecticut are the musical activities sponsored by Yale out at Norfolk. These have a lengthy tradition and are very enjoyable. The season runs from July 4 to Aug. 23.

Then there is Tanglewood, up at Lenox, Mass. Again the opening date is July 4, and there is something doing through Aug. 24. The Boston Symphony Concerts occur on weekends, but there are numerous other events every day. You can get a membership for the season that saves you money.

Just a little north of Lenox is Maraboro, Vt. Here there is a famous festival run by Rudolph Serkin, with Pablo Casals frequently lending a hand. This gets under way June 25, and continues through the 17th of August.

Not to be outdone by Vermont, New Hampshire offers two series of musical events. ... about which I know noth- ... a series of concerts held during July and August at Center Harbor. There is also a series at Hanover offering music at intervals between June 29 and Aug. 24.

Maine has a very good series of concerts at Hancock, from Aug. 3 to Aug. 27. This series was originally founded by the late Pierre Monteux who m... his summer home ... continues under ... the Mont...

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.

JUN 16 1969

New England

... ...erts from ... 22. These are ... course, and there are too many others concerts to mention.

The big New York festival, comparable to Tanglewood, is at Saratoga. The Philadelphia plays here, and during the few years it has been running, it has made quite a dent in the attendance at the Massachusetts event. Buffalo has a Bach festival between June 23 and Aug. 1, while nearby Chatauqua schedules music from Aug. 2 to Aug. 20.

Opera is also to be heard in the state, though it is not so good as the productions we get in Hartford; but then outdoor opera is always a problem. In any event there is an Opera Festival at Glens Falls running from July 14 to Aug. 16. There is also opera to be heard at the Caramoor Festival in Katonah; this has a better reputation. Dates are June 21 to ... 13.

...up in northern New York ... festivals at Schroon ... Lake Placid, ...now nothing. ...en during ... Oct. ...ly

sity also has concerts between June 23 and Aug. 3.

Washington offers opera during July and August. To tell the truth, it isn't of first rank but Washingtonians don't seem to know the difference. In nearby Columbia, Md., there is also a music festival, but I don't know anything about it. It probably features the Baltimore orches-, which is pretty good.

There are music festivals in ...h Carolina at both Brev- ...nd Greensboro, if you hap- ... be going that way. Both ... are likely to be unmerci- ...ally hot in the summer, so don't go out of your way for either.

Lots of people go to Florida in the summer, I know, although I don't care for the state in hot weather. However there is music to be heard at Daytona Beach from July 24 to Aug. 10 and Daytona is not as hot as some of the other Florida towns.

If you're headed west, there is the lengthy Blossom Music Festival outside Cleveland. It is already in progress and will last through Aug. 31. Cincinnati has a famous opera series, held in the zoo, of all places; this runs from July 2 to July 27 and is well worth while.

There are also musical functions at Lakeside and Oberlin, Ohio, but I know nothing about them. If you're interested, inquire in the vicinity.

Indiana boasts a good series at the state university in Bloomington. It is rather short, lasting only from July 26 to Aug. 2.

In Illinois there are always the summer concerts by the Chicago, held outside the city at Ravinia Park. They've already started and will continue through Sept. 15. In town, there are band concerts that are very good at Grant Park, ...rting June 24 and lasting ...h Aug. 25.

...in offers music at ...om July 18 to 27 ...ne sort of fes- ...t Ephraim ...rt, near ...ould

Auto Adventure Through Berkshire...

...per Housatonic Valley ...inating for Visitors

...urth and final ...close-to-home ...esigned es- ...Connecti- ...urs are ...n with ...n In-

Bear east and remain on Route 8 to . . .

64m. BECKET, adjacent to October Mountain State Forest. You can explore Schermerhorn Gorge by road or trail. Continue north through Hinsdale. Past Tully Mountain, to the next stop.

76m. DALTON. The fa... Crane Paper Company ... the old stone m... ...rency has ... ...ries proceed south on Route 7A and U.S. 7 to . . .

98m. STOCKBRIDGE. Here the Berkshire Playhouse presents evening performances June to September. Naumkeag Gardens, on Propect Street, the former Choate estate, contain formal gardens and fo... around an outstanding ... home. Of special ... est is the ... Main Str... west ...

Recreation and the arts flourish side by side in this hill and lake region of breathtaking, kaleidoscopic beauty and variety that changes with a turn of the road, the season or the visitor's interest. Sixteen state parks encompassing 80,000 acres of forest, beckon the lover of the outdoors with streams and wooded slopes, while music fills the cool mountain air at numerous concerts and festivals, including the world-famous one held annually by The Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. Summer theatres, art museums and ballet programs at the renowned Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, carry on a 150-year-old creative tradition.

Sports and entertainment are unlimited in the Berkshires: fourteen beautiful and challenging golf courses with a background of mountain splendor . . . many excellent tennis courts . . . crystal-clear lake waters and heated resort pools for aquatic pleasures — swimming, sailing, water-skiing and thoroughbred racing. Fishermen will revel in the 90 lakes and ponds and 274 trout streams dotting the majestic landscape . . . and hunters in the bounty of partridge, pheasant and deer. For the horsemen there are miles of country roads and trails through peaceful valleys and lazy mountains. The camping family will find hundreds of wooded lakeside campsites, many with secluded beaches and boat landings. And for the gift and antique shopper the Berkshires abound in intriguing gift and antique shops.

Skiing ranks as the most exciting of the winter sports in the Berkshires. More than 20 areas, and literally hundreds of trails with miles and miles of downhill skiing offer a wide challenge on carefully groomed mountain sides. Truly fine lift facilities include chairlifts, T-bars, J-bars, Poma lifts and rope tows, eliminate the wasting of precious time in line. Snow-making equipment assures good skiing, weather or not, in this, the largest snow making region in the country. Beginner, refresher or perfectionist will find the most up-to-date ski instruction available.

Tobogganing, sleigh-riding, outstanding indoor and outdoor skating, snow-mobiling, dog sled racing . . . these are but a few of the activities which the Berkshires offer for those who enjoy a varied Winter program. Mt. Greylock, Mt. Everett, Monument Mountain and the northern end of the famous Mohawk Trail unfold views of incomparable scenic beauty the year 'round. But in Autumn the countryside ignites in a blaze of fiery red, brilliant orange and flaming bronze and gold, painting a spectacle unsurpassed by any. Interwoven with the fascinating scenic, cultural and historic attractions, numberless fine restaurants, country inns, modern hotels and fascinating resorts point up the versatility of the Berkshires. Ingenuity and warm hospitality abound everywhere, from small cosy, inexpensive inns to deluxe motels to gay and exciting resorts.

Part of the Berkshires' heritage are the historic shrines . . . birthplaces and homes of famous Americans such as Herman Melville's Arrowhead, where he wrote "Moby Dick." Artist Norman Rockwell chose the Berkshires for his home and studio because the authentic old New England atmosphere still prevails. Quiet towns, still dressed in their village greens and embellished by old Colonial homes and country churches, take one back to a peaceful and historic era.

These are only a few of the things which contribute to the fascinating heritage the Berkshires proudly offer its visitors.

Berkshires Scene

...U.S. 44) is your st... Drive northwest ... Hartford and Ay...

20m. NEW ...

Some of ... scenery ... and c... here, ...

...ATED. Turn north ... 12 miles to . . .

...NEW BOSTON. Tolland ...rs almost 3,000 acres ...een the Farmington River ... and Otis Reservoir. Continue north across the Massachusetts Turnpike, Nearby, on U.S. 20, at Jacob's Pillow is Ted Shawn's ...famous School of the Dance, ...

...ORD. ...'s finest ...darkhamsted ...reservoirs ...on U.S. 44 to . . .

...ing trail. ...you to sp... ...on sometim...

...START. Albar...

...U.S. 20 is ...community f... ...city's public library, ...man Melville Memo... containing a group of ...books and personal be... ...of the author of Moby Dic... ...lived in Pittsfield from 18... ...1863. From Pittsfield, turn so... ...Music to Route 7A, and . . .

...89m. LENOX, a popular Berkshires retreat for over a century. The Pleasant Valley Wildlife Sanctuary shows flora and fauna. ...Berkshire ...Southwest of Lenox on Route 183 lies Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. You will see a replica of the cottage where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived while he wrote The House of the Seven Gables. The Hemlock Gardens are favored picnic spots before and after Berkshire Music Festival concerts given in the great Music Shed. Return to Lenox and ...Brook. The ...age, 5 miles ...

...Fo... ...and swimm...

...the Berkshire At...

SUNDAY NEWS
MAIN TOWN'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849

MAY 18 1969

Azaleas Due to Brighten Berkshires

Pittsfield, Mass. (Special)—Music fills the Berkshire air every summer, via the famed Music Festival at Tanglewood and the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival. As a prelude to the music and dance presentations, floral beauty is expected to dominate the scene from Memorial Day to mid-June, the usual blooming period for the striking azalea display at the 4,000-acre Pittsfield State Forest, centered around 11-acre Berry Pond on Berry Mountain.

Both pond and mountain are named after William Berry, a Revolutionary War soldier who ditinguished himself in the Battle of Bennington. He received the tract of land for his services.

Azaleas Tower

The tract includes 100 acres on the summit of the ...conic Range, and it is ...t Berry him- ...self p... ...believed ... first ...azalea ...bushes ... ...d two ... to 1... ...

...IAN 19 1969

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

... Oak 'N Spr... ...th Lee designed its ... ...e slope with rope tow ...he "Social Skier."

Across from Tanglewood where strains of music performed by Boston's Symphony Orchestra fill the air all Summer, the screams of delight from happy skiers, toboganners and ice skaters at Avaloch Inn take over the rarified air of Lenox for the Winter season.

Nearby at Eastover, ... formal resort for yo... ..." more Ber...

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(M)152,525 (S) 198,160

JUN 22 1969

New England Newsclip

4

Dream Of A New Beauty Around Blossom Center

NX

By ELEANOR JOHNSTON
Beacon Journal Club Writer

PICTURE if you can the rising slopes on either side of Blossom Music Center all terraced and lined with trees, fitted out with special lighting effects to set off the whole scene at nighttime . . .

. . . At the rear of the backstage facilities—which include dressing rooms and rehearsal halls—a man-made lake fronts the patio where stage personalities and orchestra personnel relax between rehearsals . . .

. . . In the ravine up over the left slope from Blossom Center proper is Kent State University's Outdoor Theater, seating 400 persons . . .

THESE ARE the initial plans and dreams for landscaping Blossom Music Center which were presented Monday by Mrs. Dudley Blossom Jr., head of the Center's landscape committee, and Architect Peter van Dijk who designed the center.

They sketched the plans for members of Akron Garden Club during a luncheon at the new outdoor restaurant and a grand tour of the Center.

"All we need is the money," Mrs. Blossom told the 70 garden club members.

"It's like building a new house," she added. "You can only do so much each year, but we can plan and dream."

TALKED THEIR WAY THROUGH THE LUNCHEON LINE AT BLOSSOM . . . Mrs. John T. Callahan, Mrs. George Lewis

THE "RAILROAD" cars used for concert transportation took garden club members to the shell-like Music Center. They were taken backstage and across a connecting ramp to the dressing rooms, then down three flights of concrete stairs to a huge rehearsal hall.

There, Mr. van Dijk showed color films of other music centers scattered throughout the U. S., such as the Hollywood Bowl, Tanglewood (home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra), Garden State Pavillion (on the Garden State Parkway in New Jersey), Meadowbrook (near Detroit), Saratoga Pavillion in New York, (home of the New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra).

"We toured each of these centers," Mr. van Dijk said, "concentrating on the good and bad points of each, even before the plans for Blossom were on the drawing board."

REMINISCING, Mr. van Dijk said working with George Szell, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, on initial plans for the center was rough.

"He's a perfectionist," the architect added, "difficult and demanding. But he knows his stuff. And his insistence that this Music Center be as perfect as it could be was good for all of us."

Mr. van Dijk said during his discussion of the various centers, that Mr. Szell did not concern himself with looks but with acoustics.

"Hence," he added, "it was a collaborative venture of architecture and acoustics."

Mr. van Dijk said the Hollywood Bowl is terrible from an acoustical standpoint, with the sounds disappearing before reaching the audience.

"THE BUILDING at Tanglewood," he observed, "is handsome, restful. It is what we wanted to initiate at Blossom. Something that would last a long time."

Mr. van Dijk said one of the main drawbacks at Saratoga is that when entering the grounds, first glimpse is the back of the building where all kinds of delivery trucks are parked and this is wrong.

"It's like meeting a person for the first time," he went on. "and that first impression counts. How much better it would be driving up to the front of a beautiful entrance."

At our table during the luncheon was Mrs. Elton Schulenberg, the club's corresponding secretary and wife of the retired vice president of Firestone, bundled up in her raincoat.

NEXT TO HER was Mrs. E. B. Hathaway, recording secretary of the club and wife of the president of Firestone, in a chic black and white checked suit. Mr. van Dijk had to admit the weather was a bit on the cool side to be eating in an outdoor restaurant.

Mrs. C. C. Gibson, program vice chairman and Mrs. J. L. Sewell, past president and club historian, were on my side of the table.

Mrs. John S. Knight, in a pretty blue suit, was across the aisle with a party of five.

Barbara Kuhlke sat with Mrs. Blossom and Mrs. Ward Keener and later made her farewell speech as the club's president. Come Fall, Mrs. Fred Heslop takes over.

Entering the restaurant, the main topic for everyone was the centerpiece of fresh fruits and vegetables made by Mrs. J. G. Stoller and Mrs. S. D. Stanson.

It was topped with a gold music bar, with tiny red tomatoes for the notes.

AKRON BEACON JOURNAL
AKRON, O.
M & SUN. - CIRC. 189
11-24-69

In Brief . . .

When a program is billed as including piano, jug band, film projectors and sound systems, music buffs might expect an off-season Tanglewood offering in the Contemporary Trends series. The fact that it's a free lecture at Williams College tomorrow night on "Glass" makes it all the more intriguing, especially since the lecturer, a molecular biologist, considers that pleasure helps inspire learning . . . Tanglewood itself is the direct inspiration for the Blossom Music Center, detailed in a Saturday article on the Cleveland Orchestra's new summer facility in Ohio. At least this one of the imitators is far enough from the Berkshires so that box-office impact can be discounted . . . The Berkshire bid to allow counties to keep 75 per cent of the revenues from state excise stamps on deeds, put into a bill by Rep. Kitterman, raises some interesting questions, starting with whether the tax doesn't represent more nuisance than revenue. A logical overhaul might eliminate the stamps and let counties raise their deed-filing fees enough to pay recording expenses . . . We hope that complaint of Eagle Eye Tague's about drunken snowmobilers careening around the country at night isn't the tipoff for a long, chilling winter. Even with the operators sober, snowmobiles already have amassed a sizable quota of protests from land owners who see their terrain exposed as never before.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
NOV 18 1968
New England

Notes and Footnotes

shows this winter in Williamstown, Vt. Who says the theatre is dead? . . . Taking a tip perhaps from Tanglewood, which is running bus tours for music fans from the eastern part of the state, we see that the Saratoga Performing Arts Center will sponsor buses from the New York Port Authority bus terminal direct to the amphitheatre during their season, July 3 through Aug. 24. Fare includes a ticket to the performance . . . From the New Lebanon Echo comes comment that, when suc-

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUN 25 1969

Northeast's World of Culture

Some of finest music festivals within short drive

There are more than 100 summer music festivals in the United States, and some of the finest are within a short drive of Saratoga Springs.

Tanglewood offers the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its Berkshire festival in July and August, plus two appearances by the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

This year, musical director Erich Leinsdorf has scheduled all-Bach, all-Beethoven and all-Mozart programs for the Boston Symphony.

The Tanglewood season will open July 4 with Mozart's Symphony No. 29 and Piano Concerto in C.

Arthur Fiedler and the popular Boston Pops will make their appearance at the festival in Lenox, Massachusetts, on Aug. 30 and 31.

At Marlboro Music festival, in Marlboro, Vt., near Brattleboro, the famed cellist Pable Casals will conduct the festival orchestra.

This festival begins July 5 and is held every weekend until Aug. 17.

This summer it features works of contemporary composers Luigi Dallapiccola, Leon Kirchner, and Michael Reisman. A performance of Bach cantatas will be conducted by Blanche Honegger-Moyse.

New in Lake George this summer will be the addition of a summer stock company, as the Riverbend Players establish their summer residence at the Towers Hall.

This historic hall has been renovated to include a 400-seat auditorium with an arena stage. The hall, located at the southern tip of the lake, commands an excellent view of the lake.

Offered this summer will be Neil Simon's "Star Spangled Girl" and Robert Anderson's "You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running." This is the company's second season of full-scale production.

Lake George also offers the Lake George Opera Festival, the only permanent summer opera festival in the east. The five-week season begins July 14 and offers five comedy operas — Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos," Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," Puccini's "Gianni Schicchi," Ravel's "L'Heure Espagnol" and Britten's "Albert Herring."

In New Marlboro, Mass., farther south of Lenox and the Tanglewood festival, the New Marlboro Chamber Players will give seven concerts of chamber music beginning July 12.

The Adirondack-Champlain Festival is a traveling music festival. In its July-September season, it offers over 40 events at four different locations — Schroon Lake, Blue Lake Mountain, Saranac Lake and Plattsburg.

This festival offers chamber music, recitals, a symphony orchestra, folk music and dance.

The Southern Vermont Art Center in Manchester is in its 40th season, and one of the highlights of the summer is the July 27 appearance of the Berkshire Boys Choir. This choir, which will also appear at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center this Summer, has been acclaimed by critics as the best boy choir in the country.

Other events will be opera, a troupe of Spanish dancers, a baroque music concert, and the Vermont State Symphony Orchestra.

The festival offers Sunday matinee and evening performances from July 6 through Aug. 31. There is also a series of exhibitions of paintings and sculpture from May 30 to Oct. 12.

At Lake Placid, the Lake Placid Music Festival will present concerts of chamber music from July 29 to Aug. 26.

WITH LAKE GEORGE FESTIVAL—Patricia Brooks, the soprano, will be among Metropolitan Opera Company artists who will appear at the Lake George Opera Festival this summer. The season begins on July 14 at the Queensbury Theater in Glens Falls.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.
SARATOGIAN
D. 10,500
JUN 23 1969

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Thursday, May 22, 1969

Leinsdorf Tops At Tanglewood

I am continually surprised by having people say to me: "I have never been to Tanglewood," implying that they have set up a defense mechanism against the three "Bs": Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, plus an "M" for Mozart. I confess that some of the modern composers leave me baffled and cold when the Boston Symphony or any other symphonic group sneaks in one of those dissonant works as a kind of musical guinea pig for future generations. The youngsters eat these up, but the box hooders, the "Proper Bostonians" are conspicuous by their absence. Brahms is a "must' for the Cabots and Lodges.

Here, virtually in our own back yard is one of the finest musical festivals in the world each summer which bring to the Berkshires, music lovers from every state in the Union, Mexico and Canada, and has been doing so with annual cumulative audiences which began in the horse ring of the Hanna Farms back in 1934. Succeeding conductors have been Serge Koussevitzky, Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf.

The original audience of some 1,800 persons has grown to the understandable Sunday afternoon concert total of some 14,000 if the weather is propitious: 6,000 in the shed and 8,000 on the beautiful lawns outside. One of the most heartening things about the Tanglewood concerts is the great number of young people, armed with scores, blankets and raincoats who defy the elements, much as Beethoven pictured them during his Pastoral Symphony.

However, Maestro Leinsdorf, fully aware that there are "squares" and "rounds" among the vast throng of listeners, who only need exposition to the best music—the late Walter Damrosch said that "popular music is merely familiar music"—has arranged a rich program for the season of 1969, the listing of which appeared in Sunday's Times-Union of May 4th issuance.

Visitors are invited to bring box luncheons to be eaten on the lawns prior to the concerts under the many beautiful trees which adorn the estate or to patronize the cafeteria tent on the gorunds. The 1969 season starts July 4 and continues through Aug. 24. Further information and tickets are available by mail from the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall Boston, Mass.

It is a matter of deep regret to me that Mr. Leinsdorf is severing his connection with the orchestra this year. My first experience with the Bostonians was a concert in New York under the direction of Karl Muck. That was just prior to World War I. My humble opinion is that Mr. Leinsdorf has brought the orchestra to such a present peak of perfection that will be very difficult for his successor to match. Like a good ball team, it takes months and even years for the members to become amalgamated into championship form. A small man, physicall, Mr. Leinsdorf, is a giant musically when he takes his stance on the Tanglewood posium. His articulate hands and fingers spell out in advance the nuances which the conductor will obtain from his orchestra, and communicates to his listening audiences. I am very grateful to Mr. Leinsdorf for the many magnificent moments of music he has provided for me and countless thousands of other music lovers.

Berkshires Offering Visitors Big Choice Of Summer Events

PITTSFIELD — Summer visitors to the Berkshires will find a wide choice of entertainment and cultural events from music to theaters, museums to art galleries.

Biggest Attration

Biggest attraction in the region is the Berkshire Music festival at Tanglewood. Known as the summer home of the Boston Symphony, Tanglewood attracted more than 220,000 last year. This year the management will extend the traditional eight-week season by presenting a ninth week program Aug. 30-31, with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

In addition to the ninth week program, Fiedler will present the traditional annual Pops concert August 5 for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

Also expanded this year will be the Contemporary Trends program that was launched last year featuring folk, jazz and rock music. Initially there were three programs, but the project proved so popular that five concerts are scheduled for this season. They will be on consecutive Tuesdays, starting July 8.

Bus Service

Sponsored this year for the first time by the Tanglewood management will be bus excursion service for people without cars, or those who prefer not to drive to the concerts. Vehicles will leave from Boston, Worcester, Natick and Springfield, scheduled to arrive at Tanglewood one hour before all concerts, both matinee and evenings, and starting the return trip 30 minutes after the concert closes.

On August 24, Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct his final program previous to his retirement from his post. He will close with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony which is traditional for conductors about to retire from the orchestra.

Dance Programs

Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, located near Lee, embarks on its 37th year, offering programs of classical ballet, ethnic and modern dance works. Founder-Director Ted Shawn announces a 10 week season starting June 26 when the Boston Ballet with guest stars will appear at the Ted Shawn Theatre. During the season, Shawn will present outstanding performers that include Maria Alba and her Spanish dance company, stars from the American Ballet Theatre.

For the final program August 28, 29, and 30, the leading American ballet dancer Edward Villella will be seen, with partner Patricia McBride.

New this season is the David McLain Dance Theatre that will present a week of ballet from July 2 through 6, at Beaupre School in Stockbridge. The company consists of 13 young performers, trained by Mr. McLain who is chairman of the dance department at Cincinnati College Conservatory of Music.

In Williamstown the multimillion-dollar Clark Art Institute this summer for the first time provides the Acoustiguide system for visitors. This is an electronic device about the size of a camera, and is carried by a shoulder strap. It contains a tape recorded description of certain of the hundreds of pictures that hang in the galleries and which are identified by numbers to correspond to the recording. The device has a small earpiece so the visitor alone hears the descriptions, and it may be turned on or off as he wishes.

Daily Tours

Visitors at the Clark Institute also will find this summer for the first time daily conducted tours of the building. These take place every day at 3 p. m., and require about an hour. There is no charge for visiting the museum nor for the tours. A small fee, however, is required for use of the Acoustiguide.

Thirty master drawings are on exhibit all summer at the representing masters from eight representing masters from eight countries, and rang e fromthe year 1503 with a drawing by Durer, to Toulouse-Lautrec in 1899. Most of the drawings weren't originally inteded for public viewing, but were working drawings for paintings.

In Stockbridge, the Berkshire Theatre Festival opens its fourth season with a new play by the noted playwright William Gibson entitled "John and Abigail." It deals with the life of John Adams and his wife Abigail from 177 4through 1778. Anne Bancroft who will play the role of Abigail,also ha starred in three other plays by Gibson; Miracle Worker," and fEAOII "Two for the Seesaw," "The Miracle Worker," and "A Cry of Players." Gibson has drawn of Players." Gibson has drawn from letters written by the Adamses for his play script. The Adamses also figure in the award-winning hit show "1776," now running on Broadway.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

MAY 18 1969

Leinsdorf to Close Career At Final Berkshire Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

It comes as no surprise that Erich Leinsdorf has selected Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with which to end his seven-year tenure as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Beethoven Ninth, coupled with Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" will close the 1969 Barkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood on Sunday, Aug. 24, at 2:30 p.m.

One of the greatest ovations in Tanglewood history was given the late Charles Munch when he conducted Beethoven's Ninth in 1962. It was his final appearance as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Storm of Applause

An audience of over 12,000 rewarded Munch's 13 years of service to the orchestra with a storm of applause that lasted for ten solid minutes.

Leinsdorf has availed himself of resources for a great performance. His soloists will be Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor; Justino Diaz, bass. His chorus will likely be the combined forces of the Tanglewood singers and those of the Berkshire Music Center

The 1969 Berkshire Festival will follow the same format as recent years. There will be eight weekends beginning July 4 and ending Aug. 24.

Regular concerts will be Friday at 9 p.m. (with a "Weekend Prelude" at 7 p.m.), Saturdays at 8 p.m., and Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

First two weekends will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5 and 6.

Festival Highlights

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the festival. On July 12, Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio," and on July 26, Verdi's "Otello" will be given in concert form.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

Lesser-known as well as noted personalities have been invited to appear as guest conductors. The list includes David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, New Jersey Symphony; Georges Pretre of France; Josef Krips, San Francisco Symphony; Pierre Boulez of France; Daniel Barenboim of Israel; Karel Ancerl, Toronto Symphony; and Charles Wil- Boston Symphony.

Among the soloists are Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, violinists; Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager, pianists; soprano Marilyn Horne; and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

New weekend and day tours plus bus shuttle service to Tanglewood will be instituted from Boston and several other New England cities.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,892

JAN 26 1969

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

JAN 16 1969

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 58,446

JAN 26 1969

Tanglewood Program Announced for 1969

That the Boston Symphony Orchestra is well-organized group is evident in the fact that its programs for next summer at Tanglewood have just been announced — almost six months before the annual festivities.

The programs will begin on July 4, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, with the young German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, making his Tanglewood debut. Concerts will be played each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 through Aug. 24. On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9," with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander, and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's " A Survivor from Warsaw."

During the first two weekends of concerts, the emphasis will be on Mozart, and during this period pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will appear as soloists.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival. On July 12, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio," with Miss Sills, soprano Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena, and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, he will conduct Verdi's "Otello," with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska, and baritone Sherrill Milnes. On July 18, Mr. Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka "Piano Concerto No. 1," repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November when the concerto was again performed by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest conductors for the Tanglewood season are the following: David Zinman, conductor of The Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony; renowned French conductor Georges Pretre; Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony.

Among the soloists not already mentioned will be violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn, and Malcolm Frager (who recently appeared here in the Greater New Bedford Concert Series); soprano Marilyn Horne, and the inordinately attractive cellist, Jacqueline du Pre.

Arthur Fiedler (who conducted the New Bedford Symphony's Pops Concert in October at Lincoln Park) will return to Tanglewood on Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra — a concert for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund.

1969 Festival At Tanglewood Starts July 4

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox) will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

German's Debut

The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist. Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p. m. Saturday at 8 p. m. and Sunday afternoons at 2.30 through Aug. 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend prelude at 7 p. m.

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra. Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contra lto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenbergs 'A Survivor from Warsaw'.

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber - sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the orchestra.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival. On July 12, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's 'The Abduction from the Seraglio' with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass - baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's 'Otello' with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes as soloists.

Piano Concerto

On July 18, Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1, repeating their much - acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed again by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony: French conductor GeorgesPret re; Joseph Krips conductor of the San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct on July 25.

Other soloists include; violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Orchestra; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy; Van Cliburn, and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne; and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Arthur Fiedler will return to Tanglewood on Aug. 5 for his traditonal appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The 27th session of Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study, will be held from June 29 to Aug. 9. Opening exercises for the music center will be held on June 29, with Erich Leinsdorf delivering the opening address. Tanglewood - on - Parade, a series of concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center culminating with an evening gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, will be held on Aug. 19. The highly successful Comtemporary Trends concerts will be repeated this year.

New weekend and day tours, plus bus shuttle service to Tanglewood, will be instituted from Boston and several other New England cities.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 23 1969

Orchestra Plans Berkshire Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood with a concert on July 4 conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony on August 24 as his final concert as its music director.

The Tanglewood summer schedule will include concerts on Friday evenings at 9 p.m., Saturday evenings at 8 p.m., and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 p.m. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by a "weekend prelude" at 7 p.m.

STATEN ISLAND ADVANCE
Sunday, January 26, 1969

Auxiliary of museum to meet

A color film, "Music under the Trees," recalling the Boston Symphony's concerts at the Tanglewood (Mass.) Festival, will be shown at Wednesday's meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Staten Island Museum at 1:30 p.m. in the St. George museum.

The program, originally scheduled, has been postponed because of a business commitment by the speaker, Frank Sweeney Jr., of Emerson Hill.

A veteran of Vietnam, he was to have

JAMESTOWN POST JOURNAL
Friday, January 24, 1969

NO. TONAWANDA NEWS
Saturday, January 18, 1969

Concert Series To Start July 4

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Arthur Fiedler will return to Tanglewood Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

Alb. Knickerbocker News
Monday, January 20, 1969

KINGSTON FREEMAN
Saturday, January 25, 1969

Drawing Power Of Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by Eric Leinsdorf.

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Arthur Fiedler will return to Tanglewood Aug. 5 for this traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

When the 1968 Berkshire Festival ended, over 225,000 people had come to Tanglewood for the 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, open rehearsals and special events. That season marked the 31st Berkshire Festival and the 27th season of the Berkshire music Center, and it also marked a major innovation in programming. For the first time, Contemporary Trends Concerts brought jazz, folk music, music of India, and rock to Tanglewood.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TEMPO
TWICE MONTHLY CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 25 1969

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., JANUARY 26, 1969

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750
JAN 26 1969 New England

1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Opens on July 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist. Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m, Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 p.m. through Aug. 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

Final Concert

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the orchestra.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival. On July 12, Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes as soloists.

Much-Acclaimed Performance

On July 18, Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano concerto no. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed again by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony; renowned French conductor George Pretre; Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karen Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, Orchestra, will conduct on July 25.

Other soloists include; violinists Pinchas Zucherman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Orchestra; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn ,and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne; and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Boston Pops

Arthur Fielder will return to Tanglewood on Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study, will be held from June 29 to Aug. 24. Opening exercises for the Music Center will be held on Sunday afternoon, June 29 with Erich Leinsdorf delivering the opening address. Tanglewood-on-Parade, a day of concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center culminating with an evening gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, will be held on Aug. 19. The highly successful Contemporary Trends concerts will be repeated this year.

New weekend and day tours plus bus shuttle service to Tanglewood will be instituted from Boston and several other New England cities. Complete program and ticket information will be available on April 1 from the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN. 129,006
JAN 17 1969

1969 Tanglewood Program Listed

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by director Erich Leinsdorf.

German's Debut

The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tangelwood debut that evening as soloist. Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 through Aug. 24. The Friday concerts will be preceded by the weekend prelude at 7.

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw."

Chamber Group

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5 and 6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the BSO.

Two performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival. On July 12, Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction" from the "Seraglio" with sopranos Miss Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes, soloists.

Piano Concerto

On July 18, the director and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, New Jersey Symphony; French conductor Georges Pretre; Josef Krips, San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct July 25.

Other soloists include: violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne; and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Arthur Fiedler will return to Tanglewood on Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The 27th session of Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study, will be held from June 29 to Aug. 24. Opening exercises for the music center will be held June 29, with Leinsdorf delivering the opening address. Tanglewood-on-Parade, a day of concerts by members of Berkshire Music Center culminating with an evening Gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Music Center orchestras, will be held Aug. 19. The Contemporary Trends concerts will be repeated this year.

New weekend and day tours, plus bus shuttle service to Tanglewood, will be instituted from Boston and several other New England cities.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JAN 16 1969

REFORMER &
VERMONT PHOENIX (e)
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
CIRC. 7,950
JAN 23 1969 New England

sight and sound

BSO Festival Program Is Inviting

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

There are four news events attracting my attention at the moment. I wonder if I can deal with each in three paragraphs each.

Several names of special interest have been scheduled by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to appear during the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer; to wit, Gilels, Ashkenazy, Pretre, Boulez, Barenboim, du Pre, Sills (also others, like Van Cliburn).

Gilels and Ashkenazy are first-class Russian pianists; Pretre and Boulez are ascending French conductors; Barenboim is one of the world's leading young pianists who is causing an important flurry as a conductor and du Pre is his wife, who is causing an important flurry as a cellist; Sills is Beverly Sills, my favorite soprano last year . . . maybe this year, too.

Special events include concert performances of two operas: Verdi's "Otello" and Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" and a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 at Leinsdorf's final appearance as music director of the orchestra, Aug. 24 (also conducted by Charles Munch at his final appearance as director).

* * *

In the mails the last few days has been a rather plaintive letter from the Junior League to its subscribers to its concert series — addressed "Dear Friend of the Musical Community."

It thanks them for support over the last 35 years, notes that its final concert (Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 12) "is facing a sizeable deficit" and invites them to be patrons of the concert.

Cleveland's orchestra is generally considered by music lovers to be one of the five best orchestras in the country and is the beneficiary of the unmodified assertion by a music critic of international standing that it is the best orchestra in the world. It's embarrassing to consider the possibility that there might not be 3000 people in this neighborhood eager to hear and see this great orchestra.

* * *

Of the $90,000 it takes to operate the noncommercial, educational FM radio transmitter in Amherst, WFCR, $65,000 comes from the University of Massachusetts, $15,000 from the other three participating colleges, Amherst, Mount Holyoke and Smith, and $10,000 from contributions.

Last November the station didn't have the $10,000 and planned to reduce its service to its loyal fans. Last week, after several weeks of appeal, it needed only about $1000 to meet the budget.

Hundreds of listeners have given small amounts and it is beginning to appear that those gentle souls who would rather be awakened by Bach from their bedside radios than by wailing amplified guitars have been given a year's reprieve.

* * *

The 37th annual poll conducted by the Motion Picture Herald among the people who show movies confirms the oft repeated claim that Sidney Poitier is a big star. The poll shows that he was the No. 1 draw at the box office in 1968.

Some of the others in the first 10 are not surprises: Paul Newman, 2; Julie Andrews, 3; John Wayne, 4; Dean Martin, 5; Steve McQueen, 7; Jack Lemmon, 8; Lee Marvin, 9; Elizabeth Taylor, 10.

Number 5, Clint Eastwood, star of the "Dollar" westerns made in Italy, is a surprise to see in the top 10, but not, of course, John Wayne, there for the 19th time, a record.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
JAN 17 1969 New England

Boston Symphony Lists '69 Tanglewood Schedule

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the Orchestra's Music Director Erich Leinsdorf.

The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist. Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2.30 p.m. through August 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as Music Director of the orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's 'A Survivor from Warsaw.'

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Mr. Eschenbach, pianists, John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the orchestra.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival. On July 12, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's 'The Abduction from the Seraglio' with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's 'Otello' with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes as soloists.

On July 18, Mr. Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed again by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest Conductors

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Mr. Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony; renowned French conductor Georges Pretre; Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct on July 25.

Other soloists includes; violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Orchestra; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn, and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne; and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Arthur Fiedler will return to Tanglewood on Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500
JAN 20 1969 New England

Berkshire Festival Opens Season July 4

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist.

Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. through Aug. 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

SUNDAY POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 82,450
JAN 19 1969 New England

Tanglewood Lists Season

Leinsdorf to Bow Out In Beethoven's Ninth

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in his last performance as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf's resignation becomes effective following the Sunday afternoon concert, August 24, which closes the 1969 Tanglewood season.

Soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz will join the orchestra and Tanglewood Chorus for this performance.

The eight-week music festival opens at Lenox, Mass. on Friday, July 4, with an all-Mozart program. German pianist Christoph Eschebach will make his Tanglewood debut at soloist.

According to custom, the concerts of the first two weekends will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. Two operas will be given in concert form during the season. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Scaglio" July 12 with Beverly Sills, Anne Elgar, George Shirley and Jerold Siena. On July 26 he will conduct Verdi's "Otello" with Richard Cassilly, Maralin Niska and Sherrill Miles.

Guest conductors expected to participate in the festival are: David Zinman of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, Henry Lewis of the New Jersey Symphony, George Pretre, Josef Krips of the San Francisco Symphony, Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim and Karel Amcerl of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the BSO, is also scheduled to conduct one concert.

Among the soloists to perform are pianists Malcolm Frager, Van Cliburn, Vladimir Ashkenazy and Emil Gilels; violinists Pinchas Zuckman and Joseph Silverstein, soprano Marilyn Horne and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct his annual Boston Pops at Tanglewood concert on August 5 and Tanglewood-On-Parade is scheduled for August 19. The Contemporary Trends concerts, featuring popular music, will also be continued this season, as well as the Weekend Preludes at 7:00 p.m. on Friday's.

The complete program and ticket information will be available as of April 1 from the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750
JAN 26 1969 New England

1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood Opens on July 4

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist. Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m, Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 p.m. through Aug. 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

Final Concert

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the orchestra.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival. On July 12, Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes as soloists.

Much-Acclaimed Performance

On July 18, Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano concerto no. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed again by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony; renowned French conductor George Pretre; Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karen Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, Orchestra, will conduct on July 25.

Other soloists include; violinists Pinchas Zucherman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Orchestra; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn ,and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne; and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Boston Pops

Arthur Fielder will return to Tanglewood on Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study, will be held from June 29 to Aug. 24. Opening exercises for the Music Center will be held on Sunday afternoon, June 29 with Erich Leinsdorf delivering the opening address. Tanglewood-on-Parade, a day of concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center culminating with an evening gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, will be held on Aug. 19. The highly successful Contemporary Trends concerts will be repeated this year.

New weekend and day tours plus bus shuttle service to Tanglewood will be instituted from Boston and several other New England cities. Complete program and ticket information will be available on April 1 from the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 68,913 SUN 129,006
JAN 17 1969

1969 Tanglewood Program Listed

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by director Erich Leinsdorf.

German's Debut

The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tangelwood debut that evening as soloist. Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 through Aug. 24. The Friday concerts will be preceded by the weekend prelude at 7.

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw."

Chamber Group

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5 and 6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the BSO.

Two performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival. On July 12, Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction" from the "Seraglio" with sopranos Miss Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes, soloists.

Piano Concerto

On July 18, the director and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, New Jersey Symphony; French conductor Georges Pretre; Josef Krips, San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct July 25.

Other soloists include: violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the BSO; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne; and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Arthur Fiedler will return to Tanglewood on Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The 27th session of Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study, will be held from June 29 to Aug. 24. Opening exercises for the music center will be held June 29, with Leinsdorf delivering the opening address. Tanglewood-on-Parade, a day of concerts by members of Berkshire Music Center culminating with an evening Gala concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Music Center orchestras, will be held Aug. 19. The Contemporary Trends concerts will be repeated this year.

New weekend and day tours, plus bus shuttle service to Tanglewood, will be instituted from Boston and several other New England cities.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900
JAN 16 1969

REFORMER &
VERMONT PHOENIX (e)
BRATTLEBORO, VT.
CIRC. 7,950
JAN 23 1969 New England

sight and sound

BSO Festival Program Is Inviting

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

There are four news events attracting my attention at the moment. I wonder if I can deal with each in three paragraphs each.

Several names of special interest have been scheduled by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to appear during the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood next summer; to wit, Gilels, Ashkenazy, Pretre, Boulez, Barenboim, du Pre, Sills (also others, like Van Cliburn).

Gilels and Ashkenazy are first-class Russian pianists; Pretre and Boulez are ascending French conductors; Barenboim is one of the world's leading young pianists who is causing an important flurry as a conductor and du Pre is his wife, who is causing an important flurry as a cellist; Sills is Beverly Sills, my favorite soprano last year . . . maybe this year, too.

Special events include concert performances of two operas: Verdi's "Otello" and Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" and a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 at Leinsdorf's final appearance as music director of the orchestra, Aug. 24 (also conducted by Charles Munch at his final appearance as director).

* * *

In the mails the last few days has been a rather plaintive letter from the Junior League to its subscribers to its concert series -- addressed "Dear Friend of the Musical Community."

It thanks them for support over the last 35 years, notes that its final concert (Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 12) "is facing a sizeable deficit" and invites them to be patrons of the concert.

Cleveland's orchestra is generally considered by music lovers to be one of the five best orchestras in the country and is the beneficiary of the unmodified assertion by a music critic of international standing that it is the best orchestra in the world. It's embarrassing to consider the possibility that there might not be 3000 people in this neighborhood eager to hear and see this great orchestra.

* * *

Of the $80,000 it takes to operate the noncommercial, educational FM radio transmitter in Amherst, WFCR, $65,000 comes from the University of Massachusetts, $15,000 from the other three participating colleges, Amherst, Mount Holyoke and Smith, and $10,000 from contributions.

Last November the station didn't have the $10,000 and planned to reduce its service to its loyal fans. Last week, after several weeks of appeal, it needed only about $1000 to meet the budget.

Hundreds of listeners have given small amounts and it is beginning to appear that those gentle souls who would rather be awakened by Bach from their bedside radios than by wailing amplified guitars have been given a year's reprieve.

* * *

The 37th annual poll conducted by the Motion Picture Herald among the people who show movies confirms the oft-repeated claim that Sidney Poitier is a big star. The poll shows that he was the No. 1 draw at the box office in 1968.

Some of the others in the first 10 are not surprises: Paul Newman, 2; Julie Andrews, 3; John Wayne, 4; Dean Martin, 5; Steve McQueen, 7; Jack Lemmon, 8; Lee Marvin, 9; Elizabeth Taylor, 10.

Number 5, Clint Eastwood, star of the "Dollar" westerns made in Italy, is a surprise to see in the top 10, but not, of course, John Wayne, there for the 19th time, a record.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
JAN 17 1969 New England

Tanglewood Lists Season

Leinsdorf to Bow Out In Beethoven's Ninth

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in his last performance as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leinsdorf's resignation becomes effective following the Sunday afternoon concert, August 24, which closes the 1969 Tanglewood season.

Soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz will join the orchestra and Tanglewood Chorus for this performance.

The eight-week music festival opens at Lenox, Mass. on Friday, July 4, with an all-Mozart program. German pianist Christoph Eschebach will make his Tanglewood debut at soloist.

According to custom, the concerts of the first two weekends will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. Two operas will be given in concert form during the season. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Scaglio" July 12 with Beverly Sills, Anne Elgar, George Shirley and Jerold Siena. On July 26 he will conduct Verdi's "Otello" with Richard Cassilly, Maralin Niska and Sherrill Miles.

Guest conductors expected to participate in the festival are: David Zinman of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, Henry Lewis of the New Jersey Symphony, George Pretre, Josef Krips of the San Francisco Symphony, Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim and Karel Amcerl of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the BSO, is also scheduled to conduct one concert.

Among the soloists to perform are pianists Malcolm Frager, Van Cliburn, Vladimir Ashkenazy and Emil Gilels; violinists Pinchas Zuckman and Joseph Silverstein, soprano Marilyn Horne and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct his annual Boston Pops at Tanglewood concert on August 5 and Tanglewood-On-Parade is scheduled for August 19. The Contemporary Trends concerts, featuring popular music, will also be continued this season, as well as the Weekend Preludes at 7:00 p.m. on Friday's.

The complete program and ticket information will be available as of April 1 from the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

Boston Symphony Lists '69 Tanglewood Schedule

The Boston Svymphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the Orchestra's Music Director Erich Leinsdorf.

The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist. Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2.30 p.m. through August 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as Music Director of the orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's 'A Survivor from Warsaw.'

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Mr. Eschenbach, pianists, John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the orchestra.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival. On July 12, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's 'The Abduction from the Seraglio' with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's 'Otello' with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes as soloists.

On July 18, Mr. Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed again by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest Conductors

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Mr. Leinsdorf include; David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony; renowned French conductor Georges Pretre; Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct on July 25.

Other soloists includes; violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Orchestra; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn, and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne; and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Arthur Fiedler will return to Tanglewood on Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500
JAN 20 1969 New England

Berkshire Festival Opens Season July 4

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist.

Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. through Aug. 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

SUNDAY POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 82,450
JAN 19 1969 New England

Leinsdorf to conclude with Beethoven's 9th

Two concert performances of Mozart and Verdi operas are scheduled for the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. The eight-week season opens on July 4 and closes Aug. 24. The final concert will feature Schoenberg's "Survivor from Warsaw" and the Beethoven Ninth.

The Boston Symphony's Summer music festival will have several guest conductors: the Netherland Chamber Orchestras' David Zinman, the New Jersey Symphony's Henry Lewis, France's Georges Pretre, the San Francisco Symphony's Josef Krips, French composer Pierre Boulez, Israel's pianist - conductor Daniel Barenboim and the Toronto Symphony's conductor-elect Karel Ancerl.

Erich Leinsdorf, who concludes his tenure as B.S.O. music director in August, will conduct the remainder of the programs, and the B.S.O. assistant conductor, Charles Wilson, will lead one.

The cast for Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" on July 12 includes sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski. Verdi's "Otello" on July 26 will feature tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Marilyn Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes. Leinsdorf will conduct both operas.

For his final concert, Beethoven's Ninth, Leinsdorf has chosen a vocal quartet of Miss Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and basso Justino Diaz.

Other soloists this Summer will include pianists Christoph Eshenbach, John Browning, Claude Frank (the Mozart weekend, July 4-6), and Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager; violinists Pinchas Zukerman and Joseph Silverstein, who is B.S.O. concertmaster; cellist Jacqueline Dupre, wife of Barenboim; and soprano Marilyn Horne.

Festival concerts are at 9 p.m. Fridays, 8 p.m. Saturdays and 2:30 Sundays. The Friday evenings begin at 7 p.m. with a "Weekend Prelude," a chamber concert related to the programming of the week-end.

Other activities traditional to Tanglewood continue. The orchestra's Berkshire Music Center opens its 27th season on June 29. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops return Aug. 5.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JAN 24 1969 New England

* * *

The list of conductors who will join Erich Leinsdorf in his farewell summer as director of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. shows some interesting names (but not that of William Steinberg, who will succeed him as music director). Among them are David Zinman, the young American who has been active in Europe recently; Henry Lewis, Negro director of the New Jersey Symphony; Daniel Barenboim, pianist-conductor; and he composer-conductor, Pierre Boulez.

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N.Y.
D. 62,892 SUN. 56,019

FEB 2 1969

SENTINEL (e)
ANSONIA, CONN.
CIRC. 16,800

FEB 5 1969

Begin July 4

Berkshire dates set for Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

Christopher Eschenbach, a young German pianist, will make his Tanglewood debut as soloist that evening.

Concerts will be given at 9 p.m. Fridays, 8 p.m. Saturdays and at 2:30 p.m. Sundays through Aug. 24. Friday evening performances will be preceded by the Weekend Prelude at 7.

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz will be soloists.

It will be preceded by Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber - sized orchestra. All Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4-6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will perform.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival.

Otello on July 26

Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" on July 12 with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass - baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. He will also conduct Verdi's "Otello" on July 26 with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes as soloists.

On July 18, Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include David Zinman of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis of the New Jersey Symphony, French conductor George Pretre and Josef Krips of the San Francisco Symphony.

Also, French composer Pierre Boulez, Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim, Karen Ancerl, newly - appointed conductor of the Toronto Sumphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform July 25.

Soloists will include violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne, and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Fiedler on Aug. 5

Arthur Fiedler will return Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study, will be held from June 29 to Aug. 24.

Leinsdorf will deliver the address for opening exercises for the Music Center on June 29.

On Aug. 19, Tanglewood - on-Parade, a day of concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center will culminate with a Gala Concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras in the evening. The Contemporary Trends concerts will also be repeated this year.

New weekend and day tours plus bus shuttle service to Tanglewood will be instituted from Boston and several other New England cities. Complete program and ticket information will be available April 1 from the Berkshire Festival Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., 02115.

PATRICIA LOUGHERY

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

MAR 31 1969

Boston Symphony Opens July 4 at Tanglewood

The 1969 Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) July 4 through Aug. 24. At the opening concert, Erich Leinsdorf, in his final season as music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct an all-Mozart program with pianist Christoph Eschenbach as soloist making his Tanglewood debut.

Other all-Mozart concerts will be given July 5 and 6 with solo-pianists John Browning, and Claude Frank.

On July 18, Schwarenka's "Piano Concerto No. 1" will be performed by Leinsdorf and orchestra with soloist Earl Wild.

For opera lovers, Leinsdorf will conduct two concert performances: Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio," July 12, with Beverly Sills, Anne Elgar, George Shirley, Jerold Siena and Raymond Michalski; and on July 26, Verdi's "Otello" with Maralin Niska, Richard Cassily and Sherrill Milnes.

In his final appearance as music director of the orchestra, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" with soloists Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz. Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" will precede the symphony.

Concerts will be given each Friday evening at 9, preceded by the week end prelude at 7; Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30.

Summer Festivals Make News

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

In the midst of winter ice and snow, the hottest music news recently has been from outdoor summer festivals.

Both Tanglewood and Saratoga have made important announcements.

Summer festivals are more than a series of concerts or dance programs. They represent an important musical entity (an orchestra, troupe or music school) working in a permanent summer home.

Results go beyond collecting dollars or increasing fame. Performers gain employment, which eases the employer's annual problem in two ways. Personal income is steady and performers are in good practice when fall seasons start.

New England offers many summer events, which can be included in a vacation or occasional trip.

Castle Hill Festival at Ipswich is the summer school and performing project of New England Conservatory of Music.

Hopkins Center Congregation of the Arts, Dartmouth College, Hanover, N.H., is the focal point for many performing groups.

Rudolf Serkin and Pablo Casals direct the Marlboro, Vt. Music Festival.

Music Mountain, Falls Village, Conn., gives chamber music concerts, as does Yale Summer School of Music and Art, Norfolk, Conn.

Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival in Lee offers dance programs by world-famous performers for 10 weeks each summer.

Other intriguing names are the Monteux Memorial Festival, Hancock, Maine; Provincetown Music Festival and Silvermine Chamber Festival, New Canaan, Conn.

Tanglewood's complete 1969 programs will be available April 1 from Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., 02115. A January bulletin showed 24 major concerts, from July 4 to Aug. 24 (two weeks of chamber orchestra and six weeks of full Boston Symphony.) Erich Leinsdorf will have as guest conductors: David Zinman, Henry Lewis, Georges Pretre, Josef Krips, Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim, Karel Ancerl and Charles Wilson.

Soloists will include pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager. Complete operas will include Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio" on July 12 and Verdi's "Otello" on July 26.

Leinsdorf will end his conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 24 with a gala performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Concerts will be at 9 p.m. Fridays, 8 p.m. Saturdays, and 2:30 p.m. Sundays. At 7 p.m. on Fridays there will be the free bonus "Weekend Prelude" chamber music programs.

Saratoga's main events are in two sections. New York City Ballet (Balanchine and Kirstein, directors) presents 23 programs between July 2 and July 27. The Philadelphia Orchestra (Eugene Ormandy, music director) will be heard 16 times between July 31 and August 24. Dance programs are on Sundays at 3:30 and every other night of the week, except Mondays, at 8:30. Orchestral programs are on Thursday, Friday and Saturday at 8:30 and Sundays at 3:30.

Both Saratoga and Tanglewood offer many added events. Those at Saratoga are more varied, and frankly aim to alleviate deficits inevitably resulting from major concerts.

Tanglewood's miscellaneous events are largely related to its music school, the Berkshire Music Center, and range from student offerings to a notably Festival of Contemporary Music.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

MAR 13 1969

1969 at Tanglewood Festival

As famous as July 4 has become for firecrackers and flags, it is also a date eagerly awaited by many music fans in this area. It marks the opening day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in nearby Lenox, Mass.

This year's opener will be a concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's music director, and will feature the young German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, making his Tanglewood debut as soloist. The summer schedule calls for concerts each Friday at 9 p. m., Saturday at 8 p. m., and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 p. m. through Aug. 24. Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Preude at 7 p. m.

One of the highlights of the season will come Aug. 24 when Leinsdorf conducts his final concert in a lengthy career as orchestra director. For his farewell appearance, he has picked Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" will be the other musical presentation that evening.

Mozart Triples

Of further interest is the fact that the first two weekends of concerts this year will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra, and that all-Mozart programs are slated July 4, 5 and 6.

Opera will come to Tanglewood in 1969 in the form of two concert performances. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elger on July 12. Also featured will be the tenors Jerold Siena and George Shirley (who once sang in Woodstock with the Turnau Opera Players), and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski. On July 26, Leinsdorf will be conducting Verdi's "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baratone Sherill Milnes as soloists.

A once-in-a-lifetime treat will come July 18, when Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild play the Scharwenka Piano concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performances of last fall, when the concerto was performed by the orchestra for the first time in 55 years.

KINGSTON FREEMAN
Saturday, February 15, 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 15 1969 New Eng

BU-Tanglewood Institute Slates Expanded Program

Boston University-Tanglewood Institute, the partnership in arts and education between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center, will begin its fourth year on June 29 with a new and expanded program in music, art, theatre and dance, conducted in Lenox.

Eight Weeks

The eight-week session, consisting of private classes, seminars, workshops, professional performance and studio work in painting, drawing, theatre, mime, dance, piano and voice, was established when Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, invited the School of Fine and Applied Arts to conduct a summer program of college-level instruction for music students at the Berkshire Music Center. Registration for the first summer totaled 50 students, all studying music. This year, enrollment is expected to exceed 300 students, coming from all 50 states and four foreign countries, and registered for courses which cover every aspect of the arts.

The program is headed by Edwin E. Stein, dean of Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts. Assistant dean of the school, John R. Watts, serves as administrator.

Mac Morgan

The music program for 1969 is highlighted by vocal seminars, at which Alexander Kipnis, the noted Russian bass, and Pierre Bernac, the French baritone who is a close associate of Francois Poulenc, will be guest-artists. Chairman of the seminars is Mac Morgan, associate professor in the voice department in Boston University's division of music, and former Berkshire resident. He will be assisted by Mary Davenport, Robert Gartside, Chloe Owen and Wilma Thompson, all of whom are faculty members at Boston University.

There will also be two piano seminars, one headed by Claude Frank, a pianist who has appeared with every major symphony orchestra in America and Europe, and the other by Bela Boszormenyi-Nagy, professor of piano at Boston University's division of music.

In addition, there will be an applied music—chamber music seminar conducted by violinist, Roman Totenberg of Boston University and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Totenberg will also conduct a seminar in chamber music and accompanying.

Young Artists

Once more this summer, Boston University Tanglewood Institute will be offering the Young Artist at Tanglewood program. This is an eight-week session for gifted high school instrumentalists between their junior and senior years. Selected from auditions held in major cities throughout the country, the young musicians are given an opportunity to study under members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from the division of music at Boston University. The annual enrollment is restricted to approximately 70 students, with an exact balance maintained on each instrument. The program involves private study, chamber music, master classes, orchestral performance and work in analysis.

Leinsdorf to conclude with Beethoven's 9th

Two concert performances of Mozart and Verdi operas are scheduled for the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. The eight-week season opens on July 4 and closes Aug. 24. The final concert will feature Schoenberg's "Survivor from Warsaw" and the Beethoven Ninth.

The Boston Symphony's Summer music festival will have several guest conductors: the Netherland Chamber Orchestras' David Zinman, the New Jersey Symphony's Henry Lewis, France's Georges Pretre, the San Francisco Symphony's Josef Krips, French composer Pierre Boulez, Israel's pianist - conductor Daniel Barenboim and the Toronto Symphony's conductor-elect Karel Ancerl.

Erich Leinsdorf, who concludes his tenure as B.S.O. music director in August, will conduct the remainder of the programs, and the B.S.O. assistant conductor, Charles Wilson, will lead one.

The cast for Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" on July 12 includes sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski. Verdi's "Otello" on July 26 will feature tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Marilyn Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes. Leinsdorf will conduct both operas.

For his final concert, Beethoven's Ninth, Leinsdorf has chosen a vocal quartet of Miss Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and basso Justino Diaz.

Other soloists this Summer will include pianists Christoph Eshenbach, John Browning, Claude Frank (the Mozart weekend, July 4-6), and Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager; violinists Pinchas Zukerman and Joseph Silverstein, who is B.S.O. concertmaster; cellist Jacqueline Dupre, wife of Barenboim; and soprano Marilyn Horne.

Festival concerts are at 9 p.m. Fridays, 8 p.m. Saturdays and 2:30 Sundays. The Friday evenings begin at 7 p.m. with a "Weekend Prelude," a chamber concert related to the programming of the week-end.

Other activities traditional to Tanglewood continue. The orchestra's Berkshire Music Center opens its 27th season on June 29. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops return Aug. 5.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JAN 24 1969

New England

* * *

The list of conductors who will join Erich Leinsdorf in his farewell summer as director of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. shows some interesting names (but not that of William Steinberg, who will succeed him as music director). Among them are David Zinman, the young American who has been active in Europe recently; Henry Lewis, Negro director of the New Jersey Symphony; Daniel Barenboim, pianist-conductor; and he composer-conductor, Pierre Boulez.

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N.Y.
D. 62,892 SUN. 56,019

FEB 2 1969

SENTINEL (e)
ANSONIA, CONN.
CIRC. 10,800

FEB 5 1969

Begin July 4

Berkshire dates set for Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

Christopher Eschenbach, a young German pianist, will make his Tanglewood debut as soloist that evening.

Concerts will be given at 9 p.m. Fridays, 8 p.m. Saturdays and at 2:30 p.m. Sundays through Aug. 24. Friday evening performances will be preceded by the Weekend Prelude at 7.

On Aug. 24, for his final concert as music director, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz will be soloists.

It will be preceded by Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber - sized orchestra. All Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4-6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will perform.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival.

Otello on July 26

Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" on July 12 with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass - baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. He will also conduct Verdi's "Otello" on July 26 with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes as soloists.

On July 18, Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include David Zinman of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis of the New Jersey Symphony, French conductor George Pretre and Josef Krips of the San Francisco Symphony.

Also, French composer Pierre Boulez, Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim, Karen Ancerl, newly - appointed conductor of the Toronto Sumphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform July 25.

Soloists will include violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne, and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Fiedler on Aug. 5

Arthur Fiedler will return Aug. 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study, will be held from June 29 to Aug. 24.

Leinsdorf will deliver the address for opening exercises for the Music Center on June 29.

On Aug. 19, Tanglewood - on-Parade, a day of concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center will culminate with a Gala Concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras in the evening. The Contemporary Trends concerts will also be repeated this year.

New weekend and day tours plus bus shuttle service to Tanglewood will be instituted from Boston and several other New England cities. Complete program and ticket information will be available April 1 from the Berkshire Festival Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., 02115.

PATRICIA LOUGHERY

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

MAR 31 1969

Boston Symphony Opens July 4 at Tanglewood

The 1969 Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) July 4 through Aug. 24. At the opening concert, Erich Leinsdorf, in his final season as music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct an all-Mozart program with pianist Christoph Eschenbach as soloist making his Tanglewood debut.

Other all-Mozart concerts will be given July 5 and 6 with solo-pianists John Browning, and Claude Frank.

On July 18, Schwarenka's "Piano Concerto No. 1" will be performed by Leinsdorf and orchestra with soloist Earl Wild.

For opera-lovers, Leinsdorf will conduct two concert performances: Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio," July 12, with Beverly Sills, Anne Elgar, George Shirley, Jerold Siena and Raymond Michalski; and on July 26, Verdi's "Otello" with Maralin Niska, Richard Cassily and Sherrill Milnes.

In his final appearance as music director of the orchestra, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" with soloists Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz. Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" will precede the symphony.

Concerts will be given each Friday evening at 9, preceded by the week end prelude at 7; Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30.

Summer Festivals Make News

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

In the midst of winter ice and snow, the hottest music news recently has been from outdoor summer festivals.

Both Tanglewood and Saratoga have made important announcements.

Summer festivals are more than a series of concerts or dance programs. They represent an important musical entity (an orchestra, troupe or music school) working in a permanent summer home.

Results go beyond collecting dollars or increasing fame. Performers gain employment, which eases the employer's annual problem in two ways. Personal income is steady and performers are in good practice when fall seasons start.

New England offers many summer events, which can be included in a vacation or occasional trip.

Castle Hill Festival at Ipswich is the summer school and performing project of New England Conservatory of Music.

Hopkins Center Congregation of the Arts, Dartmouth College, Hanover, N.H., is the focal point for many performing groups.

Rudolf Serkin and Pablo Casals direct the Marlboro, Vt. Music Festival.

Music Mountain, Falls Village, Conn., gives chamber music concerts, as does Yale Summer School of Music and Art, Norfolk, Conn.

Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival in Lee offers dance programs by world-famous performers for 10 weeks each summer.

Other intriguing names are the Monteux Memorial Festival, Hancock, Maine; Provincetown Music Festival and Silvermine Chamber Festival, New Canaan, Conn.

Tanglewood's complete 1969 programs will be available April 1 from Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., 02115. A January bulletin showed 24 major concerts, from July 4 to Aug. 24 (two weeks of chamber orchestra and six weeks of full Boston Symphony.) Erich Leinsdorf will have as guest conductors: David Zinman, Henry Lewis, Georges Pretre, Josef Krips, Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim, Karel Ancerl and Charles Wilson.

Soloists will include pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn and Malcolm Frager. Complete operas will include Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio" on July 12 and Verdi's "Otello" on July 26.

Leinsdorf will end his conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 24 with a gala performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Concerts will be at 9 p.m. Fridays, 8 p.m. Saturdays, and 2:30 p.m. Sundays. At 7 p.m. on Fridays there will be the free bonus "Weekend Prelude" chamber music programs.

Saratoga's main events are in two sections. New York City Ballet (Balanchine and Kirstein, directors) presents 23 programs between July 2 and July 27. The Philadelphia Orchestra (Eugene Ormandy, music director) will be heard 16 times between July 31 and August 24. Dance programs are on Sundays at 3:30 and every other night of the week, except Mondays, at 8:30. Orchestral programs are on Thursday, Friday and Saturday at 8:30 and Sundays at 3:30.

Both Saratoga and Tanglewood offer many added events. Those at Saratoga are more varied, and frankly aim to alleviate deficits inevitably resulting from major concerts.

Tanglewood's miscellaneous events are largely related to its music school, the Berkshire Music Center, and range from student offerings to a notably Festival of Contemporary Music.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

MAR 13 1969

1969 at Tanglewood Festival

As famous as July 4 has become for firecrackers and flags, it is also a date eagerly awaited by many music fans in this area. It marks the opening day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in nearby Lenox, Mass.

This year's opener will be a concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's music director, and will feature the young German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, making his Tanglewood debut as soloist. The summer schedule calls for concerts each Friday at 9 p. m., Saturday at 8 p. m., and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 p. m. through Aug. 24. Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Preude at 7 p. m.

One of the highlights of the season will come Aug. 24 when Leinsdorf conducts his final concert in a lengthy career as orchestra director. For his farewell appearance, he has picked Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" will be the other musical presentation that evening.

Mozart Triples

Of further interest is the fact that the first two weekends of concerts this year will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra, and that all-Mozart programs are slated July 4, 5 and 6.

Opera will come to Tanglewood in 1969 in the form of two concert performances. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elger on July 12. Also featured will be the tenors Jerold Siena and George Shirley (who once sang in Woodstock with the Turnau Opera Players), and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski. On July 26, Leinsdorf will be conducting Verdi's "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baratone Sherill Milnes as soloists.

A once-in-a-lifetime treat will come July 18, when Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild play the Scharwenka Piano concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performances of last fall, when the concerto was performed by the orchestra for the first time in 55 years.

KINGSTON FREEMAN
Saturday, February 15, 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 29,900

FEB 15 1969

New Eng

BU-Tanglewood Institute Slates Expanded Program

Boston University-Tanglewood Institute, the partnership in arts and education between Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts and the Berkshire Music Center, will begin its fourth year on June 29 with a new and expanded program in music, art, theatre and dance, conducted in Lenox.

Eight Weeks

The eight-week session, consisting of private classes, seminars, workshops, professional performance and studio work in painting, drawing, theatre, mime, dance, piano and voice, was established when Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, invited the School of Fine and Applied Arts to conduct a summer program of college-level instruction for music students at the Berkshire Music Center. Registration for the first summer totaled 50 students, all studying music. This year, enrollment is expected to exceed 300 students, coming from all 50 states and four foreign countries, and registered for courses which cover every aspect of the arts.

The program is headed by Edwin E. Stein, dean of Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts. Assistant dean of the school, John R. Watts, serves as administrator.

Mac Morgan

The music program for 1969 is highlighted by vocal seminars, at which Alexander Kipnis, the noted Russian bass, and Pierre Bernac, the French baritone who is a close associate of Francois Poulenc, will be guest-artists. Chairman of the seminars is Mac Morgan, associate professor in the voice department in Boston University's division of music, and former Berkshire resident. He will be assisted by Mary Davenport, Robert Gartside, Chloe Owen and Wilma Thompson, all of whom are faculty members at Boston University.

There will also be two piano seminars, one headed by Claude Frank, a pianist who has appeared with every major symphony orchestra in America and Europe, and the other by Bela Boszormenyi-Nagy, professor of piano at Boston University's division of music.

In addition, there will be an applied music—chamber music seminar conducted by violinist, Roman Totenberg of Boston University and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Totenberg will also conduct a seminar in chamber music and accompanying.

Young Artists

Once more this summer, Boston University Tanglewood Institute will be offering the Young Artist at Tanglewood program. This is an eight-week session for gifted high school instrumentalists between their junior and senior years. Selected from auditions held in major cities throughout the country, the young musicians are given an opportunity to study under members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from the division of music at Boston University. The annual enrollment is restricted to approximately 70 students, with an exact balance maintained on each instrument. The program involves private study, chamber music, master classes, orchestral performance and work in analysis.

8

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tanglewood

ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL—JULY/AUGUST 1969
24 CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WEEK	FRIDAYS AT 9 O'CLOCK	SATURDAYS AT 8 O'CLOCK	SUNDAYS AT 2:30
1	JULY 4 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Kallir and Frank LEINSDORF MOZART PROGRAM Symphony no. 29 K. 201 Piano concerto in C K. 467 Eschenbach Symphony no. 39 K. 543	JULY 5 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF MOZART PROGRAM 'Haffner' Symphony K. 385 Piano concerto in A K. 488 Browning Symphony no. 40 K. 550	JULY 6 LEINSDORF MOZART PROGRAM Six German dances K. 571 Piano concerto in B flat K. 595 Frank 'Jupiter' Symphony K. 551
2	JULY 11 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Silverstein and Eskin LEINSDORF BACH PROGRAM The four suites	JULY 12 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF MOZART: The Abduction from the Seraglio (in German) Sills, Shirley, Elgar, Siena, Michalski, Tanglewood Choir	JULY 13 ZINMAN GRAFF: Symphony for strings BACH: Triple concerto in A minor Dwyer, Silverstein, Levin HANDEL: Concerto grosso op. 6 no. 1 MOZART: 'Linz' Symphony K. 425
3	JULY 18 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Zukofsky and Kalish LEINSDORF ROSSINI: 'L'Italiana in Algeri' Overture SCHARWENKA: Piano concerto no. 1 Wild STRAVINSKY: The rite of spring	JULY 19 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF Soloist and concerto to be announced. Program includes PROKOFIEV: 'Romeo and Juliet' suite	JULY 20 LEINSDORF TCHAIKOVSKY PROGRAM Introduction to Act II 'Swan Lake' Violin concerto Zukerman Symphony no. 5
4	JULY 25 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Wild LEINSDORF BEETHOVEN: 'Egmont' Overture BEETHOVEN: Symphony no. 1 BRAHMS: Piano concerto no. 2 Watts	JULY 26 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF VERDI: Otello (in Italian) Cassilly, Niska, Milnes, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir	JULY 27 WILSON SIBELIUS: Symphony no. 2 BEETHOVEN: 'Emperor' Concerto Ashkenazy
5	AUGUST 1 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Boston Symphony Chamber Players LEINSDORF STRAVINSKY: Symphony in C SCHOENBERG: A survivor from Warsaw BRAHMS: Symphony no. 4	AUGUST 2 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am BOULEZ HAYDN: Sinfonia concertante op. 84 Silverstein, Gomberg, Walt, Eskin DEBUSSY: Jeux BARTOK: Two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra Silverstein DEBUSSY: La mer	AUGUST 3 BARENBOIM MENDELSSOHN: 'Ruy Blas' Overture ELGAR: Cello concerto DuPré BEETHOVEN: Symphony no. 5
6	AUGUST 8 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Berkshire Boy Choir ANCERL SMETANA: Ma Vlast	AUGUST 9 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF DEBUSSY: Three nocturnes Women of Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir WEILL: Suite from 'The Threepenny Opera' BRAHMS: Piano concerto no. 1 Cliburn	AUGUST 10 KRIPS HAYDN: 'Surprise' Symphony STRAUSS: Till Eulenspiegel SCHUBERT: Symphony no. 9
7	AUGUST 15 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Boston Symphony Chamber Players LEINSDORF BEETHOVEN PROGRAM 'Pastoral' Symphony 'Eroica' Symphony	AUGUST 16 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am RUDOLF HAYDN: Symphony no. 91 BARTOK: Dance Suite TCHAIKOVSKY: 'Pathétique' Symphony	AUGUST 17 LEWIS BERLIOZ: 'Corsaire' Overture BERLIOZ: Nuits d'été MOZART: Parto, parto from 'La clemenza di Tito' K. 621 ROSSINI: Cruda sorte from 'L'Italiana in Algeri' Horne TCHAIKOVSKY: Francesca da Rimini
8	AUGUST 22 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Sills KATIMS ROSSINI: 'Gazza Ladra' Overture TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony no. 4 VAUGHAN WILLIAMS: Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Taillis RAVEL: 'Daphnis et Chloé' no. 2	AUGUST 23 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF VARÈSE: Déserts BEETHOVEN: Piano concerto no. 4 Frager STRAVINSKY: 'Firebird' suite	AUGUST 24 LEINSDORF BERLIOZ: Royal hunt and storm from 'The Trojans' BEETHOVEN: Symphony no. 9 Sills, Kopleff, Alexander, Diaz, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir
BOSTON POPS	SATURDAY AUGUST 30 8.00 Shed ARTHUR FIEDLER and the BOSTON POPS FESTIVAL ORCHESTRA	SUNDAY AUGUST 31 2:30 Shed ARTHUR FIEDLER and the BOSTON POPS FESTIVAL ORCHESTRA	Pops Ticket Prices: $4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 6, Box seat 6.50 Admission to the lawn: $3 (on sale the day of the concert).

MAIL ORDERS NOW
FOR ALL PERFORMANCES

Box Seat . . . (Special parking provided) (Box contains 6 chairs)	$8.50
Front: 1, 2, 7, 8, 9, 10	8.00
Front: 3, 4	7.50
Front: 11, 12	7.00
Front: 5, 6, 13, 14, 15, 16	6.50
Rear: 1 thru 8: Rows A thru M	5.50
Rear: 1 thru 8: Rows N thru V	4.50
Rear: 9, 10	4.50
Rear: 11, 12	3.50

Enclose check and self-addressed envelope with mail orders to FESTIVAL TICKET OFFICE, TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. 02140

TANGLEWOOD MUSIC SHED SEATING PLAN

BALDWIN PIANO PROGRAMS SUBJECT TO CHANGE RCA RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
MAY 4 1969

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 6,100
MAY 3 1969

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
APR 29 1969

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500
APR 30 1969

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
APR 29 1969

Tanglewood Will Add Two Pops Concerts

LENOX — Two special concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler with the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra will extend the Tanglewood season this year, adding two Labor Day weekend programs. The two additional concerts are Saturday night, Aug. 30, at 8 and Sunday, Aug. 31, at 2.30 in the shed. Tickets are now on sale along with tickets for the 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

Mozart Concerts

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens the 1969 season with three all Mozart concerts, each featuring one of Mozart's last three symphonies and one of his late piano concertos. Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning and Claude Frank are the opening weekend soloists.

Each Friday evening concert will be preceded by a weekend prelude at 7, beginning Friday, July 4, with a joint recital by Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank playing Mozart piano music. The other weekend preludes are: Joseph Silverstein (violin) and Jules Eskin (cello), July 11, Paul Zukofsky (violin) and Gilbert Kalish (piano), July 18; Earl Wild (piano), July 25; Boston Symphony Chamber Players (wind Quintet), Aug. 1; Berkshire Boy Choir, Aug. 8; Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Aug. 15; Beverly Sills (soprano), Aug. 22.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra (July 13); Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Orchestra (July 27); French composer Piere Boulez (Aug. 2); Israeli Daniel Barenboim (Aug. 3); Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (Aug. 8;); Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony (Aug. 10); Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cinncinati Symphony Orchestra (Aug. 16); Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, (Aug. 17), and Milton Katims, conductor of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, (Agu. 22).

A brochure containing programs, soloists, conductors and ticket information is available by writing the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, 02115.

Notes on Music

Hegyi in Premieres; BSO Lists Season

Julius Hegyi, conductor of the Albany Symphony and the Berkshire Symphony, participated in the 20th anniversary celebration of the Regional Composer's Forum of music by Southeastern composer in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, over the weekend.

Hegyi conducted the augmented University of Alabama Symphony Orchestra in premiere performances of "Ozymandias" for voice and orchestra by Joe Evan Burt of Jacksonville, Fla., and "Etendue du Son" by David Brandon Phillips of Nashville, Tenn. These were among ten orchestral compositons presented during the three day forum.

As conductor of the Chattanoga Symphony Orchestra. Hegyi was a frequent of the Regional Composer's Forum in earlier years. The Forum is sponsored by the University of Alabama, the Southeastern Composer's League and the National Endowment for the Arts.

* * *

THE COMPLETE concert listing for the Tanglewood season has been announced with the details of Erich Leinsdorf's final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The season opens July 4 with an all-Mozart weekend to be conducted by Leinsdorf and closes August 24 with Leinsdorf leading the orchestra in Berlioz' royal hunt from "The Trojans" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9.

Highlights during the season include the August 3 program conducted by Daniel Barenboim and featuring cellist Jacqueline DuPre in Elgar's Cello Concerto. Other concrets include an all-Beethoven and an all-Tschaikovsky program.

The weekend Preludes at 7:00 on Friday evenings will be continued for the third season followed by the full concert at 9:00 p.m. Prelude performers include pianist Earl Wild, sprano Beverly Sills, cellist Jules Eskin and the Gerkshire Boy Choir.

Saturday concerts begin at 8:00 p.m. and Sunday matinees at 2:30 p.m.

The complete schedule of regular and special concerts at Tanglewood will be carried in the Show section of The Sunday Times-Union this week. Ticket information may be obtained by writing the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

* * *

THE LAKE GEORGE Opera Festival of Queensbury has received a grant of $12,000 from the New York State Council on the Arts.

The funds will assist with the production costs of the five comic operas to be presented this season. The company opens July 17 and runs through August 23.

The season's repertoire consists of Donizetti's "Don Pasq

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, April 30, 1969

THE COMPLETE concert listing for the Tanglewood season has been announced with the details of Erich Leinsdorf's final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The season opens July 4 with an all-Mozart weekend to be conducted by Leinsdorf and closes August 24 with Leinsdorf leading the orchestra in Berlioz' royal hunt from "The Trojans" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9.

Highlights during the season include the August 3 program conducted by Daniel Barenboim and featuring cellist Jacqueline DuPre in Elgar's Cello Concerto. Other concrets include an all-Beethoven and an all-Tschaikovsky program.

The weekend Preludes at 7:00 on Friday evenings will be continued for the third season followed by the full concert at 9:00 p.m. Prelude performers include pianist Earl Wild, sprano Beverly Sills, cellist Jules Eskin and the Gerkshire Boy Choir.

Saturday concerts begin at 8:00 p.m. and Sunday matinees at 2:30 p.m.

The complete schedule of regular and special concerts at Tanglewood will be carried in the Show section of The Sunday Times-Union this week. Ticket information may be obtained by writing the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
APR 30 1969

Jerry Bauer

Sills in front of La Scala: Pinnacle of meteoric rise

LA SILLS AT THE SUMMIT

ittle more than two years ago, Bev- her

Boston millionaire and direct descen of John Alden. She is famous for he and beloved for her warmth and

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000
APR 21 1969

will stage for her in 1970. This fall the New York City Opera will star her in a new production of "Lucia"; next year she will make her debut at London's Royal Opera House in the same opera.

Accolade: Last summer when she opened the Tanglewood Festival with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in a solo Mozart program, she received a standing ovation at intermission, a unique accolade, from 5,000 people. "She is that rare singer," says Leinsdorf, "who not only has all the music and interpretive virtues—but a great voice." This summer she returns to Tanglewood, opens Philadelphia's Robin Hood Dell and New York State's Caramoor Festival, the last with Handel's "Semele." "Who else could they get?" asks Sills. "I'm the only one who knows the damned thing."

She is understandably pleased and surprised by her universal popularity. Her fee has skyrocketed to $5,000 a performance and more for recitals. "I don't dare sneeze or I'll be out of business," she says. "I went through so many years when nobody wanted me, not even to sing at a bar mitzvah. Suddenly I'm the Beatles of opera."

Last week, before her debut at La Scala, the tall, beautiful, red-headed and

Springfield Republican 6-22-'69 (facimile)
New York Times 4-27-'69 (as shown)
Albany Times Union 5-4-'69 (facimile)

8

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tanglewood

ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL—JULY/AUGUST 1969
24 CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WEEK	FRIDAYS AT 9 O'CLOCK	SATURDAYS AT 8 O'CLOCK	SUNDAYS AT 2:30
1	JULY 4 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Kallir and Frank LEINSDORF MOZART PROGRAM Symphony no. 29 K. 201 Piano concerto in C K. 467 Eschenbach Symphony no. 39 K. 543	JULY 5 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF MOZART PROGRAM 'Haffner' Symphony K. 385 Piano concerto in A K. 488 Browning Symphony no. 40 K. 550	JULY 6 LEINSDORF MOZART PROGRAM Six German dances K. 571 Piano concerto in B flat K. 595 Frank 'Jupiter' Symphony K. 551
2	JULY 11 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Silverstein and Eskin LEINSDORF BACH PROGRAM The four suites	JULY 12 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF MOZART: The Abduction from the Seraglio (in German) Sills, Shirley, Elgar, Siena, Michalski, Tanglewood Choir	JULY 13 ZINMAN GRAFF: Symphony for strings BACH: Triple concerto in A minor Dwyer, Silverstein, Levin HANDEL: Concerto grosso op. 6 no. 1 MOZART: 'Linz' Symphony K. 425
3	JULY 18 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Zukofsky and Kalish LEINSDORF ROSSINI: 'L'Italiana in Algeri' Overture SCHARWENKA: Piano concerto no. 1 Wild STRAVINSKY: The rite of spring	JULY 19 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF Soloist and concerto to be announced. Program includes PROKOFIEV: 'Romeo and Juliet' suite	JULY 20 LEINSDORF TCHAIKOVSKY PROGRAM Introduction to Act II 'Swan Lake' Violin concerto Zukerman Symphony no. 5
4	JULY 25 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Wild LEINSDORF BEETHOVEN: 'Egmont' Overture BEETHOVEN: Symphony no. 1 BRAHMS: Piano concerto no. 2 Watts	JULY 26 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF VERDI: Otello (in Italian) Cassilly, Niska, Milnes, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir	JULY 27 WILSON SIBELIUS: Symphony no. 2 BEETHOVEN: 'Emperor' Concerto Ashkenazy
5	AUGUST 1 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Boston Symphony Chamber Players LEINSDORF STRAVINSKY: Symphony in C SCHOENBERG: A survivor from Warsaw BRAHMS: Symphony no. 4	AUGUST 2 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am BOULEZ HAYDN: Sinfonia concertante op. 84 Silverstein, Gomberg, Walt, Eskin DEBUSSY: Jeux BARTOK: Two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra Silverstein DEBUSSY: La mer	AUGUST 3 BARENBOIM MENDELSSOHN: 'Ruy Blas' Overture ELGAR: Cello concerto DuPré BEETHOVEN: Symphony no. 5
6	AUGUST 8 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Berkshire Boy Choir ANCERL SMETANA: Ma Vlast	AUGUST 9 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF DEBUSSY: Three nocturnes Women of Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir WEILL: Suite from 'The Threepenny Opera' BRAHMS: Piano concerto no. 1 Cliburn	AUGUST 10 KRIPS HAYDN: 'Surprise' Symphony STRAUSS: Till Eulenspiegel SCHUBERT: Symphony no. 9
7	AUGUST 15 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Boston Symphony Chamber Players LEINSDORF BEETHOVEN PROGRAM 'Pastoral' Symphony 'Eroica' Symphony	AUGUST 16 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am RUDOLF HAYDN: Symphony no. 91 BARTOK: Dance Suite TCHAIKOVSKY: 'Pathétique' Symphony	AUGUST 17 LEWIS BERLIOZ: 'Corsaire' Overture BERLIOZ: Nuits d'été MOZART: Parto, parto from 'La clemenza di Tito' K. 621 ROSSINI: Cruda sorte from 'L'Italiana in Algeri' Horne TCHAIKOVSKY: Francesca da Rimini
8	AUGUST 22 Weekend Prelude 7 pm Sills KATIMS ROSSINI: 'Gazza Ladra' Overture TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony no. 4 VAUGHAN WILLIAMS: Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Taillis RAVEL: 'Daphnis et Chloé' no. 2	AUGUST 23 OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am LEINSDORF VARÈSE: Déserts BEETHOVEN: Piano concerto no. 4 Frager STRAVINSKY: 'Firebird' suite	AUGUST 24 LEINSDORF BERLIOZ: Royal hunt and storm from 'The Trojans' BEETHOVEN: Symphony no. 9 Sills, Koplefi, Alexander, Diaz, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir
BOSTON POPS	SATURDAY AUGUST 30 8.00 Shed ARTHUR FIEDLER and the BOSTON POPS FESTIVAL ORCHESTRA	SUNDAY AUGUST 31 2:30 Shed ARTHUR FIEDLER and the BOSTON POPS FESTIVAL ORCHESTRA	Pops Ticket Prices: $4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 6, Box seat 6.50 Admission to the lawn: $3 (on sale the day of the concert).

MAIL ORDERS NOW
FOR ALL PERFORMANCES

Box Seat . . . (Special parking provided) (Box contains 6 chairs)	$8.50
Front: 1, 2, 7, 8, 9, 10	8.00
Front: 3, 4	7.50
Front: 11, 12	7.00
Front: 5, 6, 13, 14, 15, 16	6.50
Rear: 1 thru 8: Rows A thru M	5.50
Rear: 1 thru 8: Rows N thru V	4.50
Rear: 9, 10	4.50
Rear: 11, 12	3.50

Enclose check and self-addressed envelope with mail orders to
FESTIVAL TICKET OFFICE, TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. 02140

TANGLEWOOD MUSIC SHED SEATING PLAN

BALDWIN PIANO PROGRAMS SUBJECT TO CHANGE RCA RECORDS

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

MAY 4 1969

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 6,100

MAY 3 1969

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

APR 29 1969

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

APR 30 1969

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

APR 29 1969

Tanglewood Will Add Two Pops Concerts

LENOX — Two special concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler with the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra will extend the Tanglewood season this year, adding two Labor Day weekend programs. The two additional concerts are Saturday night, Aug. 30, at 8 and Sunday, Aug. 31, at 2.30 in the shed. Tickets are now on sale along with tickets for the 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

Mozart Concerts

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens the 1969 season with three all Mozart concerts, each featuring one of Mozart's last three symphonies and one of his late piano concertos. Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning and Claude Frank are the opening weekend soloists.

Each Friday evening concert will be preceded by a weekend prelude at 7, beginning Friday, July 4, with a joint recital by Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank playing Mozart piano music. The other weekend preludes are: Joseph Silverstein (violin) and Jules Eskin (cello), July 11, Paul Zukofsky (violin) and Gilbert Kalish (piano), July 18; Earl Wild (piano), July 25; Boston Symphony Chamber Players (wind Quintet), Aug. 1; Berkshire Boy Choir, Aug. 8; Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Aug. 15; Beverly Sills (soprano), Aug. 22.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra (July 13); Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Orchestra (July 27); French composer Piere Boulez (Aug. 2); Israeli Daniel Barenboim (Aug. 3); Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (Aug. 8;); Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony (Aug. 10); Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cinncinati Symphony Orchestra (Aug. 16); Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, (Aug. 17), and Milton Katims, conductor of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, (Agu. 22).

A brochure containing programs, soloists, conductors and ticket information is available by writing the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, 02115.

Jerry Bauer

Sills in front of La Scala: Pinnacle of meteoric rise

LA SILLS AT THE SUMMIT

ittle more than two years ago, Bev- her Boston millionaire and direct descen of John Alden. She is famous for her ... and beloved for her warmth and

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 21 1969

... the New York City Opera will stage for her in 1970. This fall the New York company will star her in a new production of "Lucia"; next year she will make her debut at London's Royal Opera House in the same opera.

Accolade: Last summer when she opened the Tanglewood Festival with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in a solo Mozart program, she received a standing ovation at intermission, a unique accolade, from 5,000 people. "She is that rare singer," says Leinsdorf, "who not only has all the music and interpretive virtues—but a great voice." This summer she returns to Tanglewood, opens Philadelphia's Robin Hood Dell and New York State's Caramoor Festival, the last with Handel's "Semele." "Who else could they get?" asks Sills. "I'm the only one who knows the damned thing."

She is understandably pleased and surprised by her universal popularity. Her fee has skyrocketed to $5,000 a performance and more for recitals. "I don't dare sneeze or I'll be out of business," she says. "I went through so many years when nobody wanted me, not even to sing at a bar mitzvah. Suddenly I'm the Beatles of opera."

Last week, before her debut at La Scala, the tall, beautiful, red-headed and

Springfield Republican (facimile) 6-22-'69
New York Times 4-27-'69 (as shown)
Albany Times Union (facimile) 5-4-'69

Notes on Music

Hegyi in Premieres; BSO Lists Season

Julius Hegyi, conductor of the Albany Symphony and the Berkshire Symphony, participated in the 20th anniversary celebration of the Regional Composer's Forum of music by Southeastern composer in Tuscaloosa, Alabama, over the weekend.

Hegyi conducted the augmented University of Alabama Symphony Orchestra in premiere performances of "Ozymandias" for voice and orchestra by Joe Evan Burt of Jacksonville, Fla., and "Etendue du Son" by David Brandon Phillips of Nashville, Tenn. These were among ten orchestral compositons presented during the three day forum.

As conductor of the Chattanoga Symphony Orchestra. Hegyi was a frequent of the Regional Composer's Forum in earlier years. The Forum is sponsored by the University of Alabama, the Southeastern Composer's League and the National Endowment for the Arts.

* * *

THE COMPLETE concert listing for the Tanglewood season has been announced with the details of Erich Leinsdorf's final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The season opens July 4 with an all-Mozart weekend to be conducted by Leinsdorf and closes August 24 with Leinsdorf leading the orchestra in Berlioz' royal hunt from "The Trojans" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9.

Highlights during the season include the August 3 program conducted by Daniel Barenboim and featuring cellist Jacqueline DuPre in Elgar's Cello Concerto. Other concrets include an all-Beethoven and an all-Tschaikovsky program.

The weekend Preludes at 7:00 on Friday evenings will be continued for the third season followed by the full concert at 9:00 p.m. Prelude performers include pianist Earl Wild, sprano Beverly Sills, cellist Jules Eskin and the Gerkshire Boy Choir.

Saturday concerts begin at 8:00 p.m. and Sunday matinees at 2:30 p.m.

The complete schedule of regular and special concerts at Tanglewood will be carried in the Show section of The Sunday Times-Union this week. Ticket information may be obtained by writing the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

* * *

THE LAKE GEORGE Opera Festival of Queensbury has received a grant of $12.000 from the New York State Council on the Arts.

The funds will assist with the production costs of the five comic operas to be presented this season. The company opens July 17 and runs through August 23.

The season's repertoire consists of Donizetti's "Don Pasq-

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, April 30, 1969

THE COMPLETE concert listing for the Tanglewood season has been announced with the details of Erich Leinsdorf's final season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The season opens July 4 with an all-Mozart weekend to be conducted by Leinsdorf and closes August 24 with Leinsdorf leading the orchestra in Berlioz' royal hunt from "The Trojans" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9.

Highlights during the season include the August 3 program conducted by Daniel Barenboim and featuring cellist Jacqueline DuPre in Elgar's Cello Concerto. Other concrets include an all-Beethoven and an all-Tschaikovsky program.

The weekend Preludes at 7:00 on Friday evenings will be continued for the third season followed by the full concert at 9:00 p.m. Prelude performers include pianist Earl Wild, sprano Beverly Sills, cellist Jules Eskin and the Gerkshire Boy Choir.

Saturday concerts begin at 8:00 p.m. and Sunday matinees at 2:30 p.m.

The complete schedule of regular and special concerts at Tanglewood will be carried in the Show section of The Sunday Times-Union this week. Ticket information may be obtained by writing the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

APR 30 1969

Henry Lewis Will Be Guest Conductor In 1969 Tanglewood Berkshire Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Mass.) will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the Orchestra's Music Director Erich Leinsdorf. The young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that night as soloist. Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p. m., Saturday at 8 p. m. and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 p. m. through August 24. The Friday night concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

On August 24, for his final concert as Music Director of the orchestra, Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's 'A Survivor from Warsaw'.

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the orchestra.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 Festival. On July 12, Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's 'The Abduction from the Seraglio' with sopranos Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siens and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's 'Otello' with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes as soloists.

On July 18, Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano concerto no. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed again by the orchestra after a lapse of fifty-five years.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony; renowned French conductor George Pretre; Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct on July 25.

Other soloists include: violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra; pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Van Cliburn, and Malcolm Frager; soprano Marilyn Horne; and cellist Jacqueline du Pre.

Arthur Fiedler will return to Tanglewood on August 5 for his traditional appearance with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The 27th session of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study, will be held from June 29 to August 24. Opening exercises for the Music Center will be held on Sunday afternoon, June 29 with Erich Leinsdorf delivering the opening address. Tanglewood-on-Parade, a day of concerts by members of the Berkshire Music Center culminating with an evening Gala Concert by the combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, will be held on August 19. The highly successful Contemporary Trends concerts, will be repeated this year.

New weekend and day tours plus bus shuttle service to Tanglewood will be instituted from Boston and several other New England cities. Complete program and ticket information is available from the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750
MAY 11 1969
New England

Tanglewood Changes

In addition to death and taxes, a third certainty in this world is change. Revisions and innovations in even the soundest establishments become advisable, or inevitable, sometimes.

Tanglewood is no exception. There is evidence that the law of change is at work there also to some extent, not suddenly or violently but calmly and gradually. The most obvious changes so far are directional.

This summer's concert series will be the last for Erich Leinsdorf, ending his seven-year tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Festival, though he will appear occasionally as guest conductor, both in Symphony Hall and at Lenox.

The list of guest conductors for this summer is the longest ever. and the usual eight-week season will be extended with two "pops" concerts by an orchestra led by Arthur Fiedler.

Next year is to bring further changes, with Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller becoming "artistic directors" and Leonard Bernstein, who leaves the New York Philharmonic this week, nonresident "adviser." These appointments suggest the probability of more diversified programs, offering considerable contemporary and avant-garde material, though always with the firm foundation of standard classical music.

In the fall William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, will also take on similar duties with the Boston Symphony for three years. Apparently, however, his role at Tanglewood is to be somewhat less prominent than had been expected.

Chicago
today
American
Always on Top of the News
D. 436,893 SUN. 483,418
MAY 13 1969

24-July 20, the first stock production of this musical since its downtown run last year. . . . Erich Leinsdorf has been engaged by the Metropolitan Opera to conduct the new "Tristan" production in 1971-72 starring Birgit Nilsson as Isolde. . . . The Boston Symphony orchestra's summer season at Tanglewood will run from July 4 thru Aug. 24 with Leinsdorf as principal conductor and guests including Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim, Karel Ancerl [Toronto's new music director], Josef Krips, Henry Lewis, and Milton Katims. . . . Ancerl also will be a guest conductor in San Francisco next season, Krips' last there as music director, along with Seiji Ozawa [conductor-elect in 1970, who will be on the podium for 6 consecutive weeks of concerts], Lewis, and Jean Martinon.

Tanglewood Program Guides Are Available

Complete program guides for the Tanglewood season have arrived at the Berkshire Hills Conference office in the Western Mass. Electric Co. building on Eagle Street and are available to interested parties, according to an announcement by John V. Geary.

This year's Tanglewood season will run for nine weeks with the Boston Symphony programs running from July 4 through Aug. 24, and an extra week of Boston Pops concerts directed by Arthur Fiedler running through Aug. 31. Highlight of the lighter programs will be the Boston Pops doing "Peter and the Wolf" with Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy as narartor on Aug. 5.

There will be five Contemporary Trend concerts this season, but individual programs will not be announced until July 1. The Berkshire Boy Choir, with headquarters at Stockbridge School, will present Tanglewood programs on July 26 and Aug. 8.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
MAY 16 1969

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 31,320
MAY 17 1969
The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
MAY 17 1969

Tanglewood Ready For Its Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced its schedule for the Berkshire Festival it holds each summer at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

The season will run from July 4 through Aug. 24, eight weeks with three concerts a week — Friday night at 9, Saturday night at 8 and Sunday afternoon at 2:30. The guest list is as impressive as ever.

CONDUCTORS: David Zineman, July 13; Charles Wilson, July 27; Pierre Boulez, Aug. 2; Daniel Barenboim, Aug. 3; Darel Ancert, Aug. 8; Josef Krips, Aug. 10; Max Rudolf, Aug. 16; Henry Lewis, Aug. 17, and Milton Katims, Aug. 22. This will be the last season for Erich Leinsdorf as musical director of the orchestra.

Pianists: Christoph Eschenback, July 4; Lilian Kallir, July 4; John Browning, July 5; Claude Frank, July 4, 6; Earl Wild, July 18, 25; Gilbert Kalish, July 18; Andre Watts, July 25; Vladimir Ashkenazy, July 26; Van Cliburn, Aug. 9, and Malcolm Frageer, Aug. 23.

Violinists: Joseph Silverstein, July 11,13, and Aug. 2; Paul Zukofsky, July 18, and Pinchas Zukerman, July 20.

Cellists: Jules Eskin, July 11 and Aug. 2, and Jarqueline DuPre, Aug. 3.

FLUTE: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, July 13. Oboe: Ralph Gombert, Aug. 2. Bassoon: Sherman Walt, Aug. 2.

Singers: Beverly Sills, soprano, July 12, Aug. 22 and 24; George Shierley, tenor, July 12; Jerold Siena, tenor, July 12; Raymond Michalski, bass, July 12; Richard Cassilly, tenor, July 26; Maralin Niska, July 26; Sherrill Milnes, baritone, July 26; Marilyn Home, soprano, Aug. 17; Florence Kopleff, contralto, Aug. 24; John Alexander, tenor, Aug. 24; Justino Diaz, Aug. 24.

Ensembles: Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Aug. 1 and 15. Choruses: Berkshire Chorus, July 26, Aug. 9 and 24; Tanglewood Choir, July 12 and 26, Aug. 9 and 24; Berkshire Boy Choir, July 26, Aug. 8.

CONTEMPORARY TRENDS will be a feature again this year. This brought rock, jazz, Indian and folk music to Tanglewood last summer. This year five Tuesday programs are planned, to be announced July 1.

The Boston Pops will play Aug. 5, Arthur Feidler conducting. The day-long gala, Tanglewood-on-Parade, will be held Aug. 19.

Ticket information may be obtained by writing to the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTING

RIDGEWOOD, N. J.
HERALD-NEWS
W. 13,000
MAY 8 1969

TWO SPECIAL CONCERTS conducted by Arthur Fiedler with the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra will extend the Tanglewood season this year -- adding two Labor Day weekend programs. The two additional concerts are Saturday, August 30, 8 p.m., and Sunday afternoon, August 31, at 2:30 in the Shed. Tickets are now on sale along with tickets for the 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, opens the 1969 season with three all-Mozart concerts -- each featuring one of Mozart's last three symphonies and one of his late piano concertos. Christoph Eschenback, John Browning, and Claude Frank are the opening weekend soloists.

Each Friday evening concert will be preceded by a Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. -- beginning Friday, July 4, with a joint recital by Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank playing Mozart piano music. The other Weekend Preludes are: Joseph Silverstein (violin) and Jules Eskin (cello), July 11; Paul Zukofsky (violin) and Gilbert Kalish (piano), July 18; Earl Wild (piano), July 25; Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Wind Quintet), August 1; Berkshire Boy Choir, August 8; Boston Symphony Chamber Players, August 15; Beverly Sills (soprano), August 22.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra (July 13); Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra (July 27); French composer Pierre Boulez (August 2); Israeli Daniel Barenboim (August 3); Karel Ancerl, newly - appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (August 8); Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony (August 10); Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cinncinati Symphony Orchestra (August 16); Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, (August 17); and Milton Katims, conductor of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, (August 22).

A brochure containing programs, soloists, conductors and ticket information is available by writing the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston 02115.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 223,251 SUN. 396,682
APR 20 1969

WESTBURY TIMES
Thursday, May

... opera, "Goyescas," by Enrique Granados, performed by students of the Manhattan School of Music. These students are generally first-rate, and the group that performed "Goyescas" certainly was, among them a baritone from Kansas City, Richard Taylor. His voice has sufficient quality to have earned him the opportunity to sing under Erich Leinsdorf this summer at Tanglewood, where he will be entrusted with the title role in Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," and he will also sing in a concert version of "Otello."

"Goyescas" is so seldom heard that it w...

The list of conductors who will join Erich Leinsdorf in his farewell summer as director of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. shows some interesting names (but not that of William Steinberg, who will succeed him as Music Director). Among them are David Zinman, the young American who has been active in Europe recently; Henry Lewis, director of the New Jersey Symphony; Daniel Barenboim, pianist-conductor; and composer-conductor Pierre Boulez. Leinsdorf will open the sequence on July 4 and close it on August 24 with a performance of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD CALL
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.
FEB 16 1969

10

Tanglewood Season Extended

LENOX, Mass.—This summer's season of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is being extended for a ninth weekend with Aug. 30-31 concerts by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the first concerts on the July 4 weekend with pianist Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning and Claude Frank as soloists in all-Mozart programs. A weekend prelude with pianist Lilian Kallir and Frank will open at 7 p.m. on July 4.

Other soloists during the summer include pianists Earl Wild, Gilbert Kalish, Van Cliburn, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Malcolm Frager and Andre Watts; violinists Pincus Zuckerman, Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky; cellists Jacqueline Du Pre and Jules Eskin; sopranos Beverly Sills and Marilyn Horne; tenors George Shirley, Richard Cassilly and John Alexander; mezzo-soprano Florence Kopleff; baritone Sherrill Milnes and bass Justino Diaz.

Guest conductors include Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim, Josef Krips, Karel Ancerl, Max Rudolf, Miltin Katims, Henry Lewis, David Zinman and Charles Wilson.

MUSIC ARTISTS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
6 TI. A YR. CIRC. N. AVAIL.
APR MAY 1969

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
MAY 24 1969

Tanglewood Festival: Leinsdorf/Boston Sym:
Henry Lewis, Georges Pretre, Josef Krips, Charles Wilson, Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim and Karel Ancerl. Also appearing as soloists will be violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Malcolm Frager & Van Cliburn, soprano Marilyn Horne and cellist Jacqueline du Pre. The beauty of the countryside has attracted visitors through the years. Ticket & additional information: Symphony Hall, Boston, Massachusetts 02115.

MASSACHUSETTS
101. Boston Pops Concerts
251 Huntington Avenue
Boston, Massachusetts 02115
102. Esplanade Concerts
Symphony Hall
Boston, Massachusetts 02115
103. Jacobs Pillow Dance Festival
P.O. Box 287
Lee, Massachusetts 01238
104. Tanglewood/Berkshire Festival; July 4 through August 24 with concerts given each Friday and Saturday night and Sunday afternoons in Lenox, Massachusetts; Erich Leinsdorf opens the season with German pianist Christoph Eschenbach making his Tanglewood debut and on August 24 for his final concert as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony"; all-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5 & 6; on July 12 Leinsdorf conducts "The Abduction from the Seraglio" and on July 26 "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily and baritone Sherrill Milnes. Guest conductors will include David Zinman,

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000
MAY 10 1969

stroll the beckoning beaches along its 400 miles of coastline.

THE magical spell of mountains and music bewitches visitors in the Massachusetts Berkshires area. At Tanglewood the strains of the Boston Symphony will be in the air from July 4 to Aug. 24, followed by the festive tunes of Arthur Fiedler's Boston Pops on Aug. 30 and 31. South in Lee, the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival will spring to life on June 26. On a different note, visit the Shaker Village in Hancock, to see the handiwork of this industrious sect. . . . In the On to Pioneer Valley, stroll its charming town of Old Deerfield, stroll its lovely tree-lined streets and view its beautifully restored homes of the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries. Springfield relives its heritage in Storrowtown, a delightful, reconstructed New England village of shops and meeting houses. And in Old Sturbridge Village you can happily while away days and hours snooping through reconstructed early 19th-century houses and craft shops. Boston means museums (the Fine Arts and Gardner along the Fenway, and the cluster around Harvard Univer-

cue

MAY 10, 1969 35¢

NEW ENGLAND RESORTS & DINING

10.

Tanglewood Season Extended

LENOX, Mass.—This summer's season of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is being extended for a ninth weekend with Aug. 30-31 concerts by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the first concerts on the July 4 weekend with pianist Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning and Claude Frank as soloists in all-Mozart programs. A weekend prelude with pianist Lilian Kallir and Frank will open at 7 p.m. on July 4.

Other soloists during the summer include pianists Earl Wild, Gilbert Kalish, Van Cliburn, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Malcolm Frager and Andre Watts; violinists Pincus Zuckerman, Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky; cellists Jacqueline Du Pre and Jules Eskin; sopranos Beverly Sills and Marilyn Horne; tenors George Shirley, Richard Cassilly and John Alexander; mezzo-soprano Florence Kopleff; baritone Sherrill Milnes and bass Justino Diaz.

Guest conductors include Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim, Josef Krips, Karel Ancerl, Max Rudolf, Miltin Katims, Henry Lewis, David Zinman and Charles Wilson.

MUSIC ARTISTS
NEW YORK, N.Y.
G. TL. A.Y.
APR MAY 1969

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
MAY 24 1969

Tanglewood Festival: Leinsdorf/Boston Sym.

Henry Lewis, Georges Pretre, Josef Krips, Charles Wilson, Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim and Karel Ancerl. Also appearing as soloists will be violinists Pinchas Zuckerman and Joseph Silverstein, pianists Emil Gilels, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Malcolm Frager & Van Cliburn, soprano Marilyn Horne and cellist Jacqueline du Pre. The beauty of the countryside has attracted visitors through the years. Ticket & additional information: Symphony Hall; Boston, Massachusetts 02115.

MASSACHUSETTS

101. Boston Pops Concerts
251 Huntington Avenue
Boston, Massachusetts 02115

102. Esplanade Concerts
Symphony Hall
Boston, Massachusetts 02115

103. Jacobs Pillow Dance Festival
P.O. Box 287
Lee, Massachusetts 01238

104. Tanglewood/Berkshire Festival; July 4 through August 24 with concerts given each Friday and Saturday night and Sunday afternoons in Lenox, Massachusetts; Erich Leinsdorf opens the season with German pianist Christoph Eschenbach making his Tanglewood debut and on August 24 for his final concert as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony"; all-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5 & 6; on July 12 Leinsdorf conducts "The Abduction from the Seraglio" and on July 26 "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily and baritone Sherrill Milnes. Guest conductors will include David Zinman,

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 244,000
MAY 10 1969

cue
MAY 10, 1969
35¢

stroll the beckoning beaches along its 400 miles of coastline.

THE magical spell of mountains and music bewitches visitors in the Massachusetts Berkshires area. At Tanglewood the strains of the Boston Symphony will be in the air from July 4 to Aug. 24, followed by the festive tunes of Arthur Fiedler's Boston Pops on Aug. 30 and 31. South in Lee, the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival will spring to life on June 26. On a different note, visit the Shaker Village in Hancock, to see the handiwork of this industrious sect. . . . In the On to Pioneer Valley. . . . In the charming town of Old Deerfield, stroll its lovely, tree-lined streets and view its beautifully restored homes of the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries. Springfield relives its heritage in Storrowton, a delightful, reconstructed New England village of shops and meeting houses. And in Old Sturbridge Village you can happily while away days and hours snooping through reconstructed early 19th-century houses and craft shops. Boston means museums (the Fine Arts and Gardner along the Fenway, and the cluster around Harvard Univer-

NEW ENGLAND RESORTS & DINING

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450
JUN 12 1969

NEWS (e)
MALDEN, MASS.
CIRC. 10,832
JUN 12 1969

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
JUN 12 1969

PRESS
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
(E) 19,775
JUN 27 1969

N.E. music jumping

By JOHN HAHN

BOSTON (UPI) — Music from baroque to folk-rock will be euging Broadway from the spotlight this summer in New England, long a bulwark of the straw-hat circuit.

While serious concerts will be as prevalent as ever, star attractions for younger audiences are moving strong into a field which for years had been almost exclusive to Broadway tryouts or revivals.

New England's largest suspension bridge will be an extra added attraction to motorists headed for the ever-popular jazz and folk music festivals at Newport, R.I., in July.

The Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., the granddaddy of outdoor musical events in the Northeast, will be tinged with nostalgia this summer as Erich Leinsdorf concludes his tenure with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sing and Sail

Folk singer Peter Seeger begins a unique series of concerts June 28 at Portland, Maine. With a musical group, Seeger then will sail aboard his Maine-built Hudson River style sloop down the New England coast to New York City, giving concerts at ports of call en route.

One of Seeger's stops will be during the Newport Folk Music Festival, July 16-20. The folk concerts follow the summer resort's season - opening Jazz Festival, which brackets the Independence Day weekend.

Gerry Mulligan and Woody Herman will be among the jazz attractions. Joining Seeger at the folk concerts will be Arlo Guthrie, Theodore Bikel and James Brown.

The Theater - by - the - Sea at Natunuck, R.I., is offering an 11-233 season starting June 20 with "Star - Spangled Girl." Other shows range from "The Killing of Sister George" and "A Lion in Winter" to "The Subject was Roses."

Fairy Tales

Theater - by - the - Sea this summer also will present musical versions of the classic fairy tales for children, commencing with "The Sleeping Beauty," given July 12 and 19.

In Maine, Lakewood Theater —the nation's oldest continuous summer playhouse — opens June 30 for its 69th season. It has basically the same shows as the Ogunquit Playhouse, only a week later — featuring Tom Ewell and Jane Cornell in "The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie," starting July 14, and James Whittemore in "The Chic Life," a comedy opening Aug. 4.

Ogunquit, which opens June 23 with Ewell and Miss Cornell, also has Arlene Francis in "Pal Joey" Aug. 11, and Eddie Bracken as of Aug. 18 in "You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running."

Tent-style theaters north and south of Boston will present weekly shows of the Broadway variety, sometimes featuring well-known celebrities of the television and movie world.

The South Shore Music Circus in Cohasset, for example, will separate its weekly shows with Sunday spectaculars, offering one-nighters including the Cowsills, Victor Borge and The Brooklyn Bridge.

Series of Specials

ly its former format of Broadway shows, the Carousel Theater in Framingham, Mass., this season will star a series of specials for young audiences.

The parade of presentations will start July 8 with Diana Ross and the Supremes, and Steve Wonder. Ann Corio's "This was Burlesque" with Steve Mills will give way, in order, to Tom Jones; The Temptations; Johnny Mathis; Blood, Sweat and Tears and other popular entertainers, in addition to a tempting schedule of Sunday night shows for the young.

Tanglewood audiences will not get a chance to see Leinsdorf's successor, William Steinberg, in action at Lenox, Mass., this summer but the Boston Symphony will be guest - conducted by Pierre Boulez, Karl Ancerl and Daniel Barenboim, among others.

In his last year with the festival, Leinsdorf scheduled music from the era of Bach to Edgar Varese, including a complete concert performance of Verdi's opera, "Otello."

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 434,330
JUN 1 1969

Summer Festivals Changing

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

In the panoramic survey of summer festivals offered last Sunday by the N. Y. Times, there was visible what may be a trend, and one of great importance. This is the inclusion in summertime programs of pieces a clear distance off the beaten path. The works are for the most part modern, and many are of recognized importance; significantly, conductors will be aiming them at an audience that, by all indications, buys its music in the vacation months alone.

Whether this indicates a new-found sense of responsibility of the part of conductors or merely their wish to add a little spice to musical fare that is by tradition safely bland, I don't know.

Here are some of the signs: at Saratoga, summer home of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy will preface Chopin and Mahler with Krystof Penderecki's Threnody "To the Victims of Hiroshima," an athematic, arhythmic work that's sure to set squirming a fair part of the audience, and later in the season, Ormandy is including an all-Viennese program, ordinarily a Strauss-dominated concoction of waltzes and schmalz, the "Seven Songs" of Alban Berg.

While Ormand's musicians are in Saratoga, Temple University in Philadelphia will host the Zagreb Philharmonic, making its U. S. debut at the Temple Univ. Music Festival. And here, too, new works will be interlarded among the old pieces, for example, by Milko Kelemen, Wolfgang Fortner, and Michael Tippett.

★ ★

Closer to home, Erich Leinsdorf, who is clearly interested in educating his public, will repeat from his in-town Boston Symphony season the Schoenberg "Survivor from Warsaw" and "Deserts" by Edgard Varese, both of which made Symphony Hall a livelier place to be this winter, while the new and ambitious Blossom Music Center, summer home of the Cleveland Orchestra, is following suit, scheduling Alan Hovaness with Schumann and Sibelius, Ulysses Kay with Schubert, Rachmaninoff and Tchaikovsky.

These are the big orchestral festivals which cater to large crowds and keep attendance figures foremost in mind. They are not going all that far in the pursuit of the new, it's true, but any movement at all is to be encouraged.

★

There are smaller scale festivals, of course, that are more select, more adventurous, and esentially more responsible. Most notable of among these is the Dartmouth Congregation of the Arts, the music segment of which will be built around the consecutive two-week guest appearances of composers Roger Sessions, Roberto Gerhard, and Luigi Dallapiccolo. And aside from this and close to hand is the excellent little series sponsored by the Yale School of Music at its summer site in Norfolk, Ct., and the choice Marlboro concerts in Marlboro, Vt.

From these smaller enterprises you can generally expect a higher quality of performance and a more knowledgeable choice of program. And it's to be hoped that the taste of the new that most followers will undoubtedly receive will lead them to these somewhat more discerning events.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JUN 4 1969

Andre Watts to Japan

American Negro pianist Andre Watts, 24, flies out Wed. (4) for Japan. He's on a five-week tour of Asian dates for the U.S. State Dept.

Upon his return to the States, Watts will be heard at the Berkshire Music Festival with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf.

Across a few rivers and into a few trees, Vermont's Marlboro Music Festival will open its 19th season July 5, with famed cellist Pablo Casals listed as resident conductor.

Moving on to Lenox, Mass., there is the nation's oldest major music festival—the Berkshire at Tanglewood—which gets under way July 4 with the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

The leafy cool of Tanglewood is matched by the beautiful beaches and zesty sea air of Newport, R.I., where this summer, the 16th annual Newport Jazz Festival plays perhaps its final engagement before being forced out of the area by a new bridge. The connecting road for the bridge is planned to run right through Festival Field.

Starting July 3, producer George Wein has programed an imposing list of jazz stars for the four-day event, and seasoned it with some of the best rock acts. Miles Davis, Art Blakey, Dave Brubeck, Gerry Mulligan, Bill Evans, Sun Ra, Roland Kirk and Freddie Hubbard will share the spotlight with the Mothers of Invention, Led Zeppelin and Blood, Sweat and Tears. It should be quite a confrontation.

Also due at Newport, July 16-20, is a Folk Festival featuring Johnny Cash, Arlo Guthrie, Son House, Joni Mitchell, Muddy Waters, Pete Seeger and many others. It may be the last year for folk and jazz at Newport, but it should be a memorable one.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 427,270
JUN 10 1969

Sounds Of Music From Tanglewood

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will begin July 4 weekend and opens with three Mozart concerts. The festival runs through Labor Day weekend with many guest conductors, including French composer Pierre Boulez, who will take over as music director of the New York Philharmonie in 1971.

The schedule is as follows:

July 4: Erich Leinsdorf (beginning his last summer with the Boston Symphony) conducts Mozart's Symphonies No. 29 and 39 and Piano Concerto in C, K. 467, with Christoph Eschenbach as guest pianist. Weekend prelude at 7 p.m. with Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank.

July 5: Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, Symphony No. 40 and piano concerto in A, K. 488, with John Browning as guest pianist.

July 6: Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's "Six German Dances," "Jupiter" Symphony and Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 595, with Claude Frank as guest pianist.

July 11: Leinsdorf conducts a Bach program with the four suites. Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin are guest artists in a weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

July 12: Leinsdorf conducts a Mozart opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio" (in German). Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski and the Tanglewood Choir perform.

July 13: David Zinman conducts Graff's Symphony for Strings, Handel's concerto grosso, Op. 6, No. 1, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer and Joseph Silverstein soloists, and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony.

July 18: Leinsdorf conducts Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri" Overture, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," and Scharwenka piano concerto 1 with Earl Wild on the piano. Paul Zukofsky, and Gilbert Kalish in a weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

July 19: Leinsdorf conducts Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliette" Suite.

July 20: Leinsdorf conducts Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, Introduction to Act II "Swan Lake" and the violin concerto with Pinchas Zuckerman as guest violinist.

July 25: Leinsdorf conducts Beethovan's "Egmont" Overture, Symphony No. 1 and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Andre Watts as guest pianist. Earl Wild plays piano in a weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

July 26: Leinsdorf conducts Verdi's "Otello" (in Italian) with Richard Cassilly, Maralin Niska and Sherrill Milnes, soloists.

July 27: Charles Wilson conducts Sibelius Symphony 2 and Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenazy in a piano guest appearance.

Aug. 1: Leinsdorf conducts Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," and Brahms' Symphony No. 4. Boston Symphony Chamber Players in the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Aug. 2: Pierre Boulez conducts Haydn's "Sinfonia concertante," with Joseph Silverstein, Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt and Jules Eskin; Debussy's "Jeux," Bartok's "Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra" with Joseph Silverstein and Debussy's "La Mer."

Aug. 3: Daniel Barenboim conducts Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture, Elgar's cello concerto with Jaqueline Du Pre as guest cellist, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

Aug. 8: Karel Ancerl conducts Smetana's "Ma Vlast." The Berkshire Boys' Choir does the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Aug. 9: Leinsdorf conducts Debussy's "Three Nocturnes" with the Women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir; Kurt Weill's suite from "The Threepenny Opera" and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 with Van Cliburn on piano.

Aug. 10: Josef Krips conducts Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Schubert's Symphony No. 9.

Aug. 15: Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Eroica" Symphonies. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players do the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Aug. 16: Max Rudolf conducts Haydn's symphony 91, Bartok's "Dance Suite" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

PIERRE BOULEZ

VLADIMIR ASHKENAZY

DANIEL BARENBOIM

Aug. 17: Henry Lewis conducts Berlioz' "Corsaire" Overture and "Nuits d'Ete," Mozart's "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tibo," Rossini's "Cruda Sorte," from "L'Italiana in Algeri" with Marilyn Horne and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

Aug. 22: Milton Katims conducts Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra" Overture, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis," and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite. Beverly Sills sings in the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Aug. 23: Leinsdorf conducts Varese's "Deserts," Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Frager on piano and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

Aug. 24: Leinsdorf conducts Berlioz' "Royal Hunt and Storm" from "The Trojans" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 with Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, Justino Diaz, Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir.

Aug. 30: Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

Aug. 31: Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

Music in the Air: It's Festival Time

By Bob Micklin
Newsday Music Critic

Fresh air, soft, warm breezes and an abundant variety of music and dance are the [redacted] the BeeGees, Steve Lawrence and Eydie Gorme, the Fifth Dimension and Peter, Paul and [redacted]

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450
JUN 12 1969

NEWS (e)
MALDEN, MASS.
CIRC. 10,832
JUN 12 1969

ITEM
CLINTON, MASS.
JUN 12 1969

PRESS
MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
(F) 19,775
JUN 27 1969

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 434,330
JUN 1 1969

N.E. music jumping

By JOHN HAHN

BOSTON (UPI) — Music from baroque to folk-rock will be ousting Broadway from the spotlight this summer in New England, long a bulwark of the straw-hat circuit.

While serious concerts will be as prevalent as ever, star attractions for younger audiences are moving strong into a field which for years had been almost exclusive to Broadway tryouts or revivals.

New England's largest suspension bridge will be an extra added attraction to motorists headed for the ever-popular jazz and folk music festivals at Newport, R.I., in July.

The Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., the granddaddy of outdoor musical events in the Northeast, will be tinged with nostalgia this summer as Erich Leinsdorf concludes his tenure with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sing and Sail

Folk singer Peter Seeger begins a unique series of concerts June 28 at Portland, Maine. With a musical group, Seeger then will sail aboard his Maine-built Hudson River style sloop down the New England coast to New York City, giving concerts at ports of call en route.

One of Seeger's stops will be during the Newport Folk Music Festival, July 16-20. The folk concerts follow the summer resort's season - opening Jazz Festival, which brackets the Independence Day weekend.

Gerry Mulligan and Woody Herman will be among the jazz attractions. Joining Seeger at the folk concerts will be Arlo Guthrie, Theodore Bikel and James Brown.

The Theater - by - the - Sea at Natunuck, R.I., is offering an 11-233 season starting June 20 with "Star - Spangled Girl." Other shows range from "The Killing of Sister George" and "A Lion in Winter" to "The Subject was Roses."

Fairy Tales

Theater - by - the - Sea this summer also will present musical versions of the classic fairy tales for children, commencing with "The Sleeping Beauty," given July 12 and 19.

In Maine, Lakewood Theater —the nation's oldest continuous summer playhouse — opens June 30 for its 69th season. It has basically the same shows as the Ogunquit Playhouse, only a week later — featuring Tom Ewell and Jane Cornell in "The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie," starting July 14, and James Whittemore in "The Chic Life," a comedy opening Aug. 4.

Ogunquit, which opens June 23 with Ewell and Miss Cornell, also has Arlene Francis in "Pal Joey" Aug. 11, and Eddie Bracken as of Aug. 18 in "You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running."

Tent-style theaters north and south of Boston will present weekly shows of the Broadway variety, sometimes featuring well-known celebrities of the television and movie world.

The South Shore Music Circus in Cohasset, for example, will separate its weekly shows with Sunday spectaculars, offering one-nighters including the Cowsills, Victor Borge and The Brooklyn Bridge.

Series of Specials

ly its former format of Broadway shows, the Carousel Theater in Framingham, Mass., this season will star a series of specials for young audiences.

The parade of presentations will start July 8 with Diana Ross and the Supremes, and Steve Wonder. Ann Corio's "This was Burlesque" with Steve Mills will give way, in order, to Tom Jones; The Temptations; Johnny Mathis; Blood, Sweat and Tears and other popular entertainers, in addition to a tempting schedule of Sunday night shows for the young.

Tanglewood audiences will not get a chance to see Leinsdorf's successor, William Steinberg, in action at Lenox, Mass., this summer but the Boston Symphony will be guest - conducted by Pierre Boulez, Karl Ancerl and Daniel Barenboim, among others.

In his last year with the festival, Leinsdorf scheduled music from the era of Bach to Edgar Varese, including a complete concert performance of Verdi's opera, "Otello."

JUN 1 1969

Summer Festivals Changing

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

In the panoramic survey of summer festivals offered last Sunday by the N. Y. Times, there was visible what may be a trend, and one of great importance. This is the inclusion in summertime programs of pieces a clear distance off the beaten path. The works are for the most part modern, and many are of recognized importance; significantly, conductors will be aiming them at an audience that, by all indications, buys its music in the vacation months alone.

Whether this indicates a new-found sense of responsibility of the part of conductors or merely their wish to add a little spice to musical fare that is by tradition safely bland, I don't know.

Here are some of the signs: at Saratoga, summer home of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy will preface Chopin and Mahler with Krystof Penderecki's Threnody "To the Victims of Hiroshima," an athematic, arhythmic work that's sure to set squirming a fair part of the audience, and later in the season, Ormandy is including an all-Viennese program, ordinarily a Strauss-dominated concoction of waltzes and schmalz, the "Seven Songs" of Alban Berg.

While Ormand's musicians are in Saratoga, Temple University in Philadelphia will host the Zagreb Philharmonic, making its U. S. debut at the Temple Univ. Music Festival. And here, too, new works will be interlarded among the old pieces, for example, by Milko Kelemen, Wolfgang Fortner, and Michael Tippett.

★

Closer to home, Erich Leinsdorf, who is clearly interested in educating his public, will repeat from his in-town Boston Symphony season the Schoenberg "Survivor from Warsaw" and "Deserts" by Edgard Varese, both of which made Symphony Hall a livelier place to be this winter, while the new and ambitious Blossom Music Center, summer home of the Cleveland Orchestra, is following suit, scheduling Alan Hovaness with Schumann and Sibelius, Ulysses Kay with Schubert, Rachmaninoff and Tchaikovsky.

These are the big orchestral festivals which cater to large crowds and keep attendance figures foremost in mind. They are not going all that far in the pursuit of the new, it's true, but any movement at all is to be encouraged.

★

There are smaller scale festivals, of course, that are more select, more adventurous, and esentially more responsible. Most notable of among these is the Dartmouth Congregation of the Arts, the music segment of which will be built around the consecutive two-week guest appearances of composers Roger Sessions, Roberto Gerhard, and Luigi Dallapiccolo. And aside from this and close to hand is the excellent little series sponsored by the Yale School of Music at its summer site in Norfolk, Ct., and the choice Marlboro concerts in Marlboro, Vt.

From these smaller enterprises you can generally expect a higher quality of performance and a more knowledgeable choice of program. And it's to be hoped that the taste of the new that most followers will undoubtedly receive will lead them to these somewhat more discerning events.

Across a few rivers and into a few trees, Vermont's Marlboro Music Festival will open its 19th season July 5, with famed cellist Pablo Casals listed as resident conductor.

Moving on to Lenox, Mass., there is the nation's oldest major music festival—the Berkshire at Tanglewood—which gets under way July 4 with the Boston Symphony in an all-Mozart program conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

The leafy cool of Tanglewood is matched by the beautiful beaches and zesty sea air of Newport, R.I., where this summer, the 16th annual Newport Jazz Festival plays perhaps its final engagement before being forced out of the area by a new bridge. The connecting road for the bridge is planned to run right through Festival Field.

Starting July 3, producer George Wein has programed an imposing list of jazz stars for the four-day event, and seasoned it with some of the best rock acts. Miles Davis, Art Blakey, Dave Brubeck, Gerry Mulligan, Bill Evans, Sun Ra, Roland Kirk and Freddie Hubbard will share the spotlight with the Mothers of Invention, Led Zeppelin and Blood, Sweat and Tears. It should be quite a confrontation.

Also due at Newport, July 16-20, is a Folk Festival featuring Johnny Cash, Arlo Guthrie, Son House, Joni Mitchell, Muddy Waters, Pete Seeger and many others. It may be the last year for folk and jazz at Newport, but it should be a memorable one.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JUN 4 1969

Andre Watts to Japan

American Negro pianist Andre Watts, 24, flies out Wed. (4) for Japan. He's on a five-week tour of Asian dates for the U.S. State Dept.

Upon his return to the States, Watts will be heard at the Berkshire Music Festival with the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 427,270
JUN 10 1969

Sounds Of Music From Tanglewood

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will begin July 4 weekend and opens with three Mozart concerts. The festival runs through Labor Day weekend with many guest conductors, including French composer Pierre Boulez, who will take over as music director of the New York Philharmonic in 1971.

The schedule is as follows:

July 4: Erich Leinsdorf (beginning his last summer with the Boston Symphony) conducts Mozart's Symphonies No. 29 and 39 and Piano Concerto in C, K. 467, with Christoph Eschenbach as guest pianist. Weekend prelude at 7 p.m. with Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank.

July 5: Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, Symphony No. 40 and piano concerto in A, K. 488, with John Browning as guest pianist.

July 6: Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's "Six German Dances," "Jupiter" Symphony and Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 595, with Claude Frank as guest pianist.

July 11: Leinsdorf conducts a Bach program with the four suites. Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin are guest artists in a weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

July 12: Leinsdorf conducts a Mozart opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio" (in German). Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski and the Tanglewood Choir perform.

July 13: David Zinman conducts Graff's Symphony for Strings, Handel's concerto grosso, Op. 6, No. 1, with Doriot Anthony Dwyer and Joseph Silverstein soloists, and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony.

July 18: Leinsdorf conducts Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri" Overture, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," and Scharwenka piano concerto 1 with Earl Wild on the piano. Paul Zukofsky, and Gilbert Kalish in a weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

July 19: Leinsdorf conducts Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliette" Suite.

July 20: Leinsdorf conducts Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, Introduction to Act II "Swan Lake" and the violin concerto with Pinchas Zuckerman as guest violinist.

July 25: Leinsdorf conducts Beethóvan's "Egmont" Overture, Symphony No. 1 and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 with Andre Watts as guest pianist. Earl Wild plays piano in a weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

July 26: Leinsdorf conducts Verdi's "Otello" (in Italian) with Richard Cassilly, Maralin Niska and Sherrill Milnes, soloists.

July 27: Charles Wilson conducts Sibelius Symphony 2 and Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenazy in a piano guest appearance.

Aug. 1: Leinsdorf conducts Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," and Brahms' Symphony No. 4. Boston Symphony Chamber Players in the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Aug. 2: Pierre Boulez conducts Haydn's "Sinfonia concertante," with Joseph Silverstein, Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt and Jules Eskin; Debussy's "Jeux," Bartok's "Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra" with Joseph Silverstein and Debussy's "La Mer."

Aug. 3: Daniel Barenboim conducts Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture, Elgar's cello concerto with Jaqueline Du Pre as guest cellist, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5.

Aug. 8: Karel Ancerl conducts Smetana's "Ma Vlast." The Berkshire Boys' Choir does the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Aug. 9: Leinsdorf conducts Debussy's "Three Nocturnes" with the Women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir; Kurt Weill's suite from "The Threepenny Opera" and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 with Van Cliburn on piano.

Aug. 10: Josef Krips conducts Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Schubert's Symphony No. 9.

Aug. 15: Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Eroica" Symphonies. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players do the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Aug. 16: Max Rudolf conducts Haydn's symphony 91, Bartok's "Dance Suite" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony.

PIERRE BOULEZ

VLADIMIR ASHKENAZY

DANIEL BARENBOIM

Aug. 17: Henry Lewis conducts Berlioz' "Corsaire" Overture and "Nuits d'Ete," Mozart's "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tibo," Rossini's "Cruda Sorte," from "L'Italiana in Algeri" with Marilyn Horne and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

Aug. 22: Milton Katims conducts Rossini's "La Gazza Ladra" Overture, Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis," and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite. Beverly Sills sings in the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Aug. 23: Leinsdorf conducts Varese's "Deserts," Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with Malcolm Frager on piano and Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite.

Aug. 24: Leinsdorf conducts Berlioz' "Royal Hunt and Storm" from "The Trojans" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 with Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, Justino Diaz, Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir.

Aug. 30: Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

Aug. 31: Arthur Fiedler conducts the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra.

Music in the Air: It's Festival Time

By Bob Micklin
Newsday Music Critic

Fresh air, soft, warm breezes and an abundant variety of music and dance are the

the BeeGees, Steve Lawrence and Eydie Gorme, the Fifth Dimension and Peter, Paul and 12.

Mozart and Acid Rock; swing to Bach, sway to the Generation Gap; drink wine to Wagner and have lunch at the ballet—all this is part of the scene in the Berkshires, the center for America's zappiest music and dance institutions

TANGLEWOOD

The state of the Berkshire Festival—familiarly known as Tanglewood—is such that nature wins flat-out on weekends. Formal gardens cover most of its two-hundred-ten acres. Thick lawns, lines of pines and hemlock hedges stretch to the horizon. The air is scented with pine; clear and mountain fresh. There are no "No" signs and not very much litter. Smaller wonder that it's been described as "the pastoral music capital of the United States."

Originally, Tanglewood was a private estate overlooking shimmering Lake Mahkeenak between Lenox and Stockbridge, Massachusetts. Longfellow, Holmes and Melville met there in the 1850's—this is where Hawthorne got the idea for Tanglewood Tales and where he wrote The House of Seven Gables.

In 1936 Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Gorham Brooks donated Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for use as its summer home. At the time Serge Koussevitzky was musical director. Fifteen thousand people attended the first Berkshire Festival. Now more than 220,000 people visit the B.S.O. summer home each year. The festival season begins on June 29 and lasts until August 24, and its schedule includes twenty-four weekend performances by the Boston Symphony as well as concerts by the Boston Symphony chamber players and guest artists.

In 1940 Koussevitzky founded the Berkshire Music Center because he believed musicians and composers should share "a summer of living and working with music." The Center developed under his leadership to flourish as a springboard for the most promising young musicians in the country.

Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Prime time programming is a common denominator around here and Brahms wafts sweetly over the Sunday esthetes . . . chartered buses arrive with old folks casually dressed. Bearded professors stretch out on blankets. Couples with a leaning towards hair and babies. Here and there a student is studying a score. There are few children and almost no black people.

My thoughts wander . . . twenty years ago. The question then was should I go into my father's business or play a trombone that summer vacation? I had passed the audition for the student Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. For reasons it took me three years of analysis to explain, I opted for the old man. Although I eventually went back to music, it was not of the "serious" variety and it seems strange to finally come to Tanglewood for the first time as, of all things, a writer. Lying on the grass during the third movement, I marvel at the importance of decisions at eighteen . . . I could be playing Brahms instead of listening to him today.

Earlier that day, however, I had been rudely reminded of my current role. Although The Shed is the main show—it's a kind of steel tent with open sides and 6,000 seats where the Boston Symphony plays—Tanglewood also presents concerts of less than mass appeal in the Chamber Continued on Page 90

by Michael Zwerin
photographs by Bud Lee

HOLIDAY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,032,000

JUN 1969

TANGLEWOOD

Continued from Page 55

Music Hall and the Theatre Concert Hall, the latter being an organically modern structure designed by Eliel Saarinen. At nine-thirty it was chilly enough for a parka. The sky was spotless and deeply blue. Collegiate types stood about chatting on the still-dewy grass to the rear of the theater, which has no wall.

This would be the last concert of a two-week "Festival of Contemporary Music," featuring people like Varèse and Webern. More my speed, I had to admit.

During intermission I spotted a young man we shall refer to as Kent Plunkett, an ex-bassist with many jazz giants and now a member of the B.S.O. We had never met. Having a weekly jazz column to write, however, and smelling an interesting story, I approached him and introduced myself.

"I know you. You're a big jazz critic." He responded with a sardonic smile and did not accept my extended hand.

"Oh . . . yes . . . well . . . I was wondering if we could get together for a talk."

"No!" He scowled. "I don't talk to jazz critics. The last time I did, the guy used everything I said in his book without giving me any credit." He walked away, throwing over his shoulder, "You critics have all the bread anyway."

Never mind. The little exchange serves a purpose. For one thing, it illustrates the fragmented social side of the jazz world today. And it reminds me that jazz has almost totally disappeared—at least temporarily—from Lenox, Massachusetts, and environs.

Jerzi Sapiejewski waits for his weekly lesson in Gunther Schuller's wood-and-stone living room. Their old mill house—with "ANNO 1830" carved over the entrance—is enveloped by the greenery of old Stockbridge, a village about ten minutes from Lenox. The room is beamed high and of enormous proportions so that a grand piano, three couches and many sturdy antique pieces do not begin to clutter the space. Ran Blake, an unsung hero of jazz who is assisting Gunther for the summer, passes through time, after time carrying scores of sheet music while Gunther's wife bustles about in the kitchen. His son answers the phone—which rings often—and calls "Daddy." Daddy is a tall man who grew sideburns with the rest of us. He seems resigned to the interruptions.

In his early twenties, Jerzi has a face that Roman Polanski, the Polish film director, might approve for a romantic lead. But he left Warsaw over a year ago and composes "serious" music. On Wednesday morning, he tells me, the same Berkshire Festival Orchestra I once rejected will perform the score he is going over for my benefit. It has a juicy trombone part and I feel a by now unfamiliar tingle in the muscles that once constituted my embouchure. I continue taking notes, not playing them.

Gunther meanwhile is running over an hour behind schedule as usual. At forty-four, he has been performed by and conducted the New York Philharmonic among others. His scholarly book, Early Jazz, has been acclaimed by the critics. He is president of the New England Conservatory and head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Tanglewood Music School to which Jerzi submitted scores and received a scholarship along with nine other successful applicants. Yesterday, a creative photographer asked him to pose composing in a picturesque antique bathtub. When last seen, Gunther was jogging from lesson to rehearsal munching lunch enroute.

You can't eat culture and, hungry in Lenox, one is apt to run into Philistines.

Friday night: The scene is the Five Seasons, a rustic, postered saloon in a "country inn" named Avaloch.

Customer: "Is it possible to get something to eat here?"

Waiter: "If you tip heavy it is."

A townie nods out beside his bottle of brew. Under him—and everybody—a floor is atmospherically loading with butts. The juke box is soulful. Beer flows like beer and everybody drinks; groovy man, really neat, you betcha. Almost to the floor, the townie is propped at the last minute by a large and tattooed friend. "There you go, Buddy Boy."

Outside in a jammed garden strung with lights, Gordon Rose and the Generation Gap swing some hard electric blues for young dancing pleasure. Senior citizens—guests at the hotel and unable to sleep through the noise, I am told—observe numbly from grassy banks on the other side. As always, they are armed with folding chairs. A sign at the gate demands "$1 admission—HAVE MONEY READY!"

Inevitably Tanglewood has "parasites" recitals, art exhibits, festivals of lesser scope. With a little effort it is possible to catch in a twenty-four-hour period a Bartók concert, a dance recital by Merce Cunningham and his troupe and also fit in a visit to The Berkshire Playhouse as well as a party or two in Stockbridge. The problem is one of elimination and stamina.

With that in mind I drove reluctantly to Jacob's Pillow on Saturday afternoon. I say reluctantly because I was unhappy about missing a chamber music concert. But as I drove through Lee, past a postman buying a five-cent lemonade from a little girl sitting Lucylike behind a crooked packing-case stand, I kept telling myself that Jacob's Pillow was a dancer's haven. And had been ever since "Papa" Ted Shawn founded the place in the Thirties with his wife and dancing partner Ruth St. Denis. Since then it has flourished as the leading experimental dance workshop in the country and everyone from Martha Graham to the Joffrey Ballet has performed there.

Why then did I resent going? It wasn't only the missed concert. I have never been a particular fan of the dance.

Continued on Page 96

TANGLEWOOD

Continued from Page 91

The entire form seemed to me contrived, decadent, almost laughable and certainly not interesting. Possibly, since I have put my share of time in orchestra pits, I retain some of the musician's resentment against what he considers his essential element being demoted to mere accompaniment. And in view of the reduced lot of working musicians these days, I was particularly uptight, as they say, by the fact that, except for occasional piano accompaniment, the only music at Jacob's Pillow is on tape. (The American Federation of Musicians has not exactly dealt vigorously with the problem of automation.)

However, principles were overlooked and spirits improved as soon as I arrived at the Pillow. The theater is a red barn and it nestles on the side of a lush Berkshire hill. Edward Villella's first flying leap from the wings and Patricia McBride's flowing, poetic body also contributed to the sense of improved being. A dancer must, to be successful, use, control and synchronize every part of the body, including mind and ears. I ended up applauding as vigorously and as long as everybody else.

Saturday night: Lenox proper; it's all you can expect from a small, unspoiled town in New England. Except for one sign—"Budweiser, Joe's Grill" on a side street—it is devoid of neon. Gracious, clean, painted houses sit way back, separated from the streets by cut lawns and shade. A few have signs that signify that paying guests are welcome. The Curtis Hotel straddles the main intersection. It is a wooden whale of an old place with a surrounding covered porch, where some guests sit on wicker armchairs and rockers. You can, furthermore, tell it's very old-fashioned by a sign over the registration desk: "No credit cards honored until further notice."

A cut or two above a thruway stop five miles north of town on Route Seven is Lenox House, which serves good plain American food. Every so often during dinner, Muzak's "Full Moon and Empty Arms" is interrupted by a commercial announcement; "Marcus party . . . Marcus please . . . Party of four." The Marcus party is all Capri pants and bejeweled harlequins. They haven't spoken to each other in fifteen minutes, let alone smiled.

Back under the Shed, Gina Bachauer, Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony and Sergei Rachmaninoff are teamed up and knocking everybody out with the strains of (would I lie to you?) "Full Moon and Empty Arms." It's enough to make you cry.

Then it's over to Eastover, "New England's largest year-round resort," where the management claims, "We are about the only place still catering to young adults. Almost everyone else has gone either family or longhair." You will find neither Jimi Hendrix nor Ludwig van Beethoven at Eastover, only young adults in search of mates.

The crowd waiting for hamburgers around midnight is large and on the make. Master Lonelyhearts over there clutches some broad, kissing her hard as I go to the counter for food. Without loosening his grip, he turns to me and remarks; "Hey, cantcha see deres a line? Whatsa matta witcha?" A country band wails "Born to Lose." Awkward lovers stroll outside, holding strange hands. Fat young adults stroll alone.

Sunday night: It seems like a Monday in some ways. Lenox has emptied. Nothing is shaking except chamber music at the Music Inn, Daniel Antoun conducting. Antoun, former director of the Baalbek Music Festival in Lebanon, just bought the place, a wreck after a year of neglect. The Inn is open for European-plan guests but occupation is quite far from capacity. It seems like off-season here.

A couple with two children walk away upon learning that admission is three-fifty each. But the ticket-taker lady says, "Buy two and we'll let the kids in free." Quite a few children are inside, considering that ninety percent of the six hundred seats are not occupied. The Hall is the former lobby and very rustic. The audience contains some Indian shirts and love beads too. Many people seem to know one another. Nobody is dressed up—except for Norman Rockwell, a local resident who looks as though he might have drawn himself.

The players file on stage. Marilyn DuBow seems about fifteen and not much more than a hundred pounds. However, she turns out to be a heavy violinist indeed. Raphael Diaz resembles Donovan the pop star, with whom he toured the States playing cello. Angus Whyte wears a smile at the harpsichord; last week he wore his Bach sweatshirt while delivering a lecture on baroque music. All twelve of them are recently out of the conservatory, living in at the Inn for the summer, enthusiastic and extremely competent. Buxtehude, Marcello, Bach and Pinkham sparkle. Not one popular song all evening. Ecstatic applause, deserved.

Invigorated, I repair down the road a piece to "La Cave de la Comtesse, a small French boîte where one plays games, has a drink, chats quietly by the fire and listens to romantic music. . . . It is a club for Wheatleigh guests and assorted friends. Be our friend."

Conversation is interrupted by the bartender on mike. "I'm going to sing a song in Hindi." He does and more. All the drinkers pause, attentive and polite. Then another captive half hour with Ran Blake at the grand. And once again Phil Barber quiets down the house for an act. Too much culture. Further art appreciation is out of the question and I excuse myself to roam in the garden. The night is cool, bright with stars and a yellow moon. Hawthorne, I imagine, once held the same view. Trees rustle gently. I can almost hear an eighteen-year-old boy practicing his trombone. THE END 12.

Mozart and Acid Rock; swing to Bach, sway to the Generation Gap; drink wine to Wagner and have lunch at the ballet—all this is part of the scene in the Berkshires, the center for America's zappiest music and dance institutions

TANGLEWOOD

The state of the Berkshire Festival—familiarly known as Tanglewood—is such that nature wins flat-out on weekends. Formal gardens cover most of its two-hundred-ten acres. Thick lawns, lines of pines and hemlock hedges stretch to the horizon. The air is scented with pine; clear and mountain fresh. There are no "No" signs and not very much litter. Smaller wonder that it's been described as "the pastoral music capital of the United States."

Originally, Tanglewood was a private estate overlooking shimmering Lake Mahkeenak between Lenox and Stockbridge, Massachusetts. Longfellow, Holmes and Melville met there in the 1850's—this is where Hawthorne got the idea for Tanglewood Tales and where he wrote The House of Seven Gables.

In 1936 Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Gorham Brooks donated Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for use as its summer home. At the time Serge Koussevitzky was musical director. Fifteen thousand people attended the first Berkshire Festival. Now more than 220,000 people visit the B.S.O. summer home each year. The festival season begins on June 29 and lasts until August 24, and its schedule includes twenty-four weekend performances by the Boston Symphony as well as concerts by the Boston Symphony chamber players and guest artists.

In 1940 Koussevitzky founded the Berkshire Music Center because he believed musicians and composers should share "a summer of living and working with music." The Center developed under his leadership to flourish as a springboard for the most promising young musicians in the country.

Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Prime time programming is a common denominator around here and Brahms wafts sweetly over the Sunday esthetes . . . chartered buses arrive with old folks casually dressed. Bearded professors stretch out on blankets. Couples with a leaning towards hair and babies. Here and there a student is studying a score. There are few children and almost no black people.

My thoughts wander . . . twenty years ago. The question then was should I go into my father's business or play a trombone that summer vacation? I had passed the audition for the student Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. For reasons it took me three years of analysis to explain, I opted for the old man. Although I eventually went back to music, it was not of the "serious" variety and it seems strange to finally come to Tanglewood for the first time as, of all things, a writer. Lying on the grass during the third movement, I marvel at the importance of decisions at eighteen . . . I could be playing Brahms instead of listening to him today.

Earlier that day, however, I had been rudely reminded of my current role. Although The Shed is the main show—it's a kind of steel tent with open sides and 6,000 seats where the Boston Symphony plays—Tanglewood also presents concerts of less than mass appeal in the Chamber Continued on Page 90

by Michael Zwerin
photographs by Bud Lee

HOLIDAY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,032,000

JUN 1969

TANGLEWOOD

Continued from Page 55

Music Hall and the Theatre Concert Hall, the latter being an organically modern structure designed by Eliel Saarinen. At nine-thirty it was chilly enough for a parka. The sky was spotless and deeply blue. Collegiate types stood about chatting on the still-dewy grass to the rear of the theater, which has no wall.

This would be the last concert of a two-week "Festival of Contemporary Music," featuring people like Varèse and Webern. More my speed, I had to admit.

During intermission I spotted a young man we shall refer to as Kent Plunkett, an ex-bassist with many jazz giants and now a member of the B.S.O. We had never met. Having a weekly jazz column to write, however, and smelling an interesting story, I approached him and introduced myself.

"I know you. You're a big jazz critic." He responded with a sardonic smile and did not accept my extended hand.

"Oh . . . yes . . . well . . . I was wondering if we could get together for a talk."

"No!" He scowled. "I don't talk to jazz critics. The last time I did, the guy used everything I said in his book without giving me any credit." He walked away, throwing over his shoulder, "You critics have all the bread anyway."

Never mind. The little exchange serves a purpose. For one thing, it illustrates the fragmented social side of the jazz world today. And it reminds me that jazz has almost totally disappeared—at least temporarily—from Lenox, Massachusetts, and environs.

Jerzi Sapiejewski waits for his weekly lesson in Gunther Schuller's wood-and-stone living room. Their old mill house—with "ANNO 1830" carved over the entrance—is enveloped by the greenery of old Stockbridge, a village about ten minutes from Lenox. The room is beamed high and of enormous proportions so that a grand piano, three couches and many sturdy antique pieces do not begin to clutter the space. Ran Blake, an unsung hero of jazz who is assisting Gunther for the summer, passes through time after time carrying scores of sheet music while Gunther's wife bustles about in the kitchen. His son answers the phone—which rings often—and calls "Daddy." Daddy is a tall man who grew sideburns with the rest of us. He seems resigned to the interruptions.

In his early twenties, Jerzi has a face that Roman Polanski, the Polish film director, might approve for a romantic lead. But he left Warsaw over a year ago and composes "serious" music. On Wednesday morning, he tells me, the same Berkshire Festival Orchestra I once rejected will perform the score he is going over for my benefit. It has a juicy trombone part and I feel a by now unfamiliar tingle in the muscles that once constituted my embouchure. I continue taking notes, not playing them.

Gunther meanwhile is running over an hour behind schedule as usual. At forty-four, he has been performed by and conducted the New York Philharmonic among others. His scholarly book, Early Jazz, has been acclaimed by the critics. He is president of the New England Conservatory and head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Tanglewood Music School to which Jerzi submitted scores and received a scholarship along with nine other successful applicants. Yesterday, a creative photographer asked him to pose composing in a picturesque antique bathtub. When last seen, Gunther was jogging from lesson to rehearsal munching lunch enroute.

You can't eat culture and, hungry in Lenox, one is apt to run into Philistines.

Friday night: The scene is the Five Seasons, a rustic, postered saloon in a "country inn" named Avaloch.

Customer: "Is it possible to get something to eat here?"

Waiter: "If you tip heavy it is."

A townie nods out beside his bottle of brew. Under him—and everybody—a floor is atmospherically loading with butts. The juke box is soulful. Beer flows like beer and everybody drinks; groovy man, really neat, you betcha. Almost to the floor, the townie is propped at the last minute by a large and tattooed friend. "There you go, Buddy Boy."

Outside in a jammed garden strung with lights, Gordon Rose and the Generation Gap swing some hard electric blues for young dancing pleasure. Senior citizens—guests at the hotel and unable to sleep through the noise, I am told—observe numbly from grassy banks on the other side. As always, they are armed with folding chairs. A sign at the gate demands "$1 admission—HAVE MONEY READY!"

Inevitably Tanglewood has "parasites" recitals, art exhibits, festivals of lesser scope. With a little effort it is possible to catch in a twenty-four-hour period a Bartók concert, a dance recital by Merce Cunningham and his troupe and also fit in a visit to The Berkshire Playhouse as well as a party or two in Stockbridge. The problem is one of elimination and stamina.

With that in mind I drove reluctantly to Jacob's Pillow on Saturday afternoon. I say reluctantly because I was unhappy about missing a chamber music concert. But as I drove through Lee, past a postman buying a five-cent lemonade from a little girl sitting Lucylike behind a crooked packing-case stand, I kept telling myself that Jacob's Pillow was a dancer's haven. And had been ever since "Papa" Ted Shawn founded the place in the Thirties with his wife and dancing partner Ruth St. Denis. Since then it has flourished as the leading experimental dance workshop in the country and everyone from Martha Graham to the Joffrey Ballet has performed there.

Why then did I resent going? It wasn't only the missed concert. I have never been a particular fan of the dance. Continued on Page 96

TANGLEWOOD

Continued from Page 91

The entire form seemed to me contrived, decadent, almost laughable and certainly not interesting. Possibly, since I have put my share of time in orchestra pits, I retain some of the musician's resentment against what he considers his essential element being demoted to mere accompaniment. And in view of the reduced lot of working musicians these days, I was particularly uptight, as they say, by the fact that, except for occasional piano accompaniment, the only music at Jacob's Pillow is on tape. (The American Federation of Musicians has not exactly dealt vigorously with the problem of automation.)

However, principles were overlooked and spirits improved as soon as I arrived at the Pillow. The theater is a red barn and it nestles on the side of a lush Berkshire hill. Edward Villella's first flying leap from the wings and Patricia McBride's flowing, poetic body also contributed to the sense of improved being. A dancer must, to be successful, use, control and synchronize every part of the body, including mind and ears. I ended up applauding as vigorously and as long as everybody else.

Saturday night: Lenox proper; it's all you can expect from a small, unspoiled town in New England. Except for one sign—"Budweiser, Joe's Grill" on a side street—it is devoid of neon. Gracious, clean, painted houses sit way back, separated from the streets by cut lawns and shade. A few have signs that signify that paying guests are welcome. The Curtis Hotel straddles the main intersection. It is a wooden whale of an old place with a surrounding covered porch, where some guests sit on wicker armchairs and rockers. You can, furthermore, tell it's very old-fashioned by a sign over the registration desk: "No credit cards honored until further notice."

A cut or two above a thruway stop five miles north of town on Route Seven is Lenox House, which serves good plain American food. Every so often during dinner, Muzak's "Full Moon and Empty Arms" is interrupted by a commercial announcement; "Marcus party . . . Marcus please . . . Party of four." The Marcus party is all Capri pants and bejeweled harlequins. They haven't spoken to each other in fifteen minutes, let alone smiled.

Back under the Shed, Gina Bachauer, Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony and Sergei Rachmaninoff are teamed up and knocking everybody out with the strains of (would I lie to you?) "Full Moon and Empty Arms." It's enough to make you cry.

Then it's over to Eastover, "New England's largest year-round resort," where the management claims, "We are about the only place still catering to young adults. Almost everyone else has gone either family or longhair." You will find neither Jimi Hendrix nor Ludwig van Beethoven at Eastover, only young adults in search of mates.

The crowd waiting for hamburgers around midnight is large and on the make. Master Lonelyhearts over there clutches some broad, kissing her hard as I go to the counter for food. Without loosening his grip, he turns to me and remarks; "Hey, cantcha see deres a line? Whatsa matta witcha?" A country band wails "Born to Lose." Awkward lovers stroll outside, holding strange hands. Fat young adults stroll alone.

Sunday night: It seems like a Monday in some ways. Lenox has emptied. Nothing is shaking except chamber music at the Music Inn, Daniel Antoun conducting. Antoun, former director of the Baalbek Music Festival in Lebanon, just bought the place, a wreck after a year of neglect. The Inn is open for European-plan guests but occupation is quite far from capacity. It seems like off-season here.

A couple with two children walk away upon learning that admission is three-fifty each. But the ticket-taker lady says, "Buy two and we'll let the kids in free." Quite a few children are inside, considering that ninety percent of the six hundred seats are not occupied. The Hall is the former lobby and very rustic. The audience contains some Indian shirts and love beads too. Many people seem to know one another. Nobody is dressed up—except for Norman Rockwell, a local resident who looks as though he might have drawn himself.

The players file on stage. Marilyn DuBow seems about fifteen and not much more than a hundred pounds. However, she turns out to be a heavy violinist indeed. Raphael Diaz resembles Donovan the pop star, with whom he toured the States playing cello. Angus Whyte wears a smile at the harpsichord; last week he wore his Bach sweatshirt while delivering a lecture on baroque music. All twelve of them are recently out of the conservatory, living in at the Inn for the summer, enthusiastic and extremely competent. Buxtehude, Marcello, Bach and Pinkham sparkle. Not one popular song all evening. Ecstatic applause, deserved.

Invigorated, I repair down the road a piece to "La Cave de la Comtesse, a small French boîte where one plays games, has a drink, chats quietly by the fire and listens to romantic music. . . . It is a club for Wheatleigh guests and assorted friends. Be our friend."

Conversation is interrupted by the bartender on mike. "I'm going to sing a song in Hindi." He does and more. All the drinkers pause, attentive and polite. Then another captive half hour with Ran Blake at the grand. And once again Phil Barber quiets down the house for an act. Too much culture. Further art appreciation is out of the question and I excuse myself to roam in the garden. The night is cool, bright with stars and a yellow moon. Hawthorne, I imagine, once held the same view. Trees rustle gently. I can almost hear an eighteen-year-old boy practicing his trombone. THE END

Members of the Berkshire Theater Festival sit on the steps of Stockbridge Playhouse. Front row, left to right, are resident playwright Bill Gibson, producer-director Arthur Penn, and co-producer Lynn Austin.

Ted Shawn, founder of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, leads a class on a summer's day.

Another view of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival. This is a scene from a performance of "Clowns and Other Fools."

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, whose late husband founded the music festival. Her magnificent Berkshire estate overlooks Stockbridge Bowl.

A pensive Gunther Schuller, who is head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Paul Fromm and his wife are both dedicated champions of contemporary music at Tanglewood.

Boston University's Young Artists rehearse on the Music Center's lush lawn. At Tanglewood practice usually takes place out-of-doors.

Eric Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is Leinsdorf's last season at Tanglewood.

At the Music Center a young musician gets to practice in the sun.

David Rockefeller and his wife Sydney supervise coordinating music programs at Tanglewood for the underprivileged.

Members of the Berkshire Theater Festival sit on the steps of Stockbridge Playhouse. Front row, left to right, are resident playwright Bill Gibson, producer-director Arthur Penn, and co-producer Lynn Austin.

Ted Shawn, founder of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, leads a class on a summer's day.

Another view of the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival. This is a scene from a performance of "Clowns and Other Fools."

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, whose late husband founded the music festival. Her magnificent Berkshire estate overlooks Stockbridge Bowl.

A pensive Gunther Schuller, who is head of Contemporary Music Activities at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Paul Fromm and his wife are both dedicated champions of contemporary music at Tanglewood.

Boston University's Young Artists rehearse on the Music Center's lush lawn. At Tanglewood practice usually takes place out-of-doors.

Eric Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is Leinsdorf's last season at Tanglewood.

At the Music Center a young musician gets to practice in the sun.

David Rockefeller and his wife Sydney supervise coordinating music programs at Tanglewood for the underprivileged.

14

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
JUN 5 1969 New England Newsclip

Notes and Footnotes

AS OTHERS see us. Somewhat bemused on reading an article in the glossy, 75-cent Holiday magazine for June entitled "Tanglewood." This magazine was a Curtis Publishing Co. property until the demise of their Saturday Evening Post. Now, according to the page of contents, it is put out by the Perfect Publishing Co., which the Tanglewood piece is far from.

Actually, it is a color-illustrated story of several cultural operations in the Berkshires. Mention at one point is made of Daniel Antoun at Music Inn "which he just bought." Alas, he now is out of business, showing a hazard of not rechecking a story written a year ahead.

Next is a slip-up on Avaloch and its big barroom, which is identified as the "Five Seasons Saloon." The name is the Five Reasons. A large poster in back of the bar explains about the five reasons for drinking.

Forthwith, the author becomes badly entangled on Jacob's Pillow. Says he: "I kept telling myself that Jacob's Pillow was a dancer's haven. And had been ever since 'Papa' Ted Shawn founded the place in the '30s with his wife and dancing partner Ruth St. Denis."

Miss St. Denis played no part in founding the Pillow, since she and Shawn had gone their separate ways after their Denishawn Company had foundered in the Great Depression. She went to California and launched a school of religious dance; Shawn formed his famous group of men dancers here. Martha Graham is listed as having performed at the Pillow, but never has, and the dance theatre is described as a "red barn." It is natural, unpainted wood, as are all buildings except the main house.

And so to Lenox and the Curtis Hotel that "straddles the main intersection. It is a wooden whale of an old place." Maybe it's a straddling whale which sounds difficult, but it's solid brick for sure. So there.

MEMBERS of the American Legion in Damariscotta, Maine, were pretty upset when new flags they placed on veterans' graves promptly developed holes and tatters. The mystery was solved when a red squirrel was caught in the act of chewing Old Glory on the grave of a Revolutionary War soldier. Seemed to enjoy the dye.

FOLKS WHO still yearn for an old-fashioned steam train trip may take one-day summer excursions on the Algoma Central Railway in Canada. It starts from Saulte Ste. Marie, and courses through wilderness country to Canyon Station, a four-hour trip of 114 miles each way. It connects at "Soo" with the Canadian transcontinental lines.

RICHARD V. HAPPEL.

BSO to open 1969 Tanglewood session

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
JUN 19 1969 New England

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the 28th session of the Berkshire Music Center on Sunday, June 29, at 2:30 p.m. The Orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., will greet the students and Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Orchestra and Director of the Berkshire Music Center, will deliver the principal address.

Out of a total of 400 students attending the 1969 session, 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship program provides instruction and coaching by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and distinguished guest Faculty members for young instrumentalists, singers, composers and conductors who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Four, six and eight week programs will also be offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. Boston University's Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theatre and dance. The New England Conservatory offers programs in contemporary composition, jazz and music education.

The Berkshire Music Center will offer a full schedule of orchestra, chamber music and composer's forum concerts through the summer. In addition, members of the Vocal Fellowship program will appear as soloists in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert performance of Verdi's "Otello", as part of the Berkshire Festival.

Among the Center's special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented in two parts, July 29—August 2 and August 11—17, in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Composers Theodore Antoniou, Robert Ceely, Edwin Dugger and Phillip Rhodes were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival within a Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

The highly successful Contemporary Trends Concerts will be presented again this year on Tuesday evenings July 8, 15, 22, 29 and August 12 under the auspices of the Contemporary Music Department of the Berkshire Music Center. Expanded from three concerts to five, the popular series will present artists from jazz, rock, soul and spiritual areas who will illustrate the significant trends in music outside the 'classical' medium. Complete information for this series will be available on July 1.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center marks the seventh and final year for Erich Leinsdorf as Director of the Center and Charles Wilson as head of Vocal Music activities. In the summer of 1970, Gunther Schuller, the distinguished composer-conductor and President of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Seiji Ozawa, newly-appointed Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, will become artistic directors at Tanglewood with Leonard Bernstein acting as advisor.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, August 24, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
JUN 19 1969 New England

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
JUN 19 1969 New England

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200
JUN 21 1969 New England

Courier-Journal & Times
Louisville, Ky.
SUN. 350,303
JUN 8 1969

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL at Tanglewood, where the Boston Symphony makes its home each summer, opens on July 4 and runs through Aug. 24. The programs are conservative, leaning heavily on Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Erich Leinsdorf is music director, and soloists include such names as Van Cliburn, Beverly Sills and John Browning. (Information: Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.)

SEVENTEEN
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 1,362,000
JUL 1969

Shunpike to Berkshire Hills

By JEAN O'BRIEN ERICKSON
Special Travel Consultant, Mass. Div. AAA

The southwestern section of the Berkshire Hills has all the proper ingredients for days of shunpike driving — fields of clover, nobs of tree-covered mountains, small valleys and acres of forest preserves with hiking trails and roaring waterfalls. Miles of winding, hilly roads join the Berkshire countryside to villages of elegant Summer homes and small estates.

The roads were once the routes of expeditions during the French and Indian Wars and later during the Revolutionary War, as evidenced today by historic plaques near farms and pastures. The green ridges and ledge-sided mountains were the inspiration for poems and tales by Bryant, Hawthorne and other well-known American authors.

In fact, while other scenic areas have their Grand Canyon or Pikes Peak type of wonder to attract throngs of vacationers, it is a cultural event which brings the crowds to the Berkshires. On Summer week-ends when the Boston Symphony Orchestra is performing at its Tanglewood estate, 6000 music lovers fill the Berkshire Music Shed and double that number sit on the spacious lawn. Every room in hotels, motels and guest homes for miles around is taken for "Tanglewood week-ends."

For a Berkshire Hill shunpike, we like June when waxy pink and white Laurel blossoms line the mountain roads. (Return in July or early August to hear the Tanglewood concerts). In less than two hours from Boston you can be at the Lee-Lenox exit of the Massachusetts Turnpike. Drive north on U.S. 20 to Lenox and southwest on Route 183 past the Tanglewood road and under the Turnpike to the 183-102 junction.

Visit the Berkshire Garden Center if you need tips on herb gardens or rock planting. South of the junction is Chesterwood, the Stockbridge studio of Daniel Chester French (1860-1931 a sculptor whose major works are the "Minute Man" at Concord's Old North Bridge and the seated figure of Abraham Lincoln in the Lincoln Memorial at Wash-

Housatonic River beside a steep ride, passes an old mill-factory at Husatonic and joins a more popular Berkshire drive, U.S. 7 north of Barrington. Head for Bash Bish Falls by following U.S. 7 and Route 23 through Great Barrington, the shopping center for farm and resort dwellers of Southwestern Massachusetts and past the pale green buildings and race track of the fair ground which will be bustling with visitors during the Sept. 7-13 Barrington Fair this year.

Before the hurricane-rain sotrm of several years ago damaged the roads, Bash Bish Falls could be easily reached by auto from the east, but now one should travel to New York State and approach this Massachusetts State Forest from the west.

On Route 23 drive past the enormous Jug End resort grounds in South Egremont to Hillsdale, N.Y., turn south on Route 22 to Copake Falls, N.Y., and east on Route 344. The most direct hike to the falls is along the path which starts at the side of the road. We tried the longer and steeper descent from the parking area above the falls and found the trail not too easy to follow, many mountainside run-offs to ford, and several slippery spots. Either way the view of the long white stream of water plunging into a wide rocky pool below is worth the hike. The road continues from the Bash Bish Falls area to Mt. Everett.

To the south is Sheffield, a beautiful town of early American homes fronted by tall elms. Turn north on U.S. 7 and east on Covered Bridge Lane to drive through the over 100-year-old bridge and across meadow and farm country bordered by mountain ridges. Return to Great Barrington on U.S. 7 following a line of pottery shops, antique shops and handsome homes above the Housatonic River; then on to Stockbridge along the side of Monument Mountain which was memorialized by William Cullen Bryant's poem about the Indian maiden who was thrown from the summit by her tribesman because she married a member of a hostile band.

Stockbridge was an Indian Mission in 1734. The village information booth will guide you to the 1739 Mission House and to Naumkeag, former estate (lavish gardens) of Joseph Choate, ambassador to England in 1899 (open July 1). The Berkshire Summer Theater in Stockbridge and the Jacob's Pillow Ballet Centre in Lee are nearby.

The Massachusetts Turnpike entrance at Lee is four miles away via Route 102. The round trip from the Lee interchange covers 69 miles.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
JUN 15 1969 New England

14

JUN 5 1969 New England Newspaper

Notes and Footnotes

AS OTHERS see us. Somewhat bemused on reading an article in the glossy, 75-cent Holiday magazine for June entitled "Tanglewood." This magazine was a Curtis Publishing Co. property until the demise of their Saturday Evening Post. Now, according to the page of contents, it is put out by the Perfect Publishing Co., which the Tanglewood piece is far from.

Actually, it is a color-illustrated story of several cultural operations in the Berkshires. Mention at one point is made of Daniel Antoun at Music Inn "which he just bought." Alas, he now is out of business, howing a hazard of not rechecking a story written a year ahead.

Next is a slip-up on Avaloch and its big barroom, which is identified as the "Five Seasons Saloon." The name is the Five Reasons. A large poster in back of the bar explains about the five reasons for drinking.

Forthwith, the author becomes badly entangled on Jacob's Pillow. Says he: "I kept feeling myself that Jacob's Pillow was a dancer's haven. And had been ever since 'Papa' Ted Shawn founded the place in the '30s with his wife and dancing partner Ruth St. Denis."

Miss St. Denis played no part in founding the Pillow, since she and Shawn had gone their separate ways after their Denishawn Company had foundered in the Great Depression. She went to California and launched a school of religious dance; Shawn formed his famous group of men dancers here. Martha Graham is listed as having performed at the Pillow, but never has, and the dance theatre is described as "red barn." It is natural, unpainted wood, as are all buildings except the main house.

And so to [illegible] the Curtis Hotel that "[illegible] the main intersection. [illegible] a wooden whale of an [illegible]." Maybe it's a stradd[illegible] which sounds difficult, [illegible] it's solid brick for sure.

MEMBERS of the American Legion in Dam[illegible] Maine, were pretty [illegible] on new flags they pl[illegible] veterans' graves prompt[illegible] ped holes and [illegible]. The mystery was solved when a red squirrel was caught in the act of chewing Old Glory on the grave of a Revolutionary War soldier. Seemed to enjoy the dye.

FOLKS WHO still yearn for an old-fashioned steam train trip may take one-day summer excursions on the Algoma Central Railway in Canada. It starts from Sault Ste. Marie, and courses through wilderness country to Canyon Station, a four-hour trip of 114 miles each way. It connects at "Soo" with the Canadian Transcontinental lines.

RICHARD V. HAPPEL.

BSO to open 1969 Tanglewood session

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the 28th session of the Berkshire Music Center on Sunday, June 29, at 2:30 p.m. The Orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry, Jr., will greet the students and Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Orchestra and Director of the Berkshire Music Center, will deliver the principal address.

Out of a total of 400 students attending the 1969 session, 165 will be Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The Fellowship program provides instruction and coaching by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and distinguished guest Faculty members for young instrumentalists, singers, composers and conductors who have completed their formal training and are embarking on their professional careers. Four, six and eight week programs will also be offered at Tanglewood by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. Boston University's Tanglewood Institute offers programs in music, art, theatre and dance. The New England Conservatory offers programs in contemporary composition, jazz and music education.

The Berkshire Music Center will offer a full schedule of orchestra, chamber music and composer's forum concerts through the summer. In addition, members of the Vocal Fellowship program will appear as soloists in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert performance of Verdi's "Otello", as part of the Berkshire Festival.

Among the Center's special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented in two parts, July 29—August 2 and August 11—17, in co-operation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Composers Theodore Antoniou, Robert Ceely, Edwin Dugger and Phillip Rhodes were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival within a Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

The highly successful Contemporary Trends Concerts will be presented again this year on Tuesday evenings July 8, 15, 22, 29 and August 12 under the auspices of the Contemporary Music Department of the Berkshire Music Center. Expanded from three concerts to five, the popular series will present artists from jazz, rock, soul and spiritual areas who will illustrate the significant trends in music outside the 'classical' medium. Complete information for this series will be available on July 1.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center marks the seventh and final year for Erich Leinsdorf as Director of the Center and Charles Wilson as head of Vocal Music activities. In the summer of 1970, Gunther Schuller, the distinguished composer-conductor and President of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Seiji Ozawa, newly-appointed Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, will become artistic directors at Tanglewood with Leonard Bernstein acting as advisor.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center will conclude on Sunday, August 24, the final day of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival.

BACK BAY LEDGER
JUN 19 1969 New England

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
JUN 19 1969

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
JUN 19 1969 New England

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
JUN 21 1969 New England

Courier-Journal & Times
Louisville, Ky.

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL at Tanglewood, where the Boston Symphony makes its home each summer, opens on July 4 and runs through Aug. 24. The programs are conservative, leaning heavily on Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Erich Leinsdorf is music director, and soloists include such names as Van Cliburn, Beverly Sills and John Browning. (Information: Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.)

Shunpike to Berkshire Hills

By JEAN O'BRIEN ERICKSON
Special Travel Consultant, Mass. Div. AAA

The southwestern section of the Berkshire Hills has all the proper ingredients for days of shunpike driving — fields of clover, nobs of tree-covered mountains, small valleys and acres of forest preserves with hiking trails and roaring waterfalls. Miles of winding, hilly roads join the Berkshire countryside to villages of elegant Summer homes and small estates.

The roads were once the routes of expeditions during the French and Indian Wars and later during the Revolutionary War, as evidenced today by historic plaques near farms and pastures. The green ridges and ledge-sided mountains were the inspiration for poems and tales by Bryant, Hawthorne and other well-known American authors.

In fact, while other scenic areas have their Grand Canyon or Pikes Peak type of wonder to attract throngs of vacationers, it is a cultural event which brings the crowds to the Berkshires. On Summer week-ends when the Boston Symphony Orchestra is performing at its Tanglewood estate, 6000 music lovers fill the Berkshire Music Shed and double that number sit on the spacious lawn. Every room in hotels, motels and guest homes for miles around is taken for "Tanglewood week-ends."

For a Berkshire Hill shunpike, we like June when waxy pink and white Laurel blossoms line the mountain roads. (Return in July or early August to hear the Tanglewood concerts). In less than two hours from Boston you can be at the Lee-Lenox exit of the Massachusetts Turnpike. Drive north on U.S. 20 to Lenox and southwest on Route 183 past the Tanglewood road and under the Turnpike to the 183-102 junction.

Visit the Berkshire Garden Center if you need tips on herb gardens or rock planting. South of the junction is Chesterwood, the Stockbridge studio of Daniel Chester French (1860-1931) a sculptor whose major works are the "Minute Man" at Concord's Old North Bridge and the seated figure of Abraham Lincoln in the Lincoln Memorial at Washington.

Housatonic River beside a steep ride, passes an old mill-factory at Housatonic and joins a more popular Berkshire drive, U.S. 7 north of Barrington. Head for Bash Bish Falls by following U.S. 7 and Route 23 through Great Barrington, the shopping center for farm and resort dwellers of Southwestern Massachusetts and past the pale green buildings and race track of the fair ground which will be bustling with visitors during the Sept. 7-13 Barrington Fair this year.

Before the hurricane-rain sotrm of several years ago damaged the roads, Bash Bish Falls could be easily reached by auto from the east, but now one should travel to New York State and approach this Massachusetts State Forest from the west.

On Route 23 drive past the enormous Jug End resort grounds in South Egremont to Hillsdale, N.Y., turn south on Route 22 to Copake Falls, N.Y., and east on Route 344. The most direct hike to the falls is along the path which starts at the side of the road. We tried the longer and steeper descent from the parking area above the falls and found the trail not too easy to follow, many mountainside run-offs to ford, and several slippery spots. Either way the view of the long white stream of water plunging into a wide rocky pool below is worth the hike. The road continues from the Bash Bish Falls area to Mt. Everett.

To the south is Sheffield, a beautiful town of early American homes fronted by tall elms. Turn north on U.S. 7 and east on Covered Bridge Lane to drive through the over 100-year-old bridge and across meadow and farm country bordered by mountain ridges. Return to Great Barrington on U.S. 7 following a line of pottery shops, antique shops and handsome homes above the Housatonic River; then on to Stockbridge along the side of Monument Mountain which was memorialized by William Cullen Bryant's poem about the Indian maiden who was thrown from the summit by her tribesman because she married a member of a hostile band.

Stockbridge was an Indian Mission in 1734. The village information booth will guide you to the 1739 Mission House and to Naumkeag, former estate (lavish gardens) of Joseph Choate, ambassador to England in 1899 (open July 1). The Berkshire Summer Theater in Stockbridge and the Jacob's Pillow Ballet Centre in Lee are nearby.

The Massachusetts Turnpike entrance at Lee is four miles west on Route 102. The [illegible] from the Lee interchange [illegible] 90 miles.

JUN [illegible] 1969 New England

BSO returning to Tanglewood

IN JUST A FEW weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes up its annual summer residence at Tanglewood, the former William Aspinwall Tappan estate in Lenox, Mass. This eight week season will mark the end of Erich Leinsdorf's tenure as music director of the orchestra.

Two of the conductor's specialties will be represented during the summer, Mozart and opera. The opening weekend concerts, July 4, to 6, will be devoted entirely to Mozart, with three piano concertos featured.

They are numbers 21, 23, and 27, to be performed, respectively, by Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning and Claude Frank on Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon. Under Leinsdorf's direction these concerts also include five of the symphonies and the six German dances.

On the following Saturday, July 12, opera and Mozart are to be combined. A concert performance of his "Abduction from the Seraglio" will be sung, with Beverly Sills, George Shirley and Anne Elgar in leading roles.

Two weeks later, on July 26, Verdi's "Otello" is scheduled in concert form, with Richard Cassily in the title role, Maralin Niska as Desdemona and Sherrill Milnes the Iago. The chorus, as in the "Abduction," will be the Tanglewood Choir, here augmented by the Berkshire Boy Choir.

Other programs of interest under Leinsdorf include those of Aug. 1, when Sherrill Milnes will be heard as soloist in Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," and Aug. 23, which opens with Edgard Varèse's "Deserts". The conductor's farewell concert will have Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with Miss Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz the soloists, and the Tanglewood Choir, on Aug. 24.

Guest conductors this summer are David Zinman, of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra (July 13); Charles Wilson, Boston Symphony Orchestra assistant conductor (July 27); Pierre Boulez (Aug. 2); Daniel Barenboim, who with his wife, Jacqueline DuPre, as soloist, has planned the Elgar cello concerto (Aug. 3); Karel Ancerl, to conduct Smetena's "Ma Vlast" in its entirety (Aug. 8); Joseph Krips (Aug. 10); Max Rudolf (Aug. 16); Henry Lewis, who with his wife, Marilyn Horne, as soloist, plans the Berlioz song cycle, "Nuits d'ete" (Aug. 17); and Milton Katims (Aug. 22).

LEINSDORF

Additional soloists are Earl Wild, for the Scharwenka first piano concerto (July 18); Pinchas Zukerman, for the Tchaikovsky violin concerto (July 20); Andre Watts, for Brahms' second piano concerto (July 25); Vladimir Ashkenazy, for the Beethoven Emperor Concerto (July 27); Joseph Silverstein, for Bartok's two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra (Aug. 2); Van Cliburn, for Brahms' first piano concerto (Aug. 9); and Malcolm Frager, for Beethoven's fourth piano concerto (Aug. 23).

As in past seasons each weekend opens with a Prelude concert, at 7 on Friday evenings. Cuch performers as violinist Paul Zukofsky, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and Beverly Sills will appear in these.

Open rehearsals again are scheduled for each Saturday morning, also at 10:30. Friday concerts begin at 9 p.m., those for Saturday at 8 p.m., while Sunday matinees are at 2:30 p.m.

This year's Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be held in two one-week periods. The first week runs from July 29 through Aug. 2, the second from Aug. 11 through 17. During the latter period Erich Leinsdorf conducts two concert performances of Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck," on Aug. 11 and Aug. 17.

Capping the Tanglewood season for the first time are to be Labor Day weekend concerts by the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler. They are planned for Aug. 30 at 8 p.m. and Aug. 31 at 2:30 p.m. in the Music Shed.

BROWNING

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(S) 208,349
JUN 15 1969 New England

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL—JULY/AUGUST 1969
24 CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FIRST WEEK

FRIDAYS AT 9 O'CLOCK

JULY 4
Weekend Prelude 7 pm
Kalliv and Frank
LEINSDORF
MOZART PROGRAM
Symphony no. 29 K. 201
Piano concerto in C K. 467
Eschenbach
Symphony no. 39 K. 543

SATURDAYS AT 8 O'CLOCK

JULY 5
OPEN REHEARSAL 10 30 am
LEINSDORF
MOZART PROGRAM
Haffner Symphony K. 385
Piano concerto in A K. 488
Browning
Symphony no. 40 K. 550

SUNDAYS AT 2:30

JULY 6
LEINSDORF
MOZART PROGRAM
Six German dance...
Piano conc...

SECOND WEEK

Summertime A Musical Festival

By GORDON EMERSON
Register Music Editor

In 1717, those who listened to Handel's "Water Music" played by 50 musicians on a barge in the Thames could never have guessed the extent to which outdoor music in particular, and summertime concerts in general would grow. Since such events were then sponsored only by royalty for a very limited audience their lack of insight into the present state of affairs is understandable. Nonetheless, attending some sort of summer music festival is now almost as commonplace as going to the market for many.

Summer festivals have recently mushroomed throughout the world, though America unquestionably has a most imposing corner on the market. One rather mundane though not insignificant reason for this is the fact that professional musicians need to be income-producing in the summer as well as the winter and, for example, a summer season is now part of most major orchestra contracts.

Also, for many music buffs, summertime brings on a more leisurely pace combined with greater freedom to travel. The acoustics may not always be as good (though in many cases they are even better), but during the summer it doesn't seem to matter as much.

Not long ago warm weather concerts were still relatively rare except for band concerts in the park, but now there are so many from Maine to California that anyone even remotely interested can get his fill of virtually any musical style from Lerner and Loewe to Beethoven, or Gershwin to Bartok—often on the same program. Most of the prominent American festivals such as Tanglewood and Saratoga, offer fundamentally the same fare as in their winter programs, however, and at summer chamber music centers like Marlboro, the repertoire is solidly masterwork oriented. At others, of course, the focus is distinctly on lighter symphonic fare—not to mention the scores of jazz, folk, pop and rock festivals annually headed by Newport in Rhode Island, and Monterey in California.

Some of these summer series are free, most charge admission, and many are frankly commercial in terms of programming and choice of guest artists. A few—such as Marlboro—exist for the sake of the artists themselves, but the public programs (at least in the case of Marlboro) are generally models of deeply felt and finely-honed music-making.

The Congregation of Arts, held at Dartmouth College's architecturally exciting Hopkins Center in Hanover, New Hampshire, is one of the newer—and more significant—summer-long festivals. The Congregation boasts a repertory acting company, rotating exhibitions of sculpture, painting and prints, and an ambitious series of concerts and recitals that is clearly geared to the contemporary. This must surely be the only series of summer (and probably even winter) programs (17 in all) that lists Sessions and Dallapiccola more frequently than Mozart. All concerts and lectures are held in the Center's Faulkner Auditorium which is not only a beautifully integrated space but possesses uncommonly good acoustics as well.

The activities at Hopkins also include a facet of summer programming not generally publicized but of great interest to those who feel akin to current trends: namely, presentations aside from the main concerts which are either very in-

See SUMMER MUSIC Page 2

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
JUN 15 1969 New England

The American Record Guide May, 1969

STIV... THE BOSTO...

ATURDAYS AT 8 O'CLOCK

AUGUST 2
OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am
BOULEZ
HAYDN: Sinfonia concertante op. 84
Silverstein, Gomberg, Walt, Eskin
DEBUSSY: Jeux
BARTOK: Two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra
Silverstein
DEBUSSY: La mer

AUGUST 9
OPEN REHEARSAL 10.30 am
LEINSDORF
DEBUSSY: Three nocturnes
Women of Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir
WEILL: Suite from "The Threepenny Opera"
...MS: Piano concerto no. 1

AUGUST 10
KRIPS
HAYDN: "Surprise" Symphony
STRAUSS: Till Eulenspiegel
SCHUBERT: Symphony no. 9

AUGUST 17
...aire" Overture

Ticket for Friday 9pm concert
Admission to lawn $3 (available day of concert). Open Rehearsal ...
For mail orders, please enclose check and stamped self-ad...
(payable to Boston Symphony Orchestra)
FESTIVAL TICKET OFFICE, BOX G, TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS 01240
Programs subject to change
BALDWIN PIANO
RCA RECORDS

▸Summer Music Festivals In Nearby New England

(Continued from page 1)

expensive or free of charge. At Hopkins, for example, most Composers in Residence deliver two free public lectures weekly, and orchestra rehearsals are also open to the public free of charge. Since works by the Composers in Residence are frequently scheduled at these rehearsals one is afforded the unusual opportunity of hearing and seeing the interplay that goes on between composer, conductor and musicians before the performance of a new work (several of the works being presented at Hopkins this season are either world or American premieres). Significant Italian composer Luigi Dellapiccola will speak on July 1, 4, 8 and 11; Roger Sessions on July 22, 25 and 29, and Roberto Gerhard on August 12, 15, 19 and 22. All talks are at 11:00 a.m. Composers Walter Piston and Gladys Nordenstrom will also be in attendance but lectures by them have not yet been scheduled though both will undoubtedly take part in rehearsals of their works. Rehearsal times can be obtained by writing or calling the Center in Hanover.

The annual Berkshire Festival held at Tanglewood during July and August is certainly the best known summer festival in the East—if not in America—and this year's guest conductors include Milton Katims, Pierre Boulez, Max Rudolf, Daniel Barenboim (whose wife, cellist Jacqueline Du Pre will perform the Elgar "Cello Concerto" on the same program), Joseph Krips and New Jersey Symphony conductor Henry Lewis (who was profiled in The Register last summer).

Maestro Erich Leinsdorf will conduct most of the programs, and this marks the conclusion of his reign as Music Director of the Boston Symphony. He will return to Symphony Hall in Boston during the next winter season for several guest appearances, however.

Two "Pops" programs have also been scheduled at Tanglewood featuring (naturally) Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. These will take place on Saturday and Sunday, August 30 and 31. Several outside rock and jazz groups will be brought in for appearances on consecutive Tuesday evenings.

Like the Hopkins programs, one of the least known aspects of Tanglewood could well be one of the most rewarding. The many student performances and recitals are open to the public at a minimal fee ($1 per program or $15 individual/$25 family for the entire season). There are generally six such events scheduled each week and the caliber of talent is high and programming generally imaginative. For anyone interested in music beyond "Finlandia" under the stars this is a distinct musical bargain. The Yale Concert at Norfolk also offers free student ensemble programs on Thursdays at 7 p.m. and Saturdays at 10:30 a.m.).

Unlike most other major festivals, programs at Marlboro are never announced in advance, and the only one definitely scheduled in the upcoming series is a group of Bach cantatas on Saturday July 26 to be conducted by Blanche Honneger Moyse. Pablo Casals will again be in attendance at Marlboro, and will conduct the chamber orchestra at some unknown point or points—during the season. The "pot-luck" nature of Marlboro's programming has never been a liability, however, and concerts are almost always sold out. At press time July 5, 6, 12, 13, 19 and 20 were already sold out, as is the concluding program on August 17. Consequently those interested are well advised to make reservations immediately for remaining dates.

* * *

Locally the New Haven Symphony's free "Concerts-On-The-Green" enters its third year, and the Starlight Chamber Music Festival begins its tenth season. The Starlight will depart from its usual format with the inclusion of two imported groups this year—the American Brass Ensemble on July 1st and the one-of-a-kind New York Rock and Roll Ensemble on July 15.

Further enhancing the New Haven summer scene will be the first local appearance in many years by the New York Philharmonic at the Yale Bowl on August 20 under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

BSO returning to Tanglewood

IN JUST A FEW weeks the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes up its annual summer residence at Tanglewood, the former William Aspinwall Tappan estate in Lenox, Mass. This eight week season will mark the end of Erich Leinsdorf's tenure as music director of the orchestra.

Two of the conductor's specialties will be represented during the summer, Mozart and opera. The opening weekend concerts, July 4, to 6, will be devoted entirely to Mozart, with three piano concertos featured.

They are numbers 21, 23, and 27, to be performed, respectively, by Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning and Claude Frank on Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon. Under Leinsdorf's direction these concerts also include five of the symphonies and the six German dances.

On the following Saturday, July 12, opera and Mozart are to be combined. A concert performance of his "Abduction from the Seraglio" will be sung, with Beverly Sills, George Shirley and Anne Elgar in leading roles.

Two weeks later, on July 26, Verdi's "Otello" is scheduled in concert form, with Richard Cassily in the title role, Maralin Niska as Desdemona and Sherrill Milnes the Iago. The chorus, as in the "Abduction," will be the Tanglewood Choir, here augmented by the Berkshire Boy Choir.

Other programs of interest under Leinsdorf include those of Aug. 1, when Sherrill Milnes will be heard as soloist in Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," and Aug. 23, which opens with Edgard Varese's "Deserts". The conductor's farewell concert will have Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with Miss Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz the soloists, and the Tanglewood Choir, on Aug. 24.

Guest conductors this summer are David Zinman, of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra (July 13); Charles Wilson, Boston Symphony Orchestra assistant conductor (July 27); Pierre Boulez (Aug. 2); Daniel Barenboim, who with his wife, Jacqueline DuPre, as soloist, has planned the Elgar cello concerto (Aug. 3); Karel Ancerl, to conduct Smetena's "Ma Vlast" in its entirety (Aug. 8); Joseph Krips (Aug. 10); Max Rudolf (Aug. 16); Henry Lewis, who with his wife, Marilyn Horne, as soloist, plans the Berlioz song cycle, "Nuits d'ete" (Aug. 17); and Milton Katims (Aug. 22).

LEINSDORF

Additional soloists are Earl Wild, for the Scharwenka first piano concerto (July 18); Pinchas Zukerman, for the Tchaikovsky violin concerto (July 20); Andre Watts, for Brahms' second piano concerto (July 25); Vladimir Ashkenazy, for the Beethoven Emperor Concerto (July 27); Joseph Silverstein, for Bartok's two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra (Aug. 2); Van Cliburn, for Brahms' first piano concerto (Aug. 9); and Malcolm Frager, for Beethoven's fourth piano concerto (Aug. 23).

As in past seasons each weekend opens with a Prelude concert, at 7 on Friday evenings. Cuch performers as violinist Paul Zukofsky, the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and Beverly Sills will appear in these.

Open rehearsals again are scheduled for each Saturday morning, also, at 10:30. Friday concerts begin at 9 p.m., those for Saturday at 8 p.m., while Sunday matinees are at 2:30 p.m.

BROWNING

This year's Festival of Contemporary Music, sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will be held in two one-week periods. The first week runs from July 29 through Aug. 2, the second from Aug. 11 through 17. During the latter period Erich Leinsdorf conducts two concert performances of Alban Berg's opera, "Wozzeck," on Aug. 11 and Aug. 17.

Capping the Tanglewood season for the first time are to be Labor Day weekend concerts by the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler. They are planned for Aug. 30 at 8 p.m. and Aug. 31 at 2:30 p.m. in the Music Shed.

Summertime A Musical Festival

By GORDON EMERSON
Register Music Editor

In 1717, those who listened to Handel's "Water Music" played by 50 musicians on a barge in the Thames could never have guessed the extent to which outdoor music in particular, and summertime concerts in general would grow. Since such events were then sponsored only by royalty for a very limited audience their lack of insight into the present state of affairs is understandable. Nonetheless, attending some sort of summer music festival is now almost as commonplace as going to the market for many.

Summer festivals have recently mushroomed throughout the world, though America unquestionably has a most imposing corner on the market. One rather mundane though not insignificant reason for this is the fact that professional musicians need to be income-producing in the summer as well as the winter and, for example, a summer season is now part of most major orchestra contracts.

Also, for many music buffs, summertime brings on a more leisurely pace combined with greater freedom to travel. The acoustics may not always be as good (though in many cases they are even better), but during the summer it doesn't seem to matter as much.

Not long ago warm weather concerts were still relatively rare except for band concerts in the park, but now there are so many from Maine to California that anyone even remotely interested can get his fill of virtually any musical style from Lerner and Loewe to Beethoven, or Gershwin to Bartok—often on the same program. Most of the prominent American festivals such as Tanglewood and Saratoga, offer fundamentally the same fare as in their winter programs, however, and at summer chamber music centers like Marlboro, the repertoire is solidly masterwork oriented. At others, of course, the focus is distinctly on lighter symphonic fare—not to mention the scores of jazz, folk, pop and rock festivals annually headed by Newport in Rhode Island, and Monterey in California.

Some of these summer series are free, most charge admission, and many are frankly commercial in terms of programming and choice of guest artists. A few—such as Marlboro—exist for the sake of the artists themselves, but the public programs (at least in the case of Marlboro) are generally models of deeply felt and finely-honed music-making.

The Congregation of Arts, held at Dartmouth College's architecturally exciting Hopkins Center in Hanover, New Hampshire, is one of the newer—and more significant—summer-long festivals. The Congregation boasts a repertory acting company, rotating exhibitions of sculpture, painting and prints, and an ambitious series of concerts and recitals that is clearly geared to the contemporary. This must surely be the only series of summer (and probably even winter) programs (17 in all) that lists Sessions and Dallapiccola more frequently than Mozart. All concerts and lectures are held in the Center's Faulkner Auditorium which is not only a beautifully integrated space but possesses uncommonly good acoustics as well.

The activities at Hopkins also include a facet of summer programming not generally publicized but of great interest to those who feel akin to current trends: namely, presentations aside from the main concerts which are either very inexpensive or free of charge. At Hopkins, for example, most Composers in Residence deliver two free public lectures weekly, and orchestra rehearsals are also open to the public free of charge. Since works by the Composers in Residence are frequently scheduled at these rehearsals one is afforded the unusual opportunity of hearing and seeing the interplay that goes on between composer, conductor and musicians before the performance of a new work (several of the works being presented at Hopkins this season are either world or American premieres). Significant Italian composer Luigi Dellapiccola will speak on July 1, 4, 8 and 11; Roger Sessions on July 22, 25 and 29, and Roberto Gerhard on August 12, 15, 19 and 22. All talks are at 11:00 a.m. Composers Walter Piston and Gladys Nordenstrom will also be in attendance but lectures by them have not yet been scheduled though both will undoubtedly take part in rehearsals of their works. Rehearsal times can be obtained by writing or calling the Center in Hanover.

See SUMMER MUSIC Page 2

▸Summer Music Festivals In Nearby New England

(Continued from page 1)

The annual Berkshire Festival held at Tanglewood during July and August is certainly the best known summer festival in the East—if not in America—and this year's guest conductors include Milton Katims, Pierre Boulez, Max Rudolf, Daniel Barenboim (whose wife, cellist Jacqueline Du Pre will perform the Elgar "Cello Concerto" on the same program), Joseph Krips and New Jersey Symphony conductor Henry Lewis (who was profiled in The Register last summer).

Maestro Erich Leinsdorf will conduct most of the programs, and this marks the conclusion of his reign as Music Director of the Boston Symphony. He will return to Symphony Hall in Boston during the next winter season for several guest appearances, however.

Two "Pops" programs have also been scheduled at Tanglewood featuring (naturaliy) Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. These will take place on Saturday and Sunday, August 30 and 31. Several outside rock and jazz groups will be brought in for appearances on consecutive Tuesday evenings.

Like the Hopkins programs, one of the least known aspects of Tanglewood could well be one of the most rewarding. The many student performances and recitals are open to the public at a minimal fee ($1 per program or $15 individual/$25 family for the entire season). There are generally six such events scheduled each week and the caliber of talent is high and programming generally imaginative. For anyone interested in music beyond "Finlandia" under the stars this is a distinct musical bargain. The Yale Concert at Norfolk also offers free student ensemble programs on Thursdays at 7 p.m. and Saturdays at 10:30 a.m.).

Unlike most other major festivals, programs at Marlboro are never announced in advance, and the only one definitely scheduled in the upcoming series is a group of Bach cantatas on Saturday July 26 to be conducted by Blanche Honneger Moyse. Pablo Casals will again be in attendance at Marlboro, and will conduct the chamber orchestra at some unknown point or points—during the season. The "pot-luck" nature of Marlboro's programming has never been a liability, however, and concerts are almost always sold out. At press time July 5, 6, 12, 13, 19 and 20 were already sold out, as is the concluding program on August 17. Consequently those interested are well advised to make reservations immediately for remaining dates.

* * *

Locally the New Haven Symphony's free "Concerts-On-The-Green" enters its third year, and the Starlight Chamber Music Festival begins its tenth season. The Starlight will depart from its usual format with the inclusion of two imported groups this year—the American Brass Ensemble on July 1st and the one-of-a-kind New York Rock and Roll Ensemble on July 15.

Further enhancing the New Haven summer scene will be the first local appearance in many years by the New York Philharmonic at the Yale Bowl on August 20 under the baton of Seiji Ozawa;

16.

New Music Courses

Northeastern Goes to Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Northeastern University's University College is the third institution to affiliate its summer courses with the Berkshire Music Center, educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. The others are the New England Conservatory of Music and Boston University.

Beginning tomorrow and continuing through July 23, Northeastern will hold seminars on Monday and Wednesday evenings on its Boston campus, examining the growth of the symphony orchestra with special emphasis placed on music played at Tanglewood.

Students will make two visits to Tanglewood and will attend performances by the Boston Symphony. Instead of final examinations, students will assume the role of music critics and write their impressions of the concerts.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 10[illegible]
JUN 15 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUN 28 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUN 28 1969

June 22-28

Berkshire Week in Review

[illegible] TRANSIT in the [illegible]

AND ALSO: Joan Kennedy, wife of the senator, was announced as narrator for the Aug. 5 performance of "Peter and the Wolf" at Tanglewood . . . Robert C. Sprague of Williamstown, president of Sprague Electric Co. and defense consultant, told the Senate's Armed Services Committee that deployment of the Safeguard ABM is "absolutely essential."

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
JUN 27 1969

Coming Events

Highlights of the Season

Week of July 6

TANGLEWOOD—Sunday, July 6: Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in a program of Mozart and Frank . . . Friday, July 11: Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in an all-Bach program for 9:00 p.m. concert . . . Saturday, July 12: Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio."

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: John and Abigail . . . Colonie: You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running and Oliver! . . . Williamstown: Ring Round the Moon.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Toni Lander and Bruce Marks, Norman Walker & Co., Lotte Goslar; seven performances, July 8-12.

Week of July 13

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday July 13: BSO conducted by Zinman in works of Graff, Bach, Handel, and Mozart, 2:30 . . . Friday, July 18: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in a program of Rossini, Scharwenka, and Stravinski for 9 p.m. concert . . . Saturday, July 19: Leinsdorf, soloist and concerto to be announced, program includes Prokofieff.

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: Hunger and Thirst . . . Colonie: The Student Prince . . . Williamstown: You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Ruth Mata and Eugene Hari "Love Is All You Need," a satirical program in multi-media, and Norman Walker & Co. Seven performances July 15-19.

Week of July 20

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday, July 20: BSO in a program of Tchaikovsky, conducted by Leinsdorf, 2:30 . . . Friday, July 25: Program of Beethoven and Brahms conducted by Leinsdorf, 9:00 p.m. . . . Saturday, July 26: Leinsdorf conducting BSO in a program of Verdi, with the Berkshire Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Boy Choir.

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: Hunger and Thirst . . . Colonie: George M.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Maria Alba's Spanish Dance Company, seven performances, July 22-26.

Week of July 27

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday, July 27: BSO in a program of Sibelius and Beethoven conducted by Wilson . . . Friday, August 1: Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in works by Stravinski, Schoenberg, and Brahms . . . Saturday, August 2: Boulez conducting the BSO in pieces by Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Gruppe Motion Berlin, and Teresa with Spanish dancers and Flamenco guitarist, seven performances July 29-August 1.

DIRECT BUS SERVICE TO

Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL
Lenox, Massachusetts
July 4th thru August 24th
EVERY TUES., FRI., SAT. and SUN.

EVERY Tues., Fri. and Sat. Nights, Bus Leaves from Springfield Bus Terminal at 5:15 P.M.

Round Trip Fare $4.00
Gen. Adm. Tickets To Tanglewood Always Available at The Gate

EVERY SUNDAY
Bus Leaves at 11:15 A.M.
Sunday Excursion includes stop at Oak N' Spruce Resort lodge for Chicken Barbeque ($3.50 additional)

Buses Return 20 Minutes After Concert

PETER PAN BUS LINES
1778 MAIN ST. TEL. 781-2900

Springfield Republican 6-22-69

Tanglewood Opens July 4; Season Extended to 9 Weeks

This year the Tanglewood Music Festival will extend its traditional eight-week season by presenting a ninth week program Aug. 30 and 31 with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. Other events in the season include a number of guest conductors, including David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, New Jersey Symphony; French conductor Georges Pretre; Josef Krips, San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Anceri, new conductor of the Toronto Symphony. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct July 25.

Known as the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, more than 220,000 people attended events at Tanglewood last year, crowding into the huge, pie-shaped Shed and spreading out over the spacious lawns. Along with the concert series, they enjoyed programs such as the Contemporary Trends, which was launched last year, featuring folk, jazz, soul and rock music. Initially there were three concerts, but the project proved so popular that five are scheduled for this season. They will be on consecutive Tuesdays, starting July 8.

Among the Center's special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented in two parts, July 29-Aug. 2 and August 11-17, in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Composers Theodore Antoniou, Robert Ceely, Edwin Dugger and Phillip Rhodes were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival within a Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center marks the seventh and final year for Erich Leinsdorf as Director of the Center and Charles Wilson as head of Vocal Music activities.

On Aug. 24, Mr. Leinsdorf, will conduct his final program, closing with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, a tradition among conductors retiring from the orchestra. In the summer of 1970, Gunther Schuller, the distinguished composer-conductor and President of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Seiji Ozawa, newly-appointed Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, will become artistic directors at Tanglewood with Leonard Bernstein acting as advisor.

Sponsored this year for the first time by the Tanglewood management will be bus excursion service for people without cars, or who prefer not to drive to the concerts. Vehicles will leave from Boston, Worcester, Natick and Springfield, scheduled to arrive at Tanglewood one hour before all concerts, both matinee and evenings, and starting the return trip 30 minutes after the concert closes.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
JUN 15 1969 New England

MASSACHUSETTS
Lenox
Tanglewood
July 4 through August 24. Fridays at 9, Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Leinsdorf, Katims, Boulez, Krips, etc. Soloists include Cliburn, Watts, Browning and Silverstein. For information: Write Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240 Phone: 413-637-1600.

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,742
JUN 26 1969 New England Newclip

Music Festivals In Area Varied And Plentiful

By IRENE JARRY
News Music Columnist

Music Festivals are "popping out" everywhere and people are planning their vacations around some of them. There is a varying selection around us, with everyone's favorite kind of music or composer.

Highlights this week are: chamber music in the Berkshires next Tuesday and every Tuesday thereafter for eight weeks; the Newport Jazz Festival this week end.—still going strong; Esplanade concerts in Boston; Tanglewood starting July 3 with 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is classical, modern, jazz, orchestra, quartets, folk music, and the much loved entertainment in America, musical comedy.

The Carousel Theatre in Framingham has about the best musical comedy in our vicinity. Here (some are really opera)—a perfect blending of good theatre and good music. Carousel has some the best musical comedies all summer. Monday through Saturday with a matinee on Sunday afternoon. On Sunday nights a special musical perso[illegible] Ella Fitzgerald [illegible] fillment of the standards Richard Wagner started in opera." Music, drama, dancing, acting are all blended at top level in musical comedy. Born of the energy and gaiety, and ways of our people, it is spontaneous music, unfettered and rich in fantasy. You have your sentimental tunes—good ones too!—mellifluous, haunting duets, and every other contrivance of dance, laughter, and action of the musical play.

It is interesting to note the many new young American composers who have been successful in the last few years writing musical comedy, a field where the composer with the highest standard and craftsmanship can find an enthusiastic audience and still make money with his art.

Happy listening!

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
JUN 29 1969 New England

Festivals Of Pop And Rock

It's that time of year again and the fever pitch of greasy hawkers on the midway portend a summer of neck-craning poor sound systems, high ticket costs and over-promotion. The four festivals I list here are the most important and best represented. I am listing only rock.

Newport—July 3—6, Festival Field, Newport, R.I.
Friday, July 4—8 p.m.
Jeff Beck
Blood, Sweat and Tears
Ten Years After
Jethro Tull
Saturday, July 5—2 p.m.
John Mayall
Mothers of Invention
Saturday, July 5—8 p.m.
Sly and the Family Stone
O.C. Smith
Sunday, July 6—2 p.m.
James Brown
Sunday, July 6—8 p.m.
B. B. King
Johnny Winter
Led Zeppelin
SPECIAL: Friday, July 11, "Blind Faith," with Eric Clapton, Steve Winwood, Ginger Baker and Rick Grech.

Atlantic City Pop Festival—Atlantic City Race Track, Atlantic City, N.J.
Friday, Aug. 1, 2 p.m. to midnight
Iron Butterfly
Johnny Winter
Crosby, Stills & Nash
Procol Harum
Joni Mitchell
Chicago (CTA)
Santana Blues Band
Saturday, Aug 2, noon to midnight
Jefferson Airplane
Creedence Clearwater
Arthur Brown
Butterfield Blues Band
B. B. King-Hugh Masekela
Grateful Dead
Byrds
Lighthouse
American Dream
Sunday, Aug. 3, noon to midnight
Janis Joplin
Mothers of Invention
Canned Heat
Moody Blues
3 Dog Night
Joe Cocker
Dr. John the Night Tripper
Little Richard
Sir Douglass Quintet

Woodstock Music and Art Fair—Wallkill, New York
Aug 16 and 17
Janis Joplin
Jefferson Airplane
Blood Sweat and Tears
The Band
Canned Heat
Creedence Clearwater Revival
Crosby, Stills and Nash
Arlo Guthrie
Tim Hardin
Richie Havens
Iron Butterfly
Laura Nyro
The Moody Blues
Sly and the Family Stone
Johnny Winter

Tanglewood Pop (Berkshire Music Festival)—Lenox, Mass
Aug 12 only, 8 p.m.
Jefferson Airplane
The Who
B.B. King

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
(E) 29,870
JUN 19 1969 New England

A family tour

Route 7 trip can be extended northward

By MARK AZZARA JR.

Herman Melville lived here. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived here.

Daniel Chester French, sculptor of the Lincoln Memorial, lived here.

The Shakers lived here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra lives here today.

Where is "here?" It's the Berkshire Mountains in Massachusetts and it's all yours for the price of gas and a round-trip ride up Route 7.

As was promised several weeks ago, the Route 7 tour through Connecticut easily can be extended northward. The extra trip across the state line is worth your time and, if you want to vacation there, your money as well.

The 1969 summer schedule for the Boston Symphony Orchestra has recently been released. The programs, held Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 and Sunday at 2:30, with an open rehearsal every morning at 10:30, will begin on July 4 with a weekend of Mozart.

Guest Artists

Guest artists are among the elite of American music, including pianists Andre Watts, Earl Wild and Van Cliburn, Ashkenazy. Guest conductors include Pierre Boulez, Karl Anceri and Joseph Krips.

Erich Leinsdorf steps down as music director of the symphony when the orchestra closes its season Aug. 24.

The symphony performs at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. on Route 183, west of Route 7.

Among the other spots of great importance which are easily reached from Route 7 are:

Hancock Shaker Village in Hancock: a restored Village at one time was ho[illegible]

This kind of tour could go on and on. But there's just not that much room. Farther north is Vermont. Tourist attractions are many. Those heading to Vermont who may want information on the Stow area, an excellent tourist area, can write to "Family Tour," at The News-Times, Main St., Danbury.

For those planning a tour, we urge you to tour. At a later date west, then south York State and [illegible] bury.

16.

New Music Courses

Northeastern Goes to Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Northeastern University's University College is the third institution to affiliate its summer courses with the Berkshire Music Center, educational department of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

The others are the New England Conservatory of Music and Boston University.

Beginning tomorrow and continuing through July 23, Northeastern will hold seminars on Monday and Wednesday evenings on its Boston campus, examining the growth of the symphony orchestra with special emphasis placed on music played at Tanglewood.

Students will make two visits to Tanglewood and will attend performances by the Boston Symphony. Instead of final examinations, students will assume the role of music critics and write their impressions of the concerts.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (E) 10,771
JUN 15 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUN 28 1969

June 22-28

Berkshire Week in Review

...TO TRANSIT in the Berkshires ... AND ALSO: Joan Kennedy, wife of the senator, was announced as narrator for the Aug. 3 performance of "Peter and the Wolf" at Tanglewood ... Robert C. Sprague of Williamstown, president of Sprague Electric Co. and defense consultant, told the Senate's Armed Services Committee that deployment of the Safeguard ABM is "absolutely essential."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUN 28 1969

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
JUN 27 1969

Coming Events

Highlights of the Season

Week of July 6

TANGLEWOOD—Sunday, July 6: Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in a program of Mozart and Frank . . . Friday, July 11: Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in an all-Bach program for 9:00 p.m. concert . . . Saturday, July 12: Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio."

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: John and Abigail . . . Colonie: You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running and Oliver! . . . Williamstown: Ring Round the Moon.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Toni Lander and Bruce Marks, Norman Walker & Co., Lotte Goslar; seven performances, July 8-12.

Week of July 13

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday July 13: BSO conducted by Zinman in works of Graff, Bach, Handel, and Mozart, 2:30 . . . Friday, July 18: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in a program of Rossini, Scharwenka, and Stravinski for 9 p.m. concert . . . Saturday, July 19: Leinsdorf, soloist and concerto to be announced, program includes Prokofieff.

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: Hunger and Thirst . . . Colonie: The Student Prince . . . Williamstown: You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Ruth Mata and Eugene Hari "Love Is All You Need," a satirical program in multi-media, and Norman Walker & Co. Seven performances July 15-19.

Week of July 20

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday, July 20: BSO in a program of Tchaikovsky, conducted by Leinsdorf, 2:30 . . . Friday, July 25: Program of Beethoven and Brahms conducted by Leinsdorf, 9:00 p.m. . . . Saturday, July 26: Leinsdorf conducting BSO in a program of Verdi, with the Berkshire Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Boy Choir.

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: Hunger and Thirst . . . Colonie: George M.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Maria Alba's Spanish Dance Company, seven performances, July 22-26.

Week of July 27

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday, July 27: BSO in a program of Sibelius and Beethoven conducted by Wilson . . . Friday, August 1: Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in works by Stravinski, Schoenberg, and Brahms . . . Saturday, August 2: Boulez conducting the BSO in pieces by Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Gruppe Motion Berlin, and Teresa with Spanish dancers and Flamenco guitarist, seven performances July 29-August 1.

DIRECT BUS SERVICE TO

Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL
Lenox, Massachusetts
July 4th thru August 24th
EVERY TUES., FRI., SAT. and SUN.

EVERY Tues., Fri. and Sat. Nights, Bus Leaves from Springfield Bus Terminal at 5:15 P.M.

Round Trip Fare $4.00
Gen. Adm. Tickets To Tanglewood Always Available at The Gate

EVERY SUNDAY
Bus Leaves at 11:15 A.M.
Sunday Excursion includes stop at Oak N' Spruce Resort Lodge for Chicken Barbeque ($3.50 additional)

Buses Return 20 Minutes After Concert

PETER PAN BUS LINES
1778 MAIN ST. TEL. 781-2900

Springfield Republican 6-22-69

Tanglewood Opens July 4; Season Extended to 9 Weeks

This year the Tanglewood Music Festival will extend its traditional eight-week season by presenting a ninth week program Aug. 30 and 31 with Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. Other events in the season include a number of guest conductors, including David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, New Jersey Symphony; French conductor Georges Pretre; Josef Krips, San Francisco Symphony; French composer Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Anceri, new conductor of the Toronto Symphony, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct July 25.

Known as the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, more than 220,000 people attended events at Tanglewood last year, crowding into the huge, pie-shaped Shed and spreading out over the spacious lawns. Along with the concert series, they enjoyed programs such as the Contemporary Trends, which was launched last year, featuring folk, jazz, soul and rock music. Initially there were three concerts, but the project proved so popular that five are scheduled for this season. They will be on consecutive Tuesdays, starting July 8.

Among the Center's special programs at Tanglewood this summer will again be the Festival of Contemporary Music, presented in two parts, July 29-Aug. 2 and August 11-17, in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago. Composers Theodore Antoniou, Robert Ceely, Edwin Dugger and Phillip Rhodes were commissioned to write new works to be given their premieres during the "Festival within a Festival," as B.M.C. director Erich Leinsdorf refers to it.

The 1969 session of the Berkshire Music Center marks the seventh and final year for Erich Leinsdorf as Director of the Center and Charles Wilson as head of Vocal Music activities.

On Aug. 24, Mr. Leinsdorf, will conduct his final program, closing with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, a tradition among conductors retiring from the orchestra. In the summer of 1970, Gunther Schuller, the distinguished composer-conductor and President of the New England Conservatory of Music, and Seiji Ozawa, newly-appointed Music Director of the San Francisco Symphony, will become artistic directors at Tanglewood with Leonard Bernstein acting as advisor.

Sponsored this year for the first time by the Tanglewood management will be bus excursion service for people without cars, or who prefer not to drive to the concerts. Vehicles will leave from Boston, Worcester, Natick and Springfield, scheduled to arrive at Tanglewood one hour before all concerts, both matinee and evenings, and starting the return trip 30 minutes after the concert closes.

MASSACHUSETTS
Lenox
Tanglewood
July 4 through August 24. Fridays at 9, Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30 p.m.

Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Leinsdorf, Katims, Boulez, Krips, etc. Soloists include Cliburn, Watts, Browning and Silverstein. For information: Write Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240 Phone: 413-637-1600.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
JUN 15 1969
New England

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,742
JUN 26 1969
New England Newsclip

Music Festivals In Area Varied And Plentiful

By IRENE JARRY
News Music Columnist

Music Festivals are "popping out" everywhere and people are planning their vacations around some of them. There is a varying selection around us, with everyone's favorite kind of music or composer.

Highlights this week are: chamber music in the Berkshires next Tuesday and every Tuesday thereafter for eight weeks; the Newport Jazz Festival this week end; —still going strong; Esplanade concerts in Boston; Tanglewood starting July 5 with 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is classical, modern, jazz, music, and the much loved entertainment in America, musical comedy.

The Carousel Theatre in Framingham has about the best musical comedy in our vicinity. Here is represented the almost opera, (some are really opera)—a perfect blending of good theatre and good music. Carousel has some the best musical comedies all summer. Monday through Saturday with a matinee on Saturday afternoon. On Sunday nights a special musical person, like Ella Fitzgerald fillment of the standards Richard Wagner started in opera." Music, drama, dancing, acting are all blended at top level in musical comedy. Born of the energy and gaiety, and ways of our people, it is spontaneous music, unfettered and rich in fantasy. You have your sentimental tunes—good ones too!—mellifluous, haunting duets, and every other contrivance of dance, laughter, and action of the musical play. It is interesting to note the many new young American composers who have been successful in the last few years writing musical comedy, a field where the composer with the highest standard and craftsmanship can find an enthusiastic audience and still make money with his art.

Happy listening!

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
JUN 29 1969
New England

Festivals Of Pop And Rock

It's that time of year again and the fever pitch of greasy hawkers on the midway portend a summer of neck-craning poor sound systems, high ticket costs and over-promotion. The four festivals I list here are the most important and best represented. I am listing only rock.

Newport—July 3—6, Festival Field, Newport, R.I.
Friday, July 4—8 p.m.
Jeff Beck
Blood, Sweat and Tears
Ten Years After
Jethro Tull
Saturday, July 5—2 p.m.
John Mayall
Mothers of Invention
Saturday, July 5—8 p.m.
Sly and the Family Stone
O.C. Smith
Sunday, July 6—2 p.m.
James Brown
Sunday, July 6—8 p.m.
B. B. King
Johnny Winter
Led Zeppelin

SPECIAL: Friday, July 11, "Blind Faith," with Eric Clapton, Steve Winwood, Ginger Baker and Rick Grech.

Atlantic City Pop Festival—Atlantic City Race Track, Atlantic City, N.J.
Friday, Aug. 1, 2 p.m. to midnight
Iron Butterfly
Johnny Winter
Crosby, Stills & Nash
Procol Harum
Joni Mitchell
Chicago (CTA)
Santana Blues Band
Saturday, Aug 2, noon to midnight
Jefferson Airplane
Creedence Clearwater
Arthur Brown
Butterfield Blues Band
B. B. King-Hugh Masekela
Grateful Dead
Byrds
Lighthouse
American Dream
Sunday, Aug. 3, noon to midnight
Janis Joplin
Mothers of Invention
Canned Heat
Moody Blues
3 Dog Night
Joe Cocker
Dr. John the Night Tripper
Little Richard
Sir Douglass Quintet

Woodstock Music and Art Fair—Wallkill, New York
Aug 16 and 17
Janis Joplin
Jefferson Airplane
Blood Sweat and Tears
The Band
Canned Heat
Creedence Clearwater
Revival
Crosby, Stills and Nash
Arlo Guthrie
Tim Hardin
Richie Havens
Iron Butterfly
Laura Nyro
The Moody Blues
Sly and the Family Stone
Johnny Winter

Tanglewood Pop (Berkshire Music Festival)—Lenox, Mass
Aug 12 only, 8 p.m.
Jefferson Airplane
The Who
B.B. King

NEWS-TIMES
DANBURY, CONN.
(E) 29,870
JUN 19 1969
New England

A family tour

Route 7 trip can be extended northward

By MARK AZZARA JR.

Herman Melville lived here. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived here. Daniel Chester French, sculptor of the Lincoln Memorial, lived here. The Shakers lived here. The Boston Symphony Orchestra lives here today. Where is "here?" It's the Berkshire Mountains in Massachusetts and it's all yours for the price of gas and a round-trip ride up Route 7.

As was promised several weeks ago, the Route 7 tour through Connecticut easily can be extended northward. The extra trip across the state line is worth your time and, if you want to vacation there, your money as well.

The 1969 summer schedule for the Boston Symphony Orchestra has recently been released. The programs, held Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 and Sunday at 2:30, with an open rehearsal every Saturday morning at 10:30, will begin on July 4 with a weekend of Mozart.

Guest Artists

Guest artists are among the elite of American music, including pianists Andre Watts, Van Cliburn, Earl Wild and Vladimir Ashkenazy. Guest conductors include Pierre Boulez, Karl Anceri and Joseph Krips.

Erich Leinsdorf steps down as music director of the symphony when the orchestra closes its season Aug. 24.

The symphony performs at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. on Route 183, west of Route 7.

Among the other spots of great importance which are easily reached from Route 7 are:

Hancock Shaker Village in Pittsfield: a restored village of at one time was how

This kind of tour could go on and on. But there's just not that much room. Farther north is Vermont. Tourist attractions are many. Those heading to Vermont who may want information on the Stowe area, an excellent tourist area, can write to "Family Tour," at The News-Times, Main St., Danbury.

For those planning a tour, we urge you to tour. At a later date west, then south York State and bury.

SUMMER MUSIC FESTIVALS: 1969

TANGLEWOOD/BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL: Never banned in or near Boston and always "in" with Bostonians and thousands of traveling music lovers, this—one of the oldest and most honored of festivals—gets under way July 4 for the first of eight weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf or guest conductors (center photo). Mozart, Mr. Leinsdorf, and piano soloists are featured on the July 4-6 programs; Mozart dominates the July 11-13 weekend, when his "The Abduction from the Seraglio" will be sung by Beverly Sills, George Shirley, other soloists (concert style)—this, too, led by Mr. Leinsdorf. Other highlights: pianist Earl Wild with Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No. 1 (July 18); a concert version of Verdi's "Otello" with Richard Cassilly, Maralin Niska, Sherrill Milnes (July 26); Pierre Boulez as guest conductor (Aug. 2); Daniel Barenboim, conductor, and Jacqueline DuPré, cellist (Aug. 3); Henry Lewis, conductor, and Marilyn Horne, soprano (Aug. 17); Beverly Sills recital (Aug. 22 weekend prelude); Miss Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, and Justino Diaz in Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 led by Mr. Leinsdorf (Aug. 24). For devotees of the lighter summery fare, Arthur Fiedler brings the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra to Tanglewood as well (Aug. 30, 31). (To check the details of each weekend at Tanglewood, of other festivals on these pages, and of festivals elsewhere, see Cue*'s weekly listings in the Events of the Week section*).

GARDEN STATE ARTS CENTER: The second season for this nearby festival at Telegraph Hill Park on the Garden State Parkway is already under way. It concludes on Aug. 30 and is seasoned throughout by a wide variety of attractions. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski guest-conducts the New York Philharmonic with pianist Van Cliburn, June 26-28. There follow three variety shows starring pops favorites: Glen Campbell (June 30-July 5); Rowan and Martin (July 7-12); and Diana Ross, The Supremes, Buddy Rich (July 14-19). A company of "Fiddler on the Roof" reigns from July 21-26. Then the American Ballet Theatre offers three of its most triumphant productions: ("Giselle"—July 28, Aug. 1; "Swan Lake"—July 29, Aug. 2; "Coppélia"— July 30, 31). Steve Lawrence and Eydie Gorme, with Woody Herman's Orchestra, take over Aug. 4-9. The New York Philharmonic, with pianist Byron Janis and led by Karel Ancerl, returns Aug. 13, 14. Enzo Stuarti and Corbett Monica appear Aug. 16. The "New" 1969 Liberace Show (candelabra with candles never before lighted?) holds forth from Aug. 18 to Aug. 23. On Aug. 25, and through Aug. 30, the luminaries are Henry Mancini and Johnny Mathis. At the time of this compilation, a few bookings remain "to be announced." (Again, check Cue*'s Events of the Week section weekly; therein, insofar as press deadlines permit, last minute cancellations or substitutions will be noted. The inquiry number for the festival itself is 201-264-9200*).

NEWPORT JAZZ/FOLK FESTIVALS: These, of course, are the rather rambunctious festivals at which the maturing discover the music that never ages and at which the aging rediscover the music that kept them young. The jazz edition (July 3-6) explodes July 3 at 6 p.m. with the George Benson Quartet, the Kenny Burrell Quartet, Anita O'Day, Bill Evans, Jeremy Steig, Young-Holt Unlimited, the Freddie Hubbard Quintet, and others. On the 4th, at 2 p.m., there's a Jam Session in which, with others, Art Blakey, Benny Green, Jo Jones, Howard McGhee, Ray Nance, Slam Stewart, Sonny Stitt, Buddy Tate are slated to appear; at 8 that evening, "An Evening of Jazz-Rock" bills Jeff Beck; Blood, Sweat and Tears; the Roland Kirk Quartet, others. On the 5th (at 2 p.m.), Miles Davis, Gary Burton, the Newport All Stars, others; (at 8 p.m.), Art Blakey, Dave Brubeck, Gerry Mulligan, Maxine Sullivan, others. Sunday, July 6 finale: Dave Brubeck's "Light in the Wilderness" (11 a.m.); James Brown (2 p.m.); Buddy Rich, B.B. King, Johnny Winter, Led Zeppelin, others (8 p.m.). . . . On July 11 at 8:30 p.m., a single concert by Blind Faith. . . . The Folk Festival (July 16-20), spotlights such principals as Johnny Cash, Len Chandler, Buffy Ste. Marie (July 17); Champion Jack Dupree, Sleepy John Estes, Taj Mahal, Muddy Waters (July 18); The Everly Brothers, Arlo Guthrie, Joni Mitchell (July 19); Pete Seeger, Sonny Terry, Brownie McGhee (July 20). In addition to these regularly scheduled evening concerts, the Folk Festival holds workshops and children's programs. (For full information, write Festival Field, Newport, R.I.; in New York, you may phone 759-2734/5 for availability of tickets and information on where in town to buy them.)

CUE
NEW YORK, N.
W. 244,000
JUN 28 1969

SARATOGA PERFORMING ARTS CENTER: Now ensconced as a major festival, this one, now in progress, also offers a bit of everything (photo, lower right). While a film series unreels in the Spa Theatre, the central Pavilion rocks with a rock-musical, "Your Own Thing" (June 26-28). Major attractions in the Pavilion thereafter include the New York Pro Musica's "Entertainment for Elizabeth" (June 30, July 1); the New York City Ballet (July 3-6, 8-13, 15-20, 22-27); the Philadelphia Orchestra led by Eugene Ormandy or guest conductors (July 30-Aug. 3, Aug. 6-10, Aug. 13-17, Aug. 21-24). The pops bill includes Petula Clark (July 14); Peter, Paul and Mary (July 28); The Cowsills (July 29); Buddy Rich (Aug. 4); Johnny Mathis (Aug. 5); Tony Bennett (Aug. 11); The 5th Dimension (Aug. 19); Dionne Warwick (Aug. 25); Janis Joplin (Aug. 27); The King Family (Aug. 28); and Bill Cosby (Aug. 31). On Aug. 31, the closing Saratoga date, a spate of W. C. Fields films ends with "The Old-Fashioned Way." The old-fashioned, leisurely summers grow more hectic as the winter music circuit expands into a perfect 365-days-a-year round. Saratoga adds a Monday night chamber music series by members of either the New York City Ballet orchestra or by the brilliant first-chair men and sidemen of the Philadelphia. And then, to boot, the McGill Chamber Orchestra, the De Pasquale Quartet, and Morton Gould's "Congress of Strings" (Aug. 20). See you at the stretchers.

RAVINIA FESTIVAL: Is this festival in Ravinia Park in Highland Park, Illinois, near Chicago, too far-flung for Cue and me? —as Irving Berlin wrote, "Say it isn't so." As Tanglewood is to the Boston Symphony, it's a warm-weather home for the Chicago Symphony; like Saratoga and the Garden State Arts Center, it's hospitable to the mélange music has become (photo, lower center). Here are some of the Chicago Symphony bookings, conducted either by Seiji Ozawa or guest leaders: June 28, 29; July 3, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 17 (Joan Sutherland), 19, 20, 24, 26, 27 (Gilbert and Sullivan with soloists); 31 and Aug. 2 (concert version of "Madama Butterfly" with Martina Arroyo, others); Aug. 3 (with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf); 7 and 9 (concert version of "Aida" with Martina Arroyo, Richard Tucker, Sherrill Milnes, others); Pops at Ravinia includes The New York Rock and Roll Ensemble (July 2); Peter Nero (July 4); The Iron Butterfly (July 9); Liza Minnelli (July 11); Ian and Sylvia (July 16); Benny Goodman (July 23); Ramsey Lewis (July 25); B.B. King (July 30); Preservation Hall Jazz Band (Aug. 1); Ella Fitzgerald (Aug. 10). The peripatetic New York City Ballet touches down at Ravinia, Aug. 12-17. In addition, there are several Monday evening recitals at the Murray Theatre involving either name soloists, chamber groups, visiting orchestras, or dance companies. These (again, see front-of-the-book listings) involve pianists Misha Dichter and Vladimir Ashkenazy, dancer Louis Falco, others.

CARAMOOR FESTIVAL, ETC.: The Caramoor estate festivities and the superior events already transpiring thereon are a gift of the late Walter and Lucie Rosen; the modest admission charges are mere sustaining fees for maintaining a significant memorial at a stunning site (photo lower left). To wit: The New York Pro Musica's "An Entertainment for Elizabeth" (June 27, 28); the American premiere of Britten's "The Prodigal Son" (June 29, July 6); Handel's "Semele" starring Beverly Sills, other soloists, conducted by Julius Rudel (July 3); "Viennese Music" (July 5); soprano Roberta Peters, the New York Chamber Soloists (July 11); Mr. Rudel and pianist Leonid Hambro (July 12). A full report by this reporter on the Caramoor season will appear in an early issue. . . . At Waterloo Village near Stanhope, New Jersey, also now operative on some weekends, music of consequence occurs in an overpowering setting—in this case a reconstructed pre-Revolutionary village. On July 4, the Sills-Rudel "Semele"; July 19, Van Cliburn; Aug. 2, Roberta Peters and Jan Peerce; Aug. 9, Eddy Arnold; Aug. 23, pianist Gary Graffman and Julius Rudel; and—too—dates to be announced.

In the "etc." above, note such as the new St. Louis Symphony Mississippi River Festival, the multi-community Adirondack-Champlain Festival, Vermont's Marlboro (Rudolf Serkin artistic director, Pablo Casals in residence, Alexander Schneider conducting and performing), the Blossom Festival (summer home of the Cleveland Orchestra), Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, ad infinitum. Next summer, no doubt, a moon festival—we'll be there.

—GREER JOHNSON

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 41,961 SUN. 423,790
JUN 29 1969

Tanglewood to Open

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass.—The 1969 Boston Symphony Orchestra Tanglewood season gets under way in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall today, with the traditional Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center.

On Friday at 9 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the first of three all-Mozart programs as this season's opening Berkshire Festival concert.

Each of the first weekend's all-Mozart programs includes one of the last three symphonies and a late piano concerto. On July 4, Leinsdorf conducts the symphony No. 39, and the 26-year-old German pianist Christopher Eschenbach makes his Boston Symphony and Tanglewood debuts playing the concerto in C, K. 467. The symphony No. 29 opens the program. On Saturday at 8 p.m., John Browning is soloist in the piano concerto No. 23 in A, K. 488, and Leinsdorf conducts the symphony No. 40.

Next Sunday afternoon, the soloist is Claude Frank, who will play Mozart's last piano concerto, in B flat, K. 595. Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's last symphony, the "Jupiter." Six of Mozart's German Dances, K. 571, open the program.

Leinsdorf Opens Berkshire Festival July 4 With Mozart

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony will open the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., with three all-Mozart programs, July 4, 5, 6. German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will be soloist, July 4; American pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will be soloists, respectively, July 5 and 6.

The Festival continues through Aug. 24. For further information address the Festival Ticket office at Tanglewood, Lenox 01240.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
JUN 27 1969

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
JUN 29 1969

Music and Dance

The Season's Catalog Looks Familiar, But . . .

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

If at first glance the catalog of summer music and dance concerts looks vaguely familiar, there is a reason. But because the Capital area summer festivals seem to have become a habit for a large contingent of performers (conductors, dancers, pianists, everybody) is hardly cause for complaint, considering the unbounded talent these recurring artists encompass.

A less admirable area of repetition, however, is the matter of programming itself. Too many box office hits are repeated year after year until they are absolutely worn out —as happened with the music of George Gershwin in the last few seasons. A charming change of pace once, Gershwin as a ritual ceases to be charming. (There are no Gershwin programs scheduled this season.)

Putting the repeats aside for the moment, some people and events coming up promise excitement. Tanglewood and the Boston Symphony Orchestra offer an introduction to French conductor-composer Pierre Boulez on August 2 with a program of Haydn, Debussy and Bartok. Boulez succeeds Leonard Bernstein as conductor of the New York Philharmonic iin September, 1971.

ALSO IN THE dynamic personality-musician arena are conductor Daniel Barenboim and his wife, cellist Jacqueline DuPre, following Boulez at Tanglewood on August 3 with Elgar's Cello Concerto. This concert also includes one of the dearest of repeats, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

(Incidentally, Tanglewood goes all out in the Beethoven hit-parade category, embracing also the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica" and the "Emperor" Concerto and wrapping it all up with a concluding presentation of the Symphony No. 9, Eric Leinsdorf's swan song chestra. Barenboim will appear again on August 24.)

The team of Barenboim and DuPre will also be at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center the same week, on August 7 with Saint Saens' Concerto No. 1 for Violincello and Orchestra. Barenboim will appear again August 8 when he will both conduct and play the piano in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 for piano, violin, flute and strings.

Andre Previn is another of the rising and highly competent conductors who will be in the area appearing at SPAC on August 15. Along with conducting he also will play the piano, Mozart's Concerto No. 24.

In addition to these there are numerous other guest conductors of note appearing in the area in the course of the summer, nine at Tanglewood alone. Added to these, it hardly seems necessary to mention, will be the continuing talents of Eugene Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga and Eric Leinsdorf with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

It is worthwhile to note here that the question of conductors becomes so important because the orchestras remain constant. The quality of both the Boston and Philadelphia are dependable quantities and it is the conductor who adds the seasoning.

Conductors are also important because the music programming itself is traditionally restricted in its offerings although it should be noted that there is a distinct liberalization of programming at both Saratoga and Tanglewood this summer, a very welcome sign.

Continued on Page 2

SUMMER MUSIC FESTIVALS: 1969

TANGLEWOOD/BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL: Never banned in or near Boston and always "in" with Bostonians and thousands of traveling music lovers, this—one of the oldest and most honored of festivals—gets under way July 4 for the first of eight weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf or guest conductors (center photo). Mozart, Mr. Leinsdorf, and piano soloists are featured on the July 4-6 programs; Mozart dominates the July 11-13 weekend, when his "The Abduction from the Seraglio" will be sung by Beverly Sills, George Shirley, other soloists (concert style)—this, too, led by Mr. Leinsdorf. Other highlights: pianist Earl Wild with Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No. 1 (July 18); a concert version of Verdi's "Otello" with Richard Cassilly, Maralin Niska, Sherrill Milnes (July 26); Pierre Boulez as guest conductor (Aug. 2); Daniel Barenboim, conductor, and Jacqueline DuPré, cellist (Aug. 3); Henry Lewis, conductor, and Marilyn Horne, soprano (Aug. 17); Beverly Sills recital (Aug. 22 weekend prelude); Miss Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, and Justino Diaz in Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 led by Mr. Leinsdorf (Aug. 24). For devotees of the lighter summery fare, Arthur Fiedler brings the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra to Tanglewood as well (Aug. 30, 31). (To check the details of each weekend at Tanglewood, of other festivals on these pages, and of festivals elsewhere, see Cue*'s weekly listings in the Events of the Week section*).

GARDEN STATE ARTS CENTER: The second season for this nearby festival at Telegraph Hill Park on the Garden State Parkway is already under way. It concludes on Aug. 30 and is seasoned throughout by a wide variety of attractions. Stanislaw Skrowaczewski guest-conducts the New York Philharmonic with pianist Van Cliburn, June 26-28. There follow three variety shows starring pops favorites: Glen Campbell (June 30-July 5); Rowan and Martin (July 7-12); and Diana Ross, The Supremes, Buddy Rich (July 14-19). A company of "Fiddler on the Roof" reigns from July 21-26. Then the American Ballet Theatre offers three of its most triumphant productions: ("Giselle"—July 28, Aug. 1; "Swan Lake"—July 29, Aug. 2; "Coppélia"— July 30, 31). Steve Lawrence and Eydie Gorme, with Woody Herman's Orchestra, take over Aug. 4-9. The New York Philharmonic, with pianist Byron Janis and led by Karel Ancerl, returns Aug. 13, 14. Enzo Stuarti and Corbett Monica appear Aug. 16. The "New" 1969 Liberace Show (candelabra with candles never before lighted?) holds forth from Aug. 18 to Aug. 23. On Aug. 25, and through Aug. 30, the luminaries are Henry Mancini and Johnny Mathis. At the time of this compilation, a few bookings remain "to be announced." (Again, check Cue*'s Events of the Week section weekly; therein, insofar as press deadlines permit, last minute cancellations or substitutions will be noted. The inquiry number for the festival itself is 201-264-9200*).

NEWPORT JAZZ/FOLK FESTIVALS: These, of course, are the rather rambunctious festivals at which the maturing discover the music that never ages and at which the aging rediscover the music that kept them young. The jazz edition (July 3-6) explodes July 3 at 6 p.m. with the George Benson Quartet, the Kenny Burrell Quartet, Anita O'Day, Bill Evans, Jeremy Steig, Young-Holt Unlimited, the Freddie Hubbard Quintet, and others. On the 4th, at 2 p.m., there's a Jam Session in which, with others, Art Blakey, Benny Green, Jo Jones, Howard McGhee, Ray Nance, Slam Stewart, Sonny Stitt, Buddy Tate are slated to appear; at 8 that evening, "An Evening of Jazz-Rock" bills Jeff Beck; Blood, Sweat and Tears; the Roland Kirk Quartet, others. On the 5th (at 2 p.m.), Miles Davis, Gary Burton, the Newport All Stars, others; (at 8 p.m.), Art Blakey, Dave Brubeck, Gerry Mulligan, Maxine Sullivan, others. Sunday, July 6 finale: Dave Brubeck's "Light in the Wilderness" (11 a.m.); James Brown (2 p.m.); Buddy Rich, B.B. King, Johnny Winter, Led Zeppelin, others (8 p.m.). . . . On July 11 at 8:30 p.m., a single concert by Blind Faith. . . . The Folk Festival (July 16-20), spotlights such principals as Johnny Cash, Len Chandler, Buffy Ste. Marie (July 17); Champion Jack Dupree, Sleepy John Estes, Taj Mahal, Muddy Waters (July 18); The Everly Brothers, Arlo Guthrie, Joni Mitchell (July 19); Pete Seeger, Sonny Terry, Brownie McGhee (July 20). In addition to these regularly scheduled evening concerts, the Folk Festival holds workshops and children's programs. (For full information, write Festival Field, Newport, R.I.; in New York, you may phone 759-2734/5 for availability of tickets and information on where in town to buy them.)

CUE
NEW YORK, N.
W. 244,000

JUN 28 1969

SARATOGA PERFORMING ARTS CENTER: Now ensconced as a major festival, this one, now in progress, also offers a bit of everything (photo, lower right). While a film series unreels in the Spa Theatre, the central Pavilion rocks with a rock-musical, "Your Own Thing" (June 26-28). Major attractions in the Pavilion thereafter include the New York Pro Musica's "Entertainment for Elizabeth" (June 30, July 1); the New York City Ballet (July 3-6, 8-13, 15-20, 22-27); the Philadelphia Orchestra led by Eugene Ormandy or guest conductors (July 30-Aug. 3, Aug. 6-10, Aug. 13-17, Aug. 21-24). The pops bill includes Petula Clark (July 14); Peter, Paul and Mary (July 28); The Cowsills (July 29); Buddy Rich (Aug. 4); Johnny Mathis (Aug. 5); Tony Bennett (Aug. 11); The 5th Dimension (Aug. 19); Dionne Warwick (Aug. 25); Janis Joplin (Aug. 27); The King Family (Aug. 28); and Bill Cosby (Aug. 31). On Aug. 31, the closing Saratoga date, a spate of W. C. Fields films ends with "The Old-Fashioned Way." The old-fashioned, leisurely summers grow more hectic as the winter music circuit expands into a perfect 365-days-a-year round. Saratoga adds a Monday night chamber music series by members of either the New York City Ballet orchestra or by the brilliant first-chair men and sidemen of the Philadelphia. And then, to boot, the McGill Chamber Orchestra, the De Pasquale Quartet, and Morton Gould's "Congress of Strings" (Aug. 20). See you at the stretchers.

RAVINIA FESTIVAL: Is this festival in Ravinia Park in Highland Park, Illinois, near Chicago, too far-flung for Cue and me? —as Irving Berlin wrote, "Say it isn't so." As Tanglewood is to the Boston Symphony, it's a warm-weather home for the Chicago Symphony; like Saratoga and the Garden State Arts Center, it's hospitable to the mélange music has become (photo, lower center). Here are some of the Chicago Symphony bookings, conducted either by Seiji Ozawa or guest leaders: June 28, 29; July 3, 5, 6, 8, 10, 12, 13, 17 (Joan Sutherland), 19, 20, 24, 26, 27 (Gilbert and Sullivan with soloists); 31 and Aug. 2 (concert version of "Madama Butterfly" with Martina Arroyo, others); Aug. 3 (with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf); 7 and 9 (concert version of "Aida" with Martina Arroyo, Richard Tucker, Sherrill Milnes, others); Pops at Ravinia includes The New York Rock and Roll Ensemble (July 2); Peter Nero (July 4); The Iron Butterfly (July 9); Liza Minnelli (July 11); Ian and Sylvia (July 16); Benny Goodman (July 23); Ramsey Lewis (July 25); B.B. King (July 30); Preservation Hall Jazz Band (Aug. 1); Ella Fitzgerald (Aug. 10). The peripatetic New York City Ballet touches down at Ravinia, Aug. 12-17. In addition, there are several Monday evening recitals at the Murray Theatre involving either name soloists, chamber groups, visiting orchestras, or dance companies. These (again, see front-of-the-book listings) involve pianists Misha Dichter and Vladimir Ashkenazy, dancer Louis Falco, others.

CARAMOOR FESTIVAL, ETC.: The Caramoor estate festivities and the superior events already transpiring thereon are a gift of the late Walter and Lucie Rosen; the modest admission charges are mere sustaining fees for maintaining a significant memorial at a stunning site (photo lower left). To wit: The New York Pro Musica's "An Entertainment for Elizabeth" (June 27, 28); the American premiere of Britten's "The Prodigal Son" (June 29, July 6); Handel's "Semele" starring Beverly Sills, other soloists, conducted by Julius Rudel (July 3); "Viennese Music" (July 5); soprano Roberta Peters, the New York Chamber Soloists (July 11); Mr. Rudel and pianist Leonid Hambro (July 12). A full report by this reporter on the Caramoor season will appear in an early issue. . . . At Waterloo Village near Stanhope, New Jersey, also now operative on some weekends, music of consequence occurs in an overpowering setting—in this case a reconstructed pre-Revolutionary village. On July 4, the Sills-Rudel "Semele"; July 19, Van Cliburn; Aug. 2, Roberta Peters and Jan Peerce; Aug. 9, Eddy Arnold; Aug. 23, pianist Gary Graffman and Julius Rudel; and—too—dates to be announced.

In the "etc." above, note such as the new St. Louis Symphony Mississippi River Festival, the multi-community Adirondack-Champlain Festival, Vermont's Marlboro (Rudolf Serkin artistic director, Pablo Casals in residence, Alexander Schneider conducting and performing), the Blossom Festival (summer home of the Cleveland Orchestra), Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival, ad infinitum. Next summer, no doubt, a moon festival—we'll be there.

—GREER JOHNSON

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 4[illegible]1,961 SUN. 423,790

JUN 29 1969

Tanglewood to Open

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass.—The 1969 Boston Symphony Orchestra Tanglewood season gets under way in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall today, with the traditional Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center.

On Friday at 9 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the first of three all-Mozart programs as this season's opening Berkshire Festival concert.

Each of the first weekend's all-Mozart programs includes one of the last three symphonies and a late piano concerto. On July 4, Leinsdorf conducts the symphony No. 39, and the 26-year-old German pianist Christopher Eschenbach makes his Boston Symphony and Tanglewood debuts playing the concerto in C, K. 467. The symphony No. 29 opens the program. On Saturday at 8 p.m., John Browning is soloist in the piano concerto No. 23 in A, K. 488, and Leinsdorf conducts the symphony No. 40.

Next Sunday afternoon, the soloist is Claude Frank, who will play Mozart's last piano concerto, in B flat, K. 595. Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's last symphony, the "Jupiter." Six of Mozart's German Dances, K. 571, open the program.

Leinsdorf Opens Berkshire Festival July 4 With Mozart

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony will open the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., with three all-Mozart programs, July 4, 5, 6. German pianist Christoph Eschenbach will be soloist, July 4; American pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will be soloists, respectively, July 5 and 6.

The Festival continues through Aug. 24. For further information address the Festival Ticket office at Tanglewood, Lenox 01240.

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

JUN 27 1969

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUN 29 1969

Music and Dance

The Season's Catalog Looks Familiar, But . . .

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

If at first glance the catalog of summer music and dance concerts looks vaguely familiar, there is a reason. But because the Capital area summer festivals seem to have become a habit for a large contingent of performers (conductors, dancers, pianists, everybody) is hardly cause for complaint, considering the unbounded talent these recurring artists encompass.

A less admirable area of repetition, however, is the matter of programming itself. Too many box office hits are repeated year after year until they are absolutely worn out —as happened with the music of George Gershwin in the last few seasons. A charming change of pace once, Gershwin as a ritual ceases to be charming. (There are no Gershwin programs scheduled this season.)

Putting the repeats aside for the moment, some people and events coming up promise excitement. Tanglewood and the Boston Symphony Orchestra offer an introduction to French conductor-composer Pierre Boulez on August 2 with a program of Haydn, Debussy and Bartok. Boulez succeeds Leonard Bernstein as conductor of the New York Philharmonic iin September, 1971.

ALSO IN THE dynamic personality-musician arena are conductor Daniel Barenboim and his wife, cellist Jacqueline DuPre, following Boulez at Tanglewood on August 3 with Elgar's Cello Concerto. This concert also includes one of the dearest of repeats, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

(Incidentally, Tanglewood goes all out in the Beethoven hit-parade category, embracing also the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica" and the "Emperor" Concerto and wrapping it all up with a concluding presentation of the Symphony No. 9, Eric Leinsdorf's swan song chestra. Barenboim will appear again on August 24.)

The team of Barenboim and DuPre will also be at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center the same week, on August 7 with Saint Saens' Concerto No. 1 for Violincello and Orchestra. Barenboim will appear again August 8 when he will both conduct and play the piano in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 for piano, violin, flute and strings.

Andre Previn is another of the rising and highly competent conductors who will be in the area appearing at SPAC on August 15. Along with conducting he also will play the piano, Mozart's Concerto No. 24.

In addition to these there are numerous other guest conductors of note appearing in the area in the course of the summer, nine at Tanglewood alone. Added to these, it hardly seems necessary to mention, will be the continuing talents of Eugene Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga and Eric Leinsdorf with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

It is worthwhile to note here that the question of conductors becomes so important because the orchestras remain constant. The quality of both the Boston and Philadelphia are dependable quantities and it is the conductor who adds the seasoning.

Conductors are also important because the music programming itself is traditionally restricted in its offerings although it should be noted that there is a distinct liberalization of programming at both Saratoga and Tanglewood this summer, a very welcome sign.

Continued on Page 2

18.

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(S) 109,181

MUSIC

JUN 22 1969 New England

Leinsdorf's Last Lenox

By JOHN THORNTON

FOR HIS FINAL weeks as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf has chosen programs for Tanglewood plentifully laced with works of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Verdi and Brahms.

He begins the 1969 summer season at Lenox, Mass., on July 4 with an all-Mozart program: Symphony No 29 in A, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467 with the young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach; and Symphony No 39 in E Flat, K. 543.

On July 11 Leinsdorf directs the four Bach orchestral suites, to be followed on July 18 with a more contemporary concert in which he will introduce Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No 1, and "Rite of Spring" together with Rossini's Overture to "The Italian Women in Algiers."

When Leinsdorf announced his intention of resigning a season back, he bitterly complained in the Boston press that his huge work load was responsible for him giving up the post of music director. During the ensuing storm, the volatile conductor received much support, but some BSO musicians were relieved and delighted that he was leaving.

His schedule at Tanglewood is heavy this summer. Of the 24 week-end concerts at Lenox, he will direct 15 programs.

His time off will come when nine guest conductors arrive at the huge shed on these dates: July 13, David Zinman; July 27, Charles Wilson; Aug. 2, Pierre Boulez; Aug. 3, Daniel Baremboim; Aug. 8, Karel Ancerl; Aug. 10, Josef Krips; Aug. 16, Max Rudolf; Aug. 17, Henry Lewis; and Aug. 22, Milton Katims.

Mozart is heavily favored by Leinsdorf, who will direct "The Abduction from the Seraglio" July 12 with soprano Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena, and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski.

STEINBERG
taking over

LEINSDORF
leaving

THE WEEK BEFORE, on July 6, he has scheduled an all-Mozart concert: Six German Dances; Piano Concerto in B Flat, K. 595, with Claude Frank as soloist; and the "Jupiter" Symphony.

Leinsdorf will conduct a program featuring the Prokofiev "Romeo and Juliet" ballet suite July 19, then he again turns to the task of directing a full opera in Verdi's "Otello," with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherill Milnes.

For his farewell program Aug. 24, Leinsdorf has chosen Berlioz' "Royal Hunt and Storm" from the opera "The Trojans" and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz will be the quartet for the "Choral".

The guest conductors have chosen programs largely from the standard repertoire except for Ancerl, who will direct Smetena's "Ma Vlast," a series of consecutive tone poems, the best known of which is "Die Moldau, on Aug. 8.

David Zinman, (July 13) the first guest director, will conduct Graff's "Symphony for Strings." Bach's Triple Concerto, Handel's Concerto Grosso No 1 from Opus 6 and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, K. 425.

Charles Wilson will be at Lenox July 27 for the Sibelius Symphony No 2 and the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenhazy as soloist.

Pierre Boulez appears Aug. 2 to direct Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante with four BSO principals, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, oboist Ralph Gomberg, bassoonist Sherman Walt and cellist Jules Eskin. Boulez, exceptionally talented in music of the French school will also conduct Debussy's "Jeux" and "La Mer" and Two Rhapsodies for Violin by Bartok, with Silverstein as soloist.

Daniel Baremboim on Aug. 3 conducts Elgar's Cello Concerto with Jacqueline DePre as soloist, Beethoven's C Minor Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture.

Veteran Josef Krips is the guest conductor Aug. 10 directing Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Schubert's lengthy C Major Symphony.

Max Rudolf will conduct Haydn's Symphony No 91, Bartok's "Dance Suite" and Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony Aug. 16.

On Aug. 17 Henry Lewis has chosen a program of Berlioz "Corsaire Overture," "Nuits de'ete," "Parto, parto" from "La Clemenza di Tito" of Mozart, Rossini's "Cruda Sorte" from "L'Italiana in Algeria" and Tschaikovsky's tone poem "Francesca da Rimini." Marilyn Horne is the soloist.

Milton Katims is set for Aug. 22 when he directs Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis" and Ravel's Second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite.

Two special concerts at the end of the season, Aug. 30 and 31, will feature Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. These Pops Galas always attract sellout crowds.

IN ADDITION to the regular Saturday-Sunday concerts, Tanglewood this summer has scheduled five Tuesday programs in which the accent will be on the contemporary scene, including rock, jazz, Indian and folk music.

Weekend "Preludes" proved very popular last year will continue. At these prelude mini-concerts, two hours before the Friday BSO events, members of the orchestra present short recitals with guest artists.

Open rehearsals take place in the Shed each Saturday morning (where you will usually find the students) and the huge grounds are open every day from sunup to sundown on non-concert days.

When Tanglewood closes Aug. 25, BSO musicians will take a well deserved rest until late in October when their new director, William Steinberg will take over the podium at Symphony Hall in Boston.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

2

JUN 22 1969 New England Newsclip

'69 Season Bows And Old Reliables Breathe New Life

As the summer entertainment circuit picks up speed, there are signs of new life among the old reliable sources of fun and fancy serving residents of Western Massachusetts.

The Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox remains the queen of the attractions. It has a few changes of its own. Yet, the schedule at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst is longer and more diversified this year.

Not to be forgotten, however, is the Storrowton Theater in West Springfield where a resurgence of energy is all too evident.

Dancers Jump to It

There are signs of new life among the dancers: the David McLain Dance Theater is a new enterprise offering ballet at the Beaupre Creative Arts Center in Stockbridge. This is a short drive from Ted Shawn's Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival entering its 37th year.

The theaters, too, in Stockbridge and Williamstown and Vermont and other vacation neighborhoods along the shores of Long Island Sound and Cape Cod are eagerly announcing, and in some cases already presenting, their summer play schedules.

New at Tanglewood will be a ninth weekend to present a couple of extra performances of Arthur Fieldler's highly popular Boston Pops programs, and there will be an expansion of the "Contemporary Trends" programs from three to five to offer more sounds of folk, rock and jazz on Tuesday evenings.

Bancroft at Stockbridge

The Berkshire Theater Festival at Stockbridge will open its season July 1 with a new play by William Gibson starring Anne Bancroft. The Williamstown theater will open its 15th season July 3 with a comedy, "Ring Round the Moon."

There are several large musical theaters offering the sort of musical show fare scheduled at Storrowton Theater. They are widely dispersed, however, and tend to serve Western Massachusetts people only when they are on vacation.

Oakdale Musical Theater at Wallingford, Conn., is one of the closest. Others are the Warwick Music Theater in Rhode Island, the Carousel at Framingham and the Cape Cod Melody Tent at Hyannis.

Stratford and Shakespeare

In Stratford, Conn., the official 15th season of the American Shakespeare Festival Theater began last week after several weeks of special performances for students.

The repertory fare this year includes "Henry V," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Hamlet" and Chekov's "Three Sisters." The schedule ends Sept. 14.

The Champlain Shakespeare Festival at the University of Vermont in Burlington will offer "Othello," "Richard III" and "The Winter's Tale" in repertory from July 22 to Aug. 30.

There are three offerings at the Goodspeed Opera House in East Haddam, Conn.: "The Boy Friend" from June 23 to July 12, a new musical called "Tom Piper" from July 14 to Aug. 2 and "Lock Up Your Daughters" from Aug. 4 to Aug. 30.

Saratoga vs. Tanglewood?

Whether the schedule of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra at Saratoga's performing arts center is enticing customers from Tanglewood is still debated.

This is Saratoga's fourth summer. It started Friday with W.C. Fields', "My Little Chickadee," in the Spa Theater and will end with Fields again, "The Old Fashioned Way," also in the Spa.

Between will be the film festival, stage shows, chamber music, the New York City ballet from July 3 to July 27, the Philadelphia Orchestra from July 30 to Aug. 24 and assorted diversions such as Petula Clark, Janis Joplin and Bill Cosby between, before and after the ballet and symphony.

Holding a high status among the musical fraternity (as high as Tanglewood because of its quality) is the musical festival led at Marlboro, Vt., by Rudolph Serkin and, in recent years, graced by Pablo Casals.

There are other series of concerts in the neighborhood, i.e., Hartt College in Hartford, the Cummington School of the Arts, Music Mountain at Falls Village, Conn., the Yale Summer School of Music and Art at Norfolk, Conn., the Red Fox Music Barn in New Marlboro, the Rotary Club-Parks Department in West Springfield, South Mountain in Pittsfield, Music Barn in Lenox.

And all around us there are theaters.

Down on the Cape there are the Provincetown Players at Provincetown, the Orleans Arena Theater at Orleans, the Cape Playhouse at Dennis, the Falmouth Playhouse at Falmouth.

In Connecticut nearby are the Triangle Playhouse in Farmington, the Sharon Playhouse at Sharon, and the Nutmeg Summer Playhouse at the University of Connecticut at Storrs.

In Vermont there are busy playhouses in Stowe and Dorset, and in Fitchburg the Lake Whalom Playhouse has been in successful operation for many years.

Most of these theatrical and musical organizations are about to launch their summer schedule of plays and concerts. Some already have begun.

None contacted have indicated a diminishing of activity. On the contrary, many have expanded, and some of the managers have shown unusually optimistic attitudes toward their box offices.

Tomorrow: Tanglewood.

By RICHARD HAMMERICH
Republican Theater Critic

Berkshire Arts Units Woo Youngsters

PITTSFIELD — In a unique cooperative project, three of the major performing arts organizations in Berkshire county will sponsor a joint arts program for youngsters this summer.

Jointly Sponsored

The program, to be called "A Day in the Arts," is jointly sponsored by Tanglewood, Berkshire Threatre Festival and Jacob's Pillow, and was developed in consultation with the Berkshire Regional Educational Theater (BRET).

Under the "Day in the Arts" plan, small groups of youngsters 10 to 14 will attend performances at each of the three arts centers on three successive days, with the fourth day devoted to a visual arts program.

The program will continue, with successive groups, for eight weeks. The visits will include attending performances, meeting the performing artists, touring backstage areas, lunches or supper, and a recreational period at the Tanglewood swimming area each day. A total of 100 to 180 children is expected to be involved.

Artistic Project

The visual arts program is being planned around the creation of an artistic project in the youngsters' home community, and will feature, as examples, the painting of an outdoor mural or construction of a playground sculpture.

The program is designed to reach youngsters who would not otherwise have an opportunity for an aesthetic experience of this type. The aim is to provide the youngsters with an introduction to the performing arts, an understanding of their interrelationship, a sense of the discipline and training of the artist, and an opportunity to carry back to their communities the momentum to create arts activities of their own.

Enrollments are being handled by the neighborhood centers (Hope, NEW, and OCA) in Pittsfield, and the South Berkshire Community Action office in Great Barrington.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUN 21 1969 New England

Berkshire Festival

The Berkshire Festival that starts this week at Tanglewood will be the last for Erich Leinsdorf. His seven-year reign as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will end with the final strains of the Beethoven Ninth on the afternoon of Aug. 24.

Major orchestras and their conductors become synonymous. Think of one and you think of the other—Koussevitsky, Munch and then Leinsdorf with the Boston Symphony, Szell and the Cleveland, Ormandy and the Philadelphia, Toscanini and the N.B.C. Symphony, Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic, though the Bernstein image will change now, with the appointment of Pierre Boulez to succeed him.

* * *

What the orchestra plays is up to the permanent conductor, and its standards and interpretations are his too. At Tanglewood Leinsdorf also is responsible for the operation of the Berkshire Music Center. Besides guest appearances with orchestras here and abroad, after leaving Boston, he will specialize, as in the past, in conducting opera.

The Tanglewood establishment is much more than a brilliant series of concerts in the Music Shed, by one of the world's finest orchestras. It is a rural retreat for the serious study of music in many forms, a busy summer seminar of practice and performance, with the students presenting numerous concerts of their own.

Tanglewood was the forerunner of Chicago's Ravina, Detroit's Meadowbrook, New York state's Saratoga, Ohio's Blossom Center, Colorado's Aspen and others of lesser scope. And the Berkshire Festival remains unsurpassed for the excellence of its music, the value of its instruction and the enjoyment of its programs.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUN 29 1969 New England

18.

MAINE SUNDAY TELEGRAM
PORTLAND, MAINE
(T) 109,181

MUSIC

JUN 22 1969 New England

Leinsdorf's Last Lenox

By JOHN THORNTON

FOR HIS FINAL weeks as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf has chosen programs for Tanglewood plentifully laced with works of Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Verdi and Brahms.

He begins the 1969 summer season at Lenox, Mass., on July 4 with an all-Mozart program: Symphony No 29 in A, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467 with the young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach; and Symphony No 39 in E Flat, K. 543.

On July 11 Leinsdorf directs the four Bach orchestral suites, to be followed on July 18 with a more contemporary concert in which he will introduce Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No 1, and "Rite of Spring" together with Rossini's Overture to "The Italian Women in Algiers."

When Leinsdorf announced his intention of resigning a season back, he bitterly complained in the Boston press that his huge work load was responsible for him giving up the post of music director. During the ensuing storm, the volatile conductor received much support, but some BSO musicians were relieved and delighted that he was leaving.

His schedule at Tanglewood is heavy this summer. Of the 24 week-end concerts at Lenox, he will direct 15 programs.

His time off will come when nine guest conductors arrive at the huge shed on these dates: July 13, David Zinman; July 27, Charles Wilson; Aug. 2, Pierre Boulez; Aug. 3, Daniel Baremboim; Aug. 8, Karel Ancerl; Aug. 10, Josef Krips; Aug. 16, Max Rudolf; Aug. 17, Henry Lewis; and Aug. 22, Milton Katims.

Mozart is heavily favored by Leinsdorf, who will direct "The Abduction from the Seraglio" July 12 with soprano Beverly Sills and Anne Elgar, tenor George Shirley and Jerold Siena, and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski.

STEINBERG
taking over

LEINSDORF
leaving

THE WEEK BEFORE, on July 6, he has scheduled an all-Mozart concert: Six German Dances; Piano Concerto in B Flat, K. 595, with Claude Frank as soloist; and the "Jupiter" Symphony.

Leinsdorf will conduct a program featuring the Prokofiev "Romeo and Juliet" ballet suite July 19, then he again turns to the task of directing a full opera in Verdi's "Otello," with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherill Milnes.

For his farewell program Aug. 24, Leinsdorf has chosen Berlioz' "Royal Hunt and Storm" from the opera "The Trojans" and the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander and Justino Diaz will be the quartet for the "Choral".

The guest conductors have chosen programs largely from the standard repertoire except for Ancerl, who will direct Smetena's "Ma Vlast," a series of consecutive tone poems, the best known of which is "Die Moldau, on Aug. 8.

David Zinman, (July 13) the first guest director, will conduct Graff's "Symphony for Strings," Bach's Triple Concerto, Handel's Concerto Grosso No 1 from Opus 6 and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, K. 425.

Charles Wilson will be at Lenox July 27 for the Sibelius Symphony No 2 and the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenhazy as soloist.

Pierre Boulez appears Aug. 2 to direct Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante with four BSO principals, concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, oboist Ralph Gomberg, bassoonist Sherman Walt and cellist Jules Eskin. Boulez, exceptionally talented in music of the French school will also conduct Debussy's "Jeux" and "La Mer" and Two Rhapsodies for Violin by Bartok, with Silverstein as soloist.

Daniel Baremboim on Aug. 3 conducts Elgar's Cello Concerto with Jacqueline DePre as soloist, Beethoven's C Minor Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture.

Veteran Josef Krips is the guest conductor Aug. 10 directing Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Schubert's lengthy C Major Symphony.

Max Rudolf will conduct Haydn's Symphony No 91, Bartok's "Dance Suite" and Tschaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony Aug. 16.

On Aug. 17 Henry Lewis has chosen a program of Berlioz "Corsaire Overture," "Nuits de'ete," "Parto, parto" from "La Clemenza di Tito" of Mozart, Rossini's "Cruda Sorte" from "L'Italiana in Algeria" and Tschaikovsky's tone poem "Francesca da Rimini." Marilyn Horne is the soloist.

Milton Katims is set for Aug. 22 when he directs Tschaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Vaughan Williams' "Fantasia on a Theme of Thomas Tallis" and Ravel's Second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite.

Two special concerts at the end of the season, Aug. 30 and 31, will feature Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra. These Pops Galas always attract sellout crowds.

IN ADDITION to the regular Saturday-Sunday concerts, Tanglewood this summer has scheduled five Tuesday programs in which the accent will be on the contemporary scene, including rock, jazz, Indian and folk music.

Weekend "Preludes" proved very popular last year will continue. At these prelude mini-concerts, two hours before the Friday BSO events, members of the orchestra present short recitals with guest artists.

Open rehearsals take place in the Shed each Saturday morning (where you will usually find the students) and the huge grounds are open every day from sunup to sundown on non-concert days.

When Tanglewood closes Aug. 25, BSO musicians will take a well deserved rest until late in October when their new director, William Steinberg will take over the podium at Symphony Hall in Boston.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUN 22 1969 New England

'69 Season Bows And Old Reliables Breathe New Life

As the summer entertainment circuit picks up speed, there are signs of new life among the old reliable sources of fun and fancy serving residents of Western Massachusetts.

The Berkshire Musical Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox remains the queen of the attractions. It has a few changes of its own. Yet, the schedule at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst is longer and more diversified this year.

Not to be forgotten, however, is the Storrowton Theater in West Springfield where a resurgence of energy is all too evident.

Dancers Jump to It

There are signs of new life among the dancers: the David McLain Dance Theater is a new enterprise offering ballet at the Beaupre Creative Arts Center in Stockbridge. This is a short drive from Ted Shawn's Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival entering its 37th year.

The theaters, too, in Stockbridge and Williamstown and Vermont and other vacation neighborhoods along the shores of Long Island Sound and Cape Cod are eagerly announcing, and in some cases already presenting, their summer play schedules.

New at Tanglewood will be a ninth weekend to present a couple of extra performances of Arthur Fiedler's highly popular Boston Pops programs, and there will be an expansion of the "Contemporary Trends" programs from three to five to offer more sounds of folk, rock and jazz on Tuesday evenings.

Bancroft at Stockbridge

The Berkshire Theater Festival at Stockbridge will open its season July 1 with a new play by William Gibson starring Anne Bancroft. The Williamstown theater will open its 15th season July 3 with a comedy, "Ring Round the Moon."

There are several large musical theaters offering the sort of musical show fare scheduled at Storrowton Theater. They are widely dispersed, however, and tend to serve Western Massachusetts people only when they are on vacation.

Oakdale Musical Theater at Wallingford, Conn., is one of the closest. Others are the Warwick Music Theater in Rhode Island, the Carousel at Framingham and the Cape Cod Melody Tent at Hyannis.

Stratford and Shakespeare

In Stratford, Conn., the official 15th season of the American Shakespeare Festival Theater began last week after several weeks of special performances for students.

The repertory fare this year includes "Henry V," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Hamlet" and Chekov's "Three Sisters." The schedule ends Sept. 14.

The Champlain Shakespeare Festival at the University of Vermont in Burlington will offer "Othello," "Richard III" and "The Winter's Tale" in repertory from July 22 to Aug. 30.

There are three offerings at the Goodspeed Opera House in East Haddam, Conn.: "The Boy Friend" from June 23 to July 12, a new musical called "Tom Piper" from July 14 to Aug. 2 and "Lock Up Your Daughters" from Aug. 4 to Aug. 30.

Saratoga vs. Tanglewood?

Whether the schedule of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra at Saratoga's performing arts center is enticing customers from Tanglewood is still debated.

This is Saratoga's fourth summer. It started Friday with W.C. Fields', "My Little Chickadee," in the Spa Theater and will end with Fields again, "The Old Fashioned Way," also in the Spa.

Between will be the film festival, stage shows, chamber music, the New York City ballet from July 3 to July 27, the Philadelphia Orchestra from July 30 to Aug. 21 and assorted diversions such as Petula Clark, Janis Joplin and Bill Cosby between, before and after the ballet and symphony.

Holding a high status among the musical fraternity (as high as Tanglewood because of its quality) is the musical festival led at Marlboro, Vt., by Rudolph Serkin and, in recent years, graced by Pablo Casals.

There are other series of concerts in the neighborhood, i.e., Hartt College in Hartford, the Cummington School of the Arts, Music Mountain at Falls Village, Conn., the Yale Summer School of Music and Art at Norfolk, Conn., the Red Fox Music Barn in New Marlboro, the Rotary Club-Parks Department in West Springfield, South Mountain in Pittsfield, Music Barn in Lenox.

And all around us there are theaters.

Down on the Cape there are the Provincetown Players at Provincetown, the Orleans Arena Theater at Orleans, the Cape Playhouse at Dennis, the Falmouth Playhouse at Falmouth.

In Connecticut nearby are the Triangle Playhouse in Farmington, the Sharon Playhouse at Sharon, and the Nutmeg Summer Playhouse at the University of Connecticut at Storrs.

In Vermont there are busy playhouses in Stowe and Dorset, and in Fitchburg the Lake Whalom Playhouse has been in successful operation for many years.

Most of these theatrical and musical organizations are about to launch their summer schedule of plays and concerts. Some already have begun.

None contacted have indicated a diminishing of activity. On the contrary, many have expanded, and some of the managers have shown unusually optimistic attitudes toward their box offices.

Tomorrow: Tanglewood.

By RICHARD HAMMERICH
Republican Theater Critic

Berkshire Arts Units Woo Youngsters

PITTSFIELD — In a unique cooperative project, three of the major performing arts organizations in Berkshire county will sponsor a joint arts program for youngsters this summer.

Jointly Sponsored

The program, to be called "A Day in the Arts," is jointly sponsored by Tanglewood, Berkshire Threatre Festival and Jacob's Pillow, and was developed in consultation with the Berkshire Regional Educational Theater (BRET).

Under the "Day in the Arts" plan, small groups of youngsters 10 to 14 will attend performances at each of the three arts centers on three successive days, with the fourth day devoted to a visual arts program.

The program will continue, with successive groups, for eight weeks. The visits will include attending performances, meeting the performing artists, touring backstage areas, lunches or supper, and a recreational period at the Tanglewood swimming area each day. A total of 100 to 180 children is expected to be involved.

Artistic Project

The visual arts program is being planned around the creation of an artistic project in the youngsters' home community, and will feature, as examples, the painting of an outdoor mural or construction of a playground sculpture.

The program is designed to reach youngsters who would not otherwise have an opportunity for an aesthetic experience of this type. The aim is to provide the youngsters with an introduction to the performing arts, an understanding of their interrelationship, a sense of the discipline and training of the artist, and an opportunity to carry back to their communities the momentum to create arts activities of their own.

Enrollments are being handled by the neighborhood centers (Hope, NEW, and OCA) in Pittsfield, and the South Berkshire Community Action office in Great Barrington.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUN 21 1969 New England

Berkshire Festival

The Berkshire Festival that starts this week at Tanglewood will be the last for Erich Leinsdorf. His seven-year reign as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will end with the final strains of the Beethoven Ninth on the afternoon of Aug. 24.

Major orchestras and their conductors become synonymous. Think of one and you think of the other—Koussevitsky, Munch and then Leinsdorf with the Boston Symphony, Szell and the Cleveland, Ormandy and the Philadelphia, Toscanini and the N.B.C. Symphony, Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic, though the Bernstein image will change now, with the appointment of Pierre Boulez to succeed him.

* * *

What the orchestra plays is up to the permanent conductor, and its standards and interpretations are his too. At Tanglewood Leinsdorf also is responsible for the operation of the Berkshire Music Center. Besides guest appearances with orchestras here and abroad, after leaving Boston, he will specialize, as in the past, in conducting opera.

The Tanglewood establishment is much more than a brilliant series of concerts in the Music Shed, by one of the world's finest orchestras. It is a rural retreat for the serious study of music in many forms, a busy summer seminar of practice and performance, with the students presenting numerous concerts of their own.

Tanglewood was the forerunner of Chicago's Ravina, Detroit's Meadowbrook, New York state's Saratoga, Ohio's Blossom Center, Colorado's Aspen and others of lesser scope. And the Berkshire Festival remains unsurpassed for the excellence of its music, the value of its instruction and the enjoyment of its programs.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUN 29 1969 New England

19.

TANGLEWOOD

By RICHARD HAMMERICH

LENOX — The idealistic dream of the valiant ladies who were so determined in 1934 to hear a symphony orchestra in the Berkshires couldn't have included a vision of the scope of Tanglewood in 1969.

They beat the drums through the hills and produced three concerts that summer at Hanna Farm in Stockbridge with an orchestra of New York Philharmonic musicians conducted by Dr. Henry Hadley.

There were fewer than 10,000 at those three concerts called the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. There will be 200,000 this summer at about 100 concerts and open rehearsals of all sizes.

The sound of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the gracious atmosphere of the spacious Tanglewood are at the core of the growth. The Berkshire Festival has become the preeminent summer music festival of the world. . .although the Austrians might put up a strong defense at the venerable festivities at Salzburg.

The news at Tanglewood is that even with its immense popularity and apparent strength, the management adds inducements each year to increase attendance.

The reason, of course, is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, like all the others, operates with an annual deficit, and the Berkshire Festival operates with a profit. Audiences up to 15,000 see to that.

At first glance the multiple opportunities for music listening at Tanglewood are confusing: there is the central festival, the Friends' series, the Contemporary Trends programs and the Festival of Contemporary Music.

Many of the events in these series are in connection with the programs of advanced musical education in the Berkshire Music Center.

Founded in 1940 at Tanglewood by Serge Koussevitzky, then conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the center this year will have about 400 students.

The main series, the festival, offers 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on eight week ends, the first July 4 this year and the last Aug. 24.

The concerts are scheduled at 9 Friday evenings, at 8

See TANGLEWOOD Page Four

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION

VOL. 106, NO. 146 SPRINGFIELD, MASS., MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 23, 1969 26 PAGES SEVEN CENTS

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.

JUL 2 1969 New England

Tanglewood Weekend Series To Get Underway

On Friday at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the first of three all-Mozart programs as this season's opening Berkshire Festival concert at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Each of the first weekend's one of the last three symphonies and a late piano concerto. On July 4, Mr. Leinsdorf conducts the symphony no. 39, and the 26-year old German pianist Christoph Eschenbach makes his Boston Symphony and Tanglewood debuts playing the concerto in C, K. 467. The symphony no. 29 opens the program. On Saturday July 5 at 8 p.m., John Browning is soloist in the piano concerto no. 23 in A, K. 488, and Mr. Leinsdorf conducts the symphony no. 40. The opening work is the 'Haffner' symphony. On Sunday afternoon, July 6, the soloist is Claude Frank, who will play Mozart's last piano concerto, in B flat, K. 595. Mr. Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's last symphony, the 'Jupiter.' Six of Mozart's German Dances, K. 571, open the program.

Each Tanglewood weekend begins with a Weekend Prelude, a brief concert at 7 p.m. on Friday evenings. On July 4, Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank will perform Bach and Mozart music for two pianos, joined by the Violone Ensemble, a five-man string group which is one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A ticket for the 9 p.m. Boston Concert admits the holder to the Weekend Prelude, for which seats are unreserved. The Preludes are particularly popular with concert goers who picnic on the Tanglewood lawn before the Friday evening concert.

Saturday morning, July 5, at 10:30 a.m., is the first of this season's Open Rehearsals. Seats are unreserved, and their sale, the morning of the concert, benefits the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund.

On Sunday afternoon, June 29, at 2:30, Erich Leinsdorf will be the principal speaker at the Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study. Mr. Leinsdorf retires from the dual post of Music Director of the Boston Symphony and Director of the Berkshire Music Center at the end of this summer. His address deals with the Center's work during his 1962-69 tenure and with present and future needs to link the earlier modern music of the 20th century with advanced contemporary music.

The Opening Exercises will also be addressed by Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will greet the Center's students and guests, and by Robert C. Alsop, Chairman of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. Randall Thompson's Alleluia, a part of each opening ceremony since it was composed for the initial Exercises in 1940, will be sung by the students, directed by Charles Wilson, head of the Vocal Music activities of the Center, and Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony is Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, and composer Gunther Schuller is Head of Contemporary Music Activities. This summer, as before, there will be frequent public performances by the Fellows of the Center and by its faculty. Their schedule is announced as the season progresses.

TIMES-UNION  Albany, Thurs., July 3, 1969 4

Edgar S. Van Olinda

Go to Tanglewood For Tops in Music

If you cannot attend the Man and His World fair at Montreal this summer, do not despair. Right in Albany's backyard is one of the most cosmopolitan gatherings of people from every civilized country in the world attending the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood in the heart of the Berkshire Mountains. The elite of Boston's Back Bay mingle, friendly-like, with their more plebian music lovers, probably secretly enving their Bermuda shorts, the miniskirts, but devoted to "The Three Bs," while munching hot dogs and drinking Cokes.

Ralph Waldo Emerson who was a Bostonian of sorts, once said: "An institution is the lengthened shadow of a man," a generic description of anyone who has contributed anything for the betterment of mankind. However, Tanglewood is the "lengthened shadow" of the late Gertrude Robinson Smith which hovers over "The Salsburg of America." She gathered together a nucleus of music lovers in 1934 from Lenox, Stockbridge and the surrounding Berkshire communities, with an infiltration of Capital Area patrons to institute a series of summer concerts which were touted as "Music Under the Moon," with the late Henry Hadley and some 85 members of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, presenting a series of concerts in the horse ring of the Hanna Farms.

The first concert was Aug. 23, 1934. Miss Smith dominated the operation until her death a couple of years ago. Her moving appeal for a permanent shed after a disasterous concert in a tent during a severe thunder and lightning storm when even the God of Nature defied conductor, Serge Koussevitzky was responsible for raising some $100,000 and the new shed. The upheaval of the elements was responsible for the present acoustically perfect al fresco auditorium where the major concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been held ever since.

Here's a suggestion for any members of the family who feel they are allergic to the classics, as represented by the "three Bs," Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. As the late Walter Damroch so truthfully stated. "Popular music is merely familiar music." Which being interpreted means that if you listen to the music which has endured for hundreds of years often enough, it will become a "must!"

A satisfactory approach to this so-called classical music would be to attend the two concerts by the Boston Pops Orchestra, under the disarming direction of Arthur Fiedler, Saturday, Aug. 30, at 8 p.m. and Sunday, Aug. 31, at 2:30 in the shed. If you can't see your way clear to put out from $4 to $6 for reserved seats, but admission tickets to the lawn for $3 on the days of the concerts. You will have lots of company, and I am sure, it will create a desire to hear the same orchestra in the major works. Erich Leinsdorf is retiring as conductor of the Bostonians this year, a group of instrumentalists which he has raised to the peak of perfection. The two-month Tanglewood season starts tomorrow.

TIMES-UNION • Albany, Fri., July 4, 1969 2

AROUND THE TOWN

by Edgar S. Van Olinda

Cauliflower, Tanglewood and Gene

I look in vain each summer at the Tanglewood Music Festival for fistiana's undefeated former champion Gene Tunney who frequently occupied one of the many boxes along with the rest of "the proper Bostonians." There is nothing strange in the affinity of music and boxing. Wasn't there some fellow by the name of Dick Wagne who wrote a series of music dramas, titled: "The Ring?"

As a matter of fact, several years ago, I became quite palsy-walsy with a group of cauliflowered gentry up at Saratoga Lake when the late Tom Luther encouraged the fistic champs to train up at his White Sulphur Springs Hotel. White Sulphur, like the Grand Union and the United States Hotel is just a memory. It was razed in order to straightten out the curved road past the hotel, a dangerous traffic hazard.

It may have been the spirit of the colorful Norman Selby, better known as "Kid McCoy," (the 'real McCoy' of the boxing world) that first gave Mr. Luther his introduction to the fight game. For it was Mr. Selby, one of the greatest fighters of all times, who had his training quarters across the lake from White Sulphur. This was prior to his championship days and before he married into the Ellis family of Schenectady, founders of the American Locomotive Company.

The first of the top-ranking fighters to train at Luther's was Knockout Brown, or "K.O. Brown" as he was known to the profession. The Beau Brummel of the fight game, Frank Moran, also trained in the Luther ring and ate at the Luther table. Benny Leonard and Battling Levinsky were frequent boarders during training periods. But the most colorful and popular of all was Jack Dempsey. Mr. Luther built a cabin for him called "Dempsey's Cottage," between the outdoor ring and the hotel.

At one time there were three world champions at Luther's: Dempsey, Pancho Villa and Jack Britton. Luis Firpo, the "Bull of the Pampas," and Mr. cho Villa and Jack Britton. Mr. Tunney, the Shakespearean scholar, were Johnny-com-lately at Luther's.

Mr. Tunney, the personification of George Bernard Shaw's hero in his novel: "Cachel Byron's Profession" was staying at the White Sulphur Springs Hotel waiting to get a fight with Dempsey. The Albany Mendelssohn Club was holding its annual outing at the hotel. The late Ben Franklin, no shrinking violet, braced up to Mr. Tunney and informed the pugilist that the group surrounding him, pop-eyed with interest, were members of the foresaid band of troubadours.

"Oh Yes," Mendelssohn," elucidated Mr. Tunney. "Your patron saint was one of the three great composers of the world, sharing honors with Bach and Beethoven."

Whether Mr. Tunney used the substitution of the name of Mendelssohn for the one which is common knowledge, as a compliment to the local male singing group, or not, he, apparently was not familiar with the "Immortal Triumvirate" of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms also known as "The Three Bs." But not a single member of the admiring circle had the temerity to challenge Mr. Tunney's musical erudition.

19.

TANGLEWOOD

By RICHARD HAMMERICH

LENOX — The idealistic dream of the valiant ladies who were so determined in 1934 to hear a symphony orchestra in the Berkshires' couldn't have included a vision of the scope of Tanglewood in 1969.

They beat the drums through the hills and produced three concerts that summer at Hanna Farm in Stockbridge with an orchestra of New York Philharmonic musicians conducted by Dr. Henry Hadley.

There were fewer than 10,000 at those three concerts called the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. There will be 200,000 this summer at about 100 concerts and open rehearsals of all sizes.

The sound of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the gracious atmosphere of the spacious Tanglewood are at the core of the growth. The Berkshire Festival has become the preeminent summer music festival of the world. . .although the Austrians might put up a strong defense at the venerable festivities at Salzburg.

The news at Tanglewood is that even with its immense popularity and apparent strength, the management adds inducements each year to increase attendance.

The reason, of course, is that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, like all the others, operates with an annual deficit, and the Berkshire Festival operates with a profit. Audiences up to 15,000 see to that.

At first glance the multiple opportunities for music listening at Tanglewood are confusing: there is the central festival, the Friends' series, the Contemporary Trends programs and the Festival of Contemporary Music.

Many of the events in these series are in connection with the programs of advanced musical education in the Berkshire Music Center.

Founded in 1940 at Tanglewood by Serge Koussevitzky, then conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the center this year will have about 400 students.

The main series, the festival, offers 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on eight week ends, the first July 4 this year and the last Aug. 24.

The concerts are scheduled at 9 Friday evenings, at 8

See TANGLEWOOD Page Four

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION

VOL. 106, NO. 146 SPRINGFIELD, MASS., MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 23, 1969 26 PAGES SEVEN CENTS

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.

JUL 2 1969 New England

Tanglewood Weekend Series To Get Underway

On Friday at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the first of three all-Mozart programs as this season"s opening Berkshire Festival concert at Tanglewood in Lenox.

Each of the first weekend's one of the last three symphonies and a late piano concerto. On July 4, Mr. Leinsdorf conducts the symphony no. 39, and the 26-year old German pianist Christoph Eschenbach makes his Boston Symphony and Tanglewood debuts playing the concerto in C, K. 467. The symphony no. 29 opens the program. On Saturday July 5 at 8 p.m., John Browning is soloist in the piano concerto no. 23 in A, K. 488, and Mr. Leinsdorf conducts the symphony no. 40. The opening work is the 'Haffner' symphony. On Sunday afternoon, July 6, the soloist is Claude Frank, who will play Mozart's last piano concerto, in B flat, K. 595. Mr. Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's last symphony, the 'Jupiter.' Six of Mozart's German Dances, K. 571, open the program.

Each Tanglewood weekend begins with a Weekend Prelude, a brief concert at 7 p.m. on Friday evenings. On July 4, Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank will perform Bach and Mozart music for two pianos, joined by the Violone Ensemble, a five-man string group which is one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A ticket for the 9 p.m. Boston Concert admits the holder to the Weekend Prelude, for which seats are unreserved. The Preludes are particularly popular with concert goers who picnic on the Tanglewood lawn before the Friday evening concert.

Saturday morning, July 5, at 10:30 a.m., is the first of this season's Open Rehearsals. Seats are unreserved, and their sale, the morning of the concert, benefits the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund.

On Sunday afternoon, June 29, at 2:30, Erich Leinsdorf will be the principal speaker at the Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study. Mr. Leinsdorf retires from the dual post of Music Director of the Boston Symphony and Director of the Berkshire Music Center at the end of this summer. His address deals with the Center's work during his 1962-69 tenure and with present and future needs to link the earlier modern music of the 20th century with advanced contemporary music.

The Opening Exercises will also be addressed by Thomas D. Perry, Jr., Manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will greet the Center's students and guests, and by Robert C. Alsop, Chairman of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. Randall Thompson's Alleluia, a part of each opening ceremony since it was composed for the initial Exercises in 1940, will be sung by the students, directed by Charles Wilson, head of the Vocal Music activities of the Center, and Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony is Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, and composer Gunther Schuller is Head of Contemporary Music Activities. This summer, as before, there will be frequent public performances by the Fellows of the Center and by its faculty. Their schedule is announced as the season progresses.

TIMES-UNION  Albany, Thurs., July 3, 1969 4

Edgar S. Van Olinda

Go to Tanglewood For Tops in Music

If you cannot attend the Man and His World fair at Montreal this summer, do not despair. Right in Albany's backyard is one of the most cosmopolitan gatherings of people from every civilized country in the world attending the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood in the heart of the Berkshire Mountains. The elite of Boston's Back Bay mingle, friendly-like, with their more plebian music lovers, probably secretly enving their Bermuda shorts, the miniskirts, but devoted to "The Three Bs," while munching hot dogs and drinking Cokes.

Ralph Waldo Emerson who was a Bostonian of sorts, once said: "An institution is the lengthened shadow of a man," a generic description of anyone who has contributed anything for the betterment of mankind. However, Tanglewood is the "lengthened shadow" of the late Gertrude Robinson Smith which hovers over "The Salsburg of America." She gathered together a nucleus of music lovers in 1934 from Lenox, Stockbridge and the surrounding Berkshire communities, with an infiltration of Capital Area patrons to institute a series of summer concerts which were touted as "Music Under the Moon," with the late Henry Hadley and some 85 members of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, presenting a series of concerts in the horse ring of the Hanna Farms.

The first concert was Aug. 23, 1934. Miss Smith dominated the operation until her death a couple of years ago. Her moving appeal for a permanent shed after a disasterous concert in a tent during a severe thunder and lightning storm when even the God of Nature defied conductor, Serge Koussevitzky was responsible for raising some $100,000 and the new shed. The upheaval of the elements was responsible for the present acoustically perfect al fresco auditorium where the major concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been held ever since.

Here's a suggestion for any members of the family who feel they are allergic to the classics, as represented by the "three Bs," Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. As the late Walter Damroch so truthfully stated. "Popular music is merely familiar music." Which being interpreted means that if you listen to the music which has endured for hundreds of years often enough, it will become a "must!"

A satisfactory approach to this so-called classical music would be to attend the two concerts by the Boston Pops Orchestra, under the disarming direction of Arthur Fiedler, Saturday, Aug. 30, at 8 p.m. and Sunday, Aug. 31, at 2:30 in the shed. If you can't see your way clear to put out from $4 to $6 for reserved seats, but admission tickets to the lawn for $3 on the days of the concerts. You will have lots of company, and I am sure, it will create a desire to hear the same orchestra in the major works. Erich Leinsdorf is retiring as conductor of the Bostonians this year, a group of instrumentalists which he has raised to the peak of perfection. The two-month Tanglewood season starts tomorrow.

TIMES-UNION • Albany, Fri., July 4, 1969 2

AROUND THE TOWN

by Edgar S. Van Olinda

Cauliflower, Tanglewood and Gene

I look in vain each summer at the Tanglewood Music Festival for fistiana's undefeated former champion Gene Tunney who frequently occupied one of the many boxes along with the rest of "the proper Bostonians." There is nothing strange in the affinity of music and boxing. Wasn't there some fellow by the name of Dick Wagne who wrote a series of music dramas, titled: "The Ring?"

As a matter of fact, several years ago, I became quite palsy-walsy with a group of cauliflowered gentry up at Saratoga Lake when the late Tom Luther encouraged the fistic champs to train up at his White Sulphur Springs Hotel. White Sulphur, like the Grand Union and the United States Hotel is just a memory. It was razed in order to straightten out the curved road past the hotel, a dangerous traffic hazard.

It may have been the spirit of the colorful Norman Selby, better known as "Kid McCoy," (the 'real McCoy' of the boxing world) that first gave Mr. Luther his introduction to the fight game. For it was Mr. Selby, one of the greatest fighters of all times, who had his training quarters across the lake from White Sulphur. This was prior to his championship days and before he married into the Ellis family of Schenectady, founders of the American Locomotive Company.

The first of the top-ranking fighters to train at Luther's was Knockout Brown, or "K.O. Brown" as he was known to the profession. The Beau Brummel of the fight game, Frank Moran, also trained in the Luther ring and ate at the Luther table. Benny Leonard and Battling Levinsky were frequent boarders during training periods. But the most colorful and popular of all was Jack Dempsey. Mr. Luther built a cabin for him called "Dempsey's Cottage," between the outdoor ring and the hotel.

At one time there were three world champions at Luther's: Dempsey, Pancho Villa and Jack Britton. Luis Firpo, the "Bull of the Pampas," and Mr. cho Villa and Jack Britton. Mr. Tunney, the Shakespearean scholar, were Johnny-com-lately at Luther's.

Mr. Tunney, the personification of George Bernard Shaw's hero in his novel: "Cachel Byron's Profession" was staying at the White Sulphur Springs Hotel waiting to get a fight with Dempsey. The Albany Mendelssohn Club was holding its annual outing at the hotel. The late Ben Franklin, no shrinking violet, braced up to Mr. Tunney and informed the pugilist that the group surrounding him, pop-eyed with interest, were members of the foresaid band of troubadours.

"Oh Yes," Mendelssohn," elucidated Mr. Tunney. "Your patron saint was one of the three great composers of the world, sharing honors with Bach and Beethoven."

Whether Mr. Tunney used the substitution of the name of Mendelssohn for the one which is common knowledge, as a compliment to the local male singing group, or not, he, apparently was not familiar with the "Immortal Triumvirate" of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms also known as "The Three Bs." But not a single member of the admiring circle had the temerity to challenge Mr. Tunney's musical erudition.

20.

TANGLEWOOD

The Straw Hat Circuit

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Dreams of a Few, Reality for Millions

At the World's Most Famous Music Festival

Continued from Page 1

Saturdays and at 2.30 Sunday afternoons. The Friday concert is preceded at 7 by a small - scale, 50 - minute program featuring artists scheduled to appear in one or more of the big weekend concerts.

The Saturday evening program is preceded at 10.30 a.m. by an open rehearsal which usually runs through most of the program scheduled to be performed Sunday afternoon.

All of these full - orchestra concerts are given in the Shed, which seats a handful fewer than 6000, and often include the appearance of famous guest soloists or conductors.

Boulez Scheduled

One of the guest conductors scheduled this summer is the French avant-garde composer, Pierre Boulez, who has become established as a conductor of the first rank so fast that his recent appointment replacing Leonard Bernstein in New York has surprised many listeners.

Another fast - rising young guest conductor scheduled this summer is Daniel Barenboim, already world famous as a pianist of the first rank.

Among the solo pianists scheduled this summer are several who attract special attention: Christoph Eschenbach, Andre Watts, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Malcolm Frager and Van Cliburn, who usually draws an audience approaching 12,000.

Among the special events on the weekend schedule are concert versions of two operas, Verdi's "Otello" and Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio," and Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony, which will be on the final program Erich Leinsdorf conducts as regular music director of the orchestra.

Series Expanded

The Contemporary Trends series, started last year with three concerts, will be expanded this year to five and be given Tuesday nights.

The artists haven't been announced, but they will be leading performers in the fields of folk music, rock, jazz and perhaps contributory sources such as Indian, soul, gospel, country and western.

Loosely grouped under the heading of Friends' concerts are about 40 events performed by varying groups (up to 70 - member full orchestra) made up of faculty, the young professionals and advanced students studying in four programs; the center itself, the New England Conservatory of Music, the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Fellows of the Center.

Anyone can join the society called Friends of the Center for $15 ($25 for the family) and attend any or all of these Friends' events with his membership card. It is probably the biggest musical bargain in the nation.

New Music

The festival of Contemporary Music (two weeks) is sponsored by the center and the Fromm Music Foundation. The programs offer new music (some of it composed especially for the festival) and works chosen from the several contemporary styles (serial, aleatory, electronic).

TANGLEWOOD LENOX MASSACHUSETTS

There are, also, a few special events, notably Boston Pops and Tanglewood - on - parade.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct three of his famous Pops programs in the Shed, Aug. 5 and 30 at 8 p.m. and Aug. 31 at 2.30.

Tanglewood - on - Parade (Aug. 19 this year) is the day - long presentation of concerts by all of the instrumental and vocal departments of the Berkshire Music Center ending with a performance by the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra (almost 200 players) which ends with a display of fireworks over Lake Mahkeenac.

The Tanglewood grounds (210 acres) are open frequently during the week for guided tours, and the gates are open two hours before each major concert.

There are several buildings on the grounds in addition to the great shed (built in 1938) which houses the main concerts.

The theater - concert hall, built in 1941, seats 1200 and is the scene of important chamber - music and small orchestra concerts.

The chamber - music hall seats about 200 on movable chairs, but a side wall is made of sliding doors and a large outdoor audience can be accommodated. It is used for lectures and classes as well as music.

The main house, originally a Victorian - style domicile, houses the administrative offices, library and some of the studios of the center.

The rehearsal stage in a hidden corner of the grounds is like a small concert hall without an audience.

Study Studios

The Hawthrone Cottage, a replica of the burned cottage on the same site where Hawthorne wrote "House of Seven Gables" and planned "Tanglewood Tales," contains study studios. Nearby is a barn used as a rehearsal hall.

The cafeteria near the theater - concert hall serves snacks and box lunches to music lovers who fail to bring picnic supplies.

A long, narrow structure at the main gate houses bookstore, art gallery, box office, Friends' society office and press and public relations offices.

There are, also, buildings for the caretaker's family, greenhouses, barns for grounds equipment and several little studios for students.

It all began when Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Gorham Brooks gave the estate to the orchestra after the 1936 festival so that the Berkshire Symphonic Festival would have a home.

Comes as Surprise

The gift to the orchestra rather than to the festival corporation caused some surprise inasmuch as the orchestra had provided the music for the incorporated festival by invitation only one summer.

The first two festivals in 1934 and 1935 were at the Hanna Farm (now Stockbridge School) with New York musicians.

In 1936 the festival's managing ladies invited Koussevitzky to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Holmwood (now Foxhollow School for Girls.).

The year 1937 looked bleak to the ladies because no suitable fields were available. . .until the orchestra was given Tanglewood.

A two - week, six - concert festival was given under a large tent at Tanglewood in 1937; it was interrupted by a thunderstorm which became famous as "the $100,000 storm."

For Great Shed

That was the amount raised by the ladies to build their great shed (it covers 1½ acres) on the Tanglewood estate. . . designed by Saarinen and completed a month before the 1938 festival.

In 1945 the ladies gave their shed to the orchestra and disbanded their organization, Berkshire Symphonic Festivals, Inc. They had done their work well. The festival was world famous.

Tanglewood can be reached by car in a few minutes more than an hour from Springfield by way of the Massachusetts Turnpike. There are direction signs through Lee and Lenox from Exit 2 and through the beautiful Stockbridge Bowl from Exit 1.

New this year will be a bus service intended to serve residents of Boston, Natick Worcester and Springfield. The plan is for the buses to arrive one hour before the big weekend concerts and leave one-half hour afterward. (In Springfield call 781-2900).

The record attendance at Tanglewood has never been determined. It is believed to be held either by Jascha Heifetz in 1949 or Arthur Fiedler in 1954, both about 15,400.

More listeners could have been accommodated on the vast lawn, and more cars could have been parked. The limits of Tanglewood, spacially and esthetically, have not been reached.

Summer at Tanglewood

The grounds at Tanglewood in Lenox, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The spacious and beautifully landscaped grounds offer patrons of the Berkshire Music Festival facilities that are unrivaled in the East.

cue
MAGAZINE FOR NEW YORK AND SUBURBS
20 W. 43 ST. NEW YORK 10036/563-7170
JULY 12, 1969

SALUTE OF THE WEEK

Erich Leinsdorf

"This is wonderful. We make beautiful music here. Festivals of music grow up for various purposes on a scale commensurate with their surroundings." So did Serge Koussevitzky, then director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1936 acknowledge the gift, by the descendants of William Aspinwall Tappan, of the glorious 210 acres of trees, lawns, and meadows that was Tanglewood. The summer residence of the literary likes of Longfellow, Holmes, and Melville, and about whose "rich and diversified autumnal foliage" Nathaniel Hawthorne once rhapsodized, Tanglewood and its natural beauties did indeed encourage musical glories on the commensurate scale which Doctor Koussevitzky predicted. It is today, 32 years after the violent, thunderstorm-blessed night of its premiere concert, the nation's pre-eminent music festival. At the end of this season, its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, relinquishes his post as the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the summer festival.

Born in Vienna in 1912, Erich Leinsdorf was a child prodigy. Son of an amateur pianist, he studied piano, cello, and composition and made his debut at the age of eight at the Vienna Conservatory. When he was only 22, Leinsdorf served as Bruno Walter's assistant, at the Salzburg Festival. When he was 25, he became Arturo Toscanini's assistant, a post he held for three years. And it was on Toscanini's suggestion that the young maestro was made an assistant conductor at the Metropolitan.

From there he went on to conduct such major groups as the Cleveland Orchestra and the Rochester Philharmonic, returning in triumph as music consultant and conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. There he won an especially brilliant reputation as a conductor of German opera. When he assumed the podium of the Boston Symphony in 1962 as the orchestra's eleventh leader, Leinsdorf observed: "I have a suspicion [the orchestra] is unique. I am going to do my very best to keep it this way." And under his leadership the ensemble has remained one of the world's truly great orchestras in performing the classics and in introducing to America the best of contemporary music, including such milestones as Barber's Piano Concerto and Britten's "War Requiem."

Mr. Leinsdorf is an urbane man whose hobbies include collecting French clarets, stamps, and mechanical toys. He has the reputation for being one of the music world's most elegantly dressed denizens. But he is first, and foremost, a man of music. Next month when the final strains of Beethoven's Ninth close the Tanglewood season and the Leinsdorf era, we will join in the chorus' ode of joy and thanks, for the beauty he has brought to all of us.

Leinsdorf at Lenox

Erich Leinsdorf, who has announced his retirement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, shown at the podium during rehearsal in the Music Shed at Tanglewood.

20.

TANGLEWOOD

The Straw Hat Circuit

Dreams of a Few, Reality for Millions At the World's Most Famous Music Festival

Continued from Page 1

Saturdays and at 2.30 Sunday afternoons. The Friday concert is preceded at 7 by a small - scale, 50 - minute program featuring artists scheduled to appear in one or more of the big weekend concerts.

The Saturday evening program is preceded at 10.30 a.m. by an open rehearsal which usually runs through most of the program scheduled to be performed Sunday afternoon.

All of these full - orchestra concerts are given in the Shed, which seats a handful fewer than 6000, and often include the appearance of famous guest soloists or conductors.

Boulez Scheduled

One of the guest conductors scheduled this summer is the French avant-garde composer, Pierre Boulez, who has become established as a conductor of the first rank so fast that his recent appointment replacing Leonard Bernstein in New York has surprised many listeners.

Another fast rising young guest conductor scheduled this summer is Daniel Barenboim, already world famous as a pianist of the first rank.

Among the solo pianists scheduled this summer are several who attract special attention: Christoph Eschenbach, Andre Watts, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Malcolm Frager and Van Cliburn, who usually draws an audience approaching 12,000.

Among the special events on the weekend schedule are concert versions of two operas, Verdi's "Otello" and Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio," and Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony, which will be on the final program Erich Leinsdorf conducts as regular music director of the orchestra.

Series Expanded

The Contemporary Trends series, started last year with three concerts, will be expanded this year to five and be given Tuesday nights.

The artists haven't been announced, but they will be leading performers in the fields of folk music, rock, jazz and perhaps contributory sources such as Indian, soul, gospel, country and western.

Loosely grouped under the heading of Friends' concerts are about 40 events performed by varying groups (up to 70 - member full orchestra) made up of faculty, the young professionals and advanced students studying in four programs; the center itself, the New England Conservatory of Music, the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, Fellows of the Center.

Anyone can join the society called Friends of the Center for $15 ($25 for the family) and attend any or all of these Friends' events with his membership card. It is probably the biggest musical bargain in the nation.

New Music

The festival of Contemporary Music (two weeks) is sponsored by the center and the Fromm Music Foundation. The programs offer new music (some of it composed especially for the festival) and works chosen from the several contemporary styles (serial, aleatory, electronic).

There are, also, a few special events, notably Boston Pops and Tanglewood - on - parade.

Arthur Fiedler will conduct three of his famous Pops programs in the Shed, Aug. 5 and 30 at 8 p.m. and Aug. 31 at 2.30.

Tanglewood - on - Parade (Aug. 19 this year) is the day - long presentation of concerts by all of the instrumental and vocal departments of the Berkshire Music Center ending with a performance by the combined Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra (almost 200 players) which ends with a display of fireworks over Lake Mahkeenac.

The Tanglewood grounds (210 acres) are open frequently during the week for guided tours, and the gates are open two hours before each major concert.

There are several buildings on the grounds in addition to the great shed (built in 1938) which houses the main concerts.

The theater - concert hall, built in 1941, seats 1200 and is the scene of important chamber - music and small orchestra concerts.

The chamber - music hall seats about 200 on movable chairs, but a side wall is made of sliding doors and a large outdoor audience can be accommodated. It is used for lectures and classes as well as music.

The main house, originally a Victorian - style domicile, houses the administrative offices, library and some of the studios of the center.

The rehearsal stage in a hidden corner of the grounds is like a small concert hall without an audience.

Study Studios

The Hawthrone Cottage, a replica of the burned cottage on the same site where Hawthorne wrote "House of Seven Gables" and planned "Tanglewood Tales," contains study studios. Nearby is a barn used as a rehearsal hall.

The cafeteria near the theater - concert hall serves snacks and box lunches to music lovers who fail to bring picnic supplies.

A long, narrow structure at the main gate houses bookstore, art gallery, box office, Friends' society office and press and public relations offices.

There are, also, buildings for the caretaker's family, greenhouses, barns for grounds equipment and several little studios for students.

It all began when Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and Mrs. Gorham Brooks gave the estate to the orchestra after the 1936 festival so that the Berkshire Symphonic Festival would have a home.

Comes as Surprise

The gift to the orchestra rather than to the festival corporation caused some surprise inasmuch as the orchestra had provided the music for the incorporated festival by invitation only one summer.

The first two festivals in 1934 and 1935 were at the Hanna Farm (now Stockbridge School) with New York musicians.

In 1936 the festival's managing ladies invited Koussevitzky to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Holmwood (now Foxhollow School for Girls.).

The year 1937 looked bleak to the ladies because no suitable fields were available. . .until the orchestra was given Tanglewood.

A two - week, six - concert festival was given under a large tent at Tanglewood in 1937; it was interrupted by a thunderstorm which became famous as "the $100,000 storm."

For Great Shed

That was the amount raised by the ladies to build their great shed (it covers 1½ acres) on the Tanglewood estate. . . designed by Saarinen and completed a month before the 1938 festival.

In 1945 the ladies gave their shed to the orchestra and disbanded their organization, Berkshire Symphonic Festivals, Inc. They had done their work well. The festival was world famous.

Tanglewood can be reached by car in a few minutes more than an hour from Springfield by way of the Massachusetts Turnpike. There are direction signs through Lee and Lenox from Exit 2 and through the beautiful Stockbridge Bowl from Exit 1.

New this year will be a bus service intended to serve residents of Boston, Natick Worcester and Springfield. The plan is for the buses to arrive one hour before the big weekend concerts and leave one-half hour afterward. (In Springfield call 781-2900).

The record attendance at Tanglewood has never been determined. It is believed to be held either by Jascha Heifetz in 1949 or Arthur Fiedler in 1954, both about 15,400.

More listeners could have been accommodated on the vast lawn, and more cars could have been parked. The limits of Tanglewood, spacially and esthetically, have not been reached.

LEAVING TANGLEWOOD
At the end of each Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, route 183 (West Street) is one way (two lanes) eastbound from the Tanglewood East Drive to Lenox. Visitors leaving the parking lots by the Main Drive and West Drive may turn right or left. By turning left from the Main or West Drive the motorist can reach route 41, the Massachusetts Turnpike (Exit 1), the New York Thruway, or points south. Traffic leaving the South and Box parking areas may go in either direction on Hawthorne Street. The Lenox, Stockbridge and State Police, and the Tanglewood parking attendants will give every help to visitors who follow these directions.

TANGLEWOOD LENOX MASSACHUSETTS

Summer at Tanglewood

The grounds at Tanglewood in Lenox, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The spacious and beautifully landscaped grounds offer patrons of the Berkshire Music Festival facilities that are unrivaled in the East.

cue
MAGAZINE FOR NEW YORK AND SUBURBS
20 W. 43 ST. NEW YORK 10036/563-7170
JULY 12, 1969

"This is wonderful. We make beautiful music here. Festivals of music grow up for various purposes on a scale commensurate with their surroundings." So did Serge Koussevitzky, then director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1936 acknowledge the gift, by the descendants of William Aspinwall Tappan, of the glorious 210 acres of trees, lawns, and meadows that was Tanglewood. The summer residence of the literary likes of Longfellow, Holmes, and Melville, and about whose "rich and diversified autumnal foliage" Nathaniel Hawthorne once rhapsodized, Tanglewood and its natural beauties did indeed encourage musical glories on the commensurate scale which Doctor Koussevitzky predicted. It is today, 32 years after the violent, thunderstorm-blessed night of its premiere concert, the nation's pre-eminent music festival. At the end of this season, its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, relinquishes his post as the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the summer festival.

Born in Vienna in 1912, Erich Leinsdorf was a child prodigy. Son of an amateur pianist, he studied piano, cello, and composition and made his debut at the age of eight at the Vienna Conservatory. When he was only 22, Leinsdorf served as Bruno Walter's assistant, at the Salzburg Festival. When he was 25, he became Arturo Toscanini's assistant, a post he held for three years. And it was on Toscanini's suggestion that the young maestro was made an assistant conductor at the Metropolitan.

From there he went on to conduct such major groups as the Cleveland Orchestra and the Rochester Philharmonic, returning in triumph as music consultant and conductor of the Metropolitan Opera. There he won an especially brilliant reputation as a conductor of German opera. When he assumed the podium of the Boston Symphony in 1962 as the orchestra's eleventh leader, Leinsdorf observed: "I have a suspicion [the orchestra] is unique. I am going to do my very best to keep it this way." And under his leadership the ensemble has remained one of the world's truly great orchestras in performing the classics and in introducing to America the best of contemporary music, including such milestones as Barber's Piano Concerto and Britten's "War Requiem."

Mr. Leinsdorf is an urbane man whose hobbies include collecting French clarets, stamps, and mechanical toys. He has the reputation for being one of the music world's most elegantly dressed denizens. But he is first, and foremost, a man of music. Next month when the final strains of Beethoven's Ninth close the Tanglewood season and the Leinsdorf era, we will join in the chorus' ode of joy and thanks, for the beauty he has brought to all of us.

Leinsdorf at Lenox

Erich Leinsdorf, who has announced his retirement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, shown at the podium during rehearsal in the Music Shed at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL
JULY/AUGUST 1969
24 CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

An aerial view of the Shed and lawns at Tanglewood.

TANGLEWOOD is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A 210-acre estate in the Berkshire Hills, it offered inspiration to Nathaniel Hawthorne during the years he lived and wrote there, and now offers unsurpassable beauty in which to enjoy music. At Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony presents its Berkshire Festival and maintains its Berkshire Music Center.

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL, founded in 1934, is this country's oldest leading music festival. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays 24 concerts in the famed 6000-seat Music Shed, each Friday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for eight weeks. There are Weekend Preludes and Open Rehearsals, Boston Pops concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala, and Berkshire Music Center programs including the non-classical Tuesday 'Trends' series so successful last summer.

1969: THIS SUMMER'S FESTIVAL HIGHLIGHTS include the opening all-Mozart weekend conducted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf. Mozart's last three symphonies and three late piano concertos are featured. Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning, and Claude Frank are soloists. ☐ Van Cliburn, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Malcolm Frager, Lilian Kallir and Andre Watts are among the season's other pianists, and Earl Wild repeats his acclaimed performance of Scharwenka's long-neglected 1st piano concerto. ☐ Erich Leinsdorf conducts concert performances of two operas, Mozart's Abduction from the Seraglio, with Beverly Sills, and Verdi's Otello. ☐ Two famous husband-and-wife duos perform: Henry Lewis, conductor, with Marilyn Horne, soprano, and Daniel Barenboim, conductor, with Jacqueline DuPré, cellist. Pierre Boulez, Karel Ancerl, Josef Krips, Max Rudolf, Milton Katims and David Zinman are the other guest conductors. ☐ The 1969 Festival closes with Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert as Music Director of the Boston Symphony, for which he has chosen Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by the magnificent Royal Hunt and Storm from The Trojans by Berlioz.

A brochure listing all dates, programs, soloists, conductors, and ticket information for Tanglewood is available at Symphony Hall or by writing: Berkshire Festival Box B, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

An art class at Tanglewood, part of the B.U. program

boston arts

Contents / Volume 2, Number 6 / June 1969

2 Arts Calendar

11 New Directions for Tanglewood
by Vicki Mundy-Castle

teachers, the dedicated and talented amateurs, the appreciative listener — where would the music world be without them? And perhaps Tanglewood would also be enriched by the addition of the other performing arts and the visual arts. Dr. Edwin Stein, Dean of Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts, listened with interest to Mr. Leinsdorf's ideas. The end result was the es-members of the Faculty who have studied with modern masters discuss the approaches of the greats. Furthermore, almost all the many courses, lectures, character and not allow its structure and purpose to become limited by the scholarly necessities of credits and classrooms. The Fellows are graduate musicians; the new programs were designed to meet the needs of the university-level student.

Boston University at Tanglewood is now entering its fourth year. It has very successfully expanded the scope of the Conservatory of Music. The aim is not only to give today's composers the opportunity to be heard, but also to broaden the musical experience of the young drop in on a people a few ossibly to size

of musicians.
e gone away
ey have seen.
nce has been
new programs theatre, and niversity cred-
ilip Pearlstein
the resident painting and an outstand-
ner, is among ose interested find a wealth ls in the im-
ood, and they opportunities

an extension
hop for Play-
gram directed aywrights dear two such
s are selected posium. They experienced
re. This year
ie MacDonald
Norton, drama
ord-American,
ants see their
oratory form;
roduction, the
ed, criticized,
ty spokesman rogram to be g grace and demia, yet not
" One of last
n Brown, may
t in the Lock-
roadway next
that the worknvaluable new techniques,
important ad-
experience.
ven more valuable asset
and lovers of the arts

13

New Directions for Tanglewood

by Vicki Mundy-Castle

Tanglewood is a familiar name to music lovers everywhere, and a cherished tradition to Bostonians. The name properly belongs to a 210-acre estate overlooking Lake Mahkeenac from the Berkshire Hills. More than a century ago, it served as a meeting place for Emerson, Holmes, and Melville, and provided inspiration for the stories of Nathaniel Hawthorne. In 1934, Tanglewood became the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Berkshire Music Festival was born. Today the Festival presents 24 weekend performances by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and renowned guest artists, and the hills ring with song to the delight of the thousands who come every summer to listen. Almost every available weeknight and many afternoons are filled as well by the music of the chamber groups, singers, and orchestras of the Berkshire Music Center, the lively offspring of the B.S.O. and the Festival.

The Berkshire Music Center was founded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1940 in realization of the dream of its Music Director, Serge Koussevitzky, who was also its first Director. Since then the Music Director of the B.S.O. has also served as the director of the Center; this will be the last professional act of conductor Erich Leinsdorf with the B.S.O., before his retirement at the end of this summer. Next year the Center will be directed by Gunther Schuller, and Seiji Ozawa will act as conductor for the Berkshire Festival. Leonard Bernstein, one of the Center's illustrious alumni, will act as special adviser — his only professional commitment after his announced retirement this year from the New York Philharmonic.

The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood offers as unique an experience for young performers and students as the Festival does for enthusiastic listeners. It was originally conceived to give young professional or pre-professional musicians additional polish, and to permit them to broaden their repertoire under the guidance of the members of the Boston Symphony. The Fellows are already accomplished musicians, and the Center offers a rare opportunity for intensive work with their peers and the masters of their art, while enabling them to concentrate on the performing experience itself. The Center has since been expanded to include programs added by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music. These additional programs have broadened the scope of the Center to include the younger student, the teacher, the accomplished amateur — even the painter, the actor, the dancer, and the playwright. The Fellowship Program now offers young performers the intensely professional experience that has brought them to Tanglewood for years in a larger context.

The Fellows at Tanglewood are the core of the Center. It is the presence of these accomplished young musicians and the Boston Symphony which makes Tanglewood a unique, intensely professional environment for everyone. In the words of Erich Leinsdorf, "To live for eight

Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL JULY/AUGUST 1969
24 CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

An aerial view of the Shed and lawns at Tanglewood.

TANGLEWOOD is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A 210-acre estate in the Berkshire Hills, it offered inspiration to Nathaniel Hawthorne during the years he lived and wrote there, and now offers unsurpassable beauty in which to enjoy music. At Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony presents its Berkshire Festival and maintains its Berkshire Music Center.

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL, founded in 1934, is this country's oldest leading music festival. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays 24 concerts in the famed 6000-seat Music Shed, each Friday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for eight weeks. There are Weekend Preludes and Open Rehearsals, Boston Pops concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala, and Berkshire Music Center programs including the non-classical Tuesday 'Trends' series so successful last summer.

1969: THIS SUMMER'S FESTIVAL HIGHLIGHTS include the opening all-Mozart weekend conducted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf. Mozart's last three symphonies and three late piano concertos are featured. Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning, and Claude Frank are soloists. □ Van Cliburn, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Malcolm Frager, Lilian Kallir and Andre Watts are among the season's other pianists, and Earl Wild repeats his acclaimed performance of Scharwenka's long-neglected [illegible] concerto. □ Erich Leinsdorf conducts concert weeks inside a major musical organism is an opportunity which young people cannot often find . . . (T)here is one need which no conservatory, no university music department can fill: an intensive and protracted contact with actual performance on the highest level. Through this the young musician, en route from studio to stage, can gain a seasoned awareness of the profession's problems . . . also a valuable asset for the musician who serves as teacher, critic, listener, and amateur performer. With music increasingly available through the media of modern communications, we have a great need for well-informed cadres of people offstage as well as on the platform."

The Fellows include about forty singers, ten composers, three (invited) conductors, and ninety instrumentalists. In the course of the eight-week period, they form their own orchestra, rehearse and participate in the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala Concert with the B.S.O. under the direction of Mr. Leinsdorf. In addition they form a number of chamber music ensembles under the guidance of members of the B.S.O., and follow a regular schedule of modern and classical music in these various groups. The singers all participate in choral work and prepare at least three concerts of opera scenes. And, as if this were not enough to keep even the most dedicated young musician busy for the short eight weeks, there are also various master classes, given by members of the B.S.O. and some of the outstanding guest artists who visit Tanglewood to participate in the Berkshire Festival and stay to give the members of the Center the benefit of their talents and experience. There are also seminars in music history, and

A music student in a practice room

An art class at Tanglewood, part of the B.U. program

boston arts

Contents / Volume 2, Number 6 / June 1969

2 Arts Calendar

11 New Directions for Tanglewood
by Vicki Mundy-Castle

teachers, the dedicated and talented amateurs, the appreciative listener — where would the music world be without them? And perhaps Tanglewood would also be enriched by the addition of the other performing arts and the visual arts. Dr. Edwin Stein, Dean of Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts, listened with interest to Mr. Leinsdorf's ideas. The end result was the es-character and not allow its structure and purpose to become limited by the scholarly necessities of credits and classrooms. The Fellows are graduate musicians; the new programs were designed to meet the needs of the university-level student.

Boston University at Tanglewood is now entering its fourth year. It has very successfully expanded the scope of the members of the Faculty who have studied with modern masters discuss the approaches of the greats. Furthermore, almost all the many courses, lectures, and functions of the Center as a whole — whether under the auspices of the Fellows Program, B.U., or the Conservatory — are open to all members of the Center, and everyone is encouraged to partake of the diverse opportunities at hand. Another unique feature of the Center is the chance to observe a great orchestra in rehearsal. Through special arrangement, the Boston Symphony opens all its summer rehearsals to members of the Center, allowing them to watch as they shape a piece of music from start to performance.

There is a definite emphasis at the Center on contemporary music in a program under the direction of Gunther Schuller, President of the New England Conservatory of Music. The aim is not only to give today's composers the opportunity to be heard, but also to broaden the musical experience of the young performers in this direction. They should, after all, be temperamentally most in touch with this music. Very advanced modern music is particularly demanding upon the performer, and the Center wishes to expose its members as much as possible to the peculiar difficulties and rewards of these works. To this end, the Center brings ten young composers to Tanglewood each year and, in association with the Fromm Music Foundation, commissions new works to be performed by the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra as a part of the Festival of Contemporary Music. For the 1969 Festival, works have been commissioned from Theodore Antoniou, Robert Ceely, Edwin Dugger, and Phillip Rhodes.

Guest artists (left to right) Bela Boszormenyi-Nagy, Roman Totenberg, and Claude Frank drop in on a people a few ossibly to size

of musicians.
e gone away
ey have seen.
nce has been
new programs
theatre, and niversity cred-
ilip Pearlstein
the resident painting and an outstand-
ner, is among ose interested
find a wealth ls in the im-
ood, and they opportunities

an extension
hop for Play-
gram directed aywrights dear two such
s are selected posium. They experienced
re. This year
ie MacDonald
Norton, drama
ord-American,
ants see their oratory form;
roduction, the
ed, criticized,
ty spokesman rogram to be g grace and demia, yet not
" One of last
n Brown, may
t in the Lock-
roadway next
that the work-valuable new techniques,
important ad-
experience.
ven more valuable asset
and lovers of the arts

Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL
JULY/AUGUST 1969
24 CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

An aerial view of the Shed and lawns at Tanglewood.

TANGLEWOOD is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A 210-acre estate in the Berkshire Hills, it offered inspiration to Nathaniel Hawthorne during the years he lived and wrote there, and now offers unsurpassable beauty in which to enjoy music. At Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony presents its Berkshire Festival and maintains its Berkshire Music Center.

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL, founded in 1934, is this country's oldest leading music festival. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays 24 concerts in the famed 6000-seat Music Shed, each Friday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for eight weeks. There are Weekend Preludes and Open Rehearsals, Boston Pops concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala, and Berkshire Music Center programs including the non-classical Tuesday 'Trends' series so successful last summer.

1969: THIS SUMMER'S FESTIVAL HIGHLIGHTS include the openin all Mozart weekend conducted by the Boston Symph Mozart certos and Cl Ashker are am his acc weeks is an cannot which music and pr forman this th studio awaren . . . als who s and an creasin of mod great r people form."

The F ten co tors, a course

The Festival of Contemporary Music — "a festival within a festival" — was initiated in 1963, and has come to be a most vital element in the Tanglewood experience. This summer it will begin July 27 and continue through August 10. Gunther Schuller has written in reference to the Festival that a musical composition ". . . ceases to exist, except as a memory, the moment the performance has ended. It therefore becomes the obligation of every performing musician to keep the life-stream of music — composition — going and moving forward. The young men and women who come to Tanglewood as Fellowship students, performing in addition to Baroque and 19th Century music a wide variety of contemporary music, are meeting this challenge as a part of their professional commitment to music in all its breadth and depth."

The Contemporary Trends Concerts, an even more recent innovation at Tanglewood, enter their third year this summer and have been expanded to include five performances. The series is a musical free-for-all and may seem even a bit sacriligious to some of the more conservative devotees of Tanglewood. It is intended to give full play to the entire range of contemporary musical possibilities by bringing to the quiet hills of Tanglewood folk, rock, and soul. Judy Collins gave a concert last year, and Ravi Shankar held master classes.

The directors strive to give Tanglewood intensity as well as breadth as an artistic experience, but several years ago Erich Leinsdorf began to feel that breadth implied more than simply the range of music available. Perhaps the scope of the Center itself was too limited — what about the promising younger artists, the

Walter Eisenberg conducting the young people's orchestra

A music student in a practice room

An art class at Tanglewood, part of the B.U. program

boston arts

Contents / Volume 2, Number 6 / June 1969

2 Arts Calendar

11 New Directions for Tanglewood
by Vicki Mundy-Castle

teachers, the dedicated and talented amateurs, the appreciative listener — where would the music world be without them? And perhaps Tanglewood would also be enriched by the addition of the other performing arts and the visual arts. Dr. Edwin Stein, Dean of Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts, listened with interest to Mr. Leinsdorf's ideas. The end result was the establishment of new programs by both B. U. and the New England Conservatory of Music. While remaining under their direction, both programs form integral parts of the Berkshire Music Center. The New England Conservatory concentrates primarily on teachers and future teachers of music; like B. U., they offer academic credit — a function which the Center originally had wished to avoid. The Fellowship Program felt it important to retain its original unique character and not allow its structure and purpose to become limited by the scholarly necessities of credits and classrooms. The Fellows are graduate musicians; the new programs were designed to meet the needs of the university-level student.

Boston University at Tanglewood is now entering its fourth year. It has very successfully expanded the scope of the Berkshire Center, not only by extending the music program but also by adding other arts. Courses are now offered in art, theatre, and dance; and a playwright's workshop has already seen plays produced as a result of its activity.

The B. U. program at Tanglewood has expanded tremendously over the past four years from the original 50 students to an expected enrollment of over 300 in 1969. It aims less at providing per-

continued on page 48

(Left to right) Gene Frankel, guest director; singer Alexander Kipnis; and artist David Ratner

ensembles and their own orchestra which is under the direction of Walter Eisenberg. A visiting artist like Beverly Sills drop in on a people a few ossibly to size

of musicians.
e gone away
ey have seen.
nce has been
new programs
theatre, and niversity cred-
ilip Pearlstein
the resident painting and an outstand-
ner, is among ose interested
find a wealth ls in the im-
ood, and they opportunities

an extension
hop for Play-
gram directed aywrights dear two such
s are selected posium. They experienced
re. This year
ie MacDonald
Norton, drama
ord-American,
ants see their oratory form;
roduction, the
ed, criticized,
ty spokesman program to be g grace and demia, yet not
" One of last
n Brown, may
t in the Lock-
roadway next
that the work-valuable new techniques.
important ad-
experience.

making it an even more valuable asset to New England and lovers of the arts everywhere.

Tanglewood

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL JULY/AUGUST 1969
24 CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

An aerial view of the Shed and lawns at Tanglewood.

TANGLEWOOD is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A 210-acre estate in the Berkshire Hills, it offered inspiration to Nathaniel Hawthorne during the years he lived and wrote there, and now offers unsurpassable beauty in which to enjoy music. At Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony presents its Berkshire Festival and maintains its Berkshire Music Center.

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL, founded in 1934, is this country's oldest leading music festival. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays 24 concerts in the famed 6000-seat Music Shed, each Friday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for eight weeks. There are Weekend Preludes and Open Rehearsals, Boston Pops concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala, and Berkshire Music Center programs including the non-classical Tuesday 'Trends' series so successful last summer.

1969: THIS SUMMER'S FESTIVAL HIGHLIGHTS include the opening all-Mozart weekend conducted by the Boston Symph
Mozart
certos and Cl Ashker are am his acc weeks is an cannot which music and pr forman this the studio awaren

. . . also who se and an creasin of mod great n people form."
The F ten co tors, a course

The Festival of Contemporary Music — "a festival within a festival" — was initiated in 1963, and has come to be a most vital element in the Tanglewood experience. This summer it will begin July 27 and continue through August 10. Gunther Schuller has written in reference to the Festival that a musical composition ". . . ceases to exist, except as a memory, the moment the performance has ended. It therefore becomes the obligation of every performing musician to keep the life-stream of music — composition — going and moving forward. The young men and women who come to Tanglewood as Fellowship students, performing in addition to Baroque and 19th Century music a wide variety of contemporary music, are meeting this challenge as a part of their professional commitment to music in all its breadth and depth."

The Contemporary Trends Concerts, an even more recent innovation at Tanglewood, enter their third year this summer and have been expanded to include five performances. The series is a musical free-for-all and may seem even a bit sacriligious to some of the more conservative devotees of Tanglewood. It is intended to give full play to the entire range of contemporary musical possibilities by bringing to the quiet hills of Tanglewood folk, rock, and soul. Judy Collins gave a concert last year, and Ravi Shankar held master classes.

The directors strive to give Tanglewood intensity as well as breadth as an artistic experience, but several years ago Erich Leinsdorf began to feel that breadth implied more than simply the range of music available. Perhaps the scope of the Center itself was too limited — what about the promising younger artists, the

Walter Eisenberg conducting the young people's orchestra

A music student in a practice room

An art class at Tanglewood, part of the B.U. program

21.

The Quiet Art of Maxine Kumin

by Robert Taylor

Maxine Kumin's poetry deserves a wider audience. One can say that, of course, about all poems. This is a time (what age isn't?) of coterie poets. To be sure, some, like Allen Ginsberg, are identified as performers, celebrities, anti-aesthetic comedians; some, like Robert Lowell, exemplify high seriousness in the antique European sense. Poets today, however, tend to be better known than their work. As this is written, for instance, Anne Sexton's "Love Poems" has sold about five thousand copies — a phenomenal commercial success — yet one imagines that for every purchaser of the book there are ten persons who have heard of Anne Sexton, formed an opinion about her, and feel, alas, no [illegible] slips the lash of your analysis.

Consider her prose. Maxine Kumin has written two excellent novels. "Through Doorns of Love," (Harper & Row) published in 1965, deals with a father-and-daughter relationship and is, she says, "very highly structured because I was familiarizing myself with the form" (the chapters alternate between the father and daughter viewpoint) while "The Passions of Uxport," which came out last year and will emerge in paperback this month, is more freely handled. Since the novel appeared a few days after John Updike's "Couples" and seemingly surveyed suburban sex mores, it was overshadowed by Updike's highly-publicized book, and, when noticed by critics, it forming experience and more at intensive, college-level classroom work, seminars, and workshops. It is, for example, bringing Alexander Kipnis and Pierre Bernac to conduct voice seminars; Bela Boszormenyi-Nagy, Artur Balsam, and Claude Frank to give piano seminars, and Roman Totenberg will give violin seminars. The regular faculty, like that of the Fellowship Program, is largely composed of members of the Boston Symphony as well as B. U. faculty.

New Directions for Tanglewood

from page 15

One of the new additions to the Center which has been particularly successful is Young Artists at Tanglewood, an adolescent version of the Fellowship Program. The participants are talented youngsters generally between their junior and senior years of high school. Like the Fellows they are carefully selected by audition from all over the country. Dr. Lee Chrisman, chairman of music education at B. U. and coordinator of the Young Artists Program, sends hundreds of letters to music educators in an effort to locate promising young instrumentalists and then travels some 20,000 miles to hold auditions in 30 cities. Finally on June 29, about 70 extremely gifted young people gather together to embark on an experience designed to influence the course of their future lives. For most it is their first exposure to the intensity and concentration which goes into the training and profession of the musician — new even to kids brought up on a regular diet of music lessons, school orchestras, and practice sessions. They have private instruction and participate in seminars and master classes, and they enjoy all the privileges of full membership in the Berkshire Music Center which includes, of course, sitting in on the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony and attending the Tanglewood concerts. Like the Fellows, they form chamber music ensembles and their own orchestra which is under the direction of Walter Eisenberg. A visiting artist like Beverly Sills or Claude Frank may even drop in on a class to give the young people a few valuable pointers — and possibly to size up the next generation of musicians. Word has it that they have gone away well pleased with what they have seen.

The Tanglewood experience has been further enriched by B. U.'s new programs in painting and drawing, theatre, and dance, all of which grant university credit. New Realist painters Philip Pearlstein and Alfred Leslie will join the resident faculty this year to teach painting and drawing. Joseph Gifford, an outstandingly creative choreographer, is among the teachers of dance. Those interested in theatre and dance also find a wealth of activities in these fields in the immediate vicinity of Tanglewood, and they take full advantage of the opportunities offered.

The theatre workshop is an extension of the Symposium Workshop for Playwrights — an unusual program directed toward helping young playwrights develop their art. Each year two such writers with promising plays are selected to participate in the Symposium. They work on their plays with experienced professionals in the theatre. This year guest directors include Pirie MacDonald and John Stix, and Elliot Norton, drama critic of the Boston Record-American, will be guest critic. Participants see their plays produced in a laboratory form; during the course of the production, the plays are discussed, analyzed, criticized, and developed. A University spokesman described the aim of the program to be "a tryout with the saving grace and humane atmosphere of academia, yet not lacking in professionalism." One of last year's participants, Kenneth Brown, may see his new play "Nightlight in the Locking Ring," produced on Broadway next fall. The participants agree that the workshop experience provides invaluable new insights into playwrighting techniques, and it is most certainly an important addition to the Tanglewood experience, making it an even more valuable asset to New England and lovers of the arts everywhere.

22

ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AT TANGLEWOOD

Tanglewood Career Of Leinsdorf Ending

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchhestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. The young German Pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist.

Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 p.m. through Aug. 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

★ ★ ★

ON AUGUST 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Mr. Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the orchestra.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 festival. On July 12, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction From the Seraglio" with sopranos Beverly Sills, Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherill Milnes as soloists.

On July 18, Mr. Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed again by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Mr. Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony; renowned French conductor Georges Pretre; Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony; French composer and newly appointed conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct on July 25.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, June 24, 1969

AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 93,000

JUN 28 1969

Liturgy Workshop

José Limon of the Juilliard School of Music and Berj Zamkochian of the Boston Symphony will be among the directors of "Liturgy in the City of Man," a workshop to be sponsored, Aug. 11-15, by the Cranwell School in collaboration with the Tanglewood Music Festival and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Details: Liturgical Workshop, Cranwell School, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 28 1969 New England

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD—Friday, July 4: Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 1969 season with Erich Leinsdorf conducting an all-Mozart program of Symphony No. 29, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467; Symphony No. 39, K. 543, with Christoph Eschenbach, 9 p.m., Shed . . . Weekend prelude with pianists Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank, 7 p.m., Shed . . . Saturday, July 5: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in all-Mozart program of "Haffner" Symphony, K. 385; Piano Concerto in A, K. 488; Symphony No. 40, K. 550, with John Browning, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Open rehearsal, 10:30 a.m. . . . Sunday, July 6: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in all-Mozart program of Six German Dances, K. 571; Piano Concerto in B Flat, K. 595; "Jupiter" Symphony, K. 551, with Claude Frank, 2:30 p.m., Shed.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUN 26 1969

Tanglewood Concerts Start With All-Mozart Program

Mozart will replace fireworks in Lenox on July 4 when Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in Tanglewood's opening, all-Mozart concert. The Independence Day opener will start at 9 with a two-piano Prelude beginning at 7 and featuring Claude Frank and Lilian Kallir. Piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach will be heard later in the evening in Mozart's piano concerto in C, K.467.

Tanglewood projects an interesting 8-week program from July 4 through August 24. A long list of special artists are scheduled including Pierre Boulez, Conductor, who has recently been named to replace Bernstein as Director of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Boulez will conduct the Boston Symphony in the Saturday evening concert on Aug. 2.

This will be Erich Leinsdorf's final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 1 1969

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,342

JUL 2 1969

July 5 at 8 p.m.: JOHN BROWNING, guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Erich Leinsdorf is conducting.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 3 1969

CLAUDE FRANK will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 2:30 p.m. at a concert in Tanglewood. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 3 1968 New England

Tanglewood Season Is Beginning Friday

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will begin Friday with Erich Leinsdorf conducting and the young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach making his Tanglewood debut as soloist.

Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m., and Sunday at 2:30 p.m., through Aug. 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will perform with the orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

THIS WEEK AT Tanglewood

SUNDAY

JUNE 29
2.30 pm Theatre
Berkshire Music Center Opening Exercises
Erich Leinsdorf will deliver the principal address. The public is cordially invited to these exercises and to the reception following in the Formal Gardens.

FRIDAY

JULY 4
7 pm Shed
Weekend Prelude
Music by MOZART and BACH
LILIAN KALLIR and CLAUDE FRANK pianists

9 pm Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Mozart program
Symphony no. 29
Piano concerto in C K. 467
CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH
Symphony no. 39

SATURDAY

JULY 5
10.30 am Shed
BSO — Open Rehearsal

8 pm Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Mozart program
Symphony no. 35 'The Haffner'
Piano concerto in A K.488
JOHN BROWNING
Symphony no. 40

SUNDAY

JULY 6
2.30 pm Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Mozart program
Six German dances K.571
Piano concerto in B flat K.595
CLAUDE FRANK
Symphony no. 41 'The Jupiter'

TUESDAY

JULY 8
8 pm
The first of the TUESDAY TANGLEWOOD TRENDS Concerts
JANIS JOPLIN
ORPHEUS
ticket prices: $4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 6, 6.50 (Box Seat)

AUGUST 5
8.30 pm
BOSTON POPS AT TANGLEWOOD
ARTHUR FIEDLER conductor
JOAN KENNEDY narrator
in 'Peter and the Wolf'
ticket prices: $4, 4.50, 5,5.50,6,6.50.

Programs subject to change

TICKET INFORMATION

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA — SHED: $3.50, 4.50, 5.50, 6.50, 7, 7.50, 8 and Box Seats, $8.50. (A Box contains 6 chairs. Special parking provided.)

ADMISSION TO LAWN: $3 (on sale day of concert)

WEEKEND PRELUDE: Friday evening ticket holder is admitted to Weekend Preludes at no extra charge.

OPEN REHEARSALS: $2.50, unreserved. (on sale day of concert).

TICKET OFFICE PHONE: (413) 637-1600

MAIN GATE — open 9 am to 6 pm daily, 9 am through intermission on concert nights.

SOUTH GATE — Open 6 pm before evening concerts, 12 noon before afternoon concerts.

Buses to Tanglewood leave Park Square, Pittsfield, one hour before Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

22

ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AT TANGLEWOOD

Tanglewood Career Of Leinsdorf Ending

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchhestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will begin July 4 with a concert conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. The young German Pianist Christoph Eschenbach will make his Tanglewood debut that evening as soloist.

Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2:30 p.m. through Aug. 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

★ ★ ★

ON AUGUST 24, for his final concert as music director of the orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with soprano Beverly Sills, contralto Florence Kopleff, tenor John Alexander and bass Justino Diaz as soloists. This will be preceded by Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw."

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled for July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Mr. Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will also perform with the orchestra.

Two concert performances of operas will highlight the 1969 festival. On July 12, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's "The Abduction From the Seraglio" with sopranos Beverly Sills, Anne Elgar, tenors George Shirley and Jerold Siena and bass-baritone Raymond Michalski as soloists. On July 26, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Verdi's "Otello" with tenor Richard Cassily, soprano Maralin Niska and baritone Sherill Milnes as soloists.

On July 18, Mr. Leinsdorf and pianist Earl Wild will play the Scharwenka Piano Concerto No. 1, repeating their much-acclaimed performance of last November, when the concerto was performed again by the orchestra after a lapse of 55 years.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Mr. Leinsdorf include: David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra; Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony; renowned French conductor Georges Pretre; Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony; French composer and newly appointed conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Pierre Boulez; Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim; and Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct on July 25.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, June 24, 1969

AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 93,000

JUN 28 1969

Liturgy Workshop

José Limon of the Juilliard School of Music and Berj Zamkochian of the Boston Symphony will be among the directors of "Liturgy in the City of Man," a workshop to be sponsored, Aug. 11-15, by the Cranwell School in collaboration with the Tanglewood Music Festival and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Details: Liturgical Workshop, Cranwell School, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 28 1969 New England

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD—Friday, July 4: Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 1969 season with Erich Leinsdorf conducting an all-Mozart program of Symphony No. 29, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467; Symphony No. 39, K. 543, with Christoph Eschenbach, 9 p.m., Shed . . . Weekend prelude with pianists Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank, 7 p.m., Shed . . . Saturday, July 5: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in all-Mozart program of "Haffner" Symphony, K. 385; Piano Concerto in A, K. 488; Symphony No. 40, K. 550, with John Browning, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Open rehearsal, 10:30 a.m. . . . Sunday, July 6: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in all-Mozart program of Six German Dances, K. 571; Piano Concerto in B Flat, K. 595; "Jupiter" Symphony, K. 551, with Claude Frank, 2:30 p.m., Shed.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUN 26 1969

Tanglewood Concerts Start With All-Mozart Program

Mozart will replace fireworks in Lenox on July 4 when Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in Tanglewood's opening, all-Mozart concert. The Independence Day opener will start at 9 with a two-piano Prelude beginning at 7 and featuring Claude Frank and Lilian Kallir. Piano soloist Christoph Eschenbach will be heard later in the evening in Mozart's piano concerto in C, K.467.

Tanglewood projects an interesting 8-week program from July 4 through August 24. A long list of special artists are scheduled including Pierre Boulez, Conductor, who has recently been named to replace Bernstein as Director of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Boulez will conduct the Boston Symphony in the Saturday evening concert on Aug. 2.

This will be Erich Leinsdorf's final year as conductor of the Boston Symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 1 1969

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,342

JUL 2 1969

July 5 at 8 p.m.: JOHN BROWNING, guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Erich Leinsdorf is conducting.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 3 1969

CLAUDE FRANK will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 2:30 p.m. at a concert in Tanglewood. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 3 1968 New England

Tanglewood Season Is Beginning Friday

LENOX, Mass. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will begin Friday with Erich Leinsdorf conducting and the young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach making his Tanglewood debut as soloist.

Concerts will be given each Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m., and Sunday at 2:30 p.m., through Aug. 24. The Friday evening concerts will be preceded by the weekend Prelude at 7 p.m.

The first two weekends of concerts will be performed by a chamber-sized orchestra. All-Mozart programs are scheduled July 4, 5, 6. In addition to Eschenbach, pianists John Browning and Claude Frank will perform with the orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

THIS WEEK AT Tanglewood

SUNDAY

JUNE 29
2.30 pm Theatre
Berkshire Music Center Opening Exercises
Erich Leinsdorf will deliver the principal address. The public is cordially invited to these exercises and to the reception following in the Formal Gardens.

FRIDAY

JULY 4
7 pm Shed
Weekend Prelude
Music by MOZART and BACH
LILIAN KALLIR and CLAUDE FRANK pianists

9 pm Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Mozart program
Symphony no. 29
Piano concerto in C K. 467
CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH
Symphony no. 39

SATURDAY

JULY 5
10.30 am Shed
BSO — Open Rehearsal

8 pm Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Mozart program
Symphony no. 35 'The Haffner'
Piano concerto in A K.488
JOHN BROWNING
Symphony no. 40

SUNDAY

JULY 6
2.30 pm Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Mozart program
Six German dances K.571
Piano concerto in B flat K.595
CLAUDE FRANK
Symphony no. 41 'The Jupiter'

TUESDAY

JULY 8
8 pm
The first of the TUESDAY TANGLEWOOD TRENDS Concerts
JANIS JOPLIN
ORPHEUS
ticket prices: $4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 6, 6.50 (Box Seat)

AUGUST 5
8.30 pm
BOSTON POPS AT TANGLEWOOD
ARTHUR FIEDLER conductor
JOAN KENNEDY narrator
in 'Peter and the Wolf'
ticket prices: $4, 4.50, 5,5.50,6,6.50.

Programs subject to change

TICKET INFORMATION
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA — SHED: $3.50, 4.50, 5.50, 6.50, 7, 7.50, 8 and Box Seats, $8.50. (A Box contains 6 chairs. Special parking provided.)
ADMISSION TO LAWN: $3 (on sale day of concert)
WEEKEND PRELUDE: Friday evening ticket holder is admitted to Weekend Preludes at no extra charge.
OPEN REHEARSALS: $2.50, unreserved. (on sale day of concert).

TICKET OFFICE PHONE: (413) 637-1600
MAIN GATE — open 9 am to 6 pm daily, 9 am through intermission on concert nights.
SOUTH GATE — Open 6 pm before evening concerts, 12 noon before afternoon concerts.
Buses to Tanglewood leave Park Square, Pittsfield, one hour before Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts.

highlights

Erich Leinsdorf Bids Adieu at Tanglewood

This summer marks the end of an era, an era of Erich Leinsdorf as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director. The Berkshire Festival, which was founded in 1934, is this country's oldest leading music festival; here the B.S.O. will play 24 concerts during the summer months in the famed 6000-seat Music Shed. There will be weekend preludes, Open Rehearsals, Boston Pops concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala, and Berkshire Music Center Programs.

An all-Mozart weekend opens the festival featuring Mozart's last three symphonies and three late piano concertos. Some of the excellent soloists this season who will highlight the festival include Van Cliburn, Andre Watts, Earl Wild, Beverly Sills, and nine guest conductors. The 1969 Festival closes with Mr. Leinsdorf's farewell concert as music director, for which he has chosen Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by the magnificent Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz.

Concert at Tanglewood

Classical Festivals

The Berkshire Festival.
Tanglewood, Lenox, 413-637-1600. Founded in 1934, the festival is this country's oldest leading music festival. Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented each Friday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for eight weeks, from July 4 to August 24, in the Music Shed. Friday evening preludes, at 7 and concerts, at 9; Saturday morning open rehearsals at 10:30 and Saturday evening, at 8; and Sunday afternoon, at 2:30. All concerts are conducted by Erich Leinsdorf unless otherwise indicated.

July 4 Concert — Mozart program: Symphony No. 29, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467, with guest soloist Christoph Eschenbach, piano; and Symphony No. 39, K. 543. The Weekend Prelude features pianists Christoph Eschenbach and Lilian Kallir.

July 5 Concert — Mozart program: "Haffner" Symphony, K. 385; Piano Concerto in A, K. 488, with guest pianist John Browning; and Symphony No. 40, K. 550.

July 6 Concert — Mozart program: Six German dances K. 571; Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 595, with guest pianist Claude Frank; and "Jupiter" Symphony, K. 551.

July 11 Concert — Bach program: The Four Suites. The Weekend Prelude features violinist Joseph Silverstein and Cellist Jules Eskin.

July 12 Concert — Mozart: "The Abduction from the Seraglio" (in German), with guests Beverly Sills, soprano; George Shirley, tenor; Elgar; Jerold Siena, tenor; Raymond Michalski, bass; and the Tanglewood Choir.

July 13 Concert — Guest conductor David Zinman of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra will lead the orchestra in Graff: Symphony for Strings; Bach: Triple Concerto in A minor, with guests Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Levin; Handel: Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 1; and Mozart: "Linz" Symphony, K. 425.

July 18 Concert — Rossini: "L'Italiana in Algeri" Overture; Scharwenka: Piano Concerto No. 1, with guest pianist Earl Wild; and Stravinsky: The Rite of Spring. The Weekend Prelude features Paul Zukofsky, violin and Gilbert Kalish, piano.

July 19 Concert — Program includes Prokofiev: "Romeo and Juliet" Suite.

July 20 Concert — Tchaikovsky program: Introduction to Act II "Swan Lake"; Violin Concerto, with guest violinist Pinchas Zukerman; and Symphony No. 5.

July 25 Concert — Beethoven: "Egmont" Overture; Beethoven: Symphony No. 1; and Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2, with guest pianist Andre Watts. The Weekend Prelude features pianist Earl Wild.

July 26 Concert — Verdi: "Otello" (in Italian), with guests Richard Cassilly, tenor; Maralin Niska, soprano; Sherrill Milnes, baritone; Berkshire Chorus; Tanglewood Choir; and Berkshire Boy Choir.

July 27 Concert — Guest conductor Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will lead the players in Sibelius: Symphony No. 2 and Beethoven: "Emperor" Concerto, with guest pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy.

August 1 Concert — Stravinsky: Symphony in C; Schoenberg: A Survivor from Warsaw; and Brahms: Symphony No. 4. The Weekend Prelude features the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

August 2 Concert — Guest conductor Pierre Boulez, the French composer, will lead the orchestra in Haydn: Sinfonia Concertante, Op. 84, with guests Joseph Silverstein, violin; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and Jules Eskin, cello; Debussy: Jeux; Bartok: Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra, with Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Debussy: La Mer.

August 3 Concert — Guest conductor Daniel Barenboim, from Israel, will lead the orchestra in Mendelssohn: "Ruy Blas" Overture; Elgar: Cello Concerto, with guest cellist Jacqueline DuPré; and Beethoven: Symphony No. 5.

August 8 Concert — Guest conductor Karel Ancerl, of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra in Smetana: Ma Vlast. The Weekend Prelude features the Berkshire Boy Choir.

August 9 Concert — Debussy: Three Nocturnes, with guests Women of the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir; Weill: Suite from "The Threepenny Opera"; and Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 1, with guest pianist Van Cliburn.

August 10 Concert — Guest conductor Josef Krips, of the San Francisco Symphony, will lead the orchestra in Haydn: "Surprise" Symphony; Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel; and Schubert: Symphony No. 9.

August 15 Concert — Beethoven program: "Pastoral" Symphony and "Eroica" Symphony. The Weekend Prelude features Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

August 16 Concert — Guest conductor Max Rudolf, of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra in Haydn: Symphony No. 91; Bartok: Dance Suite; and Tchaikovsky: "Pathétique" Symphony.

August 17 Concert — Guest conductor Henry Lewis, of the New Jersey Symphony, will lead the orchestra in Berlioz: "Corsaire" Overture; Berlioz: Nuits d'été; Mozart: Parto, parto from "La clemenza di Tito" K. 621; Rossini: Cruda sorte from "L'Italiana in Algeri," with guest soprano Marilyn Horne; and Tchaikovsky: Francesca da Rimini.

August 22 Concert — Guest conductor Milton Katims, of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra in Rossini, "Gaza Ladra" Overture; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4; Vaughan Williams, Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis; and Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloe," No. 2. The Weekend Prelude features Beverly Sills, soprano.

August 23 Concert — Varèse: Déserts; Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 4, with guest pianist Malcolm Frager; and Stravinsky: "Firebird" Suite.

August 24 Concert — In this final concert of the season, Erich Leinsdorf steps down as Music Director and leads the orchestra in Berlioz: Royal hunt and storm from "The Trojans" and Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, with guests Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor; Justino Diaz, bass.

AUGUST PROGRAM SCHEDULES FOR WGBH-FM

FRIDAY 1

9:00 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Erich Leinsdorf cond. Stravinsky: Sym. in C; Schoenberg: A Survivor from Warsaw; Brahms: Sym. No. 4.

SATURDAY 2

8:00 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Pierre Boulez cond. Haydn: Sinfonia Concertante, Op. 84 (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walf, bassoon; Jules Eskin, cello); Debussy: Jeux; Bartok: Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orch. (Joseph Silverstein, violin); Debussy: La Mer.

SUNDAY 3

2:30 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Daniel Barenboim, cond. Mendelssohn: "Ruy Blas" Over.; Elgar: Cello Con. (Jacqueline DuPré, cellist); Beethoven: Sym. No. 5.

TUESDAY 5

8:00 Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Festive concert benefiting the Orch. pension fund.

FRIDAY 8

9:00 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Karel Ancerl cond. Smetana: Ma Vlast.

SATURDAY 9

8:00 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Erich Leinsdorf cond. Debussy: Three Nocturnes (Women of Berkshire chorus and Tanglewood choir); Weill: Suite from "The Threepenny Opera"; Brahms: Piano Con. No. 1, (Van Cliburn, Piano).

SUNDAY 10

2:30 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Josef Krips cond. Haydn: "Surprise" Sym.; Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel; Schubert: Sym. No. 9.

FRIDAY 15

9:00 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Erich Leinsdorf cond. Beethoven: "Pastoral" Sym. and "Eroica" Sym.

SATURDAY 16

8:00 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Max Rudolf cond. Haydn: Sym. No. 91; Bartok: Dance Suite; Tchaikovsky: "Pathétique" Sym.

SUNDAY 17

2:30 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Henry Lewis cond. Berlioz: "Corsaire" Over. and Nuits d'été; Mozart: Parto, parto from "La Clemenza di Tito," K. 621; Rossini: Cruda Sorte from "L'Italiana in Algeri" (Marilyn Horne, soprano); Tchaikovsky: Francesca da Rimini.

TUESDAY 19

All-day TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Erich Leinsdorf cond. combined Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orch.

FRIDAY 22

9:00 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Milton Katims cond.- Rossini: "Gazza Ladra Over.; Tchaikovsky: Sym. No. 4; Vaughan Williams: Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Taillis; Ravel: "Daphnis et Chloé" No. 2.

SATURDAY 23

8:00 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Erich Leinsdorf cond. Varèse: Déserts; Beethoven: Piano Con. No. 4 (Malcolm Frager, piano); Stravinsky: "Firebird" Suite.

SUNDAY 24

2:30 Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival. Erich Leinsdorf cond. his farewell concert. Berlioz: Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans; Beethoven: Sym. No. 9 (Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor; Justino Diaz, bass; Berkshire Chorus; Tanglewood Choir).

SATURDAY 30

8:00 Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival.

SUNDAY 31

2:30 Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra at Tanglewood (S)
Live from the 1969 Berkshire Festival.

highlights

Erich Leinsdorf Bids Adieu at Tanglewood

This summer marks the end of an era, an era of Erich Leinsdorf as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director. The Berkshire Festival, which was founded in 1934, is this country's oldest leading music festival; here the B.S.O. will play 24 concerts during the summer months in the famed 6000-seat Music Shed. There will be weekend preludes, Open Rehearsals, Boston Pops concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala, and Berkshire Music Center Programs.

An all-Mozart weekend opens the festival featuring Mozart's last three symphonies and three late piano concertos. Some of the excellent soloists this season who will highlight the festival include Van Cliburn, Andre Watts, Earl Wild, Beverly Sills, and nine guest conductors. The 1969 Festival closes with Mr. Leinsdorf's farewell concert as music director, for which he has chosen Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by the magnificent Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz.

Concert at Tanglewood

Classical Festivals

The Berkshire Festival.
Tanglewood, Lenox, 413-637-1600. Founded in 1934, the festival is this country's oldest leading music festival. Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented each Friday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for eight weeks, from July 4 to August 24, in the Music Shed. Friday evening preludes, at 7 and concerts, at 9; Saturday morning open rehearsals at 10:30 and Saturday evening, at 8; and Sunday afternoon, at 2:30. All concerts are conducted by Erich Leinsdorf unless otherwise indicated.

July 4 Concert — Mozart program: Symphony No. 29, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467, with guest soloist Christoph Eschenbach, piano; and Symphony No. 39, K. 543. The Weekend Prelude features pianists Christoph Eschenbach and Lilian Kallir.

July 5 Concert — Mozart program: "Haffner" Symphony, K. 385; Piano Concerto in A, K. 488, with guest pianist John Browning; and Symphony No. 40, K. 550.

July 6 Concert — Mozart program: Six German dances K. 571; Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 595, with guest pianist Claude Frank; and "Jupiter" Symphony, K. 551.

July 11 Concert — Bach program: The Four Suites. The Weekend Prelude features violinist Joseph Silverstein and Cellist Jules Eskin.

July 12 Concert — Mozart: "The Abduction from the Seraglio" (in German), with guests Beverly Sills, soprano; George Shirley, tenor; Elgar; Jerold Siena, tenor; Raymond Michalski, bass; and the Tanglewood Choir.

July 13 Concert — Guest conductor David Zinman of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra will lead the orchestra in Graff: Symphony for Strings; Bach: Triple Concerto in A minor, with guests Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Levin; Handel: Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 1; and Mozart: "Linz" Symphony, K. 425.

July 18 Concert — Rossini: "L'Italiana in Algeri" Overture; Scharwenka: Piano Concerto No. 1, with guest pianist Earl Wild; and Stravinsky: The Rite of Spring. The Weekend Prelude features Paul Zukofsky, violin and Gilbert Kalish, piano.

July 19 Concert — Program includes Prokofiev: "Romeo and Juliet" Suite.

July 20 Concert — Tchaikovsky program: Introduction to Act II "Swan Lake"; Violin Concerto, with guest violinist Pinchas Zukerman; and Symphony No. 5.

July 25 Concert — Beethoven: "Egmont" Overture; Beethoven: Symphony No. 1; and Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2, with guest pianist Andre Watts. The Weekend Prelude features pianist Earl Wild.

July 26 Concert — Verdi: "Otello" (in Italian), with guests Richard Cassilly, tenor; Maralin Niska, soprano; Sherrill Milnes, baritone; Berkshire Chorus; Tanglewood Choir; and Berkshire Boy Choir.

July 27 Concert — Guest conductor Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will lead the players in Sibelius: Symphony No. 2 and Beethoven: "Emperor" Concerto, with guest pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy.

August 1 Concert — Stravinsky: Symphony in C; Schoenberg: A Survivor from Warsaw; and Brahms: Symphony No. 4. The Weekend Prelude features the Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

August 2 Concert — Guest conductor Pierre Boulez, the French composer, will lead the orchestra in Haydn: Sinfonia Concertante, Op. 84, with guests Joseph Silverstein, violin; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and Jules Eskin, cello; Debussy: Jeux; Bartok: Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra, with Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Debussy: La Mer.

August 3 Concert — Guest conductor Daniel Barenboim, from Israel, will lead the orchestra in Mendelssohn: "Ruy Blas" Overture; Elgar: Cello Concerto, with guest cellist Jacqueline DuPré; and Beethoven: Symphony No. 5.

August 8 Concert — Guest conductor Karel Ancerl, of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra in Smetana: Ma Vlast. The Weekend Prelude features the Berkshire Boy Choir.

August 9 Concert — Debussy: Three Nocturnes, with guests Women of the Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir; Weill: Suite from "The Threepenny Opera"; and Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 1, with guest pianist Van Cliburn.

August 10 Concert — Guest conductor Josef Krips, of the San Francisco Symphony, will lead the orchestra in Haydn: "Surprise" Symphony; Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel; and Schubert: Symphony No. 9.

August 15 Concert — Beethoven program: "Pastoral" Symphony and "Eroica" Symphony. The Weekend Prelude features Boston Symphony Chamber Players.

August 16 Concert — Guest conductor Max Rudolf, of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra in Haydn: Symphony No. 91; Bartok: Dance Suite; and Tchaikovsky: "Pathétique" Symphony.

August 17 Concert — Guest conductor Henry Lewis, of the New Jersey Symphony, will lead the orchestra in Berlioz: "Corsaire" Overture; Berlioz: Nuits d'été; Mozart: Parto, parto from "La clemenza di Tito" K. 621; Rossini: Cruda sorte from "L'Italiana in Algeri," with guest soprano Marilyn Horne; and Tchaikovsky: Francesca da Rimini.

August 22 Concert — Guest conductor Milton Katims, of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra in Rossini: "Gaza Ladra" Overture; Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 4; Vaughan Williams, Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis; and Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloe," No. 2. The Weekend Prelude features Beverly Sills, soprano.

August 23 Concert — Varèse: Déserts; Beethoven: Piano Concerto No. 4, with guest pianist Malcolm Frager; and Stravinsky: "Firebird" Suite.

August 24 Concert — In this final concert of the season, Erich Leinsdorf steps down as Music Director and leads the orchestra in Berlioz: Royal hunt and storm from "The Trojans" and Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, with guests Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor; Justino Diaz, bass.

Capitaland's Arts This Summer: A Special, Two-Page Edition of 'The Calendar'

TIMES-UNION • Sunday, June 29, 1969 F5

The Calendar

A Weekly Guide to Capitaland's Cultural Events

The Calendar is edited by:

FIONA BURDE

KUY KUK and

JOAN MUIR

This special edition of "The Calendar" includes all currently available schedules for Capitaland's summer theater, music, dance, art, film and other cultural events.

All schedules are subject to changes, deletions and additions as the ten-week season progresses.

Weekly edition of "The Calendar," incorporating such changes and including schedules that become available as the summer progress, children's events, places to see and more detailed information on the events listed here, will appear in The Sunday Times-Union throughout the season.

MUSIC

New York State

ADIRONDACK MUSIC FESTIVAL. Schroon, Blue Mountain and Saranac Lakes and Plattsburgh. July 5-Oct. 12. Programs to be announced later.

CARAMOOR FESTIVAL. Katonah. Spanish Courtyard 5:30 p.m. (exceptions noted).

June 29 — Benjamin Britten's "The Prodigal Son"

July 3 — Handel's "Semele" (Venetian Theater, 8:30 p.m.)

July 5 — An Evening of Italian opera Company (4 p.m.)

Aug. 3 — Concert

HARPUR COLLEGE. SUNY at Binghamton. Don A Walters Theatre, 8:15 p.m.

July 13, 20, 27 — Lenox String Quartet.

Aug. 3, 10, 17, 24 — New York Woodwind Quintet

LAKE GEORGE OPERA. Queensbury School, Glens Falls. 8:15 p.m. Mats 2:15 p.m.

Don Pasquale — July 17, 19, 21x, 25; Aug. 8, 14, 16x

Albert Herring — July 14x, 18, 31; Aug. 2, 16

Gianni Schicchi — July 24, 26, Aug. 13 — The Hudson Valley Brass Sextet (8:30 p.m.)

Aug. 17 — The Berkshire Quartet

Aug. 24 — The Philharmonia Piano Trio

Aug. 27 — The Mid-Hudson Madrigalists (8:30 p.m.)

Aug. 31—The New York chamber soloists.

(Season tickets available)

MOHONK MOUNTAIN CHAMBER MUSIC. Mohonk House, Lake Mohonk, New Paltz. 8:45 p.m.

July 9 — Monteux Quaartet

July 24 — Monteux Chamber Players

Aug. 6 — Luis Garcia-Renart

July 27 — Monteux Chamber Players

Aug. 10 — Canterbury Woodwind Quintet

SUMMER CHAMBER MUSIC. throu Memorial Bldg., Holiday Hills, Pawling. 8 p.m.

July 31 — Monteux Chamber Players

Aug. 7 — The Carnegie Quartet

Aug. 14 — The New York Brass Sextet

(Reservations can be made for dinner before the concerts).

WOODSTOCK PLAYHOUSE FOLK FESTIVAL. Woodstock. 8:30 p.m.

July 14 — Happy and Arty Traum

July 28 — Tim Harden

Aug. 4 — Jerry Jeff Walker

Aug. 11 — Tom Paxton

Aug. 18 — Patrick Sky

Boston Symphony at Tanglewood

Fridays—SHED—9 p.m.	Saturdays—SHED—8 p.m.	Sundays—SHED—2:30 p.m.
JULY 4 Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Kalliv and Frank LEINSDORF MOZART PROGRAM Symphony no. 29 K. 201 Piano concerto in C K. 467 Eschenbach Symphony no. 39 K. 543	JULY 5 OPEN REHEARSAL 10:30 a.m. LEINSDORF MOZART PROGRAM 'Haffner' Symphony K. 385 Piano concerto in A K. 488 Brownins Symphony no. 40 K. 550	JULY 6 LEINSDORF MOZART PROGRAM Six German dances K 571 Piano concerto in B flat K. 595 Frank Jupiter' Symphony K. 551
JULY 11 Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Silverstein and Eskin LEINSDORF BACH PROGRAM The four suites	JULY 12 OPEN REHEARSAL 10:30 a.m. LEINSDORF MOZART: The Abduction from the Seraglio (in German) Sills, Shirley, Elser, Siena, Michalski, Tanglewood Choir	JULY 13 ZINMAN GRAFF: Symphony for strings BACH: Triple concerto in A minor Dwyer, Silverstein, Lavin HANDEL: Concerto grosso op. 6 no. 1 MOZART: 'Linz' Symphony K. 425
JULY 18 Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Zukofsky and Kalish LEINSDORF ROSSINI: 'L'Italiana in Algeri' Overture SCHARWENKA: Piano concerto no. 1 Wild STRAVINSKY: The rite of spring	JULY 19 OPEN REHEARSAL 10:30 a.m. LEINSDORF Soloist and Concerto to be announced Program includes PROKOFIEV: 'Romeo and Juliet' suite	JULY 20 LEINSDORF TCHAIKOVSKY PROGRAM Introduction to Act II 'Swan Lake' Violin concerto Zuckerman Symphony no. 5
JULY 25 Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Wild LEINSDORF BEETHOVEN: 'Egmont' Overture BEETHOVEN: Symphony no. 1 BRAHMS: Piano concerto no. 2 Watts	JULY 26 OPEN REHEARSAL 10:30 a.m. LEINSDORF VERDI: Otello (in Italian) Cassilly, Nisko, Milnes, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir	JULY 27 WILSON SIBELIUS: Symphony no. 2 BEETHOVEN: 'Emperor' Concerto Ashkenazy
AUGUST 1 Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Boston Symphony Chamber Players LEINSDORF STRAVINSKY: Symphony in C SCHOENBERG: A survivor from Warsaw BRAHMS: Symphony no. 4	AUGUST 2 OPEN REHEARSAL 10:30 a.m. BOULEZ HAYDN: Sinfonia concertante op. 84 Silverstein, Gomberg, Wall, Eskin DEBUSSY: Jeux BARTOK: Two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra Silverstein DEBUSSY: La mer	AUGUST 3 BARENBOIM MENDELSSOHN: 'Ruy Blas' Overture ELGAR: Cello concerto DuPré BEETHOVEN: Symphony no. 5
AUGUST 8 Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Berkshire Boy Choir ANCERL SMETANA: Ma Vlast	AUGUST 9 OPEN REHEARSAL 10:30 a.m. LEINSDORF DEBUSSY: Three nocturnes Women of Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir WEILL: Suite from 'The Threepenny Opera' BRAHMS: Piano concerto no. 1 Cliburn	AUGUST 10 KRIPS HAYDN: 'Surprise' Symphony STRAUSS: Till Eulenspiegel SCHUBERT: Symphony no. 9
AUGUST 15 Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Boston Symphony Chamber Players LEINSDORF BEETHOVEN PROGRAM* 'Pastoral' Symphony 'Eroica' Symphony	AUGUST 16 OPEN REHEARSAL 10:30 a.m. RUDOLF HAYDN: Symphony no. 91 BARTOK: Dance Suite TCHAIKOVSKY: 'Pathétique' Symphony	AUGUST 17 LEWIS BERLIOZ: 'Corsaire' Overture BERLIOZ: Nuits d'été MOZART: Parto, parto from 'La clemenza di Tito' K. 621 ROSSINI: Ciuda suite from 'L'Italiana in Algeri' Horne TCHAIKOVSKY: Francesca da Rimini
AUGUST 22 Weekend Prelude 7 p.m. Sills KATIMS ROSSINI: 'Gazza Ladra' Overture TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony no. 4 VAUGHAN WILLIAMS: Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis RAVEL: 'Daphnis et Chloe' no. 2	AUGUST 23 OPEN REHEARSAL 10:30 a.m. LEINSDORF VARESE: Déserts BEETHOVEN: Piano concerto no. 4 Frager STRAVINSKY: 'Firebird' suite	AUGUST 24 LEINSDORF BERLIOZ: Royal hunt and storm from 'The Troians' BEETHOVEN: Symphony no. 9 Sills, Kapłof, Alexander, Diaz, Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir

NOTE: The Boston Pops will give concerts at Tanglewood on Tues., Aug. 5 at 8 p.m.; Sat., Aug. 30 at 8 p.m. and Sun., Aug. 31 at 2:30 p.m. Tanglewood on Parade, a day-long special for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center, will be held Aug. 19.

Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga

Thursday July 31 8:30 p.m.	EUGENE ORMANDY conducting GINA BACHAUER, piano ALL-RUSSIAN PROGRAM TCHAIKOVSKY: Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" PROKOFIEFF: Concerto No. 3 for Piano and Orchestra MOUSSORGSKY-RAVEL Pictures at an Exhibition
Friday August 1 8:30 p.m.	ISTVAN KERTESZ conducting ZADOR: Aria and Allegro HAYDN: Symphony No. 45, "Farewell" DVORAK: Symphony No. 7
Saturday August 2 8:30 p.m.	ISTVAN KERTESZ conducting HENRYK SZERYNG, violin MOZART: Symphony No. 33 KODALY: "Hary Janos" Suite BRAHMS: Concerto for Violin and Orchestra
Friday August 15 8:30 p.m.	ANDRE PREVIN conducting ANDRE PREVIN, piano WALTON: "Portsmouth Point," An Overture MOZART: Concerto No. 24 for Piano and Orchestra SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 2
Saturday August 16 8:30 p.m.	EUGENE ORMANDY conducting VAN CLIBURN, piano PENDERECKI: To the Victims of Hiroshima—Threnody CHOPIN: Concerto No. 1 for Piano and Orchestra MAHLER: Symphony No. 1 "The Titan" (with newly-discovered "Blumine" Movement)
Sunday August 17 3:30 p.m.	FRANZ ALLERS conducting LEE VENORA, soprano JOANNA SIMON, mezzo-soprano HARRY DANNER, tenor

July 22 — Festival Quartet and Pianist.

YALE CONCERTS. Ellen Battell Steeckel Estate, Norfolk. Chamber and Orchestra Concerts, Fridays, 8:30 p.m. July 4-Aug. 22. Also Aug. 17, Litchfield County Choral Union (3:30 p.m.); Aug. 23, Concert of Contemporary Music (2:30 p.m.).

July 4 — Works of Schubert, Bartok, Martinu and Copland.

Massachusetts

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL. Tanglewood. As well as the Boston Symphony schedule shown on this page, there will be Saturday moorning rehearsals open to the public, daily performances by the Berkshire Music Center students and faculty, a two week Festival of Contemporary Music, and five Tuesday programs to popular appeal and relevance to the contemporary music scene. All to be announced in the weekly Calendars.

NEW MARLBORO MUSIC CENTER. New Marlboro. Chamber Music Concerts. Saturday evenings. July 12-Aug. 23.

PEABODY CONSERVATORY CONCERTS. Smith College, Northampton. June 23-Aug. 1.

TALIN MUSIC FESTIVAL. Music Inn, Lenox. Concerts of Baroque and Contemporary music for chamber orchestra. July and August.

TYRINGHAM GALLERIES. Tyringham. Folk Music. Sundays at 8:30 p.m. July through Aug.

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS. Amherst. 8 p.m.

July 1, 24, 29; Aug. 5 — Hollander String Quartet

July 8 — Preservation Hall Jazz Band

July 15 — Jeanne-Marie Darre, pianist

Aug. 12 — The Romeros

Aug. 23 — Jack Landron (2 p.m.)

Vermont

AMERICAN RECORDER SOCIETY. Haybarn Theater, Goddard College, Plainfield. Concert July 25.

COMPOSERS' CONFERENCE AND CHAMBER MUSIC CENTER. Carriage Barn, Bennington College, Bennington. Concerts will be given at 8:15 p.m. on Aug. 10, 13, 16, 20 and 23. (No admission charge).

CRAFTSBURY CHAMBER PLAYERS. Sterling School, Craftsbury Common. Thursdays, 8:30 p.m. July 3-Aug. 21.

KINHAVEN MUSIC SCHOOL. Weston. Student concerts Sundays at 2:30 p.m. Faculty concerts Saturdays, 8 p.m. July 5-Aug. 17.

LANE SUMMER SERIES. Ira Allen Chapel, University of Vermont, Burlington. 8:30 p.m.

July 9 — Francisco Espinosa, guitarist.

July 29 —Youngtimers.

MARLBORO MUSIC FESTIVAL. Marlboro. Orchestra and Chamber Music Concerts on Saturdays at 8:30 p.m. and Sundays at 3 p.m. July 5-Aug. 15. Two special concerts Aug. 8 and 15. Bach Cantata program led by Blanche Honnegger-Moyse July 26. Pablo Casals will conduct, dates not known in advance.

SOUTHERN VERMONT ART CENTER, Manchester. 8:30 p.m. (exceptions noted).

July 6 — Vermont State Symphony

July 13 — Lake Geeorge Opera Quartet (3:30 p.m.)

July 20 — The Berkshire Boy Choir

July 27 — Baroque Music - Brattleboro Music Center (3:30 p.m.)

Aug. 3 — Lake George Opera? Don Pasquale

Aug. 10 — Quadro Parnasse Concert Artists (3:30 p.m.)

Aug. 17 — Boston Sinfonietta,

Aug. 24 — Jacqueline Schweitzer, pianist (3:30 p.m.)

Series tickets can be purchased for 8:30 concerts, others, general admission.

ST. MICHAEL'S COLLEGE. Winooski. 8 p.m. (No admission charge).

June 29 — Takako Nishizaki, violinist (Alliot Hall)

July 13 — Music for Trumpet and Piano (Alliot Hall)

July 27 — College-Community Chorus (Chapel)

A SUMMER COLLEGIUM IN EARLY MUSIC. Windham College, Putney. Student recitals Fridays. Faculty concerts Saturdays. 8 p.m. Aug. 3-30.

VERMONT STATE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Field House, Middlebury College, Middlebury, 8:15 p.m. July 7.

Connecticut

BAROQUE FESTIVAL ENSEMBLE. Choate School, Wallingford. 8:30 p.m. Aug. 8.

THE BERKSHIRE QUARTET. Music Mtn., Falls Village. Saturdays, 3 p.m. June 28-Aug. 30.

July 5 — Haydn. Quartet in G, Opus 76, No. 1; Bartok, Quartet No. 6; Smetana, Quartet "From My Life."

HARTFORD FESTIVAL OF MUSIC. Auditorium, Hartford Tower, Hartford Insurance Group. Wednesdays, 8:30 p.m. July 2-23.

July 2 — Works of Handel, Mozart and Alvin Etler.

HARTT COLLEGE OF MUSIC. University of Hartford, West Hartford. Chamber Music. Sundays, 8:30 p.m. June 22-Aug. 17 (except July 6).

June 29 — Beethoven program.

SILVERMINE GUILD CHAMBER MUSIC CENTER. New Canaan. 8 p.m.

July 13 — Leonid Hambro, pianist.

July 27 — Julius Baker, flute; Emily Oppenheimer, harp.

Aug. 10 — Zelda Manacher, mezzo.

Aug. 24 — Leah Effenbach, pianist and Chamber Orchestra, Paul Wolfe, conductor

STARLIGHT FESTIVAL OF MUSIC. Yale Law School Courtyard, New Haven. 8:30 p.m.

July 1 — The American Brass Quintet

July 8 — Festival Quartet, Pianist and Violinist.

July 15 — The New York Rock and Roll Ensemble.

FILMS

SPA THEATER. Saratoga Performing Arts Center. 7:30 p.m. Other times noted.

June 29, 30, July 1 — "Frankenstein" (8:45)

July 2, 3 — "Dracula" (8:50)

July 4, 5 — "King Kong" (9:15)

July 6, 7, 8 — Ingmar Bergman: "Summer Interlude" (8:55)

July 9, 10 — Ingmar Bergman: "Monika" (8:55)

July 11, 12 — Ingmar Bergman: "Secrets of Women" (9:20)

July 13, 14, 15 — Valentino: 'The Eagle" (8:45)

July 16, 17 — Valentino: "Son of the Eagle" (8:50 and 10:15)

LITTLE CINEMA. Berkshire Museum, Pittsfield, Mass. Mon. thru Wed. 8:15 p.m. Thurs. thru Sun. 7 and 9. Mats. on Wed. 2 p.m.

June 29-July 1 — "Great Catherine," Peter O'Toole, Zero Mostel, Jeanne Moreau

July 2-15 — "Francois Truffaut: "Stolen Kisses"

July 16-29 — "Otley,' Tom Courtenay, Romy Schneider

July 30-Aug. 5 — "War and Peace." part I

Aug. 6-12 — "War and Peace," part II and class on current ballet performances. SPAC, July 2, 8, 15, 22, 7 p.m. Ticket holders for any ballet performance during the week may attend. Wed. —The House that SPAC Built and rehearsal preparations for A midsummer Night's Dream.

THEATER OF MODERN DANCE, SPAC, Spa Summer Theater, mat. 2:30 p.m.; eve. 8:30 p.m.

Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater. Aug. 2 mat., Aug. 3 eve.

Repertory Dance Theater (Utah). Aug. 9 mat., Aug. 10 eve. Paul Sanasardo Dance Company. Aug. 16 mat. Aug. 17 eve.

DAVID MCCLAIN DANCE THEATER, Beaupre Creative Arts Center, Devon Rd. & Rt. 7, Stockbridge. July 2-6. Wed., Thurs., Sat., Sun. — 8:40 p.m.; Thurs. and Sat. — 3 p.m.

JACOB'S PILLOW DANCE FESTIVAL, Off Rt. 20, 9 miles from Lee, Mass. Mat. 3 p.m.; eve. performance 8:40 p.m. July 3-5 (Thurs. mat., Fri. mat. and eve., Sat. mat and eve.) Boston Ballet Company in repertoire.

Bruce Marks; Norman Walker & Co.; Lotte Goslar, mime and comedy.

July 15-19. Ruth Mata & Eugene Hari, satirical program in multi-media; Norman Walker & Co.

July 22-26 Maria Alba's Spanish Dance Company.

July 29-Aug. 2. Gruppe Motion Berlin — music, dance, sound, film; Teresa with Spanish Dancers and Flamenco Guitarist.

Aug. 12-Tug. 16. Dancers of American Ballet Theater; Afro-American Dance Co.

Aug. 21-Aug. 23. American Dance Company; Jacob's Pillow Dancers.

Aug. 28-Aug. 30. Patricia McBride and Edward Villella; Nala Najan and Anuradha; Jacob's Pillow Dancers.

UNIV. OF VERMONT LANE SERIES. Program featuring Villella and McBride, supported by Bhaskar and Shala, classical Indian dancers. Memorial Auditorium, Burlington, July 14, 8:30 p.m.

SOUTHERN VERMONT ART CENTER, Maria Alba and Company of Spanish Dancers. SVA, Manchester, Aug. 31, 8:30 p.m.

New York City Ballet at Saratoga

Thursday July 3 8:30 p.m.	A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM	Thursday July 17 8:30 p.m.	FIREBIRD LA SOURCE BRAHMS-SCHOENBERG QUARTET
Friday July 4 8:30 p.m.	A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM	Friday July 18 8:30 p.m.	JEUX MONUMENTUM/ MOVEMENTS FANTASIES SYMPHONY IN C
Saturday July 5 8:30 p.m.	A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM	Saturday July 19 8:30 p.m.	JEWELS (Ballet in three acts)
Sunday July 6 3:30 p.m.	A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM	Sunday July 20 3:30 p.m.	FIREBIRD LA SOURCE BRAHMS-SCHOENBERG QUARTET
Tuesday July 8 8:30 p.m.	SWAN LAKE DANCES AT A GATHERING WESTERN SYMPHONY	Tuesday July 22 8:30 p.m.	BUGAKU AGON PAS DE DEUX STARS AND STRIPES
Wednesday July 9 8:30 p.m.	LA SONNAMBULA FOUR TEMPERAMENTS TSCHAIKOVSKY SUITE	Wednesday July 23 8:30 p.m.	TROIS VALSES ROMANTIQUES AFTERNOON OF A FAUN PRODIGAL SON LA VALSE
Thursday July 10 8:30 p.m.	IRISH FANTASY DIVERTIMENTO #15 SLAUGHTER ON TENTH AVENUE	Thursday July 24 8:30 p.m.	ALL-TSCHAIKOVSKY PROGRAM SERENADE SWAN LAKE MEDITATION BALLET IMPERIAL
Friday July 11 8:30 p.m.	SWAN LAKE DANCES AT A GATHERING WESTERN SYMPHONY	Friday July 25 8:30 p.m.	BUGAKU AGON PAS DE DEUX STARS AND STRIPES
Saturday July 12 8:30 p.m.	LA SONNAMBULA FOUR TEMPERAMENTS TSCHAIKOVSKY SUITE	Saturday July 26 8:30 p.m.	TROIS VALSES ROMANTIQUES AFTERNOON OF A FAUN PRODIGAL SON LA VALSE
Sunday July 13 3:30 p.m.	IRISH FANTASY DIVERTIMENTO #15 SLAUGHTER ON TENTH AVENUE	Sunday July 27 3:30 p.m.	ALL-TSCHAIKOVSKY PROGRAM SERENADE SWAN LAKE MEDITATION BALLET IMPERIAL
Tuesday July 15 8:30 p.m.	JEUX MONUMENTUM/ MOVEMENTS FANTASIES SYMPHONY IN C
Wednesday July 16 8:30 p.m.	JEWELS (Ballet in three acts)

OVER

Erich Leinsdorf conducts at the Bereshire Festival in nearby Tanglewood.

NEWHOUSE NEWSPAPERS: Newark Star-Ledger, Staten Island Advance

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790

JUL 13 1969

Tanglewood Season Includes Holiday Weekend

Two special concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler with the Boston Pops Festival Orchestra will extend the Tanglewood season this year, adding two Labor Day weekend programs. The two additional concerts are Saturday, August 30 at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon August 31 at 2:30 in the Shed. Tickets are now on sale along with tickets for the 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the Berkshire Festival.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens the 1969 season with three all Mozart concerts, each featuring one of Mozart's last three symphonies and one of his late piano concertos. Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning, and Claude Frank are the opening weekend soloists.

Each Friday evening concert will be preceded by a Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. The Weekend Preludes are: Paul Zukofsky (violin) and Gilbert Kalish (piano), July 18; Earl Wild (piano), July 25; Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Wind Quintet), August 1; Berkshire Boy Choir, August 8; Boston Symphony Chamber Players, August 15; Beverly Sills (soprano), August 22.

Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood by Mr. Leinsdorf include: Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Orchestra (July 27); French composer Pierre Boulez (August 2); Israeli Daniel Barenboim (August 3); Karel Ancerl, newly appointed conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (August 8); Josef Krips, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony (August 10); Max Rudolf, conductor of the Cinncinati Symphony Orchestra (August 16); Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, (August 17); and Milton Katims, conductor of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra, (August 22).

A brochure containing programs, soloists, conductors and ticket information is available by writing the Berkshire Festival, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, June 29, 1969

CALDWELL, N.J.
PROGRESS
W. 6,000

JUL 17 1969

Musicians Shown In Library Display

STOCKBRIDGE — The Stockbridge Library has on display in the main hall photographs of many of the performing artists at Tanglewood this summer.

Booklets containing program information are available along with the latest books from the music department of the library. The display will remain through this month.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 11 1969

CRITIC-AT-LARGE

There's a Selection Of Music Festivals

By BYRON BELT

Not only is the grass always greener elsewhere, in summer it is greener than usual, and the further away the greener it seems.

Byron Belt

Whn the weather is inviting, those interested in the arts find that the muses are on the move, and they rightly wish to follow.

Sampling European fare as we have recently done has not dampened our enthusiasm for the scene closer to home; it merely augments our desires.

For those with autos, there are several attractive places where art, dance and/or music may be found conveniently, and for those without travel agencies are beginning to provide adequate transportation. Frequently the package tours, with reserved seating, housing and the like make for the least troublesome and most attractive way to enjoy the summer arts.

* * *

WATERLOO VILLAGE MUSIC FESTIVAL: The most convenient summer series in an interesting area is the two-year-old festival in the restored pre-Revolutionary village near Stanhope, New Jersey, in the Allamuchy Mountains. About an hour's journey from most central areas, Waterloo Village offers houses, a barn, tavern, an extremely handsome church, grist mill and apothecary shop, all filled with priceless antiques, all open to serve the public.

It is best to arrive at Waterloo Village at least two hours before the 8:30 concerts in the handsome festival tent. Seating within the accoustically superb enclosure is $6.50, $5.50 and $4.50, and several thousand can be accommodated on the spacious lawns for $2.50.

Van Cliburn and the National Symphony conducted by Howard Mitchell, will be the popular attractions on Saturday July 19th. Lovely Roberta Peters and famed tenor Jan Peerce will appear on August 2nd and Eddy Arnold brings his special brand of entertainment on August 9th. Julius Rudel will conduct a Viennese Night on August 23rd and Gary Graffman will be his soloist. The season will conclude on August 30th with an attraction yet to be announced.

* * *

GARDEN STATE ARTS CENTER: Located at Exit 116 of the Garden State Parkway in Telegraph Hill Park, is the center designed by Edward Durell Stone. The busy summer schedule includes many pops attractions, but among those appealing most probably to our readers are concerts by the New York Philharmonic and the American Ballet Theatre. The full schedule may be obtained by writing P. O. Box 116, Holmdel, New Jersey 07733.

* * *

CONNECTICUT COLLEGE AMERICAN DANCE FESTIVAL: The New London campus of Connecticut College is transformed each summer into one of the most creative and important dance centers in the world. This marks the 22nd American Dance Festival, with the season's kick-off scheduled for next Saturday evening.

Twyla Tharp & Dancers will perform at 7 p.m. out-of-doors as part of a double bill which will feature the Yvonne Rainer company in the Crozier-Williams Center theatre at 8:30.

The Paul Taylor Dance Company will perform on July 26th and again on August 2nd, with a specially commissioned work given its world premiere on the latter date. The Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater will perform on August 9th and 16th and other companies will share the evenings of August 1st and 15th.

Gary Graffman is piano soloist at the Waterloo Village Festival next month.

Taylor, Ailey and others are in residence teaching at the college for two-week periods, but the public at large is invited to partake of the weekend performances at modest prices.

* * *

MARLBORO MUSIC FESTIVAL: The distinguished summer activities of Rudolf Serkin and his musical friends (including Pablo Casals, Jaime Laredo and others too numerous to mention) are in their nineteenth season in Marlboro, Vermont. Since performances are always completely sold out and the trip a rather long one, it would be advisable to place a call (802/254-2394) prior to making plans. At press time tickets were available only for August 8th and 15th.

The big summer festivals in this part of the country are those located in New York State at Saratoga Springs, and near Lenox, Massachusetts at Tanglewood. In additon to the overwhelming quantity and quality of the attractions at these two giants, the peripheral activity is of unusual interest as well.

* * *

THE BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL-TANGLEWOOD: The great Boston Symphony Orchestra makes Tanglewood its summer home, and between the spectacular scenery, 24 concerts by the orchestra and innumerable other factors, Tanglewood stands as the very lively Grande Dame of American summer festivals.

In addition to Erich Leinsdorf, in his final season as director of the Festival as well as the related Berkshire Music Center, conductors include the New York Philharmonic's newly appointed music director Pierre Boulez (on August 2nd) Charles Wilson, Daniel Barenboim, Karel Ancerl, Josef Krips, Max Rudolf, Milton Katims and New Jersey Symphony conductor Henry Lewis, who conducts on August 17th with his wife Marilyn Horne as soloist.

Tanglewood performances are given in the Shed every Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 and Sunday at 2:30. Friday's are particularly appealing, for at 7 there is a Weekend Prelude featuring festival guests in recital. These performances are included in the price of tickets for the orchestral concerts.

This Friday, for example, Paul Zukofsky and Gilbert Kalish will perform music of Webern and Busoni for violin and piano. On August 1st the superb Berkshire Boy Choir will appear and on the 22nd soprano Beverly Sills.

Leinsdorf highlights include a concert version of Verdi's "Otello," starring Richard Cassilly, Maralin Niska and Sherill Milnes on July 26th, and a concluding Beethoven Ninth Symphony on August 24th. Arthur Fiedler will conduct two special Labor Day weekend concerts on August 30th and 31st, and unusual events abound during the season.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUL 16 1969

By
Edgar S. Van Olinda

"Yes, Virginia, there IS a Santa Claus." And, also, there IS a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, provided such a multi-colored arch in the sky starts at the Berkshire Music Festival and ends at the Four Chimneys restaurant in Old Bennington, especially on a Sunday afteroon in July or August Then the music lovers are augmented by the lads who have hit the daily double in the pre-Saratoga flat track in Pownal, Vt.

The Four Chimneys gustatory complex is easily distinguishable for the quartet of red brick heat and smoke vents (there are actually five) which stan dout in cheerful relief above the white Colonial facade of the former mansion set on a landscaped plot of ground. The several dining rooms, wine cradles and glass-strewn mahogany are the result of the vision and initiative of inn keeper Jimmie Rallis, former member of the culinary staff of the Ten Eyck Hotel during the owner-management of the Rockwell family. The restaurant is comfortably air conditioned. Jimmie could not improve the food so he installed all the creature comforts that moodern electronics have conjured up.

The popular greeter is that old pro, Paul Wentick, who is as familiar to this tri-state clientele as the Bennington monument. The viands are lovingly processed by the master de cuisine, Maurice Champaign under the watchful eyes of Mr. Rallis who is pretty skillful himself with a skillet. If some self-styled gourmet cannot find something on the extensive menu to stimulate his taste buds, Mr. Rallis will roll up his sleeves, don his apron and produce a real chef d'oeuvre.

The Four Chimneys has become the Mecca for those attending Tanglewood, especially the Sunday afternoon concerts by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the regrettably final season's directorship of Erich Leinsdorf. Devotees of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, plus a goodly sprinkling of Mozart and Bach, receive great material sustenance after two hours of spirituaal revelry.

The trip from Tanglewood, via Pittsfield, Williamstown, Pownal and Bennington is through some of the most beautiful scenery in the eastern part of the United States with magnificient views of the Berkshires, and the Green Mountains.

History and art-minded Albanians and alumni of Williams College may receive a vicarious thrill on the way to the Four Chimneys to stop off at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute or re-examine the former Van Rnesselaer mansion which stood on the Hudson River in the northern section of Albany. The building was taken down, stone by stone and shipped to Williamstown where it was re-erected in 1863 as the home of the Sigma Phi fraternity. It stands in the rear of the Congregational Church. Sudden thought: If one has the yen to receive a bird's eye view of Vermont, there is an elevator in the Bennington Monument to whisk the more elderly to the top.

26.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 12 1969

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

More Power to 'Em

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

WHEN MAJOR HENRY Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, the musicians' basic weekly wage was $40 for a season of 24 weeks. This figure, of course, has significance only if we also know what a pound of cod cost that year in Boston. How long did a fiddler or a trumpeter have to bow or blow to earn enough to buy that fish?

To be sure, no BSO member in 1881 owned an auto, a radio or a television set. His house didn't have automatic heat. His wife washed clothes and dishes by hand and dried his shirts on a clothesline and his coffee cup on a dish towel. He went rarely, if at all, to the movies but stereopticon or magic-lantern travel lectures were high points in a man's entertainment year and for an evening's relaxation with "the boys," there were many fraternal orders. These included the Eagles, Woodmen of the World, Royal Arcanum, Ancient Order of Oddfellows, Hibernians and many others where a friendly glass of beer was to be had for five cents and there was always a chair vacant for a fourth man at pinochle.

Higginson evidently had a deep pocket and didn't care how far down he dipped. Nevertheless, many devices were tried to elicit money while studiously refusing to let a "Barnum touch mar the habitual serenity of the Bostonians or to threaten the dignity of so subtle a cultural" venture. One year at least, seats were auctioned off and H. Earle Johnson in his book "Symphony Hall" reported that some of "our Yankee forbears who loved their neighbors well enough in general but not well enough in particular to relish sitting beside them 24 Friday afternoons or Saturday evenings" made sensational bids up to $1,120 for two $12 seats for the privilege of choosing the location of their places "at Symphony."

* * * *

I AM NOT informed how the Boston trustees' contract with the musicians' union reads but I think there is a sum specified for a number of weekly services—a service in this sense referring either to a rehearsal or a concert. I read, as does everyone else, what craftsmen in the building trades ask. It takes longer and costs more to learn to play a cello or a clarinet, in the degree of competence a major symphony requires, than an apprentice must serve before he becomes a journeyman craftsman. This need not be the place to decide which vocation warrants the greater remuneration, but orchestra musicians these days would like to equate themselves, on the remunerative scale, with university faculties rather than with the building trades.

The Boston orchestra, nor any other for that matter, has never been self-supporting. There has long been a faction which advocates that the government should subsidize orchestras, and museums, theatres and other cultural institutions as well. The government, in effect, does subsidize many such organizations by allowing deductions from income tax returns, virtually inviting, nay, recommending, that taxpayers capable of allotting sums, large or small to such purposes, do so. The institutions benefit while the donors receive gratification for their magnanimity and philanthropy.

* * * *

THE AMERICAN PUBLIC has hypnotized itself with the slogan "bigger and better." Just because General Electric sales went up some per cent this past fiscal year, attendance at Tanglewood should also go up, and with it, receipts. This is in spite of the fact that Tanglewood, Symphony, Carnegie, Philharmonic and other halls have fairly fixed and constant capacities and a "second shift," when the halls are sold out, is not feasible.

Furthermore, General Motors announces that its sales this year are wonderful, almost equal to the sales of 1966 (or what was that good year?) and no one appears to fear for GM's financial well-being. Yet, if Tanglewood has fewer seats occupied one weekend than another, some people ask, "Is Tanglewood slipping?" If anyone chooses to look around, it might be of interest to notice that "Tanglewood is being imitated." Incidentally, the Metropolitan Opera has stated that it takes in $36,000 when it sells out at a $15 top performance. A regular routine performance costs $56,000.

I HAVE LONG been curious to learn what Van Cliburn gets for a one-night stand at Tanglewood and Saratoga. The townspeople know what "Peter, Paul and Mary" got for a one-night stand at the Pittsfield Boys' Club. More power to them, I always say. What do you always say? And how many people go to bed at 11:25 to avoid a guy whose public relations agent spread the propaganda that he gets $75 grand a week?

I'm not much of a World Series fan nor a racetrack habitue, a confession which will fascinate few people. However, I've heard tell that you can't park your car at the stairs or escalator to the grandstands. At the tracks, some friends of mine say that the view of the clubhouse from the bleachers is infuriating and I'm told that hand-carried transistor radios at a ball park are standard practice. The fans want to know who's on first.

There's just too damn many people on this earth. If only we could eliminate some segments of the population. Let the Royal Oak preacher or the late Wisconsin senator do the picking and then ask the government to be more evenhanded with money and the Lord, with intelligence. Many of our problems might be solved.

* * * *

THE EXPERTS aren't doing too well. The people we vote for don't prove to be as wise as we hoped. Lots of us know how to regulate traffic much better than the guys the various mayors appoint. Loads of people can construct symphony concert programs much better than the talented men who now are charged with the responsibility.

Half the fun of going to ball games is to exercise our privilege of shouting to the amorphous executioner, "Kill the umpire!" We in the stands can see and judge a ball at the plate much better than the man somebody entrusted with the authority to make such decisions. We go home cleansed and self-righteous. Hurrah for the dissenters. They serve a very worthy purpose in sports, politics, the arts and life in general. More power to 'em.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

As I Hear It

Watersheds

connects, as well as of music, at the venerable age of 87. Yet, "Firebird" was nearer in its initial appearance to "Salome," "Elektra," "Das Lied von der Erde" or "La Mer" than to anything written in the last 50 years. Obviously there is semantic contradiction.

* * * *

THE PERTINENCE of this observation appears when one considers not only the current Tanglewood season but also the other summer festivals scattered over the countryside. Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also of the Berkshire Musical Center, stated four weeks ago in his welcoming address at opening exercises that music is at a point which might be called a watershed.

The word "watershed," as we all understand it, refers to the direction rain flows when it falls on a roof or the ridge of a hill, in each case yielding to the natural slope. Thus, rain falling on a certain parting of the ways. There was a watershed of a different type in the first parts of the 19th century when science made available to mankind methods of locomotion and communication beyond those which had served primitive man. The analogy with music in our time breaks down here, though, for it is not at all clear that we, the general public are riding the new wave.

There has never been total agreement that change is progress. The hottest arguments prevail on political regimes, social mores and artistic and cultural directions. The leaders who get the biggest headlines are often captains who do not always have the most numerous troops. Those of us unable to appreciate the moonshots of music dare not ridicule the astronauts. We fear their eyesight and insight into their own projects are superior to ours. Only when they go to such jusqu'auboutisme as John Cage did when he asked a musician to play the raisins in a slice of fruit cake or as someone

* * * *

THAT IT IS the product of what comes naturally and spontaneously to the talented executants who, in general, are untrained and so-to-speak musically illiterate, is a pill hard to swallow for all those students who dedicate years of their lives in pursuit of that type of music which is variously labeled as classical, sophisticated, serious, longhair and other terms less flattering. "To put it bluntly," said Leinsdorf, "contemporary music" (and he was referring to the type the Boston Symphony would generally play) "has no audience." Yet, he insisted that "the stock of performable masterpieces must be replenished constantly."

With the exception of Stravinsky, whom we can't quite decide where to pigeonhole, there is no music of a living composer being played at Tanglewood this summer. Does a trepid acrophobia impel us to cling to a musical Wasserscheide for fear of plunging down an unknown slope?

PANORAMA
A JEROME PRESS PUBLICATION
270 Summer Street, Boston, Mass. 02110
TEL. 423-3400

[redacted]

AROUND THE HUB Continued

Human Nature Dictates

that not everyone likes contemporary, pop, and folk music, but do not despair. There are two marvelous classical festivals underway. At Tanglewood, under the direction of the renowned Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will blend the elements into a state of complete harmony on Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Some of the selections that will be performed are the works of such Mozart, Handel, Stravinsky, and the works of other equally as famous composers.

The Marlboro Music Festival, which brings together noted musicians from all over the world each summer in Vermont, offers chamber orchestra and chamber music concerts each Saturday evening at 8:30 and Sunday afternoon at 3. Over 80 different works, selected by the musicians themselves, are in rehearsal each week. Unlimited rehearsal time is the rule and the programs are made up from the works in progress only a day before each performance and are not generally announced in advance.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

AUG 1969

one ... with the orchestra and ... ed master classes at Edinboro State College. The festival was supported by a grant from the Pennsylvania State Council on the Arts. . . . The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Massachusetts) got underway on July 4 with a concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, who retires from the dual post of music director of the orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center at the end of the summer. Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood include David Zinman, Charles Wilson, Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim, Karel Ancerl, Josef Krips, Max Rudolf, Henry Lewis, and Milton Katims. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra will also make their traditional appearances at the Tanglewood Festival.

Wednesday, July 30, 1969

A Goodly Land

A publication of the General Electric Co.'s Research and Development Center here recently printed an article with the above title. Because we feel the article is the best description of Schenectady we have read, we reprint it here without further comment.

"Variety is the word for the environment of Schenectady and the kind of life possible to its residents. The weather is temperate but changeable. Prevailing winds don't prevail very long. The seasons are distinct: summers hot; winters cold and snowy enough for excellent local skiing; springs with everything in blossom, including boys and girls on skateboards; autumns brilliant, with foliage to match a New England postcard.

"The city — which now has a population of over 80,000 — was settled in the 17th century by the Dutch, and its long history is recalled in many Dutch and Indian place names. A downtown area called "the Stockade," which was burned in 1690 by French and Indian raiders, is now a residential neighborhood of narrow, shady streets and old houses lovingly restored.

"The city's neighborhoods include everything from slum areas (fast shrinking under the impetus of urban renewal) to middle-class flats and houses, housing developments and apartment projects, and the neatly trimmed lawns of suburbia, with the ride-around lawn mower circling the pool. Good roads enable thousands to live in the surrounding countryside only a few minutes from their job in the city.

"Sound education is a tradition. Public schools of the city and suburbs win high ratings for progressive curricula and pupil achievement. Seven colleges, three graduate schools, and two junior colleges are within a 25-mile radius.

"Cultural facilities include a museum, many art classes and shows, a semi-professional symphony orchestra, a light opera company, and a little theater group that has thrived for 40 years. Touring musical and dramatic attractions visit regularly. Summer theaters abound. The Saratoga Performing Arts Center — summer home of the New York City Ballet and Philadelphia Orchestra — is only 22 miles away, the Berkshire Music Festival (Tanglewood) only 45 miles away, a pleasant drive after work on a summer's evening.

As Dutch patroon Arendt Van Curler put it 300 years ago: Schenectady is a 'faire and goodly land, well fit for the homes and works of man.'" 26.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 12 1969

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

More Power to 'Em

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

WHEN MAJOR HENRY Lee Higginson established the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, the musicians' basic weekly wage was $40 for a season of 24 weeks. This figure, of course, has significance only if we also know what a pound of cod cost that year in Boston. How long did a fiddler or a trumpeter have to bow or blow to earn enough to buy that fish?

To be sure, no BSO member in 1881 owned an auto, a radio or a television set. His house didn't have automatic heat. His wife washed clothes and dishes by hand and dried his shirts on a clothesline and his coffee cup on a dish towel. He went rarely, if at all, to the movies but stereopticon or magic-lantern travel lectures were high points in a man's entertainment year and for an evening's relaxation with "the boys," there were many fraternal orders. These included the Eagles, Woodmen of the World, Royal Arcanum, Ancient Order of Oddfellows, Hibernians and many others where a friendly glass of beer was to be had for five cents and there was always a chair vacant for a fourth man at pinochle.

Higginson evidently had a deep pocket and didn't care how far down he dipped. Nevertheless, many devices were tried to elicit money while studiously refusing to let a "Barnum touch mar the habitual serenity of the Bostonians or to threaten the dignity of so subtle a cultural" venture. One year at least, seats were auctioned off and H. Earle Johnson in his book "Symphony Hall" reported that some of "our Yankee forbears who loved their neighbors well enough in general but not well enough in particular to relish sitting beside them 24 Friday afternoons or Saturday evenings" made sensational bids up to $1,120 for two $12 seats for the privilege of choosing the location of their places "at Symphony."

* * * *

I AM NOT informed how the Boston trustees' contract with the musicians' union reads but I think there is a sum specified for a number of weekly services—a service in this sense referring either to a rehearsal or a concert. I read, as does everyone else, what craftsmen in the building trades ask. It takes longer and costs more to learn to play a cello or a clarinet, in the degree of competence a major symphony requires, than an apprentice must serve before he becomes a journeyman craftsman. This need not be the place to decide which vocation warrants the greater remuneration, but orchestra musicians these days would like to equate themselves, on the remunerative scale, with university faculties rather than with the building trades.

The Boston orchestra, nor any other for that matter, has never been self-supporting. There has long been a faction which advocates that the government should subsidize orchestras, and museums, theatres and other cultural institutions as well. The government, in effect, does subsidize many such organizations by allowing deductions from income tax returns, virtually inviting, nay, recommending, that taxpayers capable of allotting sums, large or small to such purposes, do so. The institutions benefit while the donors receive gratification for their magnanimity and philanthropy.

* * * *

THE AMERICAN PUBLIC has hypnotized itself with the slogan "bigger and better." Just because General Electric sales went up some per cent this past fiscal year, attendance at Tanglewood should also go up, and with it, receipts. This is in spite of the fact that Tanglewood, Symphony, Carnegie, Philharmonic and other halls have fairly fixed and constant capacities and a "second shift," when the halls are sold out, is not feasible.

Furthermore, General Motors announces that its sales this year are wonderful, almost equal to the sales of 1966 (or what was that good year?) and no one appears to fear for GM's financial well-being. Yet, if Tanglewood has fewer seats occupied one weekend than another, some people ask, "Is Tanglewood slipping?" If anyone chooses to look around, it might be of interest to notice that "Tanglewood is being imitated." Incidentally, the Metropolitan Opera has stated that it takes in $36,000 when it sells out at a $15 top performance. A regular routine performance costs $56,000.

I HAVE LONG been curious to learn what Van Cliburn gets for a one-night stand at Tanglewood and Saratoga. The townspeople know what "Peter, Paul and Mary" got for a one-night stand at the Pittsfield Boys' Club. More power to them, I always say. What do you always say? And how many people go to bed at 11:25 to avoid a guy whose public relations agent spread the propaganda that he gets $75 grand a week?

I'm not much of a World Series fan nor a racetrack habitue, a confession which will fascinate few people. However, I've heard tell that you can't park your car at the stairs or escalator to the grandstands. At the tracks, some friends of mine say that the view of the clubhouse from the bleachers is infuriating and I'm told that hand-carried transistor radios at a ball park are standard practice. The fans want to know who's on first.

There's just too damn many people on this earth. If only we could eliminate some segments of the population. Let the Royal Oak preacher or the late Wisconsin senator do the picking and then ask the government to be more evenhanded with money and the Lord, with intelligence. Many of our problems might be solved.

* * * *

THE EXPERTS aren't doing too well. The people we vote for don't prove to be as wise as we hoped. Lots of us know how to regulate traffic much better than the guys the various mayors appoint. Loads of people can construct symphony concert programs much better than the talented men who now are charged with the responsibility.

Half the fun of going to ball games is to exercise our privilege of shouting to the amorphous executioner, "Kill the umpire!" We in the stands can see and judge a ball at the plate much better than the man somebody entrusted with the authority to make such decisions. We go home cleansed and self-righteous. Hurrah for the dissenters. They serve a very worthy purpose in sports, politics, the arts and life in general. More power to 'em.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 26 1969

As I Hear It

Watersheds

conflicts, as well as of music, at the venerable age of 87. Yet, "Firebird" was nearer in its initial appearance to "Salome," "Elektra," "Das Lied von der Erde" or "La Mer" than to anything written in the last 50 years. Obviously there is semantic contradiction.

* * * *

THE PERTINENCE of this observation appears when one considers not only the current Tanglewood season but also the other summer festivals scattered over the countryside. Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also of the Berkshire Musical Center, stated four weeks ago in his welcoming address at opening exercises that music is at a point which might be called a watershed.

The word "watershed," as we all understand it, refers to the direction rain flows when it falls on a roof or the ridge of a hill, in each case yielding to the natural slope. Thus, rain falling on a certain parting of the ways. There was a watershed of a different type in the first parts of the 19th century when science made available to mankind methods of locomotion and communication beyond those which had served primitive man. The analogy with music in our time breaks down here, though, for it is not at all clear that we, the general public are riding the new wave.

There has never been total agreement that change is progress. The hottest arguments prevail on political regimes, social mores and artistic and cultural directions. The leaders who get the biggest headlines are often captains who do not always have the most numerous troops. Those of us unable to appreciate the moonshots of music dare not ridicule the astronauts. We fear their eyesight and insight into their own projects are superior to ours. Only when they go to such jusqu'auboutisme as John Cage did when he asked a musician to play the raisins in a slice of fruit cake or as someone

* * * *

THAT IT IS the product of what comes naturally and spontaneously to the talented executants who, in general, are untrained and so-to-speak musically illiterate, is a pill hard to swallow for all those students who dedicate years of their lives in pursuit of that type of music which is variously labeled as classical, sophisticated, serious, longhair and other terms less flattering. "To put it bluntly," said Leinsdorf, "contemporary music" (and he was referring to the type the Boston Symphony would generally play) "has no audience." Yet, he insisted that "the stock of performable masterpieces must be replenished constantly."

With the exception of Stravinsky, whom we can't quite decide where to pigeonhole, there is no music of a living composer being played at Tanglewood this summer. Does a trepid acrophobia impel us to cling to a musical Wasserscheide for fear of plunging down an unknown slope?

PANORAMA
A JEROME PRESS PUBLICATION
270 Summer Street, Boston, Mass. 02110
TEL. 423-3400

AROUND THE HUB Continued

Human Nature Dictates

that not everyone likes contemporary, pop, and folk music, but do not despair. There are two marvelous classical festivals underway. At Tanglewood, under the direction of the renowned Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will blend the elements into a state of complete harmony on Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Some of the selections that will be performed are the works of Bach, Mozart, Handel, Stravinsky, and the works of other equally as famous composers.

The Marlboro Music Festival, which brings together noted musicians from all over the world each summer in Vermont, offers chamber orchestra and chamber music concerts each Saturday evening at 8:30 and Sunday afternoon at 3. Over 80 different works, selected by the musicians themselves, are in rehearsal each week. Unlimited rehearsal time is the rule and the programs are made up from the works in progress only a day before each performance and are not generally announced in advance.

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

AUG 1969

One w...
with the orchestra and ...
ed master classes at Edinboro State College. The festival was supported by a grant from the Pennsylvania State Council on the Arts. . . . The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood (Lenox, Massachusetts) got underway on July 4 with a concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, who retires from the dual post of music director of the orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center at the end of the summer. Guest conductors invited to Tanglewood include David Zinman, Charles Wilson, Pierre Boulez, Daniel Barenboim, Karel Ancerl, Josef Krips, Max Rudolf, Henry Lewis, and Milton Katims. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra will also make their traditional appearances at the Tanglewood Festival.

Wednesday, July 30, 1969

A Goodly Land

A publication of the General Electric Co.'s Research and Development Center here recently printed an article with the above title. Because we feel the article is the best description of Schenectady we have read, we reprint it here without further comment.

"Variety is the word for the environment of Schenectady and the kind of life possible to its residents. The weather is temperate but changeable. Prevailing winds don't prevail very long. The seasons are distinct: summers hot; winters cold and snowy enough for excellent local skiing; springs with everything in blossom, including boys and girls on skateboards; autumns brilliant, with foliage to match a New England postcard.

"The city — which now has a population of over 80,000 — was settled in the 17th century by the Dutch, and its long history is recalled in many Dutch and Indian place names. A downtown area called "the Stockade," which was burned in 1690 by French and Indian raiders, is now a residential neighborhood of narrow, shady streets and old houses lovingly restored.

"The city's neighborhoods include everything from slum areas (fast shrinking under the impetus of urban renewal) to middle-class flats and houses, housing developments and apartment projects, and the neatly trimmed lawns of suburbia, with the ride-around lawn mower circling the pool. Good roads enable thousands to live in the surrounding countryside only a few minutes from their job in the city.

"Sound education is a tradition. Public schools of the city and suburbs win high ratings for progressive curricula and pupil achievement. Seven colleges, three graduate schools, and two junior colleges are within a 25-mile radius.

"Cultural facilities include a museum, many art classes and shows, a semi-professional symphony orchestra, a light opera company, and a little theater group that has thrived for 40 years. Touring musical and dramatic attractions visit regularly. Summer theaters abound. The Saratoga Performing Arts Center — summer home of the New York City Ballet and Philadelphia Orchestra — is only 22 miles away, the Berkshire Music Festival (Tanglewood) only 45 miles away, a pleasant drive after work on a summer's evening.

As Dutch patroon Arendt Van Curler put it 300 years ago: Schenectady is a 'faire and goodly land, well fit for the homes and works of man.'"

Lots of Music Left in Them Thar Hills

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

There's plenty of music still echoing among the hills of New England in August, some of it close to convenient expressways, some tucked away on rugged side-roads.

Closest to home are the peppy Family Concerts of band music at Green Hill Park on Sunday afternoons.

Or, as a contrast, one might plan a vacation trip well beyond the limits of New England, to the muisc-laden "Man and His World" exposition at Montreal, or the splendid new National Arts Center in Ottawa, where Marlene Dietrich appears in person Aug. 4-10 in connection with a festival of her films, and a Canadian revue, "Love and Maple Syrup," making use of revolutionary new techniques, is presently nightly (except Mondays) following its success in London.

Speedways, and a couple of hours of brisk driving beyond Pittsfield, will bring one to the Saratoga Performing Arts Center at Saratoga Springs, N.Y., where the big half of the summer is just starting.

The New York City Ballet has finished its month at Saratoga, but pairs of programs by three other dance companies are scheduled for the first three weekends of August.

Saratoga Concerts

The Philadelphia Orchestra opened its Saratoga season July 30, with William Smith conducting a student matinee. Eugene Ormandy's conducting began July 31, and continues on Aug. 9, 10, 13, 14, 16, 22 and 24. Arthur Fiedler conducts a "Pops" program Aug. 23. Other guest conductors: Istvan Kertesz, Andre Kostelanetz, Daniel Barenboim, Andre Previn, Franz Allers, Julius Rudel. There are soloists galore, also many one-night added events of a popular nature.

In the Berkshires, Jacob's Pillow continues its 10-week season through Aug. 30, with Center Ballet of Buffalo making its local debut Aug. 5-10.

Tanglewood's Boston Symphony major concerts and Berkshire Music Center presentations are presented through Aug. 24, and Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Boston "Pops" on Aug.5, 30 and 31.

Chamber Music

Chamber music is to be found in such centers as the Yale Concerts in Norfolk, Conn. (up to Aug. 23) also Music Mountain at Falls Village, Conn. (up to Aug. 30) and spots nearer Pittsfield.

The famed music festival (Rudolf Serkin and Pablo Casals) at Marlboro, Vermont offers concerts through Aug. 15.

New Hampshire Music Festival, at towns around Lake Winnepesaukee, extends through Aug. 10.

Dartmouth College's Congregation of the Arts at Hopkins Center, Hanover, N.H., finds Roberto Gerhard of Spain in residence for two weeks from Aug. 11 to 23.

Brilliant programs by Dartmouth Festival Orchestra, featuring much contemporary music, are led by Mario di Bonaventura.

Aug. 24-30 brings the Institute of Church Music at Colby College, Waterville, Maine.

City Organist

Philip Beaudry, formerly of Worcester, will play the famous old Boston organ in Methuen Memorial Music Hall on Aug. 27.

New England Conservatory of Music presents summer programs at Castle Hill is Ipswich on Aug. 15-16, Sept. 5-6 and Oct. 10.

Musical comedies and operettas are not included in Carousel Theater's season at Framingham this year, but they may be had in profusion at "music tents" on the North and South Shores, Cape Cod, and at Storrowtown Village on the Eastern States Exposition grounds in West Springfield.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 2 1969 New England

As I Hear It

Country Newspaper

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

IT IS THE normal province of big city journals and periodicals to report the many artistic and cultural events which naturally gravitate to their areas. But not all incidents of historical importance take place in metropolises.

The residences of high ranking ecclesiastics and of members of small ruling families often gave small towns in Europe an importance their size did not warrant. Among those dignitaries of both estates were some with strong interests in the arts.

Even during the middle ages and the Renaissance, Salzburg, standing at the crossroads of the great European trade routes, played an important part in the history of music. Yet, from the beginning of the 19th century until 1870, it lived only on the greatness of its past, highlighted by the memories of Haydn, Leopold and Wolfgang Mozart. That year saw the establishment of the international foundation of the Mozarteum, and opened a period of intensified artistic activity.

The Weimar to which Charles Augustus invited Goethe in 1782 was a small town distinguished by the presence of an enlightened ruler. The Bayreuth to which Ludwig II invited Wagner in 1872 was also a small town with a ruler of more than ordinary cultural vision. For their respective reasons, each of these communities became a mecca of scholars and artists from the entire culturally sophisticated world. Even now these cities have populations of only about forty thousand.

* * * *

IN 1918, Pittsfield, the shire town of Berkshire, had a population of about 41,000. Its newspaper had then been in continuous daily publication since 1892. The county had long been the summer home of wealthy and important families from the large cities of the Eastern seaboard. In the era preceding World War I, the estates required the services of gardeners and domestics of all ranks. Yet, few households retained persons of cultural talents. Only one engaged a musician to play the pipe organ built into the vaulted halls of the mansion. The owner of another estate, a wealthy widow, had an interior decorator on her staff whom she later married.

In the last year of World War I, a wealthy musician came to Pittsfield because of the poor health of her husband. She was born and bred in Chicago, had even played the Schumann Piano Concerto with an orchestra under Theodore Thomas at the World Exposition of 1893. She soon brought to Pittsfield four musicians from the Chicago orchestra and formed a string quartet for her personal pleasure. She promptly expanded her interest in chamber music and generously proceeded to share her enjoyment with all others in the vicinity.

* * * *

THE ESTABLISHMENT of a musical colony with adequate residences for the artists and a concert hall of ideal size on South Mountain brought Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge to the attention of the whole musical world. Her imaginative and aggressive plans concentrated on chamber music and made her the most admired and respected musical philanthropist of her day. Others may have devoted larger sums for buildings or to organizations, but Mrs. Coolidge became personally involved, applied her whole time, resources and knowledge.

When the Congress of the United States accepted her offer to build and endow a chamber music auditorium in a courtyard of the Library of Congress in Washington, she extended the scope of opportunities for composers and performers to a degree which had not existed. The list of chamber ensembles she favored, in this country and in Europe, is a nonpareil roster. During her lifetime she commissioned much of the chamber music of quality written at the time. The list includes Bartok, Copland, Ravel, Schoenberg and Stravinsky.

It was the privilege of this small-town newspaper to observe and chronicle the establishment and growth of this unique institution in international music history.

* * * *

IN 1934 a group of summer residents—they were more often called "cottagers" (and what cottages!)—put into action what had probably started as a tea-party rumination. "Why not have some symphony concerts in the Berkshires!" The New York Philharmonic would be finishing its Stadium series in mid-August and Henry Hadley, an assistant conductor of the orchestra and a composer of stature, was available. "Music under the moon" was romantic. But two evening hours under the August heavens in the Berkshires was not the most desirable circumstance under which to hear music. (The orchestra sat under a protecting shell.) After two exciting but not very extraordinary short seasons, poor Hadley died.

What to do? Someone suggested inviting the Boston Symphony. The majority of the festival committee was sure of the answer. But to its astonishment and jubilation the orchestra and Koussevitzky accepted. The first four years, the BSO played under tents erected on various estates. In 1937, a cloudburst occurred during the "Ride of the Valkyries." Koussevitzky declared an ultimatum. "A permanent roof or no music!"

* * * *

THE CAMPAIGN to raise the necessary money and the erection of the great Shed were accomplished in jig time. The 1938 Festival was played under solid and secure protection for the first time. Its growth and expansion are common knowledge. The unique feature of Tanglewood, the estate which was finally donated to the BSO, was that the entire orchestra, with all its principals and its permanent conductor, came to play programs of seriousness that equaled those of their winter concerts in Symphony Hall.

The establishment of the Berkshire Music Center was the achievement of a dream Koussevitzky had long nourished. The invitation to Aaron Copland to head the "Academy," as Koussevitzky liked to call it, and to Boris Goldovsky to head the opera department launched the Music Center. Thus Tanglewood became a pioneer and leader in musical pursuits.

This enterprise, too, was a venture which this small-town newspaper was privileged to observe and report. Truly the mountains came to Mahomet.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 9 1969 New England

Conductor had everything but a red cape

By ROBERT S. VAN FLEET
Ottaway News Service

SARATOGA, N.Y. — A good conductor of a symphony is like a Hemingway fighter of bulls. He has grace. He has power. Precision.

And I suppose an aficionado of the bulls would add sensitivity.

This comparison, while undoubtedly not new, occurred to me last weekend as Daniel Barenboim conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra at the breathtakingly lovely Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

The young conductor, 24, and his cellist wife are a rage of the current summer season, both at Tanglewood in Massachusetts and at Saratoga.

He certainly has grace and power and precision and sensitivity. It is easy to think of him as a new Leonard Bernstein.

The Saratoga "festival" is now in its fourth season. The center, located in the state park at Saratoga Springs just off Interstate Route 87, is 30 minutes (at 62 miles an hour) north of Albany.

The setting for the summer fare of ballet and symphony (and a little pop and rock) is as near perfect as the millions of dollars contributed by the State of New York, the Rockefellers and other benefactors can make it.

While Tanglewood is rich in tradition and maturity, Saratoga is lush and bright and efficient. The covered pavilion, open on two sides and the back, seats more than 5,000. The lawns around it have room for another 15,000.

The unusual character of the place is the bowl-like terrain that allows even those sitting on the grass at $2 to see the stage.

Thus, they have a view of the dance during July when the New York City Ballet takes up summer residence and the orchestra during August when the Philadelphia and Eugene Ormandy come to town.

But the excitement of the evening was Barenboim. A remarkable pianist, he conducted from the piano (mainly with jerks and nods of his head) as he and two other soloists and a small portion of the orchestra played a Brandenburg Concerto by Bach.

Then he took the full orchestra through Schubert's Fifth Symphony and finally, gloriously, through the Second Symphony by Brahms.

A symphony conductor is fascinating because he is an example of the pure exercise of power. When he tells a whole 33-member violin section to shush, they just better well shush.

When he isometrically strains a harmony from the brasses and woodwinds, the sound is almost visible.

As for the bullfighter comparison, Barenboim at times stamped on the beat, he snapped is heels together like a military man coming to attention, and he even drew his arm back to sight down along the baton at the brasses.

During the Schubert, I thought he probably doesn't have the flamboyance of a Bernstein, but decided I was wrong when he got to Brahms. Of course, there's nothing very gung-ho about Schubert.

STANDARD TIMES
HYANNIS, MASS.
(E) 22,520 (S) 14,72[illegible]

AUG 17 1969 New England Newsclip

Notes and Footnotes

FRANKLY, WHEN we heard that a chap at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood played tunes on his skull, we were skeptical. However, after brooding over it awhile, we went to Tanglewood and made some discreet inquiries at the Music Center office in the main house. The girl at the desk wasn't in the least surprised at our inquiry.

She looked into the next room, asked if Sam was there. He was, and in no time we met Sam Brylawski of Washington, D.C., who could, indeed, play a tune on his skull. He showed us. It rather shook us up.

Sam is a tall, lean young man, and when he makes music he first clenches his fists. Then he forms his mouth into an "O" and starts pounding the top of his head ruthlessly. He varies the shape of his mouth and the tempo of his beating fists to produce tunes which emerge from his lips in a sort of hollow popping manner. He started with the "William Tell Overture." It was unmistakeable. We cringed.

"It doesn't hurt at all," he assured us, adding that he has a two-octave scale in his skull. "I can play anything I can hum," he added, and said he became aware of his talent three years ago. "It also works through my teeth, jaws and nose, but I prefer using my head." He has appeared on a Baltimore television station, on radio, and has played before audiences, when it has to be amplified. "It has a marimba ring over a mike," he told us.

Sam asked us for a request number, and we picked "Get Me to the Church on Time" from "My Fair Lady." He hammered it out readily. For orthodox music, he plays the trumpet, but not as a Music Center student. He works in the Center office.

Before playing for any length of time, Sam says he has to limber up his wrists, rather like a violinist tuning up. When his hair is wet, he finds the tunes aren't so good. "It cushions the sound," said he.

Sam is on the watch for new music that lends itself to head-playing, and even hopes some young musician may compose some for him. It's certainly a new field.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 19 1969

28

DAILY RECORD
MORRISTOWN, N. J.
D. 36,915
AUG 12 1969

There's Culture In The Country

By DORIANNE PERRUCCI

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is the country's oldest leading music festival. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays 24 concerts in the famed 6,000 seat Music Shed each Friday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for eight weeks in Lee, Mass.

There are weekend preludes and open rehearsals, Boston Pops concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala on Aug. 19 and Berkshire Music Center programs including the non-classical Tuesday "Trends" series.

The 1969 Festival closes with Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert as music director of the Boston Symphony for which he has chosen Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by the magnificent Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz. Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, Justino Diaz, the Berkshire Chorus, and the Tanglewood Choir will sing.

The weekend preludes at 7 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, present guest artists and members of the Orchestra in short recitals. Open rehearsals in the Shed each Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. offer an insight into the Orchestra members, its conductors, and soloists.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's unique summer academy for advanced musical study, gives public performances nearly every day. The second week of the Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, Chicago, will be held Aug. 11-17.

Programs run the gamut of contemporary classics and new music in an enormous range of forms, styles, and techniques. The Contemporary Trends Concerts will bring the Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show, on August 12.

August 15
Weekend Prelude, 7 p.m.
Boston Symphony Chamber Players
Leinsdorf
Beethoven Program
"Pastoral" Symphony
"Eroica" Symphony

August 16
Open Rehearsal, 10:30 a.m.
Rudolf
Haydn: Symphony No. 91
Bartok: Dance Suite
Tchaikovsky: "Pathetique" Symphony

August 17
Lewis
Berlioz: "Corsaire" Overture
Berlioz: Nuits d'ete
Mozart: Parto, parto from "La clemenza di Tito" K.621
Rossini: Cruda sorte from "L'Italiana in Algieri"
Horen
Tchaikovsky: Francesca da Rimini

BERKSHIRE THEATRE
FESTIVAL
(Stockbridge)

"ENCOUNTERS"
"THE MUSICAL CELEBRATION"

An exploration of the psychological levels of the story of Romeo and Juliet, through music and movement. A kinetic musical score from rock to lyrical writing bombards piano, guitar, harpsichord, harp, and percussion. "ENCOUNTERS" will take all the musical elements of comedy, choreography, words, and music, and weld them into one entity. Four musicians play onstage throughout the evening. Aug. 13-30.

director
LARRY ARIC
authors
WALLY HARPER AND PAUL ZAKRZEWSKI

WORKSHOP PROJECTS

Six experimental workshop units varying in size, scope and intention, perform throughout the summer in newly redone spaces of the theatre barn and the Homestead Inn. The Walrus Stage, a resident group of actors, directors, and playwrights headed by Gordon Rogoff, present a series of workshop evenings in association with the Smith College Drama Department.

PIXIE JUDY MUSICAL THEATRE FOR CHILDREN

At the playhouse August 18, 11 a.m. and 2 p.m.

JACOB'S PILLOW DANCE FESTIVAL

VIII

A two-part program of Ballet and African ethnic dance is planned by JOHN CHRISTIAN, executive director of the Festival Aug. 12-16. Six dancers of the American Ballet Theatre, Cynthia Gregory, Ivan Nagy, Michael Smuin, Alexandria Radius, Han Ebbelaar and Zhandra Rodriguez, will stage five varied selections of ballet under the direction of Michael Smuin. Two works will premiere, "Five Sketches," and "Adagio from Gartenfest." The Afro-American Dance Ensemble directed by Arthur Hall returns to Jacob's Pillow after its explosive first appearance last year. The Ensemble is a unique group of young Afro-Americans who attempt to identify the American black man with his African heritage through dance. Their motivation is racial pride.

IX

John Christian presents the American Dance Company under the direction of Richard Englund and the Jacob's Pillow Dancers in the world premiere of "Homage," choreographed by Norman Walker in a two-part program. "Homage" has five sections: "Fugue"; "Ritual"; "Dresden Duet"; "Parking Please"; and "Rock."

X

In the last week of the festival, Patricia McBride and Edward Villella, lauded duo of the New York City Ballet; Nala Najan, master of the Hindu dance, and Anuradha; and the Jacob's Pillow Dancers in the premiere of a new work choreographed by Nala Najan will dance in an ebullient close to the season. Lectures by P.W. Mancester ("The History and Development of the Royal Ballet," Aug. 17), and ethnic dancer Matteo ("Your World of Dance," Aug. 24), will be featured in the last two evenings of dance appreciation at 8:30 p.m.

TURN TO TODAYS CLASSIFIED AUTOMOTIVE PAGES FOR TREMENDOUS BUYS ON NEW AND USED CARS.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
AUG 13 1969
New England Newsclip

Biggest Festival of Them All

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

ROCHESTER, Mich. — Among America's summer music festivals, which one offers the most extensive program of classical music? Tanglewood? Saratoga? Guess again.

In this college community, about 25 miles from Detroit, Meadow Brook Music Festival at Oakland University has presented symphonic concerts since July 3 and will continue through Aug. 31 at the rate of four per week, usually to audiences of between 4,000 and 8,000. The only interruption in the nine-week season was from Aug. 5 to Aug. 10, when the American Ballet became the main performer.

The impressive total is 38 major events, 32 concerts and six ballet programs. Of the concerts, 28 are given by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra under Sixten Ehrling, Roger Wagner, Henry Lewis and Julius Rudel.

The last four concerts (an innovation this year) are by the New York Philharmonic under Karel Ancerl and Seiji Ozawa.

The ballet programs use the Detroit Symphony Orchestra as accompaniment.

Impressive Soloists

The impressive list of soloists includes pianists Cliburn, Ashkenazy, Watts, Janis, sopranos Schwarzkopf and Horne, violinists Rabin and Perlman, and many others.

This "marvelous mushroom" sprang up in 1964, its plans spearheaded by representatives of the automotive industry, in cooperation with Oakland University and Kresge Foundation.

The story of the University, founded in 1957, is in itself one of marvelous growth, from 570 students in 1959 to nearly 6,000 this fall.

Both the university and the festival have received important gifts of land and money from public-spirited individuals. Also, the Kresge Foundation contributed $76,000 to the festival in 1964, $50,000 in 1965 and $500,000 in 1969, for all building extensions or improvements.

The Howard C. Baldwin Pavilion, seating 2,138, was named in memory of that civic leader and foundation trustee.

Lawns adjoining the pavilion are suited for audiences up to 6,000.

150,000 a Year

The festival has been drawing about 150,000 each year.

James D. Hicks, previously assistant manager of the Detroit Symphony, became Meadow Brook's manager in 1964, and this fall moves on to manage the Louisville Symphony Orchestra. He has worked with Chancellor D. B. Varner of the University, and with each year's chairmen and committees.

1969 festival chairmen are Mr. and Mrs. Marvin L. Katke. Katke is an executive of Ford Motor Co.

Prices for festival concerts are extremely low, $4 in the pavilion, $3 in the pit and $2.50 on the lawn.

Such schedules are made possible by more than 30 major donors, over 400 contributing sponsors, and by advertising space sold in the 160-page free program book.

Like several other major American summer festivals, Meadow Brook has its own school of music. The 93-piece orchestra of students and faculty members is brought to an exciting degree of virtuosity by James Levine, assistant conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. Choral programs, chamber music and master classes involve nationally known leaders and performers.

Imagine Tanglewood moved as close to Boston as Westboro, and located in one of New England's college towns, and you have some idea of the freshness and spontaneity Meadow Brook has brought to the immense and music-loving Detroit area.

VISITOR'S GUIDEPOST
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 15 1969
New England Newsclip

music

Fort Mudge Memorial Dump — Works it out on the steps of the new City Hall, August 1 at noon. One City Hall Square, Boston.

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends — Rock music rocks the Berkshires. August 12 Bill Graham presents the Fillmore North-cast; Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King and The Who, enhanced by the Joshua Light Show. Tickets through the box office (Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240) go from $4 to $6.50 but you can sit on the lawn for $3. More information at (413) 637-1600.

Tanglewood — The summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a 210-acre estate set in the rolling hills of the Berkshires in western Massachusetts. Erich Leinsdorf conducts "the aristocrat of orchestras" Friday evenings at 9, Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30. Guest conductors and soloists appear throughout the season. A brochure with complete concert and ticket information is available from the Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, 02115.

Esplanade Concerts — Take a turn for the military with a series of Wednesday night performances by the gentlemen of the Coast Guard, Fort Devens, Boston's First Naval District and the Air Force. All performances begin 8 pm at the Hatch Shell unless interrupted by counter-concerts or a national emergency.

The Carousel Theatre — Welcomes the Temptations and Gladys Knight and the Pips thru August 2. Make reservations at 872-3577.

Hammond Museum — Takes advantage of its extraordinary acoustics and presents an organ concert by Virgil Fox on August 6. Kenneth Wilson's Summer Pops take up residence thru August, and perform every Friday at 8:30 pm. Phone in advance reservations at 283-2080. Located off Hesperus Avenue in Gloucester.

Freedom Trail Organ Concerts— R. Rice Nutting kindly performs Sundays at 6:45 pm and Wednesdays at 12:10 pm on the Emanee Electric thru August 3. It's free

28

DAILY RECORD
MORRISTOWN, N. J.
D. 36,915

AUG 12 1969

There's Culture In The Country

By DORIANNE PERRUCCI

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood is the country's oldest leading music festival. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays 24 concerts in the famed 6,000 seat Music Shed each Friday and Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon for eight weeks in Lee, Mass.

There are weekend preludes and open rehearsals, Boston Pops concerts conducted by Arthur Fiedler, the Tanglewood-on-Parade Gala on Aug. 19 and Berkshire Music Center programs including the non-classical Tuesday "Trends" series.

The 1969 Festival closes with Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert as music director of the Boston Symphony for which he has chosen Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, preceded by the magnificent Royal Hunt and Storm from "The Trojans" by Berlioz. Beverly Sills, Florence Kopleff, John Alexander, Justino Diaz, the Berkshire Chorus, and the Tanglewood Choir will sing.

The weekend preludes at 7 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, present guest artists and members of the Orchestra in short recitals. Open rehearsals in the Shed each Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. offer an insight into the Orchestra members, its conductors, and soloists.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's unique summer academy for advanced musical study, gives public performances nearly every day. The second week of the Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, Chicago, will be held Aug. 11-17.

Programs run the gamut of contemporary classics and new music in an enormous range of forms, styles, and techniques. The Contemporary Trends Concerts will bring the Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show, on August 12.

August 15
Weekend Prelude, 7 p.m.
Boston Symphony Chamber Players
Leinsdorf
Beethoven Program
"Pastoral" Symphony
"Eroica" Symphony

August 16
Open Rehearsal, 10:30 a.m.
Rudolf
Haydn: Symphony No. 91
Bartok: Dance Suite
Tchaikovsky: "Pathetique" Symphony

August 17
Lewis
Berlioz: "Corsaire" Overture
Berlioz: Nuits d'ete
Mozart: Parto, parto from "La clemenza di Tito" K.621
Rossini: Cruda sorte from "L'Italiana in Algieri"
Horen
Tchaikovsky: Francesca da Rimini

BERKSHIRE THEATRE
FESTIVAL
(Stockbridge)

"ENCOUNTERS"
"THE MUSICAL CELEBRATION"

An exploration of the psychological levels of the story of Romeo and Juliet, through music and movement. A kinetic musical score from rock to lyrical writing bombards piano, guitar, harpsichord, harp, and percussion. "ENCOUNTERS" will take all the musical elements of comedy, choreography, words, and music, and weld them into one entity. Four musicians play onstage throughout the evening. Aug. 13-30.

director
LARRY ARIC
authors
WALLY HARPER AND PAUL ZAKRZEWSKI

WORKSHOP PROJECTS

Six experimental workshop units varying in size, scope and intention, perform throughout the summer in newly redone spaces of the theatre barn and the Homestead Inn. The Walrus Stage, a resident group of actors, directors, and playwrights headed by Gordon Rogoff, present a series of workshop evenings in association with the Smith College Drama Department.

PIXIE JUDY MUSICAL THEATRE FOR CHILDREN

At the playhouse August 18, 11 a.m. and 2 p.m.

JACOB'S PILLOW
DANCE FESTIVAL
VIII

A two-part program of Ballet and African ethnic dance is planned by JOHN CHRISTIAN, executive director of the Festival Aug. 12-16. Six dancers of the American Ballet Theatre, Cynthia Gregory, Ivan Nagy, Michael Smuin, Alexandria Radius, Han Ebbelaar and Zhandra Rodriguez, will stage five varied selections of ballet under the direction of Michael Smuin. Two works will premiere, "Five Sketches," and "Adagio from Gartenfest." The Afro-American Dance Ensemble directed by Arthur Hall returns to Jacob's Pillow after its explosive first appearance last year. The Ensemble is a unique group of young Afro-Americans who attempt to identify the American black man with his African heritage through dance. Their motivation is racial pride.

IX

John Christian presents the American Dance Company under the direction of Richard Englund and the Jacob's Pillow Dancers in the world premiere of "Homage," choreographed by Norman Walker in a two-part program. "Homage" has five sections: "Fugue"; "Ritual"; "Dresden Duet"; "Parking Please"; and "Rock."

X

In the last week of the festival, Patricia McBride and Edward Villella, lauded duo of the New York City Ballet; Nala Najan, master of the Hindu dance, and Anuradha; and the Jacob's Pillow Dancers in the premiere of a new work choreographed by Nala Najan will dance in an ebullient close to the season. Lectures by P.W. Mancester ("The History and Development of the Royal Ballet," Aug. 17), and ethnic dancer Matteo ("Your World of Dance," Aug. 24), will be featured in the last two evenings of dance appreciation at 8:30 p.m.

TURN TO TODAYS CLASSIFIED AUTOMOTIVE PAGES FOR TREMENDOUS BUYS ON NEW AND USED CARS.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 13 1969 New England Newsclip

Biggest Festival of Them All

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

ROCHESTER, Mich. — Among America's summer music festivals, which one offers the most extensive program of classical music? Tanglewood? Saratoga? Guess again.

In this college community, about 25 miles from Detroit, Meadow Brook Music Festival at Oakland University has presented symphonic concerts since July 3 and will continue through Aug. 31 at the rate of four per week, usually to audiences of between 4,000 and 8,000. The only interruption in the nine-week season was from Aug. 5 to Aug. 10, when the American Ballet became the main performer.

The impressive total is 38 major events, 32 concerts and six ballet programs. Of the concerts, 28 are given by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra under Sixten Ehrling, Roger Wagner, Henry Lewis and Julius Rudel.

The last four concerts (an innovation this year) are by the New York Philharmonic under Karel Ancerl and Seiji Ozawa.

The ballet programs use the Detroit Symphony Orchestra as accompaniment.

Impressive Soloists

The impressive list of soloists includes pianists Cliburn, Ashkenazy, Watts, Janis, sopranos Schwarzkopf and Horne, violinists Rabin and Perlman, and many others.

This "marvelous mushroom" sprang up in 1964, its plans spearheaded by representatives of the automotive industry, in cooperation with Oakland University and Kresge Foundation.

The story of the University, founded in 1957, is in itself one of marvelous growth, from 570 students in 1959 to nearly 6,000 this fall.

Both the university and the festival have received important gifts of land and money from public-spirited individuals. Also, the Kresge Foundation contributed $76,000 to the festival in 1964, $50,000 in 1965 and $500,000 in 1969, for all building extensions or improvements.

The Howard C. Baldwin Pavilion, seating 2,138, was named in memory of that civic leader and foundation trustee.

Lawns adjoining the pavilion are suited for audiences up to 6,000.

150,000 a Year

The festival has been drawing about 150,000 each year.

James D. Hicks, previously assistant manager of the Detroit Symphony, became Meadow Brook's manager in 1964, and this fall moves on to manage the Louisville Symphony Orchestra. He has worked with Chancellor D. B. Varner of the University, and with each year's chairmen and committees.

1969 festival chairmen are Mr. and Mrs. Marvin L. Katke. Katke is an executive of Ford Motor Co.

Prices for festival concerts are extremely low, $4 in the pavilion, $3 in the pit and $2.50 on the lawn.

Such schedules are made possible by more than 30 major donors, over 400 contributing sponsors, and by advertising space sold in the 160-page free program book.

Like several other major American summer festivals, Meadow Brook has its own school of music. The 93-piece orchestra of students and faculty members is brought to an exciting degree of virtuosity by James Levine, assistant conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra. Choral programs, chamber music and master classes involve nationally known leaders and performers.

Imagine Tanglewood moved as close to Boston as Westboro, and located in one of New England's college towns, and you have some idea of the freshness and spontaneity Meadow Brook has brought to the immense and music-loving Detroit area.

VISITOR'S GUIDEPOST
BOSTON, MASS.

AUG 15 1969 New England Newsclip

music

Fort Mudge Memorial Dump — Works it out on the steps of the new City Hall, August 1 at noon. One City Hall Square, Boston.

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends — Rock music rocks the Berkshires. August 12 Bill Graham presents the Fillmore North-cast: Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King and The Who, enhanced by the Joshua Light Show. Tickets through the box office (Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240) go from $4 to $6.50 but you can sit on the lawn for $3. More information at (413) 637-1600.

Tanglewood — The summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a 210-acre estate set in the rolling hills of the Berkshires in western Massachusetts. Erich Leinsdorf conducts "the aristocrat of orchestras" Friday evenings at 9, Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30. Guest conductors and soloists appear throughout the season. A brochure with complete concert and ticket information is available from the Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, 02115.

Esplanade Concerts — Take a turn for the military with a series of Wednesday night performances by the gentlemen of the Coast Guard, Fort Devens, Boston's First Naval District and the Air Force. All performances begin 8 pm at the Hatch Shell unless interrupted by counter-concerts or a national emergency.

The Carousel Theatre — Welcomes the Temptations and Gladys Knight and the Pips thru August 2. Make reservations at 872-3577.

Hammond Museum — Takes advantage of its extraordinary acoustics and presents an organ concert by Virgil Fox on August 6. Kenneth Wilson's Summer Pops take up residence thru August, and perform every Friday at 8:30 pm. Phone in advance reservations at 283-2080. Located off Hesperus Avenue in Gloucester.

Freedom Trail Organ Concerts— R. Rice Nutting kindly performs Sundays at 6:45 pm and Wednesdays at 12:10 pm on the Emance Electric thru August 3. It's free

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

THIS WEEK AT THE
BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL
Tanglewood
LENOX, MASS.

TODAY,
SUNDAY, AUGUST 17
2:30 SHED
HENRY LEWIS conductor
MARILYN HORNE soprano
Berlioz: 'Le Corsaire' Overture
Nuits d'ete
Mozart: Parto, parto from 'The Clemency of Tito'
Rossini: Cruda sorte from 'The Italien girl in Algeria'
Tchaikovsky: Francesca da Rimini

FRIDAY, AUGUST 22
7 pm SHED
WEEKEND PRELUDE
BEVERLY SILLS soprano
CHARLES WILSON pianist
Music by Handel, Strauss, Schubert and Rossini
9 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
MILTON KATIMS conductor
Rossini: 'La Gazza Ladra'
Tchaikovsky: Symphony no. 4
Vaughn Williams: Fantasia on a theme of Thomas Tallis
Ravel: 'Daphnis and Chloe' suite no. 2

SATURDAY, AUGUST 23
10:30 am SHED
BSO–Open Rehearsal
8 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
MALCOLM FRAGER pianist
Varese: Deserts
Beethoven: Piano concerto no. 4
Stravinsky: Firebird suite

SUNDAY, AUGUST 24
2:30 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Berlioz: Royal hunt and storm from 'Les Troyens'
Beethoven: Symphony no. 9
BEVERLY SILLS, FLORENCE KOPLEFF, JOHN ALEXANDER, JUSTINO DIAZ, TANGLEWOOD CHOIR, BERKSHIRE CHORUS

Tickets: $3.50, 4.50, 5.50, 6.50, 7, 7.50, 8 and $8.50 (Box seat. Box contains 6 chairs. Special parking provided.)
Ticket to Friday concert includes admission to Weekend Prelude.
Admission to lawn: $3 (available day of concert.)
Open Rehearsal: $2.50 (Unreserved, available day of concert.)
All children regardless of age must have tickets.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER

The Festival of Contemporary Music
TODAY,
SUNDAY, AUGUST 17
9 pm SHED
BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Berg: Wozzeck

MONDAY, AUGUST 18
9 pm THEATRE
COMPOSERS FORUM
Music by composers studying at BMC

TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE
AUGUST 19 SHED
from 2 pm
continuous programs by the BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER until ...
THE GALA CONCERT at 8 pm
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
guest conductors
CHARLES WILSON
GUNTHER SCHULLER narrator
SAM LEVENSON
Tickets: $4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 6 and $6.50 (Box seat)
Admission to lawn: $3
(Available 6 pm day of concert.)

THURSDAY, AUGUST 21
9 pm THEATRE
Vocal Concert-Opera Scenes

SATURDAY, AUGUST 23
2:30 pm THEATRE
BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA
Conducting Fellows

SUNDAY, AUGUST 24
10:30 pm THEATRE
Chamber Music

BOSTON POPS FESTIVAL ORCHESTRA
ARTHUR FIEDLER conductor
SATURDAY, AUGUST 30 at 8 pm
SUNDAY, AUGUST 31 at 2:30 pm
Tickets: $4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 6, Box seat $6.50

Programs subject to change.

For further ticket information:
TANGLEWOOD
LENOX, MASS. 01240
(413) 637-1600
Baldwin Piano RCA Records

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, AUGUST 17, 1969

MASSACHUSETTS

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL, Tanglewood, Lenox.

Today 2:30 p.m. — Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henry Lewis, conductor; Marilyn Horne soprano. Program: Berlioz, "Corsaire" Overture and "Nuits d'Ete;" Mozart," Parto, parto "from "The Clemency of Tito;" Rossini, "Cruda sorte" from "The Italian Girl in Algeria;" Tchaikovsky, "Francesea da Rimini."

Tues. 8 p.m. — Tanglewood-on-Parade: Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. Guest Conductors: Gunther Schuller, Charles Wilson. Narrator: Sam Leverson.

Fri. 7 p.m. — Weekend Prelude: Beverly Sills, soprano.

Fri. 9 p.m. — Boston Symphony Orchestra, Milton Katims conducting. Program: Rossini, "La Gazza Ladra," Overture; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4; Vaughan Williams, Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Taillis; Ravel, "Daphnis et Chloe" No. 2.

Sat. 10:30 a.m. — Boston Symphony Orchestra Open Rehearsal

Sat. 8 p.m. — Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Malcolm Frager, piano. Program: Varese. Deserts; Beethoven, Piano Concerto No. 4; Stravinsky, "Firebird" suite Next Sun. 2:30 p.m. — Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting (last concert of season).

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER, Tanglewood, Lenox. (Theater-Concert Hall unless otherwise noted).

Today 10 a.m. — Chamber Music

Today 9 p.m. — Festival of Contemporary Music: Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Program: Berg's Opera "Wozzeck" performed by Vocal Fellows (Shed)

Mon. 9 p.m. — Composers Forum — music by composers studying at Berkshire Music Center

Wed. 9 p.m. — Boston University Tanglewood Institute Concert

Thurs. 9 p.m. — Vocal Concert — Opera Scenes

Sat. 2:30 p.m. — Berkshire Music Center Conducting Fellows

Next Sun. 10 a.m. — Chamber Music

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, August 17, 1969

STATEN ISLAND ADVANCE
Sunday, August 17, 1969

New image for Aspen, Colo.

More than just music..

By LYNN SHERR

ASPEN, Colo. (AP) — Overhead, the wings of a giant tent undulate slowly in the warm summer wind.

On three sides, enormous mountains turn the valley into a land-locked island. Close by, delicate aspen trees rustle softly, their leaves shimmering silver and green in the bright sunlight.

A human finds music here: now in the peaceful sounds of nature; or now in the vibrant creations of man, as the orchestra under the tent reaches the crescendo of a Schumann symphony.

Some say this is the way man's music is meant to be heard: close to the sky, in counterpoint with the breeze. Thus, the summer music festivals: Tanglewood, in the Berkshires; Marlboro, in the Green Mountains; Newport, on the New England coast.

At Aspen, nearly 8,000 high in the Rocky Mo the summer festival than just serious m feeling, an atmos sive sense tha way of life.

Aspen makir is finable accent. "Rehearsals are more fun."

Settling into a bench warmed by the high morning sun, he talks about Aspen and its special mystique. "Primarily, this is an educational institution. Secondly, it is geared to professional musicians for high-level music-making.

"Every year, one looks forward to meeting people here," he explains. "There is a kind of close relationship here between teachers and pupils that leaves no dividing line. It is an unbelievably relaxed and casual atmosphere."

Part of the explanation i all performers teach; a ers perform. "Here ulty members ar bers of the a says. "Here ers by the century youth," he says. can't stand people who say ro is for the peons—it's for the pe ple, just like the troubad were. Without folk music, w have no Beethoven, no Hay no Bach. Where did music from? From the people."

LIKE

As for Aspen and t music: "Art is no speak to all t can't have in the fie sympho No er

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 19 1969 New England

Beverly Sills

. . . appears three times in the Boston Symphony's last festival week at Lenox, Mass.: tonight in "Tanglewood on Parade," Friday in weekend prelude recital, and Sunday afternoon as a soloist in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Tanglewood: something for almost everyone

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Last week Tanglewood offered a variety of things to a multiplicity of people.

After Monday's stunning performance by Berkshire Music Center forces, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, of Berg's "Wozzeck," which drew about 1,500, there was Tuesday's final Contemporary Trends concert, headlined by Jefferson Airplane, which broke a festival attendance record with 21,500, more or less. On Wednesday, Tanglewood's first full evening of dance was presented by members of the festival fellowship program with performers from the Boston University Institute and Indian Hill Summer Arts Workshop. On Thursday, another program in the festival of contemporary music presented three first performances out of five numbers. The weekend concerts by the Boston Symphony were directed by Mr. Leinsdorf, David Zinman, and Henry Lewis, with soprano Marilyn Horne as the Sunday afternoon soloist.

Bouquets and buffets

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was also playing host in and around Tanglewood from Monday through Thursday to the Music Critics Association, whose annual meeting had been arranged by Miles Kastendieck, its 1968-69 president. In a clock-spanning series of panels, symposia, demonstrations, and off-the-record social gatherings, critics from almost 50 United States publications learned more about their craft and one another, and were variously praised, blamed, advised, castigated, and consigned to oblivion by editors, performers, administrators, composers, educators, and their own colleagues.

In addition to the bouquets and the buffets (of both kinds), the critics were guests at other specially arranged events. Theodore Antoniou, a young Greek composer of talent and purpose, who is a Berkshire Center Fellow this summer, offered a taped performance of his "Events II," which was given a successful premiere in a Tanglewood contemporary music concert the previous week. The unlikely setting was the Nathaniel Hawthorne House studio overlooking Stockbridge Bowl, but the original owner could hardly have objected to the convincing exposition of his work given by Mr. Antoniou or the galvanic work itself, which, even in such close confines, was a strong musical statement of that conviction.

'You are there'

Close quarters, this time at the Lenox Club, brought together critics and their hosts, officials of the BSO and Acoustic Research, Inc., for a demonstration of four channel stereo broadcast techniques, in which WCRB, Waltham, and WGBH, Boston cooperated. Sounds, of the BSO and Boston Pops, from the dim past to the recent present, came at the auditors from one to four speakers at a time, with the hoped-for "yo are there" result. The new methods, whic will be used by the two stations to broad cast Saturday evening Symphony Hall con certs during the coming season, should b the next best thing to making it to the hall

Critics also had an intimate look at Bald win's "Electronic Concert Grand," whic had made its Tanglewood debut in July vi Earl Wild's performance of the Scharwenk Piano Concerto No. 1. On this occasion, th master of ceremonies was the Italian com poser, Luciano Berio, whose studies in com bining electronic sound with that of con ventional instruments are the basis of hi composition. With David Levine, a Wulsi Memorial Fellow, at the piano, and late Mr. Berio and a group of performing critics the harmonics, pedals (five instead o three), and amplifying properties of the in strument were examined and tested wit appropriate curiosity and amusement occa sioned by Baldwin's announced pianistic "kick into the 20th century."

Sympathetic ears

Another kick into the 20th century, the Festival of Contemporary Music, again drew its special audience to a concert on Aug. 14. Three first performances — Robert Lewis's Divertimento for Six Instruments, Phillip Rhodes's "Autumn Setting" for soprano and string quartet, and Edwin Dugger's Intermezzi—were offered to sympathetic ears, if not always comprehending ones on first hearing. Two works which had been done before—James Yannatos's intriguing "Suite for Six" and Mr. Berio's lengthy "Differences"— began the program, and reminded us that, thanks to the Berkshire Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation, contemporary music does have a chance to be heard not just once but even more often.

MASSACHUSETTS

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL., Tanglewood. Lenox.

Today 2:30 p.m. — Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. Program: Berlioz, Royal hunt and storm from "The Trojans"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 9, Beverly Sills, soprano; Florence Kopleff, contralto; John Alexander, tenor; Justino Diaz, bass; Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir.

Sat. 8 p.m. — Boston Pops Festival Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor; Eugene Indjic, pianist. Works by Tchaikovsky. Offenbach, Walteufel, Chabrier, Bach, Lennon-McCartney, Bart.

Next Sun. 2:30 p.m. — Boston Pops Festival Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor; Anthony Paratore, pianist. Works by Wagner, Rossini, Vaughan Williams, Offenbach, Gershwin, Lennon-McCartney, Webb.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, August 24, 1969

30.

INSIDE INFORMATION

Don't Give Up Hope Yet

By PHILIP R. SCHEIER

A SCANT FEW HOURS from this area is a wooded land of music and beauty which goes by the name of Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony at Lenox, Mass.

A visit there this past weekend confirmed earlier impressions that a day at Tanglewood is always a memorable musical expenrience. Of course it's the fine music by a fine orchestra, but it's more than that.

It's also the feeling of a shared experience either in the huge Music Shed, which seats some 6,000 or else sprawled out on the adjoining lawns, as the music comes flooding out of the band shell.

Listening to the music while sitting on the rolling green lawns is an eye opener for most first-time visitors. Here, couples, and entire families, have a musical picnic as they encamp on the grass, complete with food hampers, portable bars and lawn chairs and attend a concert . . . the easy way. But the evening concerts are only a small part of the daily programs, which also include special recitals during the day by various musical groups. All told, it makes for a fine weekend.

* * * *

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 8,900
AUG 26 1969

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
(E) 11,000
0-4
AUG 26 1969

EVE. NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
(E) 9,800
AUG 26 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
AUG 29 1969
New England Newsclip

NEWTON—On Sunday, Aug. 24, there were 43,000 people at Sutton to watch a golf match, 25,000 at Fenway for baseball, 5000 at Longwood for Tennis, and 4000 at Tanglewood for the B.S.O. Obviously these people were attracted by high level promotion of top grade talent. I never heard of a golf tournament offering top talent, that lost money. In season, when the B.S.O. is in summer concert, you're lucky to find a room close to Albany, N.Y. The professional talent that is palmed off by the Boston Red Sox and the Patriots, explains why the two teams anticipate a stadium to operate at a loss.

PETER G. DWYER

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
SEP 6 1969

As I Hear It

Study! Aim! Fire!

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

A YOUNG MAN entering medical school was asked if he planned to specialize on anything. He replied, "Yes, on the skin and its contents."

Another young man I know of applied for a job on a metropolitan newspaper. The person who interviewed him asked what he knew. The applicant cited his very recent college diploma. He was told "there are thousands like you." The applicant, instead of being dejected, as well as rejected, went straight to the Russian Institute at Columbia and enrolled.

* * * *

I AM AN AVID reader of obituaries, not at all for necrophilic reasons but because I am interested in careers. Men who study for professions naturally pursue them but lots of men, with academic records, start on one ploy, swerve or jump to another and finally land on ground high, dry and solid enough to warrant mention in the New York Times.

There is no assured path to success, unfortunately. Happily, the also-rans among us have plenty of company. There are two ingredients for an education. One must take Aim and then must stick to it with Fire in his spirit. In the early 19th century some men who attained eminence—such as Longfellow, Holmes, Edward Everett—went to Europe to specialize and complete their education. European youth made the "Grand Tour" of the continent. No matter which is the choice of vocation one must establish some historical benchmarks. The history of law, or medicine, or architecture, or literature requires familiarity with the profession's pioneers. There is a weaving process; the fabric of study must be as strong in the woof as in the warp; cause and effect are essential to learning; isolated facts and dates mean nothing; all study is interwoven.

MY MOTHER had a memory system which was better than the records at City Hall. She knew her circle and the whole community reliably. Mrs. Wolff's Norman was born the same week as her second daughter; Mrs. Newman's George the week after her first son. Such pertinence is requisite in all study. For instance, I always can remember when Columbus discovered America because it was the year Spain expelled all its Jews. I know when Pasteur was working on his investigation for the treatment of hydrophobia because Wagner was putting on Parsifal about the same time.

I know when certain monarchs ruled various countries because it was during their regimes that Bach, Mozart or Beethoven worked. For the same reason, I suppose, a student of electric engineering would have to learn about Faraday, Maxwell, Benjamin Franklin and Steinmetz; an aspiring medico would have to know about Pasteur, Welch, Osler and Virchow; and a legal probationer about Coke, Blackstone, Holmes and Brandeis.

* * * *

A TRUE SCHOLAR can never say to himself (nor to anyone else), "I am educated." Education is a never-ending process. No one of us would like to consult a lawyer whose knowledge ended with his sheepskin nor a doctor who practiced the methods in effect when he graduated from medical college. A musician who wrote in the formulas used by the masters who dominated the 18th and 19th centuries would find himself ridiculed or pitied. One old man who was asked why he devoted all his waking hours to study answered that he was "cramming for his finals."

One reads of this man or that who "read" law in the office of the town's leading jurist, or of the young man who got his medical training in an analogous way. The training of boys such as Mozart, Rossini and Mendelssohn was hardly more definitely pursued. All three impatiently jumped the tedious years of the alphabet and grammar and started in immediately writing music which has endured to this day. Today, however, even those who compose in what is called chance or indeterminate musical language write from full and basic knowledge. Fakers and charlatans in music are just not accepted.

* * * *

BOULEZ, who conducted this past month at Tanglewood, did not play any of his own music, and nothing of Stockhausen, Cage, Babitt or Carter was heard on any other program during the summer. Leinsdorf did play some Varese to bewildered, if tolerant, ears, but the challenges which current music proposes are supported by their creators with almost irrevocable logic and lucidity. The point is that no one can hope to delude the public very long and saturation in the vocation of one's choice is quintessential.

Years ago there appeared advertisements in national magazines with the headline, "They all laughed when I sat down at the piano." It was a solicitation of enrollment in a mail-order piano lesson course which promised that in a short time the student could play certain popular pieces acceptably. I never encountered any "graduate" of such a course, but since the ads kept appearing for several years, I assume there must have been an ample class of pupils. Bypassing in this instance the unfailing gullibility of the pubilc, it still is indisputable that learning for its own sake, beyond its potential of affording a possessor the means of earning a living, is a reward in its own right. The constant command should be: Study! Aim! Fire!

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000
AUG 30 1969

CUE REPORTS FROM

THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL

THE tallest Tanglewood tale is not one of those by Nathaniel Hawthorne. It is the story of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, which has just completed its thirty-second season on 210 magnificent acres the descendants of William Aspinwall Tappan (the original owner) gave to Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936. It was in a cottage restored and now plunked down on the edge of the Tappan estate that Hawthorne planned his Tales, but could even that master of imaginative manipulation have foreseen "the Tanglewood weekend"—a sylvan ritual of music, lawn, and meadow ringed abundantly by majestic trees and contained as if in a mammoth bowl by the Berkshire Mountains? No wonder this father-of-them-all festival, one on which most others are modeled, continues to thrive and expand.

In addition to the main Music Shed, which can seat 6037, the festival boasts a theatre used for both opera and concerts, a chamber music hall, and facilities used by the Boston Symphony's summer educational complex, the Berkshire Music Center. The extensive lawn picnics before, during, and after the concerts are by no means the least festive of the many aspects of Tanglewood. Small children and the elderly, the stylishly-attired and the earnest young music student, the tourist and the local resident—literally wining and dining by candlelight or munching on home cooking spilling from hampers—they all look relaxed, unselfconsciously posed, waiting for an American Manet to come along and paint them.

But the concerts were my principal business, and, with the weekend prelude on Friday, these got off to a damp start. The hounds of humidity bayed throughout the Berkshires, making everything and everyone vaporish, including some of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein, Burton Fine, Jules Eskin, Henry Portnoi) and pianist Gilbert Kalish, who were featured in the prelude. The briefer of Schubert's B flat major string trios sounded wan and lost, and the trout of Schubert's Trout Quintet, which followed, swam in tepid waters rather than in and out of the rapids and sparkling spray the composer wrote into his score.

At 9 p.m., conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Bostonians addressed themselves to Beethoven's Sixth and Third Symphonies, and the enervation vanished. These were noble, solid, sensible, and balanced readings which kept the large audience, prone to applaud between movements and at times almost within movements, rapt. Mr. Leinsdorf is leaving the Boston, but he leaves among the legacies his distinctive manner of shaping Beethoven. He also surprised me at times during the "Pastoral." He is not noted for histrionics, but therein he was mimetic. There's a dash of Marcel Marceau in Erich Leinsdorf.

On Saturday night, David Zinman took up the baton in the place of an indisposed Max Rudolf. This was my first opportunity to hear him conduct and so it was an occasion of special interest to me. A New Yorker by birth and only thirty-three years old, Mr. Zinman has already created a stir with the Boston and in Europe, where he leads the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. If the concert was merely intermittently arresting and often puzzling, it should be noted that this protégé of the late Pierre Monteux had inherited the bill, making one substitution of the Haydn Eighty-Third for another Haydn symphony. Mr. Zinman is a handsome, tall, and trim gentleman who initially lunged at the orchestra and Haydn as if he were a Prussian commander sprucing up the goose-step. It was leaden and wrong-headed Haydn, lacking wit, bite, or polish. Bartók's "Dance Suite" following was muddy and undifferentiated and clumsy. Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, the supercharged "Pathétique," provided a finale of fireworks. It was, in some ways, one of the most vulgar outpourings of the already-outpoured I have ever heard. It was also electrifying, just as it was the most intensely personal interpretation I heard all weekend. At one point, Mr. Zinman yelled out with passion, and he drew from the players a matching passion, especially from the unsurpassed brass section of the BSO. I began thinking of another young man who once excited speculation at Tanglewood, a Mr. Leonard Bernstein, and speculated for myself that all of us may be seeing a similar career burgeon for David Zinman in the seasons to come.

As I approached the grounds for the Saturday morning open rehearsal of the Sunday matinee, I was told that the crowd already assembled was unusually large. I had expected as much, for few Tanglewoodites would have to be told that Marilyn Horne and her conductor-husband, Henry Lewis, were likely to provide a memorable Sunday afternoon. At the rehearsal, Miss Horne was as uninhibited and informal as the Lewises' four-year-old daughter, Angela, who with impish delight watched her parents bring rehearsal auditors to their feet. Elegant in a red gown on Sunday, Miss Horne brought the entire applauding orchestra to its feet, something I've rarely witnessed. Well, it was a perfectly-rounded concert that deserved every moment of a long ovation. After a nimble "Le Corsaire" Overture by Berlioz, Mr. Lewis provided iridescent accompaniment for the composer's "Les nuits d'été" cycle and for Miss Horne. This was haunting, fragrant, subtle—another Horne triumph. With a Mozart and a Rossini aria, the soprano, as so often I've seen her do, literally ignited her listeners. But she did not have the last hurrah. Mr. Lewis did. Into Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," he inlaid sonority upon sonority until he was ready to reveal a shimmering intaglio. His, too, is a tremendous talent.

The arts enjoy a long summer's lease throughout this Massachusetts area, but in these halls of the Berkshire Mountains kings, Tanglewood is still the emperor.

—GREER JOHNSON

30.

INSIDE INFORMATION

Don't Give Up Hope Yet

By PHILIP R. SCHEIER

A SCANT FEW HOURS from this area is a wooded land of music and beauty which goes by the name of Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony at Lenox, Mass.

A visit there this past weekend confirmed earlier impressions that a day at Tanglewood is always a memorable musical expenrience. Of course it's the fine music by a fine orchestra, but it's more than that.

It's also the feeling of a shared experience either in the huge Music Shed, which seats some 6,000 or else sprawled out on the adjoining lawns, as the music comes flooding out of the band shell.

Listening to the music while sitting on the rolling green lawns is an eye opener for most first-time visitors. Here, couples, and entire families, have a musical picnic as they encamp on the grass, complete with food hampers, portable bars and lawn chairs and attend a concert . . . the easy way. But the evening concerts are only a small part of the daily programs, which also include special recitals during the day by various musical groups. All told, it makes for a fine weekend.

* * * *

MERCURY
MEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 8,900

AUG 26 1969

NEWS
MALDEN, MASS.
(E) 11,000

AUG 26 1969

EVE. NEWS
MELROSE, MASS.
(E) 9,800

AUG 26 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 29 1969

New England Newsclip

NEWTON—On Sunday, Aug. 24, there were 43,000 people at Sutton to watch a golf match, 25,000 at Fenway for baseball, 5000 at Longwood for Tennis, and 4000 at Tanglewood for the B.S.O. Obviously these people were attracted by high level promotion of top grade talent. I never heard of a golf tournament offering top talent, that lost money. In season, when the B.S.O. is in summer concert, you're lucky to find a room close to Albany, N.Y. The professional talent that is palmed off by the Boston Red Sox and the Patriots, explains why the two teams anticipate a stadium to operate at a loss.

PETER G. DWYER

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 6 1969

As I Hear It

Study! Aim! Fire!

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

A YOUNG MAN entering medical school was asked if he planned to specialize on anything. He replied, "Yes, on the skin and its contents."

Another young man I know of applied for a job on a metropolitan newspaper. The person who interviewed him asked what he knew. The applicant cited his very recent college diploma. He was told "there are thousands like you." The applicant, instead of being dejected, as well as rejected, went straight to the Russian Institute at Columbia and enrolled.

* * * *

I AM AN AVID reader of obituaries, not at all for necrophilic reasons but because I am interested in careers. Men who study for professions naturally pursue them but lots of men, with academic records, start on one ploy, swerve or jump to another and finally land on ground high, dry and solid enough to warrant mention in the New York Times.

There is no assured path to success, unfortunately. Happily, the also-rans among us have plenty of company. There are two ingredients for an education. One must take Aim and then must stick to it with Fire in his spirit. In the early 19th century some men who attained eminence—such as Longfellow, Holmes, Edward Everett—went to Europe to specialize and complete their education. European youth made the "Grand Tour" of the continent. No matter which is the choice of vocation one must establish some historical benchmarks. The history of law, or medicine, or architecture, or literature requires familiarity with the profession's pioneers. There is a weaving process; the fabric of study must be as strong in the woof as in the warp; cause and effect are essential to learning; isolated facts and dates mean nothing; all study is interwoven.

MY MOTHER had a memory system which was better than the records at City Hall. She knew her circle and the whole community reliably. Mrs. Wolff's Norman was born the same week as her second daughter; Mrs. Newman's George the week after her first son. Such pertinence is requisite in all study. For instance, I always can remember when Columbus discovered America because it was the year Spain expelled all its Jews. I know when Pasteur was working on his investigation for the treatment of hydrophobia because Wagner was putting on Parsifal about the same time.

I know when certain monarchs ruled various countries because it was during their regimes that Bach, Mozart or Beethoven worked. For the same reason, I suppose, a student of electric engineering would have to learn about Faraday, Maxwell, Benjamin Franklin and Steinmetz; an aspiring medico would have to know about Pasteur, Welch, Osler and Virchow; and a legal probationer about Coke, Blackstone, Holmes and Brandeis.

* * * *

A TRUE SCHOLAR can never say to himself (nor to anyone else), "I am educated." Education is a never-ending process. No one of us would like to consult a lawyer whose knowledge ended with his sheepskin nor a doctor who practiced the methods in effect when he graduated from medical college. A musician who wrote in the formulas used by the masters who dominated the 18th and 19th centuries would find himself ridiculed or pitied. One old man who was asked why he devoted all his waking hours to study answered that he was "cramming for his finals."

One reads of this man or that who "read" law in the office of the town's leading jurist, or of the young man who got his medical training in an analogous way. The training of boys such as Mozart, Rossini and Mendelssohn was hardly more definitely pursued. All three impatiently jumped the tedious years of the alphabet and grammar and started in immediately writing music which has endured to this day. Today, however, even those who compose in what is called chance or indeterminate musical language write from full and basic knowledge. Fakers and charlatans in music are just not accepted.

* * * *

BOULEZ, who conducted this past month at Tanglewood, did not play any of his own music, and nothing of Stockhausen, Cage, Babitt or Carter was heard on any other program during the summer. Leinsdorf did play some Varese to bewildered, if tolerant, ears, but the challenges which current music proposes are supported by their creators with almost irrevocable logic and lucidity. The point is that no one can hope to delude the public very long and saturation in the vocation of one's choice is quintessential.

Years ago there appeared advertisements in national magazines with the headline, "They all laughed when I sat down at the piano." It was a solicitation of enrollment in a mail-order piano lesson course which promised that in a short time the student could play certain popular pieces acceptably. I never encountered any "graduate" of such a course, but since the ads kept appearing for several years, I assume there must have been an ample class of pupils. Bypassing in this instance the unfailing gullibility of the pubilc, it still is indisputable that learning for its own sake, beyond its potential of affording a possessor the means of earning a living, is a reward in its own right. The constant command should be: Study! Aim! Fire!

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

AUG 30 1969

CUE REPORTS FROM

THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL

THE tallest Tanglewood tale is not one of those by Nathaniel Hawthorne. It is the story of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, which has just completed its thirty-second season on 210 magnificent acres the descendants of William Aspinwall Tappan (the original owner) gave to Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936. It was in a cottage restored and now plunked down on the edge of the Tappan estate that Hawthorne planned his Tales, but could even that master of imaginative manipulation have foreseen "the Tanglewood weekend"—a sylvan ritual of music, lawn, and meadow ringed abundantly by majestic trees and contained as if in a mammoth bowl by the Berkshire Mountains? No wonder this father-of-them-all festival, one on which most others are modeled, continues to thrive and expand.

In addition to the main Music Shed, which can seat 6037, the festival boasts a theatre used for both opera and concerts, a chamber music hall, and facilities used by the Boston Symphony's summer educational complex, the Berkshire Music Center. The extensive lawn picnics before, during, and after the concerts are by no means the least festive of the many aspects of Tanglewood. Small children and the elderly, the stylishly-attired and the earnest young music student, the tourist and the local resident—literally wining and dining by candlelight or munching on home cooking spilling from hampers—they all look relaxed, unselfconsciously posed, waiting for an American Manet to come along and paint them.

But the concerts were my principal business, and, with the weekend prelude on Friday, these got off to a damp start. The hounds of humidity bayed throughout the Berkshires, making everything and everyone vaporish, including some of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players (Joseph Silverstein, Burton Fine, Jules Eskin, Henry Portnoi) and pianist Gilbert Kalish, who were featured in the prelude. The briefer of Schubert's B flat major string trios sounded wan and lost, and the trout of Schubert's Trout Quintet, which followed, swam in tepid waters rather than in and out of the rapids and sparkling spray the composer wrote into his score.

At 9 p.m., conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Bostonians addressed themselves to Beethoven's Sixth and Third Symphonies, and the enervation vanished. These were noble, solid, sensible, and balanced readings which kept the large audience, prone to applaud between movements and at times almost within movements, rapt. Mr. Leinsdorf is leaving the Boston, but he leaves among the legacies his distinctive manner of shaping Beethoven. He also surprised me at times during the "Pastoral." He is not noted for histrionics, but therein he was mimetic. There's a dash of Marcel Marceau in Erich Leinsdorf.

On Saturday night, David Zinman took up the baton in the place of an indisposed Max Rudolf. This was my first opportunity to hear him conduct and so it was an occasion of special interest to me. A New Yorker by birth and only thirty-three years old, Mr. Zinman has already created a stir with the Boston and in Europe, where he leads the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. If the concert was merely intermittently arresting and often puzzling, it should be noted that this protégé of the late Pierre Monteux had inherited the bill, making one substitution of the Haydn Eighty-Third for another Haydn symphony. Mr. Zinman is a handsome, tall, and trim gentleman who initially lunged at the orchestra and Haydn as if he were a Prussian commander sprucing up the goose-step. It was leaden and wrong-headed Haydn, lacking wit, bite, or polish. Bartók's "Dance Suite" following was muddy and undifferentiated and clumsy. Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, the supercharged "Pathétique," provided a finale of fireworks. It was, in some ways, one of the most vulgar outpourings of the already outpoured I have ever heard. It was also electrifying, just as it was the most intensely personal interpretation I heard all weekend. At one point, Mr. Zinman yelled out with passion, and he drew from the players a matching passion, especially from the unsurpassed brass section of the BSO. I began thinking of another young man who once excited speculation at Tanglewood, a Mr. Leonard Bernstein, and speculated for myself that all of us may be seeing a similar career burgeon for David Zinman in the seasons to come.

As I approached the grounds for the Saturday morning open rehearsal of the Sunday matinee, I was told that the crowd already assembled was unusually large. I had expected as much, for few Tanglewoodites would have to be told that Marilyn Horne and her conductor-husband, Henry Lewis, were likely to provide a memorable Sunday afternoon. At the rehearsal, Miss Horne was as uninhibited and informal as the Lewises' four-year-old daughter, Angela, who with impish delight watched her parents bring rehearsal auditors to their feet. Elegant in a red gown on Sunday, Miss Horne brought the entire applauding orchestra to its feet, something I've rarely witnessed. Well, it was a perfectly-rounded concert that deserved every moment of a long ovation. After a nimble "Le Corsaire" Overture by Berlioz, Mr. Lewis provided iridescent accompaniment for the composer's "Les nuits d'été" cycle and for Miss Horne. This was haunting, fragrant, subtle—another Horne triumph. With a Mozart and a Rossini aria, the soprano, as so often I've seen her do, literally ignited her listeners. But she did not have the last hurrah. Mr. Lewis did. Into Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," he inlaid sonority upon sonority until he was ready to reveal a shimmering intaglio. His, too, is a tremendous talent.

The arts enjoy a long summer's lease throughout this Massachusetts area, but in these halls of the Berkshire Mountains kings, Tanglewood is still the emperor.

—GREER JOHNSON

An injection of new life away from

MUSIC

Peter Heyworth takes to the hills and visits three American summer schools.

EVERYONE has heard of the horrors of the New York summer, when the city stifles under a killing blanket of heat and humidity. But to judge from the weather this year the climate in the other cities of the north-eastern American seaboard is not all that much better, so that it is not surprising that in July musical life in this part of the world packs its bags and heads for the wooded mountains and lakes of New England. In these idyllic surroundings it manages to escape some of the pressures that beset the big city orchestras, and in doing so provides some of America's most lively music-making.

Tanglewood, superbly set in the Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts, is the most famous of these refuges. Here, some 30 years ago, Koussevitsky founded what is essentially a double-pronged operation. For Tanglewood is the summer home both of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Music Center, a summer school for students.

At week-ends the orchestra performs conventional programmes in an open-sided shed that can seat up to 6,000 people. But this is only the public side of Tanglewood. For the remainder of the week the Boston players coach at the Berkshire Music Center, whose student orchestra this year put on a subfestival of contemporary music under the direction of Gunther Schuller. I heard the opening concert, and the complete assurance and virtuosity with which these young players dispatched a testing assembly of contemporary scores speaks volumes for the level of instrumental instruction in the United States.

One hundred and fifty miles to the north of Tanglewood in what was, until it was opened up quite recently by airlines and motorways, the wilds of New Hampshire, lies Dartmouth College, an Ivy League institution which seven years ago built itself an arts centre, complete with theatre, gallery and concert hall, that many a medium-sized British city would, with good reason, envy. Here each summer, as the musical component of a festival called the Congregation of the Arts, Mario di Bonaventura directs a summer school for young orchestral players that specialises in contemporary music.

So far as standards of performance are concerned, Dartmouth, which is a smaller scale affair with less financial backing and younger students, cannot rival Tanglewood. But it pursues a far more purposeful artistic policy. Instead of performing an amorphous miscellany of recent music, every year Mario di Bonaventura bases his programmes on three composers, each of whom is present for a fortnight, attends rehearsals, lectures and is generally about the campus. In the past he has brought to Dartmouth figures as substantial as Kodály, Lutoslawski, Martin and Henze. This year he has been able to secure the presence of Dallapiccola, Sessions and Roberto Gerhard.

Dartmouth offers a pattern that English universities might profitably investigate, because it provides a means whereby students (and critics in so far as they figure in the picture) can get to know the composer's music in depth. My own stay at Dartmouth overlapped with that of Roger Sessions, whose music I must, to my shame, confess to having underestimated in the past. The chance to hear his chamber and orchestral concerts in particular helped me to understand why a composer who remains virtually unperformed in Britain occupies so prominent a position in American musical life.

Westwards, in a remote corner of Vermont, lies Marlboro. [illegible] years ago Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin established the [illegible] musicians. They came from all over the world (though naturally in the main from America). Some are young artists of exceptional promise, others leaders of orchestras [illegible] that Serkin [illegible] faster-moving orchestral world is due to the sort of performance difficulties that Schoenberg's music suffered from until quite recently. I would not care to say. Once bitten, twice shy. But his chamber music, along with Sessions's, seems to me to merit more attention than we (with the exception of William Glock and the BBC) have so far given it in Britain.

Marlboro refuses adamantly to announce programmes in advance and that is, of course, its [illegible] insistence that what is [illegible] should be the fruit, and not the purpose, of the whole undertaking seems to me completely justified. For only in this way can artists be liberated for a brief spell from the deadening treadmill of scheduled performances, which determine their existence for the remainder of the year.

[illegible] live in conditions of the utmost [illegible] and make music together, for the most part in small chamber groups, each of which is presided over by a musician of particular eminence. Every weekend a couple of public concerts, given in [illegible] magnificent acoustics, are put together from the performances that are considered to have reached completion.

[illegible] evening I spent there, I would prefer to take pot luck at Marlboro than the most elaborate à la carte meal elsewhere. The concert began with a glorious account of Mozart's little [illegible] played String Quintet in B flat [illegible] ensemble and intonation (and what intonation!) were flawless. But there was more than polish here. The other musical impulse that lay behind the realisation of the least detail of the extraordinary sweep and vitality of the phrasing, the vigour of the inner parts [illegible] be felt to be believed. Yet there was no shadow of overemphasis. The character of each movement was established with incomparable naturalness, [illegible] unfolded with [illegible] understanding [illegible] heat, a work of art so totally [illegible] rare experience.

[illegible] more was to come. This year, Pablo Casals is in residence at Marlboro. When I learnt that this legendary figure, now in his ninety-third year, was to conduct a Beethoven symphony, I must admit that my heart sank at the prospect of what I assumed would be no more than an act of piety to an old man who still yearned to make music; and as a frail-bent figure painfully made his way to the podium I felt that my worst suspicions were about to be confirmed.

Never have I made a profounder error, for Casals proceeded to conduct a performance of the Seventh that in sheer vigour of line and rhythm, in its sense of inner tensions and outward drama is unequalled by any other I have heard. The sheer inevitability of the music swept all before it and in the last movement a great fountain of life and energy seemed to spring into existence at the behest of this miraculous old man.

But Marlboro is [illegible] than a source of great occasions such as this. [illegible] are indeed they are peripheral to its true purpose, which is to bring refreshment and new life to a musical world that each year grows more standardised and machine-made. I hope to write more about this later, in another context.

CONSENSUS: EVENTS

Compiled by WILLIAM H. WELLS

what the experts report is the best of musical, dramatic and other events—as reviewed by prominent publications in the field.

TANGLEWOOD HIGHLIGHTS — Summer 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF's final summer as music director for the Boston Symphony and its related Berkshire Music Center was plagued with bad weather, but blessed by a more than usual number of outstanding performances.

Opera turned out the dominant factor of the season. While we did not attend the generally acclaimed "Abduction from the Seraglio," we were able to hear Leinsdorf's incandescent version of Verdi's "Otello" and his absolutely overpowering reading of Berg's "Wozzek."

"Otello" featured Richard Cassilly in the title role, and his unique blend of power and compassion mark him as probably the finest potential dramatic tenor of our day. Sherrill Milnes' Iago was lushly vocalized but only modestly characterized, while Maralin Niska was a sometimes shrill but generally sympathetic Desdemona.

Within the framework of semi-staged action, "Otello" was a triumph largely thanks to the intense yet lyrical master hand of Leinsdorf, who secured some of the finest playing the Boston Symphony provided all season.

The surprise hit of the summer was Berg's towering "Wozzeck," performed by the youthful Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, and conducted by Leinsdorf for his first time. The semi-staged performance in the gloomy Tanglewood shell proved astonishingly effective.

Richard Taylor in the title role, and Alexandra Hunt as Marie were both outstanding among the young professional singers, and there seemed general agreement among enthusiastic audiences for two under-publicized presentations (and among some 50 critics attending a week's symposia!) that the cast and orchestra were considerably superior to the Met's most recent efforts with Berg's masterpiece. A few stylistic questions aside, "Wozzeck" was one of the major accomplishments of Leinsdorf's fruitful years in Boston.

Instrumental Highlights

Charles Wilson, who returns to N.Y. City Opera this season as principal resident conductor, demonstrated his outstanding skills in a program which featured a sumptuously exciting Sibelius Second Symphony and a Beethoven "Emperor" in whch Vladimir Ashkenazy pleased almost everyone more than he did me.

The distinguished Russian seemed a bit pale after Earl Wild had presented a flaming recital of rarely heard virtuoso music that literally set off skyrockets in the sedate old shed just an hour before Andre Watts demonstrated once again his superior brand of pianism in a grandly scaled performance of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto with Leinsdorf in top form.

Jacqueline du Pre mesmerized one of the season's largest crowds with her impassioned interpretation of the introspective beauties of Elgar's superb Cello Concerto. Daniel Barenboim's flamboyant conducting did fair justice to the orchestral portions without matching what Barbirolli accomplishes on his Angel recording with Miss du Pre.

Another husband-wife combination, Marilyn Horne and Henry Lewis floundered on the delicate beauties of the Berlioz "Les nuits d'ete," but had a huge success with a small audience in Mozart's Parto, parto and Cruda sorte from Rossini's "Italian Woman in Algiers."

Pierre Boulez drilled the BSO into expensive over-time, but the result was one of the oustanding orchestral concerts of many seasons. In familiar Boulez interpretations of Debussy ("Jeux" and "La Mer") the Bostonians shimmered under his batonless wizardry, and in a Haydn Sinfonia Concertante and Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra, Joseph Silverstein was outstanding in a covey of expert BSO soloists.

Every Boulez concert convinces us that New York may very well have accomplished the musical coup of the century in securing such an inspired and imaginative conductor for the Philharmonic.

The Berkshire Boy Choir

Each summer for the past three seasons a distinguished master of a major British boy and men choir has been brought to Stockbridge, Massachusetts to direct The Berkshire Boy Choir.

The BC was founded by businessman John Stookey to provide a major shot in the arm to what has long appeared to be the dying tradition of male choirs in America.

This year 47 boys and 14 men were rounded up from choirs all over the country, and Allan Wicks, master of the choirs at Canterbury Cathedral, was invited to spend 9 weeks in preparing the chorus and touring to various spots in the East.

We heard the BC in full programs at both the Saratoga and Tanglewood festivals, and in the handsome setting of the Spanish chapel at The Cloisters. Each program revealed the tremendous potential of such a select group, and in the short time at his disposal Mr. Wicks accomplished a near miracle.

Major works in the repertory included Aaron Copland's lean and challenging "In the Beginning," Benjamin Britten's "Ode to St. Cecilia," and the Monteverdi Mass "In illo tempore." These works, along with many shorter pieces from Schütz through Vaughan Williams, Holst, and a young Cambridge composer Allen Ridout, were all performed with seraphic tone and remarkable power and intensity under Wicks' demanding direction.

Summer Festivals Get Better and Better

By GEORGE GELLES
Special to the H-T.

Summer festivals are coming of age, and if the mid-season months once gloried in "easy livin'," those days are stone dead. For looking back over the past two months, one realizes that our seasonal festivals are starting to take new tacks, and in so doing are making new demands.

Each year the musical public increases in size, sophistication and experience. If few orchestra boards are bold enough to offer real adventure in programming, virtually all are becoming increasingly aware of the need for a varied diet, including both unfamiliar works from the past two centuries and ones from our own.

Thus, the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf last season looked at the Romantic keyboard virtuoso-composer Scharwenka, for instance, at Schoenberg and Varese. And when these composers were then played at Tanglewood, they proved that the unfamiliar piece needn't double as box office dirge.

But though Tanglewood flirted with the out-of-the-way, it was basically true to form, a meat-and-potatoes affair where standard fare was abundantly served. One had to go to the smaller operations for more provocative programming, to those newly blossomed series that over the past half dozen years have added fresh dimensions to the summer landscape.

EACH HAD its special character. The "Romantic Revival" set in the mansions of Newport (R.I.) concentrated on neglected works from the salon. If the choice of programs wasn't to my mind always ideal and the performing forces in large part semi-professional, the ambiance offered by the mansions themselves and the relaxed pace of the proceedings helped make my one visit a pleasure.

Canvassing the country for the past several seasons have been the "Music from Marlboro" tours, but they never even hinted how marvelous Marlboro really is. Its forte, of course, is chamber music, and it draws to Marlboro College the best of the young professionals. Rehearsals are held under the watchful eyes and ears of Rudolf Serkin, Artistic Director of the Festival, Felix Galimir and other elder statesmen, and only at mid-week do the weekend's programs start to take charge.

Thus, it's agony trying to learn what one might hear, but when the risk is taken and the trip to Vermont made, it's hard to go wrong. And I'll remember for a good long time the performance of Beethoven's "Choral Fantasy" that Leon Kirchner led at Marlboro's closing concert.

The Congregation of the Arts at Dartmouth College tries to be the most forward-looking festival, but makes it on paper only. This summer, as with several in the past, three established composers spent two weeks apiece in residence—Roger Sessions and Luigi Dallapiccola were among them—and programs were built around representative works of theirs.

Yet far too often, the performances led by Mario di Bonaventura were grossly inadequate. Though his orchestra might have played well, it didn't, and his interpretations of new music were rarely more than half-baked. I'm grateful for the chance to have heard scores seldom played, but the performances were most always disappointments.

I could easily continue. There was the excellent little New Hampshire Music Festival, the Bennington (Vt.) Composers' Conference, the Yale School of Music Concerts at Norfolk (Ct.), the series sponsored by the Harvard Summer School. Each challenged the listener in a different way, each had its reward, each made the summer months a little richer.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 21 1969

30a

An injection of new life away from it all

MUSIC

Peter Heyworth takes to the hills and visits three American summer schools.

EVERYONE has heard of the horrors of the New York summer, when the city stifles under a killing blanket of heat and humidity. But to judge from the weather this year the climate in the other cities of the north-eastern American seaboard is not all that much better, so that it is not surprising that in July musical life in this part of the world packs its bags and heads for the wooded mountains and lakes of New England. In these idyllic surroundings it manages to escape some of the pressures that beset the big city orchestras and in doing so provides some of America's most lively music making.

Tanglewood, superbly set in the Berkshire Hills of western Massachusetts, is the most famous of these refuges. Here, some 30 years ago, Koussevitsky founded what is essentially a double-pronged operation. For Tanglewood is the summer home both of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Music Center, a summer school for students.

At week-ends the orchestra performs conventional programmes in an open-sided shed that can seat up to 6,000 people. But this is only the public side of Tanglewood. For the remainder of the week the Boston players coach at the Berkshire Music Center, whose student orchestra this year put on a subfestival of contemporary music under the direction of Gunther Schuller. I heard the opening concert, and the complete assurance and virtuosity with which these young players dispatched a testing assembly of contemporary scores speaks volumes for the level of instrumental instruction in the United States.

One hundred and fifty miles to the north of Tanglewood in what was, until it was opened up quite recently by airlines and motorways, the wilds of New Hampshire, lies Dartmouth College, an Ivy League institution which seven years ago built itself an arts centre, complete with theatre, gallery and concert hall, that many a medium-sized British city would, with good reason, envy. Here each summer, as the musical component of a festival called the Congregation of the Arts, Mario di Bonaventura directs a summer school for young orchestral players that specialises in contemporary music.

So far as standards of performance are concerned, Dartmouth, which is a smaller scale affair with less financial backing and younger students, cannot rival Tanglewood. But it pursues a far more purposeful artistic policy. Instead of performing an amorphous miscellany of recent music, every year Mario di Bonaventura bases his programmes on three composers, each of whom is present for a fortnight, attends rehearsals, lectures and is generally about the campus. In the past he has brought to Dartmouth figures as substantial as Kodály, Lutoslawski, Martin and Henze. This year he has been able to secure the presence of Dallapiccola, Sessions and Roberto Gerhard.

Dartmouth offers a pattern that English universities might profitably investigate, because it provides a means whereby students (and critics insofar as they figure in the picture) can get to know a composer's music in depth. My own stay at Dartmouth overlapped with that of Roger Sessions, whose music I must, to my shame, confess to having underestimated in the past. In the course of a series of chamber and orchestral concerts I came to understand why a composer who remains virtually unperformed in Britain now occupies so prominent a position in American musical life.

In particular I learnt to recognize the eloquence of his characteristically long-lined, lyrical writing, to admire the contrapuntal resource and expressive range of his music and the ability to sustain a far reaching and complex argument. Whether the sense of congestion and colourlessness that sometimes seems to dog his faster-moving orchestral writing is due to the sort of performance difficulties that Schoenberg's music suffered from until quite recently I would not care to say. Once bitten, twice shy. But his chamber music, alone recent Sessions to be a composer of stature. At the age of 73 he merits more attention than we (with the exception of William Glock and the BBC) have so far given him in Britain.

Westwards, in a remote corner of Vermont, lies Marlboro', where 19 years ago Adolf Busch and Rudolf Serkin established what was, in effect, a retreat for musicians of the highest calibre. They came from all over the world (though naturally in the main from America). Some are young artists of exceptional promise, some leaders of orchestras, some famous names in their own rights. For six weeks they live in conditions of the utmost simplicity and make music together, for the most part in small chamber groups, each of which is presided over by a musician of particular experience. Every weekend a couple of public concerts, given in a small barn with magnificent acoustics, are put together out of performances that are considered to have reached completion.

Marlboro refuses adamantly to announce programmes in advance and this is, of course, a little irritating for visitors. But Serkin's insistence that what is played should be the fruit, and not the purpose, of the whole undertaking seems to me completely justified. For only in this way can artists be liberated for a brief spell from the deadening treadmill of scheduled performances, which determine their existence for the remainder of the year.

In many cases, on the basis of the evening I spent there, I would prefer to take pot luck at Marlboro' than the most elaborate à la carte meal elsewhere. The concert began with a glorious account of Mendelssohn's little-played String Quintet in B flat major. Needless to say, ensemble and intonation (and what intonation!) were flawless. But there was more than polish here. The sheer musical impulse that lay behind the realisation of the least detail, the extraordinary sweep and vitality of the phrasing, the vigour of the inner parts—all this had to be felt to be believed. Yet there was no shadow of overemphasis. The character of each movement was established at with complete naturalness, its shape unfolded with deep understanding. To hear a work of art so totally realised is a rare experience.

But more was to come. This year Pablo Casals is in residence at Marlboro'. When I learnt that this legendary figure, now in his ninety-third year, was to conduct a Beethoven symphony I must admit that my heart sank at the prospect of what I assumed would be no more than an act of piety to an old man who still yearned to make music; and as a frail bent figure painfully made his way to the podium I felt that my worst suspicions were about to be confirmed.

Never have I made a profounder error, for Casals proceeded to conduct a performance of the Seventh that in sheer vigour of line and rhythm, in its grasp of inner tensions and outward drama is unequalled by any other I have heard. The sheer inevitability of the music swept all before it, and in the last movement a great fountain of life and energy seemed to spring into existence at the behest of this miraculous old man.

But Marlboro' is more than a source of great occasions such as this. In a sense indeed, they are peripheral to its true purpose, which is to bring refreshment and new life to a musical whirl that each year grows more standardised and machine-made. I hope to write more about this later, in another context.

CONSENSUS: EVENTS

Compiled by WILLIAM H. WELLS

what the experts report is the best of musical, dramatic and other events—as reviewed by prominent publications in the field.

TANGLEWOOD HIGHLIGHTS — Summer 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF's final summer as music director for the Boston Symphony and its related Berkshire Music Center was plagued with bad weather, but blessed by a more than usual number of outstanding performances.

Opera turned out the dominant factor of the season. While we did not attend the generally acclaimed "Abduction from the Seraglio," we were able to hear Leinsdorf's incandescent version of Verdi's "Otello" and his absolutely overpowering reading of Berg's "Wozzek."

"Otello" featured Richard Cassilly in the title role, and his unique blend of power and compassion mark him as probably the finest potential dramatic tenor of our day. Sherrill Milnes' Iago was lushly vocalized but only modestly characterized, while Maralin Niska was a sometimes shrill but generally sympathetic Desdemona.

Within the framework of semi-staged action, "Otello" was a triumph largely thanks to the intense yet lyrical master hand of Leinsdorf, who secured some of the finest playing the Boston Symphony provided all season.

The surprise hit of the summer was Berg's towering "Wozzeck," performed by the youthful Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, and conducted by Leinsdorf for his first time. The semi-staged performance in the gloomy Tanglewood shell proved astonishingly effective.

Richard Taylor in the title role, and Alexandra Hunt as Marie were both outstanding among the young professional singers, and there seemed general agreement among enthusiastic audiences for two under-publicized presentations (and among some 50 critics attending a week's symposia!) that the cast and orchestra were considerably superior to the Met's most recent efforts with Berg's masterpiece. A few stylistic questions aside, "Wozzeck" was one of the major accomplishments of Leinsdorf's fruitful years in Boston.

Instrumental Highlights

Charles Wilson, who returns to N.Y. City Opera this season as principal resident conductor, demonstrated his outstanding skills in a program which featured a sumptuously exciting Sibelius Second Symphony and a Beethoven "Emperor" in whch Vladimir Ashkenazy pleased almost everyone more than he did me.

The distinguished Russian seemed a bit pale after Earl Wild had presented a flaming recital of rarely heard virtuoso music that literally set off skyrockets in the sedate old shed just an hour before Andre Watts demonstrated once again his superior brand of pianism in a grandly scaled performance of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto with Leinsdorf in top form.

Jacqueline du Pre mesmerized one of the season's largest crowds with her impassioned interpretation of the introspective beauties of Elgar's superb Cello Concerto. Daniel Barenboim's flamboyant conducting did fair justice to the orchestral portions without matching what Barbirolli accomplishes on his Angel recording with Miss du Pre.

Another husband-wife combination, Marilyn Horne and Henry Lewis floundered on the delicate beauties of the Berlioz "Les nuits d'ete," but had a huge success with a small audience in Mozart's Parto, parto and Cruda sorte from Rossini's "Italian Woman in Algiers."

Pierre Boulez drilled the BSO into expensive over-time, but the result was one of the oustanding orchestral concerts of many seasons. In familiar Boulez interpretations of Debussy ("Jeux" and "La Mer") the Bostonians shimmered under his batonless wizardry, and in a Haydn Sinfonia Concertante and Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra, Joseph Silverstein was outstanding in a covey of expert BSO soloists.

Every Boulez concert convinces us that New York may very well have accomplished the musical coup of the century in securing such an inspired and imaginative conductor for the Philharmonic.

The Berkshire Boy Choir

Each summer for the past three seasons a distinguished master of a major British boy and men choir has been brought to Stockbridge, Massachusetts to direct The Berkshire Boy Choir.

The BC was founded by businessman John Stookey to provide a major shot in the arm to what has long appeared to be the dying tradition of male choirs in America.

This year 47 boys and 14 men were rounded up from choirs all over the country, and Allan Wicks, master of the choirs at Canterbury Cathedral, was invited to spend 9 weeks in preparing the chorus and touring to various spots in the East.

We heard the BC in full programs at both the Saratoga and Tanglewood festivals, and in the handsome setting of the Spanish chapel at The Cloisters. Each program revealed the tremendous potential of such a select group, and in the short time at his disposal Mr. Wicks accomplished a near miracle.

Major works in the repertory included Aaron Copland's lean and challenging "In the Beginning," Benjamin Britten's "Ode to St. Cecilia," and the Monteverdi Mass "In illo tempore." These works, along with many shorter pieces from Schütz through Vaughan Williams, Holst, and a young Cambridge composer Allen Ridout, were all performed with seraphic tone and remarkable power and intensity under Wicks' demanding direction.

Summer Festivals Get Better

By GEORGE GELLES
Special to the H-T.

Summer festivals are coming of age, and if the mid-season months once gloried in "easy livin'," those days are stone dead. For looking back over the past two months, one realizes that our seasonal festivals are starting to take new tacks, and in so doing are making new demands.

Each year the musical public increases in size, sophistication and experience. If few orchestra boards are bold enough to offer real adventure in programming, virtually all are becoming increasingly aware of the need for a varied diet, including both unfamiliar works from the past two centuries and ones from our own.

Thus, the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf last season looked at the Romantic keyboard virtuoso-composer Scharwenka, for instance, at Schoenberg and Varese. And when these composers were then played at Tanglewood, they proved that the unfamilar piece needn't double as box office dirge.

But though Tanglewood flirted with the out-of-the-way, it was basically true to form, a meat-and-potatoes affair where standard fare was abundantly served. One had to go to the smaller operations for more provocative programming, to those newly blossomed series that over the past half dozen years have added fresh dimensions to the summer landscape.

EACH HAD its special character. The "Romantic Revival" set in the mansions of Newport (R.I.) concentrated on neglected works from the salon. If the choice of programs wasn't to my mind always ideal and the performing forces in large part semi-professional, the ambiance offered by the mansions themselves and the relaxed pace of the proceedings helped make my one visit a pleasure.

Canvassing the country for the past several seasons have been the "Music from Marlboro" tours, but they never even hinted how marvelous Marlboro really is. Its forte, of course, is chamber music, and it draws to Marlboro College the best of the young professionals. Rehearsals are held under the watchful eyes and ears of Rudolf Serkin, Artistic Director of the Festival, Felix Galimir and other elder statesmen, and only at mid-week do the week-end's programs start to take charge.

and Better

Thus, it's agony trying to learn what one might hear, but when the risk is taken and the trip to Vermont made, it's hard to go wrong. And I'll remember for a good long time the performance of Beethoven's "Choral Fantasy" that Leon Kirchner led at Marlboro's closing concert.

The Congregation of the Arts at Dartmouth College tries to be the most forward-looking festival, but makes it on paper only. This summer, as with several in the past, three established composers spent two weeks apiece in residence—Roger Sessions and Luigi Dallapiccola were among them—and programs were built around representative works of theirs.

Yet far too often, the performances led by Mario di Bonaventura were grossly inadequate. Though his orchestra might have played well, it didn't, and his interpretations of new music were rarely more than half-baked. I'm grateful for the chance to have heard scores seldom played, but the performances were most always disappointments.

I could easily continue. There was the excellent little New Hampshire Music Festival, the Bennington (Vt.) Composers' Conference, the Yale School of Music Concerts at Norfolk (Ct.), the series sponsored by the Harvard Summer School. Each challenged the listener in a different way, each had its reward, each made the summer months a little richer.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

SEP 21 1969

306

Tanglewood

Von Eva Lister-Lynn
Regisseurin am Deutschen Theater, Montreal

TANGLEWOOD. — Tanglewood? Ein Stück Drifttholz, ein Zauberwald, eine Szene aus dem Sommernachtstraum? Fast haben Sie es erraten, Tanglewood — der unumstrittene Mittelpunkt der Berkshire Festivals. In drei Autostunden von Montreal, über Albany und Massachusetts Turnpike erreicht man Lenox, Massachusets, in den Berkshire Hills und somit Tanglewood, eine Domäne, die sich über 210 acres erstreckt.

Das Berkshire Music Festival ist das „Country House" des Boston Symphonie Orchesters. Im Jahre 1934 von seinem damaligen Musikdirektor Serge Koussevitzky gegründet, bietet es Musikliebhabern jeden Sommer, von Anfang Juli bis Ende August, ein äußerst reiches Programm, mit den besten Solisten der Welt. Oistrach, Aschkenasi, Stern, Kliburn sind in Tanglewood häufige Gäste, eine Tatsache, die vom Tanglewood-Publikum als eine Selbstverständlichkeit hingenommen wird.

Tanglewood gibt einem das Gefühl, eine andere Welt betreten zu haben. Rechts and links lassen Auffahrten, überwachsen und beschattet von alten, stattlichen Bäumen, das dahinterliegende Schlösschen ahnen, und man ist bereits dabei, sich ein Gedankenbild von den Insassen zu machen, als man plötzlich eine diskret angebrachte Tafel entdeckt, mit der Aufschrift: „Tanzakademie Mme Soundso", bei dem nächsten Portal: „Music Camp for Young Ladies", dann eine Ballettschule und so fort. Ein gutaussehender junger Mann in Blue Jeans diskutiert mit sich selbst und dirigiert beim Spaziergang.

Etwas weiterhin schleppt ein junges Mädchen in nettem Mini Skirt, langes Haar zusammengerafft, ein riesiges Instrument. Unseren Lift akzeptiert sie dankbar und erklärt uns auf unsere Fragen, dass sie eine Cello-Schülerin am „Berkshire Music Center" ist, der Sommerakademie für Fortgeschrittene, gegründet von „The Big Man", Serge Koussevitzky.

„Hier haben wir Gelegenheit" erzählt Debbie, unsere Passantin, „acht Wochen lang bei Leinsdorf zu studieren und fast täglich öffentliche Konzerte zu geben. Unsere Hauptdarbietung für diese Saison werden zwei Aufführungen von Alban Bergs Wozzeck" sein und Leinsdorf persönlich wird unser Orchester dirigieren."

Inzwischen haben wir Tanglewoods Einfahrt erreicht. Vor uns ein einfaches Holzgebäude. Debbie erklärt: „Das ist die Verwaltung." Wir sind noch immer auf dem Parkplatz und doch hören wir schon Klänge aus Tschaikowskys Klavierkonzert No. 1, überdurchschnittlich gut gespielt. „Ah, das ist sicher Jean", sagt Debbie, „ein Student hier, er spielt himmlich und wird sicher einmal ein grosser Pianist werden. In dem fast nur aus Glas bestehenden, kleinen Gebäude, rechts vom Eingang, ist ein Flügel aufgestellt, und wenn Sie wollen, können Sie fast jederzeit Ihr eigenes kleines Konzert geben. Die Häuschen, die Sie bei der Einfahrt gesehen haben, sind meistens Studenten-, Lehrer- und Personalwohnungen."

Eine kleine Zuhörergruppe hat sich bereits um Jean versammelt, und weitere stehen vor dem Eingang. Auch wir hören einige Minuten zu und können uns nicht des Eindrucks erwehren, dass hier eine ganz eigenartige Stimmung herrscht, eine Atmosphäre, die man kaum beschreiben kann, die man aber desto stärker fühlt.

Wir gehen durch das Tor. Jeans Spiel ist noch deutlich hörbar, doch schon wird es von anderen musikalischen Klängen unterbrochen und bald übertönt. Das Gefühl, eine andere Welt betreten zu haben, lässt uns auch hier nicht los. Vor uns liegt der eigentliche Park: Tanglewood. Von links kommen Orchestertöne, von rechts das Stimmen verschiedener Instrumente, und immer noch hörbar, fast wie von irgendwo, einige Töne von Jeans Klavier.

Das Auge, daran gewöhnt, zuerst nach links zu schauen, entdeckt mitten im Park ein an drei Seiten offenes Stahlgebäude für 6000 Besucher, in welchem die grösseren Konzerte stattfinden und wo gerade das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter der Leitung seines Dirigenten Leinsdorf mit dem hervorragenden jungen Pianisten Andre Watts, ein Brahms-Konzert probt. Zweitausend Besucher haben auf der Wiese davor Platz.

Am anderen Ende des Parkes liegt „The Theatre Concert Hall", in welchem meistens Studentenkonzerte verschiedendster Art stattfinden; dann sind da eine „Chamber Music Hall" und ein „Open Air Rehearsal Stage".

Das wirkliche Erlebnis in Tanglewood ist, ein hervorragendes Konzert unter Sternenhimmel zu hören; dafür besorgt man sich eine Karte „for the lawn". Um ein Konzert von der Wiese aus zu hören, braucht man ausser seiner Karte eine Decke, die man sich mitbringt, denn hier werden keine Stühle aufgestellt.

Die besondere Atmosphäre dieser Wiese während eines Konzerts zu schildern, ist fast unmöglich.

Vor Beginn des Konzerts ist die Wiese wie ein Ameisenhaufen: Jedermann sucht einen noch besseren Platz.

Plötzlich ein eigentümlich faszinierender Klang. Die Lichter verlöschen, die Menge kommt langsam zur Ruhe, das Konzert beginnt, und innerhalb von fünf Minuten hat sich alles verändert. Die eben noch rastlose, kommende, gehende, lachende, rufende Menschenmenge sitzt oder liegt bewegungslos, der Musik lauschend. Der nüchterne Alltag versinkt hinter den Büschen von Tanglewood, um uns ist Musik und die tröstliche Gewissheit, von gleichgesinnten Menschen umgeben zu sein. Über all dem der Sternenhimmel.

*

Die Sonntag-Konzerte beginnen um 2.30 Uhr. Um 5 Uhr sind Sie garantiert auf dem Nachhauseweg.

Ausgeruht, erfrischt und angeregt verlassen wir ungern jedes Jahr wieder diese herrliche Gegend und nur der Gedanke an unsere Rückkehr im nächsten Sommer macht die Trennung etwas leichter.

1

~~1445~~

see remarks on BMG

The World of Music

Quarterly Journal of the International Music Council (UNESCO)

Tanglewood & New Music

elmshöhe

elmshöhe

306

Tanglewood

Von Eva Lister-Lynn
Regisseurin am Deutschen Theater, Montreal

TANGLEWOOD. — Tanglewood? Ein Stück Driftholz, ein Zauberwald, eine Szene aus dem Sommernachtstraum? Fast haben Sie es erraten. Tanglewood — der unumstrittene Mittelpunkt der Berkshire Festivals. In drei Autostunden von Montreal, über Albany und Massachusetts Turnpike erreicht man Lenox, Massachusets, in den Berkshire Hills und somit Tanglewood, eine Domäne, die sich über 210 acres erstreckt.

Das Berkshire Music Festival ist das „Country House" des Boston Symphonie Orchesters. Im Jahre 1934 von seinem damaligen Musikdirektor Serge Koussevitzky gegründet, bietet es Musikliebhabern jeden Sommer, von Anfang Juli bis Ende August, ein äußerst reiches Programm, mit den besten Solisten der Welt. Oistrach, Aschkenasi, Stern, Kliburn sind in Tanglewood häufige Gäste, eine Tatsache, die vom Tanglewood-Publikum als eine Selbstverständlichkeit hingenommen wird.

Tanglewood gibt einem das Gefühl, eine andere Welt betreten zu haben. Rechts and links lassen Auffahrten, überwachsen und beschattet von alten, stattlichen Bäumen, das dahinterliegende Schlösschen ahnen, und man ist bereits dabei, sich ein Gedankenbild von den Insassen zu machen, als man plötzlich eine diskret angebrachte Tafel entdeckt, mit der Aufschrift: „Tanzakademie Mme Soundso", bei dem nächsten Portal: „Music Camp for Young Ladies", dann eine Ballettschule und so fort. Ein gutaussehender junger Mann in Blue Jeans diskutiert mit sich selbst und dirigiert beim Spaziergang.

Etwas weiterhin schleppt ein junges Mädchen in nettem Mini Skirt, langes Haar zusammengerafft, ein riesiges Instrument. Unseren Lift akzeptiert sie dankbar und erklärt uns auf unsere Fragen, dass sie eine Cello-Schülerin am „Berkshire Music Center" ist, der Sommerakademie für Fortgeschrittene, gegründet von „The Big Man", Serge Koussevitzky.

„Hier haben wir Gelegenheit" erzählt Debbie, unsere Passantin, „acht Wochen lang bei Leinsdorf zu studieren und fast täglich öffentliche Konzerte zu geben. Unsere Hauptdarbietung für diese Saison werden zwei Aufführungen von Alban Bergs Wozzeck" sein und Leinsdorf persönlich wird unser Orchester dirigieren."

Inzwischen haben wir Tanglewoods Einfahrt erreicht. Vor uns ein einfaches Holzgebäude, Debbie erklärt: „Das ist die Verwaltung." Wir sind noch immer auf dem Parkplatz und doch hören wir schon Klänge aus Tschaikowskys Klavierkonzert No. 1, überdurchschnittlich gut gespielt. „Ah, das ist sicher Jean", sagt Debbie, „ein Student hier, er spielt himmlich und wird sicher einmal ein grosser Pianist werden. In dem fast nur aus Glas bestehenden, kleinen Gebäude, rechts vom Eingang, ist ein Flügel aufgestellt, und wenn Sie wollen, können Sie fast jederzeit Ihr eigenes kleines Konzert geben. Die Häuschen, die Sie bei der Einfahrt gesehen haben, sind meistens Studenten-, Lehrer- und Personalwohnungen."

Eine kleine Zuhörergruppe hat sich bereits um Jean versammelt, und weitere stehen vor dem Eingang. Auch wir hören einige Minuten zu und können uns nicht des Eindrucks erwehren, dass hier eine ganz eigenartige Stimmung herrscht, eine Atmosphäre, die man kaum beschreiben kann, die man aber desto stärker fühlt.

Wir gehen durch das Tor. Jeans Spiel ist noch deutlich hörbar, doch schon wird es von anderen musikalischen Klängen unterbrochen und bald übertönt. Das Gefühl, eine andere Welt betreten zu haben, lässt uns auch hier nicht los. Vor uns liegt der eigentliche Park: Tanglewood. Von links kommen Orchestertöne, von rechts das Stimmen verschiedener Instrumente, und immer noch hörbar, fast wie von irgendwo, einige Töne von Jeans Klavier.

Das Auge, daran gewöhnt, zuerst nach links zu schauen, entdeckt mitten im Park ein an drei Seiten offenes Stahlgebäude für 6000 Besucher, in welchem die grösseren Konzerte stattfinden und wo gerade das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter der Leitung seines Dirigenten Leinsdorf mit dem hervorragenden jungen Pianisten Andre Watts, ein Brahms-Konzert probt. Zweitausend Besucher haben auf der Wiese davor Platz.

Am anderen Ende des Parkes liegt „The Theatre Concert Hall", in welchem meistens Studentenkonzerte verschiedendster Art stattfinden; dann sind da eine „Chamber Music Hall" und ein „Open Air Rehearsal Stage".

Das wirkliche Erlebnis in Tanglewood ist, ein hervorragendes Konzert unter Sternenhimmel zu hören; dafür besorgt man sich eine Karte „for the lawn". Um ein Konzert von der Wiese aus zu hören, braucht man ausser seiner Karte eine Decke, die man sich mitbringt, denn hier werden keine Stühle aufgestellt.

Die besondere Atmosphäre dieser Wiese während eines Konzerts zu schildern, ist fast unmöglich.

Vor Beginn des Konzerts ist die Wiese wie ein Ameisenhaufen: Jedermann sucht einen noch besseren Platz.

Plötzlich ein eigentümlich faszinierender Klang. Die Lichter verlöschen, die Menge kommt langsam zur Ruhe, das Konzert beginnt, und innerhalb von fünf Minuten hat sich alles verändert. Die eben noch rastlose, kommende, gehende, lachende, rufende Menschenmenge sitzt oder liegt bewegungslos, der Musik lauschend. Der nüchterne Alltag versinkt hinter den Büschen von Tanglewood, um uns ist Musik und die tröstliche Gewissheit, von gleichgesinnten Menschen umgeben zu sein. Über all dem der Sternenhimmel.

*

Die Sonntag-Konzerte beginnen um 2.30 Uhr. Um 5 Uhr sind Sie garantiert auf dem Nachhauseweg.

Ausgeruht, erfrischt und angeregt verlassen wir ungern jedes Jahr wieder diese herrliche Gegend und nur der Gedanke an unsere Rückkehr im nächsten Sommer macht die Trennung etwas leichter.

The World of Music

Quarterly Journal of the International Music Council (UNESCO)

Tanglewood & New Music

elmshöhe

elmshöhe

DIE WELT DER MUSIK

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

LE MONDE DE LA MUSIQUE

QUARTERLY JOURNAL OF THE
INTERNATIONAL MUSIC COUNCIL (UNESCO)
IN ASSOCIATION WITH THE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR COMPARATIVE MUSIC STUDIES AND DOCUMENTATION · BERLIN

PUBLISHED WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF UNESCO
UNESCO SUBVENTION 1965/CA 622/2/1021

VOL. XI NO. 3/1969

BÄRENREITER KASSEL · BASEL · PARIS · LONDON · NEW YORK

aussi la émission à ides de com-
é également,
ertain niveau

de musique
Institut n'ait
s de ce genre
haque saison autres insti-
ns de l'Insti-
rel allemand ganisent récontempo-
l de musique konzern de nnée en au-
s ces efforts,
samment de les créations
t étrangères
urs et public
'avant-garde
ouvent déjà
. Les princi-
Yoriaki Mat-
tsumura.
musique du le travail de conséquence, certain qu'à
ela s'avérera
□

Matsumura

BERNARD JACOBSON

Centers promoting New Music in the USA

The United States is bursting with music festivals. More than a hundred of them are listed in the annual directory published by the magazine "Musical America", and new ones spring up every year in all parts of the country. The popularity of these festivals is partly due to the climate: in most areas the summer is long and hot. Anyone who can spends a good deal of it in the countryside. Concert-going in the open air, or at least in air-conditioned halls away from the main centres of population, replaces attendance at the urban auditoriums, which are used only during the cooler months. Thus it is that, whereas European music festivals attract visitors to the big cities, American festivals usually take people away from them.

Largely because it is what their audiences want, most of the festivals concentrate on music of the classical and romantic periods. A few, however, have assumed the responsibility of making a constructive contribution to the cause of the contemporary composer, and it is the purpose of this article to give an outline of the way three of these exploratory enterprises run. Just as the biggest concentration of festivals in general is to be found in New York State and the neighbouring states of New England, so two of these three unusual festivals belong to the New England region: one is the Congregation of the Arts at Dartmouth College in Hanover, New Hampshire; the other is the Berk-

Centres d'Eclosion de la Musique Nouvelle aux USA

Les Etats-Unis subissent une explosion de festivals musicaux; plus d'une centaine sont inscrits dans le répertoire annuel de la revue « Musical America » et, chaque année, il s'en crée de nouveaux dans tout le pays. La popularité de ces festivals est due en partie au climat: dans la plupart des régions, l'été est long et chaud. Celui qui peut se le permettre en passe une grande partie à la campagne. Les concerts en plein air ou tout au moins dans des salles à air conditionné, loin des centres fréquentés, remplacent ceux des salles urbaines, utilisées seulement durant les mois moins torrides. Voilà pourquoi les festivals musicaux américains éloignent généralement les visiteurs des grandes villes alors que les festivals européens les y attirent.

La plupart des festivals concentrent leur programme sur la musique des périodes classiques et romantiques, principalement pour satisfaire le goût du public. Cependant, certains ont assumé la responsabilité de contribuer de façon constructive à la diffusion de la musique contemporaine; le but de cet article est de donner un aperçu de l'organisation de trois de ces expériences. De même que la concentration la plus importante de festivals s'observe dans la région de New York et dans les états voisins de la Nouvelle Angleterre, deux de ces trois festivals exceptionnels ont lieu en Nouvelle Angleterre: la « Congregation of Arts » au Dartmouth College à Hanovre, New Hampshire et le « Berkshire Festi-

Zentren der Neuen Musik in USA

Die USA werden derzeit von Musikfestivals förmlich überschwemmt. Mehr als hundert Festspiele sind in dem Leitfaden verzeichnet, den die Zeitschrift „Musical America" jährlich veröffentlicht, und jedes Jahr kommen in allen Teilen des Landes neue hinzu. Die Beliebtheit solcher Veranstaltungen beruht zum Teil auf dem Klima: In den meisten Gegenden ist der Sommer lang und heiß. Jeder verbringt nach Möglichkeit den größten Teil dieser Zeit auf dem Lande. Konzertbesuche im Freien oder zumindest in vollklimatisierten Sälen fern der großen Ballungszentren ersetzen den Besuch der städtischen Konzertsäle, die nur während der kühleren Monate benutzt werden. Daher kommt es, daß im Gegensatz zu europäischen Musikfestspielen, die das Publikum in die Großstädte locken, die amerikanischen Festivals gewöhnlich eine Abwanderung der interessierten Kreise aufs Land mit sich bringen.

Größtenteils um den Wünschen ihrer Hörer Rechnung zu tragen, konzentrieren sich die meisten Festivals auf die Darbietung von Musik der klassischen und romantischen Epoche. Einige Festivals jedoch lassen sich auch die zeitgenössische Musik und ihre Schöpfer angelegen sein; in diesem Artikel soll aufgezeigt werden, wie drei dieser Unternehmen funktionieren. Ebenso wie die größte Konzentration von Festivals ganz allgemein im Staate New York und den benachbarten Staaten Neu-Englands zu finden shire Festival at Tanglewood in Massachusetts. The third festival we shall consider is the Aspen Music Festival in the mountainous western state of Colorado.

Alberto Ginastera

The clearest and perhaps most remarkable picture of involvement with modern music is presented by the youngest of these three institutions, the Dartmouth Congregation. Begun as recently as 1963, it has already earned the esteem of many eminent composers. The Argentinian Alberto Ginastera, for instance, has called Dartmouth "not only a magnificent summer school but the most important music festival in the world dedicated to contemporary music."

There are solid statistical grounds for this judgment, and I shall come to them in a moment. But the first clue to Dartmouth's quality lies in its very name: Congregation of the Arts. For one thing, it concerns itself with music not in isolation but in association with the other arts. The spacious, airy Hopkins Center in which it is held contains not only val » à Tanglewood, Massachusets. Le troisième festival dont nous parlerons est l'« Aspen Music Festival » dans la région occidentale montagneuse du Colorado.

La plus récente de ces trois institutions, la « Congregation » de Dartmouth présente un des exemples les plus remarquables de contribution à la musique moderne. Sa création date de 1963, mais elle a déjà gagné l'estime de plusieurs compositeurs éminents. L'Argentin Alberto Ginastera, par exemple, nomma Dartmouth « non seulement une magnifique école d'été, mais le festival de musique le plus important du monde consacré aux œuvres contemporaines ».

Ce jugement s'appuie sur de solides statistiques et j'y reviendrai dans un moment. Mais la clé des qualités de Dartmouth est dans son titre même: « Congrégation des Arts ». La musique n'y est pas un art isolé mais associé à d'autres arts. Le spacieux Hopkins Center dans lequel se déroule le festival compte, en plus de l'auditoire principal — 1100 sièges, une excellente acoustique — une vaste chaîne de théâtres, des salles de conférences, des salles de répétitions, des galeries d'art, des studios pour gravures et autres arts. Le programme annuel tient entièrement compte de ces avantages, meublant chaque moment creux de shows artistiques, de représentations théâtrales, de rétrospectives de cinéma présentant les travaux de metteurs en scène aussi divers que Jean Renoir et Fred Zinnemann. Il y a un important échange d'activités entre les différents secteurs — des étudiants de sculpture qui ne manquent pas un concert, des musiciens qui se détendent en peignant ou en assistant à des soirées de théâtre, des étudiants résidant pour diverses raisons, qui suivent ist, so gehören auch zwei dieser drei ungewöhnlichen Unternehmen in dieses Gebiet: das eine Festival ist die „Congregation of the Arts" am Dartmouth-College in Hanover, New Hampshire, das zweite das Berkshire-Festival in Tanglewood, Massachusetts. Das dritte, das wir betrachten wollen, ist das Aspen-Musik-Festival im westlichen Kordillerenstaat Colorado.

Den klarsten und vielleicht bemerkenswertesten Eindruck vom Engagement für die zeitgenössische Musik gibt die jüngste der drei Institutionen, die „Dartmouth Congregation". Erst 1963 gegründet, hat sie sich bereits die Wertschätzung zahlreicher hervorragender Komponisten erworben. So hat beispielsweise der argentinische Komponist Alberto Ginastera Dartmouth „nicht nur als eine prächtige Sommerschule, sondern als das wichtigste Festival für zeitgenössische Musik in der ganzen Welt" bezeichnet.

Für dieses Urteil gibt es einleuchtende statistische

Gründe, auf die ich sogleich zu sprechen komme. Doch der erste Anhaltspunkt für die Qualität der am Dartmouth-College gebotenen Leistungen liegt schon im Namen: „Congregation of the Arts" (Vereinigung der Künste). Zunächst einmal beschäftigt man sich hier nicht ausschließlich mit Musik, sondern auch mit den anderen Künsten. Das geräumige luftige Hopkins Center umfaßt nicht nur den großen Spaulding-Konzertsaal mit 1100 Plätzen und einer ausgezeichneten Akustik, sondern auch eine Reihe von Theatern, Hörsälen, Übungsräumen, Galerien und Studios. Die gebotenen Möglichkeiten werden voll ausgenutzt. Dauernd gibt es Ausstellungen, Theateraufführungen und Filme, die etwa einen Querschnitt durch Arbeiten so verschiedener Regisseure wie Jean Renoir und Fred Zinnemann zeigen. Für Abwechslung und lebhaften Meinungsaustausch auf allen Gebieten ist gesorgt — es gibt Bildhauereistudenten, die nie ein Konzert versäumen, Musiker, die sich durch Malen oder den Besuch von Theater-the princi seats and theatres, l and studio program n

every spa theatre pe senting th noir and F take of a are sculpt musicians and studer poses as a advantage
entations.

Spaulding

troisième
spen Music montagneuse

ıs, la « Con-
des exemples à la musique is elle a déjà
rs éminents.
nple, nomma
nifique école us important
poraines ».
tatistiques et ıs la clé des titre même:
e n'y est pas
. Le spacieux
le le festival
ipal — 1100
vaste chaîne
des salles de lios pour granuel tient enublant chaque
le représenta-
inéma présen-
ıssi divers que
un important ts secteurs — ıquent pas un
ıt en peignant
âtre, des étu-
, qui suivent

chen komme.
Qualität der istungen liegt ıe Arts" (Verıal beschäftigt
t Musik, son-
Das geräumige ur den großen
zen und einer ch eine Reihe men, Galerien keiten werden Ausstellungen,
e etwa einen iedener Regis-emann zeigen.
ungsaustausch ot Bildhauereimen, Musiker, ı von Theater-

the principal Spaulding Auditorium, with 1,000 seats and excellent acoustics, but a wide range of theatres, lecture halls, practice rooms, art galleries, and studios for graphic and other arts. The annual program makes full use of these facilities, filling every spare moment with art shows, repertory theatre performances, and film retrospectives presenting the work of directors as diverse as Jean Renoir and Fred Zinnemann. There is much give and take of activity among the various fields—there are sculpture students who never miss a concert, musicians who relax by painting or seeing plays, and students in residence for such unrelated purposes as attending summer law courses who take advantage of the whole spectrum of artistic presentations.

par exemple des cours d'été de droit et qui profitent des avantages du programme artistique.
Et puis, il y a le choix significatif du mot « congrégation » plutôt que « festival ». Dartmouth aime, bien sûr, attirer des spectateurs. Mais la riche université qui dirige la congrégation la considère plutôt comme un projet éducatif que comme pourvoyeur de loisirs, de toute façon d'un niveau élevé. Et lorsque les participants eux-mêmes se donnent pour but principal la réalisation artistique, la satisfaction du public en sera d'autant plus profonde.
L'organisation musicale de la Congrégation fut placée, dès le début, entre les mains du directeur musical du Dartmouth College, Mario di Bonaventura. Elève de Nadia Boulanger, d'Igor Markevich et de Luigi Dallapiccola, il cumule les fonctions de

Spaulding Auditorium

And then there is the significant choice of the word "congregation" rather than "festival". Dartmouth likes, of course, to attract spectators. But the wealthy and respected university that runs the Congregation sees it rather as an educational project than as a purveyor of entertainment, on however lofty a plane. Paradoxically, as often happens when the pursuit of artistic achievement by the participants themselves is the principal concern, the result is a far more profound satisfaction for the audience too.

The musical organisation of the Congregation has, from the start, been in the hands of Dartmouth College's director of music, Mario di Bonaventura. A former student of Nadia Boulanger, Igor Markevich and Luigi Dallapiccola, he is a rare combination of conductor, teacher, and administrator. His work has brought him several awards, and he is beginning to develop an international career as a conductor—last September he was the first American ever to conduct at the autumn music festival in Warsaw.

His central pursuit, however, is the Dartmouth Congregation. He spends several months of each year travelling around Europe and America listening to music, meeting composers, and building new projects. His conception of the problems involved is bold but practical. "Everyone talks these days", he says, "about the so-called gap between composers and public. What tends to be forgotten is the gap, at least equally important, between composers and performers. When students come here for the first time, I often find that they have no real notion of what composers are trying to do today. It's this situation that our programme is chef d'orchestre, de professeur et d'administrateur, ce qui est rare. Par son travail il s'est acquis beaucoup d'estime et il commence une carrière internationale de chef d'orchestre. En septembre dernier, il fut le premier Américain à avoir dirigé au Festival Musical d'Automne de Varsovie.

Mais son intérêt principal va à la congrégation de Dartmouth. Il passe plusieurs mois par année à voyager à travers l'Europe et l'Amérique pour écouter de la musique, voir des compositeurs et faire de nouveaux projets. Sa conception des problèmes est audacieuse mais du domaine des possibilités. « Chacun parle aujourd'hui », dit-il, « d'un certain fossé qui sépare les compositeurs du public. Ce que l'on a tendance à oublier, c'est qu'il existe un fossé tout aussi important entre les compositeurs et les exécutants. Lorsque des étudiants viennent ici pour la première fois, je trouve souvent qu'ils n'ont pas de véritable notion de ce qu'essaient de faire les compositeurs aujourd'hui. C'est cette situation que nous devons affronter. Lorsque nous invitons un compositeur, nous nous efforçons d'explorer sa production en profondeur. Souvent on joue jusqu'à une douzaine de ses œuvres durant ses deux semaines de séjour. Il en dirige quelques-unes lui-même, il les supervise toutes. Et, en plus des conférences qu'il donne, il se tient souvent à la disposition des étudiants. »

Voyons un peu comment cela fonctionne en pratique. Durant les six premières années de la Congrégation, de 1963 à 1968 (avec un programme préliminaire d'une semaine en septembre 1962, lors de l'ouverture du Hopkins Center) trente-huit œuvres furent jouées en première mondiale à Dartmouth. A côté d'une douzaine de compositeurs aufführungen entspannen, demgegenüber gibt es aber auch ortsansässige Jurastudenten, die ebenfalls von den weitgespannten künstlerischen Darbietungen profitieren.

Erhebliche Bedeutung kommt der Wahl des Wortes „Congregation" zu. Natürlich möchte Dartmouth Zuschauer anlocken. Aber die wohlhabende und angesehene Universität, die die „Congregation of the Arts" durchführt, möchte die Veranstaltung als Lehr- bzw. Bildungsvorhaben gewertet und nicht zu einem Unterhaltungsprogramm herabgewürdigt wissen, unabhängig davon, wie hoch das Niveau auch sein mag. Paradoxerweise, wie es oft geschieht, wenn das Streben nach künstlerischer Leistung für die Teilnehmer selber das Hauptanliegen bildet, ist das Ergebnis auch für die Zuhörer sehr befriedigend.

Die musikalische Organisation der „Congregation" liegt von Anfang an in den Händen des Musikdirektors am Dartmouth College, Mario di Bonaventura. Als Schüler von Nadia Boulanger, Igor Markewitsch und Luigi Dallapiccola stellt er eine seltene Mischung aus Dirigent, Lehrer und Verwaltungsfachmann dar. Seine Arbeit hat ihm einige Auszeichnungen eingebracht, und er ist auf dem besten Wege, eine internationale Karriere als Dirigent zu machen: Im September vorigen Jahres war er der erste Amerikaner, der jemals beim Warschauer Herbst dirigierte.

Seine Hauptarbeit gilt jedoch der „Dartmouth Congregation". Einige Monate jeden Jahres reist er in Europa und Amerika umher, hört Musik, trifft sich mit Komponisten und arbeitet neue Pläne aus. Seine Konzeption ist durchaus neuartig, aber auch zweckmäßig. „Jeder", sagt er, „redet heute über die sogenannte Kluft zwischen Komponisten und Publikum. Was dabei anscheinend vergessen wird, ist die zumindest ebenso wichtige Kluft zwischen designed to meet. For one thing, when we invite a composer, we really try to explore his output in depth. Often as many as a dozen of his works will be performed during the two weeks he is here. Some he conducts himself, all of them he supervises. And besides lecturing, he is often available to the students informally too."

How this works in practice is best seen from the figures. In the first six years of the Congregation, from 1963 to 1968 (with a preliminary week-long programme in September, 1962, when Hopkins Center opened), thirty-eight works received their américains, notons les Polonais Bacewicz, Baird, Penderecki, le Danois Niels Viggo Benetzon, l'Allemand Blacher, les Italiens Malipiero et Petrassi et le Français Milhaud. Il y eut également 35 premières pour les Etats-Unis: six œuvres de Bentzon, trois de Blacher, cinq de Henze, une de Kodály, quatre de Lutoslawski et trois de Frank Martin. Ces premières furent réalisées dans le cadre du programme des compositeurs résidants. Chaque année, trois compositeurs séjournent deux semaines de suite, au début, au milieu et à la fin des huit semaines de festival. En plus des six noms cités, les composi-

Bonaventura, Lutoslawski

Komponisten und ausübenden Musikern. Wenn Studenten zum ersten Mal hierherkommen, stelle ich oft fest, daß sie keine wirkliche Vorstellung von dem haben, was die Komponisten heute auszusagen versuchen. Dieser Situation soll unser Programm abhelfen. Wenn wir einen Komponisten einladen, bemühen wir uns, seine Produktion wirklich auszuloten. Oft werden nicht weniger als ein Dutzend seiner Werke in den zwei Wochen seiner Anwesenheit aufgeführt. Einige dirigiert er selber, alle werden jedoch unter seiner Leitung aufgeführt. Und neben seinen Vorlesungen steht er den Studenten ganz zwanglos zur Verfügung."

Wie dies nun in der Praxis funktioniert, läßt sich am besten aus den Zahlen ersehen. In den ersten sechs Jahren der „Congregation", d. h. von 1963 bis 1968 (mit einem einwöchigen Vorprogramm im September 1962, als das Hopkins Center eröffnet wurde), erlebten achtunddreißig Werke in Dartmouth ihre Uraufführung. Abgesehen von einem Dutzend amerikanischer Komponisten waren die Polen Bacewicz, Baird und Penderecki, der Däne Niels Viggo Bentzon, der Deutsche Blacher, die Italiener Malipiero und Petrassi sowie der Franzose Milhaud vertreten. Außerdem fanden fünfunddreißig amerikanische Erstaufführungen statt, darunter sechs Werke von Bentzon, drei von Blacher, fünf von Henze, ein Werk von Kodály, vier Werke von Lutoslawski und drei von Frank Martin. Alle diese Komponisten wohnten im Rahmen der an sie ergangenen Einladungen in Hanover; dieses „composer-in-residence"-Programm bildet den schöpferischen Kern des Ganzen. Drei Komponisten wohnen jedes Jahr am Ort ihrer Tätigkeit, und zwar jeweils zwei Wochen zu Beginn, in der Mitte und am Ende des achtwöchigen Programms. Weitere Komponisten, die eine Einladung nach Dartmouth angenommen haben, sind Easley Blackwood, Elliott world premieres at Dartmouth. Apart from a dozen American composers, those represented have included the Poles Bacewicz, Baird, and Penderecki, the Dane Niels Viggo Bentzon, the German Blacher, the Italians Malipiero and Petrassi, and the Frenchman Milhaud. In addition there were thirty-five United States premieres, including six works by Bentzon, three by Blacher, five by Henze, one by Kodály, four by Lutoslawski, and three by Frank Martin. All these latter have been in connection teurs qui ont accepté une invitation à Dartmouth sont Easley Blackwood, Elliott Carter, Carlos Chavez, Copland, Henry Cowell, Ross Lee Finney, Ginastera, Krenek, Peter Mennin, Vincent Persichetti et Walter Piston. 318 œuvres contemporaines furent exécutées ces six dernières années, 189 d'entre elles par dix-sept compositeurs en séjour. En outre, les 7 premières Congrégations (1969 compris) ont commandé 32 œuvres; Bonaventura a tenté d'enrichir rationnellement le répertoire en encourageant les Carter, Carlos Chavez, Copland, Henry Cowell, Ross Lee Finney, Ginastera, Krenek, Peter Mennin, Vincent Persichetti und Walter Piston. In diesen sechs Jahren wurden 318 zeitgenössische Werke aufgeführt, davon 189 durch siebzehn am Ort wohnende Komponisten. Als ob damit nicht genug sei, wurden von den ersten sieben „Congregations" (einschließlich 1969) außerdem noch zweiunddreißig Werke in Auftrag gegeben; hierbei hat Bonaventura versucht, einen praktischen Beitrag zum Repertoire zu leisten, indem er Komponisten aufforderte, in solchen vernachlässigten Formen wie der Kammersymphonie und dem Klarinettenkonzert zu schreiben.

Who would have thought that one can have fun with electronic music. Students in the Dartmouth Studio.

Bei allem Nachdruck auf zeitgenössischer Musik betont Bonaventura: „Moderne Musik darf nicht als ein gesonderter Fall behandelt werden. Sie muß neben den klassischen Werken bestehen und muß ihre Beziehung zur Tradition unter Beweis stellen. So wollte ich zum Beispiel sehen, wie Henzes Erste Symphonie neben Mozarts ‚Prager' klingt; daher setzte ich beide einfach auf ein und dasselbe Programm". Unter den sechzehn Konzerten, die jeden Sommer gegeben werden, findet sich kaum jemals ein Programm, in dem ausschließlich zeitgenössische Musik geboten wird.

Dem Symphonie-Orchester der „Congregation" gehören Mitglieder von Symphonie-Orchestern des ganzen Landes an — aus Houston, New Orleans, Cincinnati und anderen Orten —, die die Botschaft moderner Musik mit in ihre eigenen Orchester zurückbringen. Es gibt ferner etwa achtzig College- und Konservatoriumsstudenten (viele mit Stipendien) sowie Einheimische, die zusammen mit einer with Dartmouth's composer-in-residence program, which is the creative core of its format. Three composers are in residence each year, for two weeks apiece at the beginning, middle, and end of the eight-week progamme. In addition to the six just named, composers who have accepted Dartmouth's invitation include Easley Blackwood, Elliott Carter, Carlos Chavez, Copland, Henry Cowell, Ross Lee Finney, Ginastera, Krenek, Peter Mennin, Vincent Persichetti, and Walter Piston. In those six years, 318 contemporary works were performed, 189 of them by seventeen composers-in-residence. As if that were not enough, the first seven Congregations (including 1969) have commissioned thirty-two works, and in this area Bonaventura has tried to make a rational contribution to the repertoire by encouraging composers to write in such neglected forms as the chamber symphony and the clarinet concerto.

With all this emphasis on the contemporary, Bonaventura stresses that "Modern music mustn't be treated like a kind of isolation case. It has to stand up alongside classical works, and it has to demonstrate its relationship to tradition. For instance, I wanted to see how Henze's First Symphony would sound next to Mozart's 'Prague', so I simply put them together." Among the sixteen concerts presented at Dartmouth each summer, there is hardly ever a programme in which contemporary music stands by itself.

The Dartmouth Symphony Orchestra includes a number of players from symphony orchestras around the country—Houston, New Orleans, Cincinnati, and other places—who help by carrying the message back to their own organisations. There are also about eighty college and conservatory students (many on scholarships) and local residents, compositeurs à écrire des morceaux dans des formes aussi négligées aujourd'hui que la symphonie de chambre ou le concerto pour clarinette.

En mettant ainsi l'accent sur le contemporain, Bonaventura souligne que « la musique moderne ne doit pas être traitée comme un cas isolé. Elle doit être confrontée aux œuvres classiques pour que soient décelés ses liens avec la musique traditionnelle. Par exemple, j'ai voulu voir quel effet ferait la Première Symphonie de Henze à côte de la Symphonie de Prague de Mozart. Aussi je les ai mises au même programme ». Dans les 16 concerts présentés chaque été à Dartmouth, il n'y a presque aucun programme composé exclusivement de musique contemporaine.

L'Orchestre Symphonique de Dartmouth comprend un certain nombre de musiciens d'orchestres symphoniques du pays — Houston, New Orleans, Cincinnati et d'autres villes — qui rapportent ensuite dans leur propre orchestre l'expérience de la musique contemporaine. Il y a aussi environ quatre-vingts étudiants d'universités et de conservatoires (plusieurs d'entre eux sont boursiers) et des résidents locaux qui forment, avec un noyau de chefs de pupitre, les possibilités musicales de la Congrégation. Un étudiant aura souvent, par exemple, à jouer du second hautbois à côté de son professeur et pourra observer de près comment son professeur vient à bout des difficultés d'exécution. Au sujet de la qualité du jeu, Bonaventura rapporte: « Henze et Blacher — ainsi que Krenek et Frank Martin — ont été plus touchés par l'exécution de leurs œuvres à Dartmouth que par celle de plusieurs de nos grands orchestres ce qui nous a créé des difficultés avec les grands orchestres patentés. On nous a souvent tenu rigueur de ce que notre entreprise supportée par aucune fondation ou subvention du Gouvernement soit Elite von Konzertmeistern das Orchester bilden. Es passiert oft, daß ein Student etwa die zweite Oboe auf dem Platz neben seinem Lehrer spielt, wobei er aus nächster Nähe beobachten kann, wie der Lehrer die Schwierigkeiten neuer Musik meistert.

Was das spieltechnische Niveau betrifft, weiß Bonaventura zu berichten, daß „wir durch Henzes, Blachers, Kreneks und Frank Martins Bemerkungen, hiesige Aufführungen ihrer Werke seien den Bemühungen einiger unserer größten Orchester überlegen gewesen, uns die Sympathien im ‚Musikgeschäft' teilweise verscherzt haben. Es wird uns sehr übelgenommen, daß dieses durch Stiftungs- oder Regierungsgelder in keiner Weise unterstützte ‚parvenühafte' Unternehmen Aufführungen von derart ungewöhnlicher Qualität zustande bringt. Als die ‚graue Eminenz' hinter diesen unsauberen Machenschaften wiederhole ich: Man braucht zur vorhandenen Literatur ‚lediglich' die passenden Musiker."

Hans Werner Henze beschrieb die bei seinem Aufenthalt 1967 gesammelten Eindrücke so: „Ich finde es sehr ergreifend: Es ist wie jene gänzlich der Kunst geweihte Landschaft, von der Goethe einst sprach." Und über die Bedeutung seines Aufenthaltes in Hanover für ihn selbst meinte Henze: „Man kann hier soviel über sich selber lernen. Wenn man einmal alle anderen Vorzüge dieses Ortes beiseite läßt, ist es doch so: Jede Minute jeder Stunde jedes Tages, den man sich hier aufhält, wird man mit seiner eigenen Vergangenheit konfrontiert. Es gibt so vieles neu zu überdenken, neu zu werten, neu zu beurteilen. Und wenn man abreist, ist man zwangsläufig ein anderer Mensch als bei der An-together with a nucleus of first-desk men who form the Congregation's music faculty. A student will often find himself playing, say, second oboe in the next chair to his teacher, and he can observe at close quarters how the teacher copes with the conditions of actual performance. As for the standard of playing, Bonaventura reports that "Henze's and Blacher's remarks—Krenek's and Frank Martin's, also—to the effect that performances given them here were superior to the efforts of several of our major orchestras have actually alienated us in the 'music business'. It is greatly resented that this 'upstart' venture, unsupported by any Foundation or government money, should produce performances of such unusual quality. As the 'eminence grise' behind this foul play, I repeat: one need 'only' match literature to performers."

The all-round nature of the Dartmouth experience was well expressed by Hans Werner Henze during his 1967 residence: "I find it very touching: it's parvenue à des réalisations d'une qualité inhabituelle. En tant « qu'éminence grise » de cette entreprise, je ne peux que répéter: il suffit de trouver les interprètes préparés à cette littérature musicale. »

Hans Werner Henze

Durant son séjour en 1967, Hans Werner Henze a bien exprimé le caractère universel de l'expérience de Dartmouth: « Je trouve cela très touchant: je ne peux m'empêcher de penser à Goethe qui, dans l'une de ses nouvelles, décrit un paysage entièrement dédié à l'art ». Et parlant de sa valeur pour le compositeur, il dit: « L'on peut y apprendre tant de choses sur soi-même. Ne faisons pas trop de compliments et disons simplement: chaque minute, chaque heure et chaque jour que vous passez ici, vous êtes enveloppé de votre propre passé. Il y a tellement à repenser, à réévaluer, à reclasser. Au moment du départ, vous n'êtes plus le même qu'à votre arrivée. Oui, c'est une expérience réellement créatrice ». Lorsqu'on demande à Henze s'il y avait quelque chose de comparable en Europe, sa réponse ne se fit pas attendre: « Non ».

Si à Dartmouth la musique contemporaine tient la première place, à Tanglewood elle n'est qu'un aspect d'une organisation beaucoup plus ample et compliquée. Les 210 âcres de propriété rurale de Tanglewood furent données en 1936 à l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston par Mrs. Andrew Hepburn et Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan comme quartier pour le Festival Symphonique de Berkshire, existant alors depuis deux ans. L'orchestre Symphonique de Boston donne chaque été vingt-quatre concerts dans la salle de concerts de semi plein-air—environ 6.000 sièges sans compter les pelouses environnantes; l'orchestre de chambre du Boston Symphony et des artistes invités s'y exécutent également.

En 1940, Serge Koussevitzky, alors directeur musical de l'Orchestre, fonda le Centre Musical de Berk-kunft. Ja, es ist ein wahrhaft schöpferisches Erlebnis." Auf die Frage, ob es irgendetwas in Europa gebe, das sich mit Dartmouth vergleichen ließe, antwortete Henze mit einem prompten, schlichten und uneingeschränkten „Nein!".

Im Gegensatz zu Dartmouth, wo die zeitgenössische Musik im Mittelpunkt des Interesses steht, bildet sie in Tanglewood lediglich einen Aspekt innerhalb eines umfangreicheren und komplizierter gegliederten Planes. Das 210 Morgen große Landgut Tanglewood wurde dem Bostoner Symphonieorchester im Jahre 1936 von Mrs. Andrew Hepburn und Mary Aspinwall Tappan als Wirkungsstätte für das „Berkshire Symphonic Festival" vermacht, das damals gerade zwei Jahre bestand. In der halboffenen Musikhalle mit rund 6000 Plätzen und zusätzlichem Raum auf den umgebenden Rasenflächen finden jetzt jeden Sommer vierundzwanzig Wochenendaufführungen des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters sowie Konzerte mit den Boston Symphony Chamber Players und in Tanglewood zu Gast weilenden Künstlern statt.

1940 gründete Serge Koussevitzky, der damalige musikalische Leiter des Orchesters, das „Berkshire Music Center" als Ausbildungsstätte für junge Musiker. Nach seinem Tode im Jahre 1951 trat Charles Munch an seine Stelle; Erich Leinsdorf (der in der nächsten Saison seine Tätigkeit aufgibt) leitet das „Berkshire Music Center" seit 1963. Das „Berkshire Festival" als Ganzes befaßt sich nur am Rande mit zeitgenössischer Musik, und lediglich im Rahmen des „Music Center" finden Aufführungen zeitgenössischer Musik statt. Der Kompositionsabteilung stand fünfundzwanzig Jahre Aaron Copland like Goethe's idea, in one of his novels, of a landscape entirely devoted to art." And speaking of its value to the composer, he said: "You can learn so much about yourself here. Leaving aside all the other compliments this place has had, the thing is this: every minute of every hour of every day that you're here, you are involved with your own past. There is so much rethinking, so much reassessment, so much re-evaluation to do. And when you leave you are bound to be a different person from when you came. Yes, it's a truly creative experience." When asked whether there was anything in Europe he could compare Dartmouth with, Henze's answer was a prompt, simple, and unqualified "No!"

In contrast to Dartmouth, where it is the centre of focus, contemporary music at Tanglewood is just one aspect of a much larger and more complicated set-up. The 210-acre country estate of Tanglewood was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1936 by Mrs. Andrew Hepburn and Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan as a home for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, then two years old. In the semi-open-air Music Shed, with seats for nearly 6,000 and additional room on surrounding lawns, the Festival now presents twenty-four weekend performances each summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and concerts by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and guest artists.

In 1940 Serge Koussevitzky, then music director of the Orchestra, founded the Berkshire Music Center as a professional and artistic training ground for young musicians. After his death in 1951, he was succeeded by Charles Munch, and Erich Leinsdorf (who leaves next season) has been director of the Center since 1963. The Berkshire Festival as a whole is only marginally concerned with contemporary music, and it is within the framework shire comme centre de perfectionnement professionnel et artistique pour de jeunes musiciens. Après sa mort, en 1951, Charles Munch lui succéda; Erich Leinsdorf (qui s'en ira lors de la prochaine saison) est le directeur du Centre depuis 1963. Le Festival de Berkshire dans son ensemble ne s'occupe que secondairement de la musique contemporaine et cela dans le cadre du Centre Musical. La section de composition fut dirigée pendant les vingt-cinq premières années par Aaron Copland. Après son départ, en 1965, Gunther Schuller, l'un des plus grands compositeurs d'Amérique, lui succéda à la tête des activités de musique contemporaine. Chef d'orchestre distingué, expert en jazz et pionnier des rapprochements « third-stream » entre le jazz et l'expression symphonique, éducateur aux idées nouvelles et stimulantes quant à la façon d'enseigner la musique pour former ce qu'il nomme « le musicien total », Schuller accepta en 1967 la présidence du Conservatoire de New England. Alors que l'Université de Boston assure au Centre Musical de Berkshire des cours de musique conventionnelle et des cours en d'autres arts, le Conservatoire de New England, mené par Schuller, s'occupe de musique vor. Als er 1965 in den Ruhestand trat, wurde die Leitung der Abteilung für zeitgenössische Musik von Gunther Schuller, einem der führenden amerikanischen Komponisten, übernommen. Als ausgezeichneter Dirigent, Jazz-Experte und Vorkämpfer der „third-stream"-Annäherung zwischen Jazz und Symphonik sowie als Lehrer mit frischen und anregenden Ideen in bezug auf das, was er die Ausbildung von „Vollblutmusikern" nennt, übernahm Schuller 1967 die Direktion des „New England Conservatory". Während die Universität von Boston für das „Berkshire Music Center" die Seminare und Kurse in herkömmlicher Musik sowie in anderen Künsten durchführt, vertritt das „New England Conservatory" mit Schuller an der Spitze die Sache der zeitgenössischen Musik. Neben den regelmäßigen Kompositionskursen vermitteln Seminare über nichtabendländische Musik, Jazz, die jüngsten Neuerungen in der Theorielehre und über fortschrittliche Instrumentaltechniken ein charakteristisches Bild von Schullers objektiver und unvoreingenommener Auffassung.

Erich Leinsdorf

Was die eigentliche Aufführungspraxis betrifft, zieht man es in Tanglewood anders als in Hanover vor, zeitgenössische Musik „unverwässert" zu präsentieren. Seit 1963 (als Schuller zum ersten Mal in Tanglewood auftrat) ist das Hauptereignis das einwöchige (jetzt auf zwei Wochen ausgedehnte) Festival für Zeitgenössische Amerikanische Musik, das im Jahre 1968 in Erkenntnis des sich ständig erweiternden musikalischen Horizonts das einschränkende Wort „amerikanisch" fortan fallenließ.

In der Frühzeit des „Center" wurde die Vergabe von Kompositionsaufträgen in erster Linie von der of the Music Center that the contemporary activities take place. The Composition Department was headed for the first twenty-five years by Aaron Copland. When he retired in 1965, the direction of contemporary music activities was taken over by Gunther Schuller. A fine conductor, an expert on jazz and pioneer of "third-stream" rapprochements between jazz and symphonic media, and an educator with fresh and stimulating ideas on how music can be taught to produce what he calls "total musicians", Schuller in 1967 took up the post of president at the New England Conservatory. While Boston University provides the Berkshire Music Center's conventional music courses and courses in other arts, it is the New England Conservatory, spearheaded by Schuller, that looks after contemporary matters. Apart from the regular contemporary composition courses seminars in non-Western music, jazz, recent innovations in the teaching of theory, and advanced instrumental techniques have exemplified Schuller's outward-looking approach.

As far as actual performances are concerned, Tanglewood, unlike Dartmouth, prefers to present contemporary music undiluted. Since 1963 (which was also the year when Schuller made his entrance on the Tanglewood scene), the principal channel has been the one-week (now expanded to two weeks) Festival of Contemporary American Music, which in 1968 dropped the "American" from its title in recognition of broadening horizons.

In the early years of the Center, the main brunt of commissioning was borne by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. One very distinguished result of the Foundation's generosity was Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes", which, after its world premiere at Sadler's Wells, London, in 1945, received its first contemporaine. En plus des cours réguliers de composition contemporaine, des séminaires de musique non-occidentale, le jazz, des innovations récentes dans l'enseignement de la théorie et des techniques instrumentales avancées sont autant d'exemples de l'esprit large et prévoyant de Schuller.

Si nous considérons les exécutions de Tanglewood, nous remarquons qu'à la différence de Dartmouth, la musique contemporaine y est présentée de façon non diluée. Depuis 1963 (année également de l'arrivée de Schuller à Tanglewood) le canal principal fut le Festival de Musique Contemporaine Américaine d'une durée d'une semaine (il s'échelonne maintenant sur deux semaines) qui, en 1968, supprima de son titre le mot « Américaine », acceptant ainsi d'élargir son horizon.

Durant les premières années du Centre, la Fondation Musicale Koussevitzky subventionna les principales commandes. On lui doit, par exemple, le « Peter Grimes » de Benjamin Britten, qui, après sa première mondiale au Sadler's Wells à Londres en 1945, fut joué l'année suivante pour la premiere fois en Amérique, sous la direction de Leonard Bernstein à Tanglewood. Jusqu'en 1960, la fondation Koussevitzky fit la commande de nombreuses œuvres, comprenant des opéras de Meyerowitz, Toch, Mennini et Bucci, plusieurs de ces travaux furent exécutés à Tanglewood.

Entretemps une autre agence de commandes fit son apparition, la Fondation Musicale Fromm, fondée et dirigée par Paul Fromm, un importateur de vin de Chicago qui fit don des bénéfices de son entreprise aux enfants nécessiteux et à la musique contemporaine. Dès 1957, la Fondation Fromm se chargea de subventionner des concerts de musique contemporaine à Tanglewood, elle fit également une série de Koussewitzky-Musikstiftung getragen. Ein sehr bemerkenswertes Resultat der Großzügigkeit dieser Stiftung war Benjamin Brittens Oper „Peter Grimes", die nach ihrer Uraufführung am Londoner „Sadler's Wells Theatre" im Jahre 1945 ihre amerikanische Erstaufführung im folgenden Jahr unter der Leitung von Leonard Bernstein in Tanglewood erlebte. Bis 1960 vergab die Koussewitzky-Stiftung zahlreiche Kompositionsaufträge, darunter Opern von Meyerowitz, Toch, Mennini und Bucci; viele dieser Auftragswerke wurden in Tanglewood aufgeführt.

Inzwischen war eine weitere Stiftung, die Kompositionsaufträge vergibt, in Erscheinung getreten: die Frommsche Musikstiftung, ein von Paul Fromm, einem Chikagoer Weinimporteur, gegründetes und geleitetes Unternehmen. Die Einnahmen aus seinem Geschäft verwendet Paul Fromm zur Unterstützung von Waisenkindern und zur Förderung zeitgenössischer Musik. 1957 begann die Frommsche Stiftung ein Programm zur Förderung von Aufführungen zeitgenössischer Musik in Tanglewood und vergab außerdem eine Reihe von Kompositionsaufträgen, die noch immer im Mittelpunkt der Tätigkeit des „Berkshire Music Center" stehen. Mit einer Unterbrechung von drei Jahren, nämlich von 1961 bis 1963, als keine Aufträge vergeben wurden, entstanden in den Jahren 1957 bis 1969 achtunddreißig Auftragswerke, hauptsächlich aus der Feder jüngerer amerikanischer Komponisten. Easley Blackwood, Irving Fine, David Diamond, Ingolf Dahl, Luciano Berio, Mario Davidovsky und Murray Schafer gehören zu den einem größeren Kreis bekannt gewordenen Komponisten, die aus dem Programm Nutzen gezogen haben, während einige andere erst anfangen, sich einen internationalen Namen zu American performance under Leonard Bernstein's direction at Tanglewood the following year. Down to 1960, the Koussevitzky Foundation awarded large numbers of commissions, including operas by Meyerowitz, Toch, Mennini, and Bucci, and many of the works that resulted were performed at Tanglewood.

Meanwhile another commissioning agency had come on the scene. This is the Fromm Music Foundation, founded and headed by Paul Fromm, a Chicago wine-importer who has devoted his business profits to the causes of deprived children and contemporary music. In 1957, the Fromm Foundation started a programme to support the performcommandes qui forment une des activités centrales du Centre Musical de Berkshire. Entre 1957 et 1969 (avec trois années d'interruption entre 1961 et 1963 durant lesquelles il n'y en eut pas) trente-huit commandes, composées principalement par de jeunes Américains, furent exécutées. Easley Blackwood, Irving Fine, David Diamond, Ingolf Dahl, Luciano Berio, Mario Davidovsky et Murray Schafer sont les noms les plus connus parmi ceux qui ont bénéficié du programme de subventions; de nombreux autres compositeurs commencent maintenant à pouvoir faire leurs preuves sur la scène internationale. La Fondation Fromm a également effectué un travail fort utile en favorisant la parution de disques ance of contemporary music at Tanglewood, and it also instituted a series of commissions which is still central to the Berkshire Music Center's activity. With a gap of three years from 1961 to 1963, when there were no commissions, the years from 1957 to 1969 have produced thirty-eight commissions, principally from younger American composers. Easley Blackwood, Irving Fine, David Diamond, Ingolf Dahl, Luciano Berio, Mario Davidovsky, and Murray Schafer are among the more widely known of those who have benefitted from the programme, and several others are now beginning to make their mark on the international scene. Another area in which the Fromm Foundation has done valuable work is in subsidising commercial recordings of contemporary music, whether commissioned by the Foundation or not.

Gunther Schuller leading a rehearsal at Tanglewood

Like Dartmouth, Tanglewood has an impressive list of visiting composers, though the number of their works performed is smaller. Hindemith shared the contemporary composition courses with Copland in 1940 and 1941, and the visitors since then have been Stravinsky, Honegger, Barber, Milhaud, Messiaen, Ibert, Dallapiccola, Chavez, Toch, Sessions, Blacher, Petrassi, Babbitt, Foss, Kirchner, Berio, Gerhard, Fortner, Hamilton, Lutoslawski, Xenakis, Berger, Carter, Martino, Rochberg, Perle, and Krenek. Ross Lee Finney, Seymour Shifrin, Earle Brown, Robert Cogan, Mario Davidovsky, and Andrew Imbrie have contributed on a part-time basis, and Alexander Goehr and Luciano Berio are the guests for 1969.

Repertoire breakdown for 1968, a typical eight-week session of the Music Center, shows that of 120 works performed, exactly one-third were by contemporary composers. This figure is roughly commerciaux de musique contemporaine, donnés ou non en commission par la Fondation.

Comme à Dartmouth, de nombreux compositeurs se rendent à Tanglewood, bien qu'on y joue moins de leurs œuvres. En 1940 et 1941, Hindemith et Copland se partagèrent les cours de composition contemporaine, et depuis, Tanglewood accueillit Stravinsky, Honegger, Barber, Milhaud, Messiaen, Ibert, Dallapiccola, Chavez, Toch, Sessions, Blacher, Petrassi, Babbitt, Foss, Kirchner, Berio, Gerhard, Fortner, Hamilton, Lutoslawski, Xenakis, Berger, Carter, Martino, Rochberg, Perle et Krenek. Ross Lee Finney, Seymour Shifrin, Earle Brown, Robert Cogan, Mario Davidovsky et Andrew Imbrie y ont contribué temporairement et Alexander Goehr et Luciano Berio sont les hôtes de 1969.

Un aperçu du répertoire de 1968, une session typique de huit semaines du Centre Musical, montre que sur 120 œuvres jouées, un tiers exactement sont des morceaux de compositeurs contemporains, c'est-à-dire environ deux fois moins que durant la même période à Dartmouth.

Si ces statistiques semblent accorder plus d'importance à Dartmouth, il ne faut pas oublier que le principal effort du Festival de Berkshire porte sur d'autres domaines, par exemple sur le programme de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston, qui ne comporte qu'une petite proportion de compositions contemporaines. Le Festival de l'Ecole Musicale d'Aspen dans le Colorado est également orienté surtout vers le répertoire classique et romantique, en dépit de ses travaux importants sur le vingtième siècle. Sur 140 travaux enregistrés au programme d'Aspen en 1968, on n'en compte environ qu'un cinquième de contemporains.

Aspen, qui célèbre en 1969 son vingtième anniver-machen. Ein weiteres Gebiet, auf dem die Fromm-Stiftung wertvolle Arbeit geleistet hat, ist die finanzielle Unterstützung von Schallplattenaufnahmen zeitgenössischer Werke, unabhängig davon, ob sie von der Stiftung in Auftrag gegeben worden waren oder nicht.

Wie Dartmouth kann auch Tanglewood eine eindrucksvolle Liste von Gastkomponisten vorweisen, obwohl die Zahl ihrer aufgeführten Werke geringer ist. 1940 und 1941 beteiligte sich Hindemith gemeinsam mit Copland an den Kompositionskursen; zu den Komponisten, die seit jener Zeit zu Gast waren, gehören Strawinsky, Honegger, Barber, Milhaud, Messiaen, Ibert, Dallapiccola, Chavez, Toch, Sessions, Blacher, Petrassi, Babbitt, Foss, Kirchner, Berio, Gerhard, Fortner, Hamilton, Lutoslawski, Xenakis, Berger, Carter, Martinů, Rochberg, Perle und Krenek. Ross Lee Finney, Seymour Shifrin, Earle Brown, Robert Cogan, Mario Davidovsky und Andrew Imbrie leisteten ebenfalls einen zeitlich begrenzten Beitrag. Alexander Goehr und Luciano Berio sind die Gastkomponisten des Jahres 1969.

Eine Aufschlüsselung des Programms für 1968, eines typischen achtwöchigen Semesters des „Center", zeigt, daß unter 120 aufgeführten Werken genau ein Drittel von zeitgenössischen Komponisten stammte. Diese Zahl stellt etwa die Hälfte des vergleichbaren Anteils zeitgenössischer Musik während des gleichen Zeitabschnitts in Dartmouth dar.

Wenn die statistischen Angaben für Dartmouth zu sprechen scheinen, so sollte man sich daran erinnern, daß das Berkshire-Festival seine Hauptstärke auf anderen Gebieten hat und offenbar auch durch die Programme des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters bestimmt ist, die naturgemäß einen wesentlich ge-npositeurs se oue moins de emith et Cop-position conccueillit Straessiaen, Ibert, lacher, Petras-

, donnés

hard, Fortner, erger, Carter,
Ross Lee Fin-
Robert Cogan,
y ont contri-
ehr et Luciano

ne session tyusical, montre xactement sont porains, c'est-urant la même

plus d'imporoublier que le hire porte sur le programme n, qui ne compositions con-
sicale d'Aspen
té surtout vers e, en dépit de ème siècle. Sur
ne d'Aspen en cinquième de

tième anniver-

half the comparable proportion during a similar period at Dartmouth.

If these statistics appear weighted toward Dartmouth's credit, it should be remembered that the Berkshire Festival's main strength lies in other areas, and also, obviously, in the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which naturally include a substantially lower proportion of contemporary works. The Aspen Music Festival and School in Colorado is likewise oriented towards a predominantly classical and romantic repertoire, in spite of its important work in the twentieth-century field. A count of 140 works listed in Aspen's 1968 program reveals that about one-fifth were contemporary.

Aspen, which celebrates its twentieth anniversary in 1969 and has been under the guidance of its dean, Gordon Hardy, since 1963, has not involved itself in commissioning ventures like those of Dartmouth and Tanglewood, and consequently cannot claim many world premieres. On the other hand, the Festival's Conference on Contemporary Music has enjoyed the residence of many well-known composers, both American and European. Inevitably, since the supply of good composers is not infinite, several of the same names crop up here as in the Dartmouth and Tanglewood lists. Visitors to Aspen have included Berio, Carter, Chavez, Copland, Diamond, Foss, Henze, Kirchner, Krenek, Mennin, Messiaen, Persichetti, Piston, Rieti, Sauguet, Schuman, Searle, Sessions, and Tippett, and Dallapiccola is the invited guest for 1969. In earlier seasons, there were sometimes two or three composers-in-residence, but since 1966 only one has been invited each year.

At the same time, Aspen's composition courses are saire, et que son doyen, Gordon Hardy, dirige depuis 1963, ne s'est pas lancé dans des aventures de commandes comme l'ont fait Dartmouth et Tanglewood, et ne peut, par conséquent, s'enorgueillir de nombreuses premières mondiales. Par contre, les Conférences du Festival sur la Musique Contemporaine ont incité plusieurs compositeurs célèbres à y séjourner, des Américains aussi bien que des Européens. Inévitablement, comme le nombre des bons compositeurs n'est pas illimité, on retrouvera à Aspen bien des noms que nous avons déjà vus sur les listes de Dartmouth et de Tanglewood: Berio, Carter, Chavez, Copland, Diamond, Foss, Henze, Kirchner, Krenek, Mennin, Messiaen, Persichetti, Piston, Rieti, Sauguet, Schuman, Searle, Sessions et Tippett; Dallapiccola est l'hôte de 1969. Avant 1966, il y avait parfois deux ou trois compositeurs en séjour, mais depuis, le Festival n'en a invité qu'un par an.

Gordon Hardy

Parallèlement, les cours de composition d'Aspen sont renforcés par la présence permanente de Darius Milhaud et de Charles Jones, qui se sont partagé la direction depuis la fondation de l'Ecole, et vsky und An-en zeitlich be-und Luciano

Jahres 1969.
ms für 1968,
ters des „Cenhrten Werken schen Kompo-twa die Hälfte ssischer Musik in Dartmouth

Dartmouth zu ch daran erin-ne Hauptstärke bar auch durch honieorchesters wesentlich ge-

ringeren Anteil zeitgenössischer Musik enthalten. Auch das Aspen-Musik-Festival in Colorado legt das Schwergewicht auf die klassischen und romantischen Werke, obwohl es gleichzeitig einen wichtigen Beitrag zur Musik des 20. Jahrhunderts leistet. Die im Programm von Aspen für das Jahr 1968 aufgeführten Werke stammen etwa zu einem Fünftel aus der Feder zeitgenössischer Komponisten.

Das Aspen-Festival, das 1969 sein zwanzigjähriges Bestehen feiert und seit 1963 unter der Leitung von Gordon Hardy steht, hat bisher im Gegensatz zu Dartmouth und Tanglewood keine Kompositionsaufträge vergeben und kann daher nicht mit zahlreichen Uraufführungen aufwarten. Andererseits konnte sich die im Rahmen dieses Festivals jeweils stattfindende Konferenz über zeitgenössische Musik der Anwesenheit vieler bekannter Komponisten sowohl aus Amerika als auch aus Europa erfreuen. Da die Zahl guter Komponisten nicht unbegrenzt ist, tauchen hier unvermeidlich zum Teil dieselben Namen auf wie in den Gästelisten von Dartmouth und Tanglewood. Zu den Besuchern in Aspen gehörten Berio, Carter, Chavez, Copland, Diamond, Foss, Henze, Kirchner, Krenek, Mennin, Messiaen, Persichetti, Piston, Rieti, Sauguet, Schuman, Searle, Sessions und Tippett; Dallapiccola ist für 1969 eingeladen. Früher hatten mitunter zwei oder drei Komponisten ihren vorübergehenden Wohnsitz in Aspen, doch seit 1966 wird jedes Jahr nur einer eingeladen.

Außerdem erhalten die Kompositionskurse in Aspen durch die ständige Anwesenheit von Darius Milhaud und Charles Jones Gewicht, die sich seit Gründung der angegliederten Schule die Leitung dieser Kurse geteilt haben; eine Reihe von Werken dieser beiden Komponisten wurde beim Aspen-Festival strengthened by the permanent presence of Darius Milhaud and Charles Jones, who have shared their direction since the School was founded, and a number of works by these two composers have had their first performances at the Festival. Several large-scale works by visiting composers have also received United States premieres, among them the operas "The Diary of a Madman" and "The Country Doctor" by Searle and Henze, and Tippett's Concerto for Orchestra. Most of the important premieres recently have been conducted by Walter Susskind, who became Festival concerts director in 1964 and music director three years later.

Ultimately, the value of any music festival or any music school depends on who can be attracted to perform, teach, or contribute works at it. Thus Dartmouth, Tanglewood, and Aspen each have their own special attractions to offer in any particular year. But all three of them make a continuing effort for the beleaguered cause of twentieth-century music, and on the contemporary concert scene, which is as dismal in the United States as anywhere else, they provide one of the few consistently bright spots. □ quelques-unes des œuvres de ces deux compositeurs ont été jouées pour la première fois au Festival. Plusieurs travaux importants de compositeurs invités furent également exécutés à Aspen en premières américaines, parmi eux les opéras « Le Journal d'un Fou » et « Le Médecin de Campagne » de Searle et Henze ainsi que le Concerto pour Orchestre de Tippett. Walter Susskind, qui devint en 1964 chef d'orchestre du Festival et directeur musical trois ans plus tard, dirigea la plupart des récentes premières.

Finalement, la valeur de tout festival musical ou de toute école musicale dépend des interprètes que l'on y attire, des professeurs et des compositeurs. Aussi Dartmouth, Tanglewood et Aspen ont chacun leur domaine d'attraction. Mais toutes les trois font un effort continuel pour servir la cause de la musique du vingtième siècle. Ils fournissent l'un des rares éléments consistants dans le domaine des concerts actuels, domaine par trop commun et fade aux Etats-Unis comme partout ailleurs. □ aufgeführt. Einige umfangreiche Werke von Gastkomponisten erlebten in den Vereinigten Staaten Aufführungen, darunter Searles „Tagebuch eines Wahnsinnigen" und Henzes „Landarzt" sowie Tippetts Konzert für Orchester. Die meisten wichtigen Erstaufführungen fanden in letzter Zeit unter der Stabführung von Walter Susskind statt, der 1964 Leiter der Festival-Konzerte wurde und drei Jahre später die gesamte musikalische Leitung übernahm. Letztlich hängt der Wert jedes Musikfestivals oder jeder Musikschule davon ab, wer als Musiker, Dirigent, Lehrer oder Komponist gewonnen werden kann. Dartmouth, Tanglewood und Aspen können in jedem Jahr mit eigenen künstlerischen Attraktionen und Höhepunkten aufwarten. Alle drei Orte wetteifern in dem ständigen Bemühen um die vielumworbene Musik des 20. Jahrhunderts und stellen im Konzertleben der Gegenwart, das in den Vereinigten Staaten genauso trostlos ist wie auch sonst überall, einen der wenigen erfreulichen Lichtblicke dar. □

◀ Rudolf Firkusny in the Aspen Amphitheatre

SPAC Concert Attendance Dip Seen Caused by Rain, Inflation

This month's rainy weather, in combination with the inflationary economic situation, has caused a 30 per cent drop in attendance at concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

* * *

This was disclosed yesterday by E. Craig Hankenson Jr., general manager of the center, who said the two factors have compounded one another to present a "worrisome" situation.

Hankenson said center officials are "disturbed" because income from the orchestra performances will not approach the budgeted figure. The result, he explained, will be that this year's deficit will be lager than anticipated.

The 5,100-seat amphitheater — summer home of the orchestra and New York City Ballet — had anticipated a loss of $320,000. White it appears that the season's deficit will be more, Hankenson said the loss will not approach the 1968 deficit of $378,000.

* * *

"We have been hurt by the horrible weather," Hankenson emphasized, "but we are certainly not faced with a crisis situation. The larger deficit simply means that we will be required to raise more money to meet our expenses."

Now in its fourth season, the center still deepnds heavily on large contributions from individuals, businesses and foundations to offset its annual operating deficit.

Comparing the Saratoga Festival with its nearest summer symphony neighborhood, the Tanglewood Music Festival near Lenox, Mass., Hankenson pointed out:

"Tanglewood has been there for 40 years and it has taken them a long time to build a firm nucleus of an audience. Over the years, many persons have built summer homes in the Berkshires so they could go to Tanglewood every weekend. We expect that Saratoga will build the same following here, but this won't happen in a decade. We must be patient."

* * *

Like Saratoga, Tanglewood has had its own attendance problems caused b ythe weather this summer, Hankenson noted, as have the Ravina Festival at Chicago and Blossom Festival near Cleveland.

The ballet performances at SPAC in July showed a three per cent increase in box office receipts, up from $220,000 last year to $236.00. Hankenson said the 22 performances attracted only 1,100 fewer persons than attended the 24 performances by the ballet last season.

The center manager said the average nightly attendance for the ballet, following the opening production, was "much better" than in 1968.

* * *

A readjustment of ticket prices—to create a new maximum and greater number of minimum-priced seats, enabled the center to increase its ballet box office receipts without improving overall attendance.

Box office receipts for the special events of the Saratoga season have also been off this year because of the rainy weather, Hankenson stated.

Hankenson said the center needs at least 5,000 at each performance to break even. In addition to the 5,100 amphitheater seats, the surrounding lawns have room for another 7,000 persons.

* * *

He said the immediate goal is to reduce the annual deficit to a "manageable" figure of $200,000. The center, operating on a $1.25 million budget this year, experiences a five per cent increase in costs annually.

"Even through the ballet season we were optimistic that we would have the financially excellent season that we were expecting," Hankenson remarked. "But the weather became extremely bad during the last week of July, just as the orchestra was arriving."

The weather was cold, threatening or raining for every orchestra date during the first two weeks of concerts this month.

Illustrating the impact of the weather, Hankenson noted that only 1,800 tickets for the Verdi Requiem had been sold by Tuesday morning. Late yesterday afternoon, after two sunny days, advance sales were up to 3,177.

* * *

"There hasn't been a big surge of this kind at the box office all season," he commented.

He pointed cut that the high cost of living has caused many families to cut back on entertainment to make ends meet. "Unfortunately," he added, "classical entertainment is usually the first to go."

"We appreciate the two fantastic organizations which have made the Saratoga center their permanent summer home," he concluded, "and we naturally expect people to flock here and fill every performance. But it is going to take years."

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

AUG 15 1969

Their Summer Begins

No Rest for Wicked, or Musicians

By HENRY RAYMONT
New York Times News Service

LENOX, Mass. — For most people the summer vacations are ending. But for conductors, symphony orchestras and concert soloists they have not even begun.

Once a time of repose — an interval in which musicians replenished drained energies and prepared new repertories for the coming season — summers have now become a time of frantic travel, a battle against humidity, mosquitos and airline schedules.

The cause of all this is the proliferation of outdoor summer festivals, each trying to outdo the other by featuring famous concert stars, big orchestras and innovative programs. What made it possible, of course, is the jet plane which all summer long has been shuttling artists from coast to coast and continent to continent.

Here in Lenox, where Erich Leinsdorf ended the Tanglewood music festival's 1969 season with a rousing performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony, musicians were scattering to all parts of the world.

Leinsdorf is off for Buenos Aires to begin rehearsals for 15 performances of the famed Teatro Colon Opera House, of "Der Rosenkavalier," "Wozzeck," and "Parsifal."

Leafing through a bulky notebook, Leinsdorf listed aloud his summer schedule, including his concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here and earlier appearances in Europe:

"Since July 1, I conducted 15 different programs and 16 rehearsals with the Boston, as well as two performances of 'Wozzeck' with 13 rehearsals by the Berkshire Music Center. The two last weeks of June I was in England to lead the London Symphony Orchestra in its 65th anniversary concert at festival hall. They say there's no rest for the wicked and musicians must be very wicked."

The Romeros, a Spanish classic guitar quartet made up of Celedonio Romero and his three sons, were less fortunate when they tried to get to Saratoga Springs, N.Y. from Los Angeles to play a concert with Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra two weeks ago. The 30-hour journey from Los Angeles was described by Celin Romero:

"The trouble began when we had to circle over Kennedy Airport Friday night and missed our connecting flight to Albany. So we rented a car at about 10 p.m. , about 12 hours after we left Los Angeles. We drove up the N.Y. Thruway in torrential rain and at 3 in the morning, pum, we had a flat tire. But what a terrible thing, there was no spare. For three hours we sat in the car, crammed with our guitars.

"I can't tell you what we said. There were some special Spanish words which don't translate. Then at 6 in the morning cars began to pass and somebody must have called for help because half-an-hour later a towtruck took us to Albany where everybody was very friendly." "Imagine," Angel Romero interrupted. "Cars breaking down in America and people so friendly when in Spain we think no machines ever break down in America and people have no time to be friendly."

Ormandy completed the story: "The rehearsal began at 10 a.m. Saturday morning and nobody had heard from the Romeros. Eugene Istomin who was playing the Emperor concerto with me was preparing to stand in for them when the car arrived. They had not slept for 36 hours but their playing was as vital as ever."

BANNER
BENNINGTON, VERMONT
(E) 6,200

SEP 5 1969 N Eng

Music

What We're Sending Out

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

At the end of one musical season the mind drifts to wondering where the music of the next will be coming from. In the face of current trends, particularly financial, that are influencing music-making, it is more than an idle question and its answer may become vitally important in the not too distant future.

In the interim, the just-issued Cultural Presentations Report by the Advisory Council on the Arts has raised some very basic problems with questions of their own involving the kinds of music Americans are sending abroad.

In an opening statement to the report, which covers exported art for the year 1967-68, Roy E. Larsen, chairman of the Advisory Committee (and chairman of the Executive Committee of Time, Inc), rather plaintively describes the current situation of the fifteen-year-old Cultural Presentations program of the State Department.

THE BUDGET HAS BEEN CUT from a high of $2,800,000 in 1966 to a low of $1,000,000 for fiscal 1970. Because of the cutback Larsen says, more and more of the touring performers have to be folksingers or amateur school groups or other inexpensive organizations.

Larsen estimates that a minimum of $3,000,000 annually is necessary to do the job properly and concludes by recommending that the project should be dropped rather than conducted badly.

At first glance Larsen would appear to have legitimate although hardly exclusive, complaints. It is on further thought and closer examination of the entire report that Larsen's only half-serious recommendation for ending the program begins to seem like a valid idea.

The 78-page report lists 21 groups and individuals from the Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater and the Washington National Symphony to the University of California Jazz Quintet which were sponsored during the 1967-68 term.

Each group is listed separately in alphabetical order. Each entry opens with a brief blurb about the group and its tour that could have been written by its own public relations man. This is followed by a collection of raves and testimonials from embassies and newspapers in the visited areas a la critical testimonials in a movie ad.

ONLY PASSING mention is given to any projects involving the contact with or participation of nationals in the visited countries. And only in a statistical table on page 74 is any reference given to the number of people witnessing the performances.

An example of the ludicrous superficiality of the report (completed for Congress and the public) is the opening paragraph on the Indian tour of the Los Angelss Philharmonic. "The return to India of a native son, who had become world famous," wrote the American Embassy in New Delhi, "was a stirring event for all Indian (sic), and they took great pride in the fact."

What kind of an assessment is that? And what kind of an agent is an America diplomatic embassy to be making such an assessment on a touring American orchestra?

IT WOULD SEEM that a more proper and valuable report would seek to determine more difficult but more intrinsic attributes of such a trip as: what did the touring company get out of it? What did they learn? What was the impact on the people? And forget what the American embassy or the host government had to say in official propaganda.

In the statistics it is interesting to note that only four groups played to over 50,000 people, and three of those just barely. The average total audience runs around 10,000. But an American circus, in amongst the musicians and dancers, played to 200,000.

In his report Larsen regrets that due to shrinking funds fewer countries and fewer performances can be included in the program and that these performances are more often limited to folk singers, etc., rather that orchestras, thereby not giving a "full and fair picture" of what is going on in American culture.

Quite the reverse, it may be a very accurate picture of American culture life and this is quite the brunt of the misapprehension of the entire program.

THE VALUE of orchestras abroad can be held in serious doubt when the report itself contains such statements as, "concert audiences . . . were weighted in the direction of the concert-going elite." That's an awful lot of effort for nothing.

But the Cultural Presentations project of the State Department is not the only arts agency that is suffering in cutbacks on operating funds. The National Endowment for the Arts, which takes care of such things as cultural presentations to the people of the United States, has had its financial sources strangulated and faces extinction. Somehow government-sponsored arts abroad, as an example of the cultural life of the United States, puts Uncle Sam ahead of himself if he can't get the arts to the American people. Or, more importantly, if the American people aren't supporting them.

AND WHY NOT export folk singers and their like? That is what is happening in American culture. Places like the Saratoga Performing Arts Center with the Philadelphia Orchestra and the New York City Ballet and Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony couldn't survive without the folk singer, the pop, rock and soul.

For the summer that just ended, Tanglewood's orchestral attendance was down while its overall attendance was up. A difference of nearly 30,000 people was made up by the fans of folk-rock-soul. Their total number was a little more than one-third that of those who went to hear the orchestra in one of the oldest bastions of classical music in America.

CULTURAL EXCHANGE programs of the sort sponsored by Larsen's committee, while not a necessity, are unquestionalby a positive good. But if the intentions and operations of the project are as Larsen and the report state them, it is a good thing for the wrong reason, and as Larsen says, would better be discontinued than carried on inappropriately.

It is possible to give Larsen the benefit of the doubt in that he may have been resorting to arguments that he thought might win his case for more money from Congress. Why else would anyone despair of the failure of the project chiefly as a loss of prestige to the United States?

A far more reaching blow to prestige was made by combining cultural and athletic exchanges in the same report. Twenty-one of the report's 78 pages are devoted to sports.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, September 7, 1969

31

Tanglewood crowd lessened by rain

Attendance at the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood was a victim of the Summer's generally rainy weather. About 175,400 persons bought tickets for the eight week-end concerts and Saturday open rehearsals — down about 13,200 from 1968.

But the over-all Tanglewood attendance of 236,937 was up from last year's 222,293, thanks to two record-breaking concerts — 21,500 for the Jefferson Airplane and The Who and 14,120 for music director Erich Leinsdorf's farewell program of the Beethoven Ninth.

BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

SEP 3 1969 New England

Rock Concerts Jump Attendance At Tanglewood

Although regular attendance at Tanglewood was down for the season, the rock concerts helped to push the total attendance to 236,937, which was up from last year's 222,293.

A total of 175,400 patrons attended the eight weekend concerts and Saturday morning rehearsals, which was 13,200 less than last year.

Biggest crowd of the season was drawn by the Jefferson Airplane, 21,500, a Tanglewood record. Erich Leinsdorf's farewell concert as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew 14,120.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

SEP 5 1969

22.

Music on the Offbeat

Koussevitzky Had a Dream

By Raymond Morin

AS THE BELL clanged, a sleek limousine glided down the narrow road alongside Tanglewood's massive fan-shaped music shed.

House lights were promptly dimmed.

The car circled the rear of the shed and stopped at the stage entrance. A black-caped figure of medium height got out, entered the building, handed his cape to a valet, and greeted George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony.

All audience eyes were focused on the stage door.

A kind of electricity was generated when Serge Koussevitzky, the eminent conductor, stepped through that door.

Tanglewood has never been the same since his death in 1951. Nor have podiums, anywhere.

Koussevitzky faced his first orchestra when he was 7. It was in Tver, his home town near Moscow on the banks of the Volga.

He had received music lessons from his father, a professional musician, and had written a composition. When he conducted it, the real exhilaration was in commanding the orchestra, not in hearing his own music come to life.

At 9, he joined the string section of an orchestra. Two years later, he became substitute conductor, and at 14 had his own orchestra associated with a theatrical troupe.

AMBITION AND VISION that later made Koussevitzky a world figure, asserted themselves in his early teens. Tver offered too little. He ran away from home with three rubles in his pocket and applied for a scholarship at the Philharmonic School in Moscow.

Only a scholarship for double bass was available. He accepted it, graduated with honors, and became the foremost virtuoso of string bass since Dragonetti.

But the life of a performing celebrity and teacher was not for Koussevitzky. He was saturated still with the desire to conduct.

Koussevitzky went to Germany and studied conducting at the Hochschule. His free hours were spent poring over scores and memorizing them. He haunted the orchestra halls of Berlin. His idol was the elegant, beautifully of Nikisch.

Every conductor who tried later to emulate Koussevitzky's style became a baton grandson of Nikisch.

They swelled their neck veins, grew purple in the face, crouched, shook passionately to extract more vibrato from the strings, and outdid the Signal Corps with grandiose gestures.

Most became vaudeville caricatures of the master.

KOUSSEVITZKY WAS 31 when he married Natalie Oushkoff, the daughter of a wealthy tea merchant. They had met four years earlier at a Koussevitzky double-bass recital.

This was Koussevitzky's second marriage. He had been secretive about the first, to a ballet dancer named Nadejda Galat. It had been in a time of poverty and ended in the divorce court in 1905.

It's said that when Koussevitzky's second father-in-law asked him what he'd like for a wedding present, he said a symphony orchestra.

He got one.

For four months, Koussevitzky traveled about 2,300 miles along the Volga with his 75-member orchestra playing for hard-faced peasants who had never heard an orchestra before. Even the instruments were unknown curiosities.

The first of three such tours cost more than $100,000.

Some were so moved at these concerts that they sobbed and fainted. One rustic was fascinated by the trombones. After the concert, he noticed one trombonist apparently having difficulty "taking his instrument apart." He rushed to the stage, grabbed the instrument and tore it to pieces with one gigantic tug.

"There you are, sir," he said trimphantly to the trombonist whom he had "helped."

Koussevitzky was the musical hero of Paris when he was invited to become the permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1924.

The same orchestra that Nikisch had conducted from 1889 to 1893!

Heads rolled when Koussevitzky took over at Boston. Only the most musically fit survived. America and Europe were combed for the finest procurable musicians.

Koussevitzky transformed the Boston Symphony into one of the world's great orchestras.

THE BERKSHIRE Music Festival was founded on an estate in Stockbridge in 1934. It assumed national importance soon after Koussevitzky came in 1936, when it moved to new grounds at Tanglewood.

Koussevitzky realized a lifelong dream in 1940 when he founded the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. It has reached a national zenith in music education for students from all over the world.

The man never faltered in his belief in new music and his determination to bring it recognition. Poor audience response and persons who walked out on KOUSSEVITZKY dismissed a wind player for some sour notes, a dialogue that left no doubt as to who was in charge.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 27 1969

...se him to w... ...sion.

We've never had more stimulating interviews than with Koussevitzky. They were in his winter home in Brookline and the summer estate at Lenox, called "Seranak."

Seranak stands for SERge And NAtalie Koussevitzky.

One time at Seranak, we were shown in to Koussevitzky during a "prerehearsal." He was seated before a music stand on which was the score of a Bruckner symphony.

He conducted his imaginary orchestra as he "heard" the music.

During that interview, he told us of his hopes for Tanglewood. Some of them never materialized.

It was in 1950, the year before Koussevitzky died.

He envisioned a Greek-style theater seating 25,000 at Tanglewood.

"We will have our own stage masters," he said, "and our composers and conductors. They will find a way to create a tragedy of our times, not less tragic than those of ancient Greece."

SOON AFTER the story appeared in The Worcester Telegram and was carried by the wire services, an executive of the Boston Symphony came along and said:

"The next time you see Koussevitzky, ask him where the money's coming from to build his amphitheater."

Koussevitzky was a hard taskmaster at rehearsals.

We recall a closed rehearsal of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony when the timpanist came in ahead of the beat. "Koussy" left the podium, made his way through the players, approached the timpanist menacingly and asked:

"Vy did you do dot?"

Gabbing wasn't allowed at a Koussevitzky rehearsal. Even a whisper brought on, "Don't spik! I say, don't spik! If you spik I go home."

Another time when he lashed out at a trombonist, the player remained tactfully silent.

"Vy don't you spik? Vy don't you say something?" Koussevitzky thundered.

Koussevitzky dismissed a wind player for sour notes. As the reprimanded one was leaving the stage, he bravely exclaimed, "Nuts to you!"

"It is too late for apologies," replied Koussy.

ONE TIME, as he was about to rehearse Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," he looked in the direction of the flute player to give him an encouraging look. The flute solos are difficult.

There was a new player.

"Do you know this piece?" asked Koussy.

"Nope."

"You've got a big surprise coming to you," said Koussy.

At one point it was suggested that movies be shown after Tanglewood concerts in hopes that people would leave the grounds more gradually and lessen traffic jams.

Koussy told us about it, and added this dictum.

"They play Mickey Mouse, I no conduct!" ★

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1969

A MOZART MIRACLE AT TANGLEWOOD

BY GEORGE MOVSHON

Beverly Sills (with Leinsdorf): a delectable Constanze.

BACK IN THE imperial days of the British Raj, high officials took to the hills when the hot weather came—the Indian Indian summer, of course. Administrators would leave behind them the sweltering plain and the sweating millions to make for Simla, the estival colonial capital located in cool uplands. This practice may have died out in independent India, where governors and governed stick it out in Delhi and see it through together; but nine thousand miles to the west, in the former colony of Massachusetts, a comparable imperialist procedure endures to this very day, and is likely to continue. Each summer the paladins and warriors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a hundred musicians plus wives, sweethearts, administrators, stagehands, and other assorted camp-followers, uproot themselves from the Hub and plant the flag 150 miles westward, amid the green hills of the Berkshire range. Their Simla is of course Tanglewood, a lawn upon which twenty thousand listeners may sit, lie, or sprawl; a shed to protect from the rain the richer six thousand among them: a platform for the music makers, backed by a tricky acoustic lens to fling their sounds to the multitude.

The Berkshire Festival started in the mid-Thirties and has become firmly established as the paragon of summer music institutions. It is not the oldest of the American music-feasts—Ravinia claims that honor—but it is surely the best known. Nearly a quarter of a million listeners come each season to one of the twenty-four Boston Symphony concerts, of which there are three each weekend plus an open rehearsal. Thousands more are drawn to the mid-week events, Pop, Folk, Rock, and Lesser Classical that now flesh out the Monday-through-Thursday gap.

The symphonic programs are not less serious or lower-browed than those given in Boston during the winter season, and none of the three successive music directors—Koussevitzky, Munch, and Leinsdorf—ever condescended to the theory that the span of a music-lover's attention shrinks in hot weather. The works are substantial and catholic, the soloists and guest conductors highly renowned: Boulez, Barenboim, Ancerl, and Krips were among those announced for the 1969 season. But Erich Leinsdorf, now in his final months as music director of the Boston Symphony, has done most of the work.

Eighteenth-century exercise

My Tanglewood weekend was a return to the Music Shed after an absence of twenty years, and I had forgotten how gentle, and yet how purposeful, the atmosphere is. The Shed is not unattractive as a building, the grass is agreeable to sit upon, the diffusion of sound about as efficient as could be desired. Skies above the Berkshires are remarkably free of airline traffic, and even mosquitoes seem less rapacious than their cousins elsewhere.

The second weekend of the 1969 season was entirely an eighteenth-century exercise, no doubt conceived by the music director in high aesthetic terms as an exploration of the links between Bach, Handel, and Mozart, but probably hailed enthusiastically by the business manager as a great opportunity to give half the men some time off: there was Bach on the Friday evening, the Four Suites for Orchestra and nothing but the Four Suites for Orchestra. A severely tailored affair.

Leinsdorf's Bach texture is a little thick and clotted for my taste, but the satin smoothness of the strings did much to make amends; and the serene nobility of the Air from the Third Suite—surely one of the eternal melodies—made a wonderful impression. At other times, I felt the need for more lilt, a greater variety of musical experience than Leinsdorf was offering us; but the evening was in general a satisfying one.

Die Entführung

Saturday night was devoted entirely to a concert performance in German of Die Entführung aus dem Serail, an extended miracle of youthful invention by the Mozart of 1782, and an opera calculated to do well in the concert hall where its dramatic awkwardness is not quite so obvious. The casting offered a rare chance to catch Beverly Sills in a Mozart part, one very well suited to her voice and style.

She made a delectable Constanze, shaping her phrases with unfailing beauty and impeccable grace, adding some sensible embellishment occasionally, but keeping it always in good proportion. Hers is not a big voice—not really powerful enough for a fully satisfying "Martern aller Arten"—but she is a sorceress and can make you believe that it is.

Her partner was George Shirley, a thickening sort. The singers acted sometimes, and did nothing at others. The speaking part of Pasha Selim was cut, thus making nonsense of much of the stage activity. It might have been far better to make Pasha Selim the narrator, and have the story recounted by him in the form of a flashback; or, if not that, any simple and dignified linking continuity would have served. What a pity.

Despite a soggy crust, the pie itself was well worth while. We shall miss Leinsdorf's enterprises of this sort, especially those of us who sympathize with his efforts to bring more opera into the concert hall. In recent winters and summers, he has given us the opportunity of hearing the original version of Beethoven's Fidelio, and the first form of Richard Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos—both of them memorable and rare treats. Which other conductor takes such trouble?

Changes to come

This fall, the baton of the Boston Symphony passes to William Steinberg, the newly appointed music director;

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

OCT 21 1969

Tanglewood Friends' Donations Doubled Gifts of Previous Year

Gifts from the Friends of Music at Tanglewood brought in $30,000 this year, doubling the amount given in 1968. This was reported at the semiannual meeting of the Council of Tanglewood Friends held over the weekend at the Main House at Tanglewood.

Robert C. Alsop, chairman of the Council, presided at the meeting.

Individuals

Individual gifts doubled over last year with some 700 people contributing, it was reported. Business gifts were 20 times what they were the previous year. The business community contributed $20,000.

Manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. reported on future plans of the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center. He and Harry J. Kraut, associate manager, spoke about the leadership of Seiji Ozawa, the Japanese conductor, Gunther Schuller, composer-educator, and Leonard Bernstein, when they take over artistic leadership at Tanglewood next summer.

Among those present at the meeting were Mr. and Mrs. Alsop, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boxer, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Van S. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. William Ryan, Mr. and Mrs. James Hart, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Lord, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Howitt, John H. P. Gould, Mrs. J. D. Hatch, Walter Howard, Mrs. C. D. Jackson and Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1969

32a

TO BE, OR NOT TO BE? BU HELPS

BY CRAIG STINSON

HOW DOES a high school kid with musical talent decide whether or not a musical career is for him? It's a serious problem. There are undoubtedly a great many musical people around pursuing nonmusical careers, primarily because at a critical stage in their lives they underestimated their abilities and overestimated the competition. To say nothing of all the people who got pressured into musical jobs without being suited for them.

Helping young people evaluate themselves as musicians and determine their suitability for careers as professional instrumentalists is one of the chief purposes of Boston University's Young Artists Program at Tanglewood. The BU program plucks a number of the most promising young musicians, aged fifteen to seventeen, out of communities all across the country, and places them for eight weeks of the summer in a thoroughly professional environment. After a couple of months of private study with Boston Symphony personnel, of careful coaching in chamber and orchestral work, and of exposure to the intense musical milieu of Tanglewood, the youngsters are able to return to their high schools with at least a chance of realistically appraising their potential as musicians.

The program was initiated four summers ago as BU's contribution to the educational works surrounding the Berkshire Music Festival. The moving force was Dr. Lee Chrisman, chairman of music education at BU's School of Fine and Applied Arts.

Dr. Chrisman now devotes a sizeable portion of each academic year to traveling about the United States, scouring out-of-the-way places for instrumental talent. This year, after logging some 20,000 miles and holding innumerable auditions, Dr. Chrisman selected seventy-four young men and women to come to Tanglewood.

Mr. Stinson is a contributor to the Boston Globe.

Talent vs. money

The number, as one might expect, is determined by the availability not of talent but of financial resources. The bill per student runs between $800 and $1,000. BU's support of the program is limited to administration and supplying some teaching personnel; the money for tuition and living expenses has to come from elsewhere.

A few of the students, of course, can pay their own way. By far the majority cannot. "In four years we have learned one thing," says Dr. Chrisman. "There seems to be a correlation between a youngster with great talent and families without the finances to afford the boy or girl a summer of study in Lenox. If we want the good ones we have to provide financial aid."

Fortunately, Dr. Chrisman brings to his job considerable fund-raising know-how, as well as an ear for musical promise. He has raised the number of students involved in the program from twenty the first summer to its present enrollment primarily by organizing support on the community level. The Women's Associations for Symphony Orchestras (representing all the American symphonies with budgets of $500,000 or more) have helped by initiating local fund-raising projects. And American Airlines has chipped in with some scholarships.

The curriculum

The seventy-four who made it into the program last summer lived in junior college dormitories in the town of Lenox. The structured part of their musical lives consisted of lessons with members of the Boston Symphony (augmented by a few members of the BU faculty), chamber music sessions (including twice-weekly concerts for the public), and participation in an orchestra conducted by James Yannatos. Yannatos, who spends the regular academic term conducting the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, tried to expose the young artists to a wide range of repertoire, with emphasis on twentieth-century music and nineteenth-century staples.

Orchestra rehearsals were held four times a week, with a liberal amount of time devoted to sight-reading the literature. Yannatos and the students worked up three full-fledged programs in eight weeks, plus a couple of smaller, less ambitious ones. In addition to their concerts at Tanglewood, the orchestra traveled to Boston for a performance at BU in mid-August. On Wednesday nights the young artists took part in special master classes, designed to give them further exposure to the professional expertise of the members of the Boston Symphony.

In addition to, and perhaps just as important as, these structured activities, the kids were given the run of the Tanglewood estate—which meant free access to all rehearsals and performances by the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, as well as the opportunity to rub shoulders with some of the best professional musicians in the country. As for relations between the two generations, Yannatos told me that some of the BSO people were miffed at first about having to spend time with high school students. Their views changed, however, and in the end the only complaints came from a few of the elders who got left out of the teaching program.

isolated from academic and parental distractions, free to concentrate on music.

There were gripes too, naturally. Yvonne Caruthers, a cellist from Spokane, Washington, expressed some discontent with the preponderance of modern music on the orchestral programs. Miss Cisin complained of dormitory curfews, lack of transportation facilities, and the inevitable backstabbing among competing musicians.

Everyone agreed, however, that the faculty were both first-rate instrumentalists and good teachers.

As for helping young people make career decisions, there can be no doubt at all of the program's value. As Miss Cisin put it, "I was pretty sure when I came here, and I still am; but a lot of people aren't so sure. By the end of the summer they've either been pushed up or pushed down so far that they make up their minds." △

Practicing is easy—out of reach of parents and schoolbooks.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1969

A MOZART MIRACLE AT TANGLEWOOD

BY GEORGE MOVSHON

Beverly Sills (with Leinsdorf): a delectable Constanze.

BACK IN THE imperial days of the British Raj, high officials took to the hills when the hot weather came—the Indian Indian summer, of course. Administrators would leave behind them the sweltering plain and the sweating millions to make for Simla, the estival colonial capital located in cool uplands. This practice may have died out in independent India, where governors and governed stick it out in Delhi and see it through together; but nine thousand miles to the west, in the former colony of Massachusetts, a comparable imperialist procedure endures to this very day, and is likely to continue. Each summer the paladins and warriors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a hundred musicians plus wives, sweethearts, administrators, stagehands, and other assorted camp-followers, uproot themselves from the Hub and plant the flag 150 miles westward, amid the green hills of the Berkshire range. Their Simla is of course Tanglewood, a lawn upon which twenty thousand listeners may sit, lie, or sprawl; a shed to protect from the rain the richer six thousand among them: a platform for the music makers, backed by a tricky acoustic lens to fling their sounds to the multitude.

The Berkshire Festival started in the mid-Thirties and has become firmly established as the paragon of summer music institutions. It is not the oldest of the American music-feasts—Ravinia claims that honor—but it is surely the best known. Nearly a quarter of a million listeners come each season to one of the twenty-four Boston Symphony concerts, of which there are three each weekend plus an open rehearsal. Thousands more are drawn to the mid-week events, Pop, Folk, Rock, and Lesser Classical that now flesh out the Monday-through-Thursday gap.

The symphonic programs are not less serious or lower-browed than those given in Boston during the winter season, and none of the three successive music directors—Koussevitzky, Munch, and Leinsdorf—ever condescended to the theory that the span of a music-lover's attention shrinks in hot weather. The works are substantial and catholic, the soloists and guest conductors highly renowned: Boulez, Barenboim, Ancerl, and Krips were among those announced for the 1969 season. But Erich Leinsdorf, now in his final months as music director of the Boston Symphony, has done most of the work.

Eighteenth-century exercise

My Tanglewood weekend was a return to the Music Shed after an absence of twenty years, and I had forgotten how gentle, and yet how purposeful, the atmosphere is. The Shed is not unattractive as a building, the grass is agreeable to sit upon, the diffusion of sound about as efficient as could be desired. Skies above the Berkshires are remarkably free of airline traffic, and even mosquitoes seem less rapacious than their cousins elsewhere.

The second weekend of the 1969 season was entirely an eighteenth-century exercise, no doubt conceived by the music director in high aesthetic terms as an exploration of the links between Bach, Handel, and Mozart, but probably hailed enthusiastically by the business manager as a great opportunity to give half the men some time off: there was Bach on the Friday evening, the Four Suites for Orchestra and nothing but the Four Suites for Orchestra. A severely tailored affair.

Leinsdorf's Bach texture is a little thick and clotted for my taste, but the satin smoothness of the strings did much to make amends; and the serene nobility of the Air from the Third Suite—surely one of the eternal melodies—made a wonderful impression. At other times, I felt the need for more lilt; a greater variety of musical experience than Leinsdorf was offering us; but the evening was in general a satisfying one.

Die Entführung

Saturday night was devoted entirely to a concert performance in German of Die Entführung aus dem Serail, an extended miracle of youthful invention by the Mozart of 1782, and an opera calculated to do well in the concert hall where its dramatic awkwardness is not quite so obvious. The casting offered a rare chance to catch Beverly Sills in a Mozart part, one very well suited to her voice and style.

She made a delectable Constanze, shaping her phrases with unfailing beauty and impeccable grace, adding some sensible embellishment occasionally, but keeping it always in good proportion. Hers is not a big voice—not really powerful enough for a fully satisfying "Martern aller Arten"—but she is a sorceress and can make you believe that it is.

Her partner was George Shirley, a thickening sort. The singers acted sometimes, and did nothing at others. The speaking part of Pasha Selim was cut, thus making nonsense of much of the stage activity. It might have been far better to make Pasha Selim the narrator, and have the story recounted by him in the form of a flashback; or, if not that, any simple and dignified linking continuity would have served. What a pity.

Despite a soggy crust, the pie itself was well worth while. We shall miss Leinsdorf's enterprises of this sort, especially those of us who sympathize with his efforts to bring more opera into the concert hall. In recent winters and summers, he has given us the opportunity of hearing the original version of Beethoven's Fidelio, and the first form of Richard Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos—both of them memorable and rare treats. Which other conductor takes such trouble?

Changes to come

This fall, the baton of the Boston Symphony passes to William Steinberg, the newly appointed music director;

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

OCT 21 1969

Tanglewood Friends' Donations Doubled Gifts of Previous Year

Gifts from the Friends of Music at Tanglewood brought in $30,000 this year, doubling the amount given in 1968. This was reported at the semiannual meeting of the Council of Tanglewood Friends held over the weekend at the Main House at Tanglewood.

Robert C. Alsop, chairman of the Council, presided at the meeting.

Individuals

Individual gifts doubled over last year with some 700 people contributing, it was reported. Business gifts were 20 times what they were the previous year. The business community contributed $20,000.

Manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. reported on future plans of the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center. He and Harry J. Kraut, associate manager, spoke about the leadership of Seiji Ozawa, the Japanese conductor, Gunther Schuller, composer-educator, and Leonard Bernstein, when they take over artistic leadership at Tanglewood next summer.

Among those present at the meeting were Mr. and Mrs. Alsop, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boxer, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Van S. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. William Ryan, Mr. and Mrs. James Hart, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Lord, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Howitt, John H. P. Gould, Mrs. J. D. Hatch, Walter Howard, Mrs. C. D. Jackson and Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1969

32a

TO BE, OR NOT TO BE? BU HELPS

BY CRAIG STINSON

HOW DOES a high school kid with musical talent decide whether or not a musical career is for him? It's a serious problem. There are undoubtedly a great many musical people around pursuing nonmusical careers, primarily because at a critical stage in their lives they underestimated their abilities and overestimated the competition. To say nothing of all the people who got pressured into musical jobs without being suited for them.

Helping young people evaluate themselves as musicians and determine their suitability for careers as professional instrumentalists is one of the chief purposes of Boston University's Young Artists Program at Tanglewood. The BU program plucks a number of the most promising young musicians, aged fifteen to seventeen, out of communities all across the country, and places them for eight weeks of the summer in a thoroughly professional environment. After a couple of months of private study with Boston Symphony personnel, of careful coaching in chamber and orchestral work, and of exposure to the intense musical milieu of Tanglewood, the youngsters are able to return to their high schools with at least a chance of realistically appraising their potential as musicians.

The program was initiated four summers ago as BU's contribution to the educational works surrounding the Berkshire Music Festival. The moving force was Dr. Lee Chrisman, chairman of music education at BU's School of Fine and Applied Arts.

Dr. Chrisman now devotes a sizeable portion of each academic year to traveling about the United States, scouring out-of-the-way places for instrumental talent. This year, after logging some 20,000 miles and holding innumerable auditions, Dr. Chrisman selected seventy-four young men and women to come to Tanglewood.

Mr. Stinson is a contributor to the Boston Globe.

Talent vs. money

The number, as one might expect, is determined by the availability not of talent but of financial resources. The bill per student runs between $800 and $1,000. BU's support of the program is limited to administration and supplying some teaching personnel; the money for tuition and living expenses has to come from elsewhere.

A few of the students, of course, can pay their own way. By far the majority cannot. "In four years we have learned one thing," says Dr. Chrisman. "There seems to be a correlation between a youngster with great talent and families without the finances to afford the boy or girl a summer of study in Lenox. If we want the good ones we have to provide financial aid."

Fortunately, Dr. Chrisman brings to his job considerable fund-raising know-how, as well as an ear for musical promise. He has raised the number of students involved in the program from twenty the first summer to its present enrollment primarily by organizing support on the community level. The Women's Associations for Symphony Orchestras (representing all the American symphonies with budgets of $500,000 or more) have helped by initiating local fund-raising projects. And American Airlines has chipped in with some scholarships.

The curriculum

The seventy-four who made it into the program last summer lived in junior college dormitories in the town of Lenox. The structured part of their musical lives consisted of lessons with members of the Boston Symphony (augmented by a few members of the BU faculty), chamber music sessions (including twice-weekly concerts for the public), and participation in an orchestra conducted by James Yannatos. Yannatos, who spends the regular academic term conducting the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, tried to expose the young artists to a wide range of repertoire, with emphasis on twentieth-century music and nineteenth-century staples.

Orchestra rehearsals were held four times a week, with a liberal amount of time devoted to sight-reading the literature. Yannatos and the students worked up three full-fledged programs in eight weeks, plus a couple of smaller, less ambitious ones. In addition to their concerts at Tanglewood, the orchestra traveled to Boston for a performance at BU in mid-August. On Wednesday nights the young artists took part in special master classes, designed to give them further exposure to the professional expertise of the members of the Boston Symphony.

In addition to, and perhaps just as important as, these structured activities, the kids were given the run of the Tanglewood estate—which meant free access to all rehearsals and performances by the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, as well as the opportunity to rub shoulders with some of the best professional musicians in the country. As for relations between the two generations, Yannatos told me that some of the BSO people were miffed at first about having to spend time with high school students. Their views changed, however, and in the end the only complaints came from a few of the elders who got left out of the teaching program.

isolated from academic and parental distractions, free to concentrate on music.

There were gripes too, naturally. Yvonne Caruthers, a cellist from Spokane, Washington, expressed some discontent with the preponderance of modern music on the orchestral programs. Miss Cisin complained of dormitory curfews, lack of transportation facilities, and the inevitable backstabbing among competing musicians.

Everyone agreed, however, that the faculty were both first-rate instrumentalists and good teachers.

As for helping young people make career decisions, there can be no doubt at all of the program's value. As Miss Cisin put it, "I was pretty sure when I came here, and I still am; but a lot of people aren't so sure. By the end of the summer they've either been pushed up or pushed down so far that they make up their minds." △

Practicing is easy—out of reach of parents and schoolbooks.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

OCT 1969

Lenox

A MOZART MIRACLE AT TANGLEWOOD

BY GEORGE MOVSHON

Beverly Sills (with Leinsdorf): a delectable Constanze.

BACK IN THE imperial days of the British Raj, high officials took to the hills when the hot weather came—the Indian Indian summer, of course. Administrators would leave behind them the sweltering plain and the sweating millions to make for Simla, the estival colonial capital located in cool uplands. This practice may have died out in independent India, where governors and governed stick it out in Delhi and see it through together; but nine thousand miles to the west, in the former colony of Massachusetts, a comparable imperialist procedure endures to this very day, and is likely to continue. Each summer the paladins and warriors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a hundred musicians plus wives, sweethearts, administrators, stagehands, and other assorted camp-followers, uproot themselves from the Hub and plant the flag 150 miles westward, amid the green hills of the Berkshire range. Their Simla is of course Tanglewood, a lawn upon which twenty thousand listeners may sit, lie, or sprawl; a shed to protect from the rain the richer six thousand among them: a platform for the music makers, backed by a tricky acoustic lens to fling their sounds to the multitude.

The Berkshire Festival started in the mid-Thirties and has become firmly established as the paragon of summer music institutions. It is not the oldest of the American music-feasts—Ravinia claims that honor—but it is surely the best known. Nearly a quarter of a million listeners come each season to one of the twenty-four Boston Symphony concerts, of which there are three each weekend plus an open rehearsal. Thousands more are drawn to the mid-week events, Pop, Folk, Rock, and Lesser Classical that now flesh out the Monday-through-Thursday gap.

The symphonic programs are not less serious or lower-browed than those given in Boston during the winter season, and none of the three successive music directors—Koussevitzky, Munch, and Leinsdorf—ever condescended to the theory that the span of a music-lover's attention shrinks in hot weather. The works are substantial and catholic, the soloists and guest conductors highly renowned: Boulez, Barenboim, Ancerl, and Krips were among those announced for the 1969 season. But Erich Leinsdorf, now in his final months as music director of the Boston Symphony, has done most of the work.

Eighteenth-century exercise

My Tanglewood weekend was a return to the Music Shed after an absence of twenty years, and I had forgotten how gentle, and yet how purposeful, the atmosphere is. The Shed is not unattractive as a building, the grass is agreeable to sit upon, the diffusion of sound about as efficient as could be desired. Skies above the Berkshires are remarkably free of airline traffic, and even mosquitoes seem less rapacious than their cousins elsewhere.

The second weekend of the 1969 season was entirely an eighteenth-century exercise, no doubt conceived by the music director in high aesthetic terms as an exploration of the links between Bach, Handel, and Mozart, but probably hailed enthusiastically by the business manager as a great opportunity to give half the men some time off: there was Bach on the Friday evening, the Four Suites for Orchestra and nothing but the Four Suites for Orchestra. A severely tailored affair.

Leinsdorf's Bach texture is a little thick and clotted for my taste, but the satin smoothness of the strings did much to make amends; and the serene nobility of the Air from the Third Suite—surely one of the eternal melodies—made a wonderful impression. At other times, I felt the need for more lilt; a greater variety of musical experience than Leinsdorf was offering us; but the evening was in general a satisfying one.

Die Entführung

Saturday night was devoted entirely to a concert performance in German of Die Entführung aus dem Serail, an extended miracle of youthful invention by the Mozart of 1782, and an opera calculated to do well in the concert hall where its dramatic awkwardness is not quite so obvious. The casting offered a rare chance to catch Beverly Sills in a Mozart part, one very well suited to her voice and style.

She made a delectable Constanze, shaping her phrases with unfailing beauty and impeccable grace, adding some sensible embellishment occasionally, but keeping it always in good proportion. Hers is not a big voice—not really powerful enough for a fully satisfying "Martern aller Arten"—but she is a sorceress and can make you believe that it is.

Her partner was George Shirley, a thickening sort. The singers acted sometimes, and did nothing at others. The speaking part of Pasha Selim was cut, thus making nonsense of much of the stage activity. It might have been far better to make Pasha Selim the narrator, and have the story recounted by him in the form of a flashback; or, if not that, any simple and dignified linking continuity would have served. What a pity.

Despite a soggy crust, the pie itself was well worth while. We shall miss Leinsdorf's enterprises of this sort, especially those of us who sympathize with his efforts to bring more opera into the concert hall. In recent winters and summers, he has given us the opportunity of hearing the original version of Beethoven's Fidelio, and the first form of Richard Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos—both of them memorable and rare treats. Which other conductor takes such trouble?

Changes to come

This fall, the baton of the Boston Symphony passes to William Steinberg, the newly appointed music director;

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

OCT 21 1969

Tanglewood Friends' Donations Doubled Gifts of Previous Year

Gifts from the Friends of Music at Tanglewood brought in $30,000 this year, doubling the amount given in 1968. This was reported at the semiannual meeting of the Council of Tanglewood Friends held over the weekend at the Main House at Tanglewood.

Robert C. Alsop, chairman of the Council, presided at the meeting.

Individuals

Individual gifts doubled over last year with some 700 people contributing, it was reported. Business gifts were 20 times what they were the previous year. The business community contributed $20,000.

Manager Thomas D. Perry Jr. reported on future plans of the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center. He and Harry J. Kraut, associate manager, spoke about the leadership of Seiji Ozawa, the Japanese conductor, Gunther Schuller, composer-educator, and Leonard Bernstein, when they take over artistic leadership at Tanglewood next summer.

Among those present at the meeting were Mr. and Mrs. Alsop, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Boxer, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen V. C. Morris, Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Van S. Rice, Mr. and Mrs. William Ryan, Mr. and Mrs. James Hart, Mr. and Mrs. Frederic Lord, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Howitt, John H. P. Gould, Mrs. J. D. Hatch, Walter Howard, Mrs. C. D. Jackson and Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence K. Miller.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
130,000

1969

OUR NEW CASTRONOMIQUE IS MAGNIFIQUE.

Have you tried the elegant new Voisin Cuisine lately? Turbot Soufflé, stuffed with lobster. Filet of Beef, Wellington. Pe-rigourdine. Bouille-ductions frame," around the music. The spoken dialogue was totally eliminated. Good. A narration was specially written to take its place. Great—for you cannot enjoy these arias and duets if they come grinding out one after the other like so many sausages. But the script was embarrassingly awful, and often damaged the surrounding music instead of supporting it. Writer Andrew Rathburn and narrator Mac Morgan must share the blame for needless and corny rubbish, much of it coy copy of "the plot is thickening" sort. The singers acted sometimes, and did nothing at others. The speaking part of Pasha Selim was cut, thus making nonsense of much of the stage activity. It might have been far better to make Pasha Selim the narrator, and have the story recounted by him in the form of a flashback; or, if not that, any simple and dignified linking continuity would have served. What a pity.

Despite a soggy crust, the pie itself was well worth while. We shall miss Leinsdorf's enterprises of this sort, especially those of us who sympathize with his efforts to bring more opera into the concert hall. In recent winters and summers, he has given us the opportunity of hearing the original version of Beethoven's Fidelio and the first form of Richard Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos—both of them memorable and rare treats. Which other conductor takes such trouble?

Changes to come

This fall, the baton of the Boston Symphony passes to William Steinberg, the newly appointed music director; long do they stay? What do they read? Tanglewood's administrators recently decided to seek answers to those questions, and launched a modest and homespun survey to get them. It was planned by Boston's assistant manager Harry Kraut and carried out during the first weekend of the 1968 festival (a Mozart weekend) by the teams of college students to WQXR and WNCN. △

The median age of the audience is in the upper thirties.

Women outnumber men in the ratio of eleven to nine.

Bostonians who come to Tanglewood also like to read the Boston Globe and the Monitor. The New Yorkers are, overwhelmingly, readers of The New York Times and listeners to WQXR and WNCN. △

Yannatos himself claims to prefer conducting youngsters. "They have a certain vibrancy," he says, "that you don't get—well, you could get with professionals, only you have to go through so many obstacles."

There are, to be sure, some technical limitations to dealing with unseasoned talent, as Yannatos freely admits. "You can go so far, then you either have to throw in the towel, or scream and beat heads to get them over the hill."

From what I saw, there were no indications that the genial conductor had been beating anything other than time.

Pushed up or down

On a warm weekend in August I visited the Young Artists program, heard a chamber concert, and sampled opinions of some of the participants.

The concert included a Liszt Etude, a movement from the Mozart G minor Piano Quartet, and the complete Trout Quintet of Schubert. Performances revealed a high level of technical competence and an equally high level of stage jitters. Seasoning seems to be about nine-tenths of what these musicians need now.

Outside, in the calm of a Berkshire afternoon, the kids spoke enthusiastically about the BU program and its effect on their lives. Several told me that they had never worked so hard and so productively before. Toby Cisin, a sixteen-year-old blonde, petite French hornist from Bethesda, Maryland, praised the idyllic condition of being isolated from academic and parental distractions, free to concentrate on music.

There were gripes too, naturally. Yvonne Caruthers, a cellist from Spokane, Washington, expressed some discontent with the preponderance of modern music on the orchestral programs. Miss Cisin complained of dormitory curfews, lack of transportation facilities, and the inevitable backstabbing among competing musicians.

Everyone agreed, however, that the faculty were both first-rate instrumentalists and good teachers.

As for helping young people make career decisions, there can be no doubt at all of the program's value. As Miss Cisin put it, "I was pretty sure when I came here, and I still am; but a lot of people aren't so sure. By the end of the summer they've either been pushed up or pushed down so far that they make up their minds." △

Roman Totenberg gives Mozart a workout with young musicians.

Practicing is easy—out of reach of parents and schoolbooks.

326

A Good Year? Of Course, If You Ignore . . .

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

The truth about the situation at the summer music festivals is more often more accurately relayed in the variety of ways employed to cloud the issue than in any specific statistics.

The American preoccupation with success doesn't allow anybody to admit frankly they had a bad year even in an area which is so inaccurately measured by anything as matter of fact as numbers, particularly money numbers.

TO BE HONEST, it was less than a good year on the summer circuit and nobody need look much beyond the weather bureau statistics to understand why.

The Saratoga Performing Arts Center released the attendance figures for the 1969 season this past week amidst a wealth of explanations and good hopes for 1970. A deficit figure was only estimated.

Tanglewood released attendance figures, no deficit figure, and a wealth of repertoire statistics hard on the close of the season in August. There were no real excuses but their figures were more encouraging.

The only numbers included in the Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival end of season summary were those indicating the number of world premieres and the number of dance students. Keeping the purpose of the festival in mind these are the more pertinent figures.

The ~~Lake George Opera Festival sent~~ GO only a statement saying it was the "most successful" season in their history. The question is, by what standard? Artistically, they would have little quarrel. Financially, there seemed to be an awful lot of empty seats.

THE SUCCESS OF A SUMMER music festival, or any other kind of artistic event, is not measured by the number of people who attended. However its money, and therefore its survival, are. There is something about the smell of success or failure that attracts more of the same and most area festivals are working hard at maintaining the same front. The charade is understandable and probably practical as long as there is some realistic thinking going on behind it.

It doesn't take an expert to pinpoint the most successful area of anybody's season. The attendance at events in the Saratoga Performing Arts Center amphitheater went up only at the special events, by 7,000. Peter, Paul and Mary fans come out in the rain even when Beethoven fans don't.

Between them the New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave 38 performances before 111,753 people. There were 22 special events, including four disastrous post-season programs, presented for the benefit of 107,331 people. This should not be interpreted as a mandate for more popular programming at the expense of ballet and orchestra but should be accepted realistically as fact. NE

At Tanglewood 175,468 people attended or-

ALBANY TIMES-UNION
Sunday, October 13, 1968

Music

A Good Year?

Continued From Page 1

chestra concerts and rehearsals during the eight-week season. While the number is down from 1968 it is still much more comfortable than that at Saratoga, a much younger and less established festival. Overall attendance at Tanglewood, however, was up due to its immersion for the second season in its own series of special events attended by 61,469 people, a very healthy figure for only seven performances.

THE NUMBERS GAME is easy to play and unfavorable comparisons are almost unavoidable. The question is, is it necessary? The numbers are very important to those who are planning next season's schedule, artists and emphasis, but of relatively little meaning to the general public. People who simply follow the crowd don't need box office figures to point the way.

It is a very human trait for even an artistic organization to want to know where it stands, particularly when it must answer to a business-oriented board and the quantity is much easier to measure than the quality. But wouldn't it be refreshing to see some future season summarized entirely in terms of artistic merit?

Jacob's Pillow had the right idea this year. Perhaps they could afford it, having had their share of sold-out houses during the past summer.

At any rate, the public isn't going to think in terms of artistic measures until all the festivals do.

Bartok

The 25th anniversary year of Bela Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra" will be celebrated by a special program on NET FESTIVAL, in color Wednesday, April 16, 7:30 p.m., Channel 17.

Called "Bartok at Tanglewood: Concerto for Orchestra," the ninety-minute program compares a rehearsal of the Concerto by the Berkshire Music Center Student Orchestra to a performance of it by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for which the work was originally written. NE

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the rehearsal and the performance, both of which took place at the Shed at Tanglewood, on the grounds of the Berkshire Music Center in Lennox, Mass., during the summer of 1968.

CLARENCE PRESS
Wednesday, April 9, 1969

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, April 13, 1969

Concerto scheduled

A televised performance of the Boston Symphony performing Bela Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra marks the 25th anniversary of the piece as WCNY-TV presents the special musical program Wednesday at 7:30 p.m.

The 90-minute program compares a rehearsal of the work by Berkshire Music Center students at Tanglewood and by the symphony for which the work was written.

Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's conductor, will be on the podium for both rehearsal and performance which were in the shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., last summer.

Star-Bulletin & Advertiser
HONOLULU, HAWAII
D. 160,147

APR 20 1969

Maestro

Erich Leinsdorf commemorates the 25th anniversary of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra with a program comparing a rehearsal of the work by the Berkshire Music Center Student group and the Boston Symphony's interpretation, for whom it was originally written. Leinsdorf (above) conducts both performances—in a telecast to be screened Tuesday night by KHET (Channels 11, 10 and 4) at 9 o'clock.

NET FESTIVAL commemorates the 25th anniversary of Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra with a program comparing a rehearsal of the work by the Berkshire Music Center Student Orchestra with a performance of it by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for whom it was originally written. Erich Leinsdorf conducts both rehearsal and performance. The program will be sene Wednesday at 7:30 p.m. on Ch. 17. NE

TROY MORNING RECORD
Saturday, April 12, 1969

These announcements (above) are pre-season Tanglewood showings of performances ~~made~~ taped during the 1968 Tanglewood season.

Wisconsin State Journal
MADISON, WISC.
D. 66,949 SUN. 104,944

MAY 27 1969

Music Festival to Be Featured

"Summer Showcase 1969," a new Sunday evening NET series focusing on some of the country's outstanding music festivals and other cultural events, will premiere on WHA-TV (Channel 21) on June 1.

Eighteen weeks of programs, from 90 minutes to two hours, will range the United States and will include festivals from classical music and opera to folk music, dance, and jazz. The series will be produced under a $1 million grant from the Corp. for Public Broadcasting and the Ford Foundation.

Among festivals contemplated for inclusion in Summer Showcase are the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, Mass., where Erich Leinsdorf will be making his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000

MAY 3 1969

Tuning In On. . .

WQXR - New York

'33 Years Of Classical Class'

In recent years, radio outlets across the country have been changing formats with increasing rapidity. WQXR-New York, however, has achieved consistent success by maintaining its fine music programming during the entire 33 years of its broadcasting history.

WQXR, the radio station of the New York Times, began operating on 50,000 watts in 1956, making the outlet the first fine music station to operate at the maximum power assigned to U.S. commercial radio stations. WQXR-FM, broadcasting WQXR's programs simultaneously, went on the air in 1939 as the first Frequency Modulation outlet in New York City. When the FCC ruled that AM and FM stations must separate their programs 50% of the broadcast day, WQXR began its separation on January 1, 1967, the date the ruling went into effect.

As is well known by New Yorkers, the bulk of WQXR's programming is classical music. The backbone of the outlet's schedule is the standard symphonic repertoire, which includes works by such classical chartmakers as Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Stravinsky. WQXR aired the first concert from the new Philharmonic Hall in Lincoln Center, and features weekly broadcasts of the N. Y. Philharmonic concerts, broadcasts of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts from Boston and Tanglewood, the Boston Pops spring and summer concerts, taped concerts of the Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Cleveland Orchestras, and the Peabody Award winning music "specials." These "specials" honored personalities and events in the musical world, in many instances introducing well-known artists and persons associated with the event.

Robert Sherman, program director of WQXR, emphasizes that the music scheduled on the station is intended to be listened to. "We aim for people who are listening intently," he states. The music to which the WQXR audience is listening includes light music which is programmed on "After Midnight," hosted by Gene Lees, lyric writer and pop music reviewer for Hi Fi Magazine. Aired from 12:07 to 1:45 a.m. on Sunday mornings, the show features what Sherman calls "pop music with a point." Artists such as Frank Sinatra and Jack Jones receive airplay, and one "After Midnight" broadcast was a discussion of Frank Sinatra himself and of his influence on the music scene. On this program, and on Duncan Pirnie's "Cocktail Time" (5:07 — 6 p.m., Mondays through Saturdays), which also offers light, semi-jazz fare, WQXR is trying to "brighten and youngify" its pop sound, according to Sherman. The outlet is not changing its basic programming, says the program director, "we are revitalizing what we already have."

Two folk music shows are broadcast on WQXR on the weekends. On Saturdays, from 7:07 to 8 p.m. "Woody's Children," hosted by Sherman, presents contemporary folk music, which includes protest songs, modern pieces of various types, and the songs of both the left and right wings. Sherman prepares written scripts for "Woody's Children" and also for "Folk Music Of The World" (2:07 to 3 p.m., Sundays), a program which won an Ohio State University Award in 1967 for "Folk Music Of The World's Salute To Woody Guthrie." The Sunday afternoon folk show airs international folk songs of a traditional nature.

Other WQXR music programming features "The World Of Jazz," hosted by John Wilson, music critic of the Times (2:07 — 3 p.m., Saturdays); "Nights In Latin America," Pru Devon, host (7:30 — 8 p.m., Mondays); and "Music A La Carte," a daily luncheon broadcast which programs semi-classical music. Written scripts are prepared for WQXR's music programs, including the station's classical music shows. (An exception is "Music A La Carte," on which host George Edwards ad-libs his commentary.)

The news and public affairs programming of WQXR emanates from the New York Times, with the outlet presenting 22 five-minute news broadcasts daily and six daily features news programs. At 6:30 p.m., seven days a week, the Times editorial is broadcast a day ahead of publication. A different Times special correspondent has a five-minute news show on each day of the work week.

WQXR has been honored with six Peabody Awards and seven Ohio State Awards for its classical music programming. The station's adherence to a fine music format has proved highly rewarding: over 1,000,000 listeners tune in on WQXR. It might be said, with no levity intended, that WQXR is a classical gas.

On the Dial

NET Will Increase Cultural Offerings

NEW YORK (AP) — Sweeping changes in public television, aimed at bringing more cultural offerings and diversity to noncommerical airwaves, have been announced by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

The major reform announced Tuesday was creation of a Public Broadcasting System—PBS — within the next 90 days to manage the National Educational Television Network and its 140 member stations.

PBS, an arm of the corporation, will have broad power to allocate producers time on the NET network.

The plans were announced by John W. Macy Jr., the corporation president, and Fred W. Friendly, television consultant to the Ford Foundation, the largest contributor of noncommerical television. This year the foundation provided about $13 million.

Fred W. Friendly

First Change

The first programming change involves a new two-hour Sunday night program of news, poblic affairs, music and drama, premiering in October, to replace the controversial Public Broadcast Laboratory, which will leave the air in May.

For 13 Sunday evenings during the summer, NET will provide musical programs, including visits to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.; the Summer Music Camp at Interlochen, Mich., the Newport, R.I. Folk and Jazz Festivals, the Monterey Jazz Festival from California and the Cleveland Summer Festival.

Special Grant

The "Summer Showcase 1969" series will be produced with a special Ford grant of $1 million, Friendly said.

Other grants will create a television opera company and a New York Television Theater. A Negro variety series from Harlem, "Soul!," will be discontinued.

Macy said the new PBS would bring about "the most effective distribution of programming and insure that our growing network truly serves the stations and the total audience."

The changes were announced on the eve of the annual meetings of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters and of NET affiliates.

ADVOCATE
STAMFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 31,000

APR 10 1969 New England

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

APR 9 1969 New England

PRESS (e)
BRISTOL, CONN.
CIRC. 17,150

APR 9 1969 New England

Tanglewood broadcast in stereo

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood will be broadcast by WGBH-FM, live and in stereo this summer, starting Friday, July 4 at 9 p.m.

The concerts, direct from the famed 6000-seat Music Shed at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., continue through August and mark Erich Leinsdorf's final months as music director of the Berkshire Festival.

To be held every Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m., the 1969 Berkshire Festival opens with two all-Mozart programs. On July 4 Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 29, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467 with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist; and Symphony No. 39, K. 543.

The following evening, Saturday, July 5 at 8 p.m., he has chosen Mozart's Symphony No. 35 in D, K. 385, "The Haffner", Piano Concerto in A, K. 488 with John Browning as soloist and Symphony No. 40, K. 550.

Now in its 34th season, the Berkshire Festival will be heard not only in Boston, but throughout much of New England and New York State on Eastern Educational Radio Network stations WFCR (Amherst, Mass.), and WAMU-FM (Albany, N.Y.) and on WGBH-FM in Boston.

The 1969 Berkshire Festival is being produced for radio by Jordan Whitelaw; William Pierce is the symphony announcer.

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

JUN 19 1969 New England

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

JUN 19 1969 New England

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

JUN 19 1969 New England

Boston Pops On NET Sunday

Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, narrates Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" as part of the Boston Pops Old Timers' Night to be seen on NET's "Sounds of Summer" Sunday (June 22) at 8 p.m. on Channel 24. Steve Allen is host.

Old Timers' Night includes a broad selection of light classics, popular tunes of the day, and sing-along favorites. Arthur Fiedler, since 1930 leader of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the concert.

ELMIRA STAR GAZETTE
Saturday, June 21, 1969

Boston Symphony Concerts Will Be Broadcast Live

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer will be broadcast live by WAMC-FM (90.3 mc.), starting Friday, July 4, at 9 p.m.

The concerts, direct from the famed 6000-seat Music Shed at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, continue through Aug. 24 and mark Erich Leinsdorf's final months as music director of the orchestra.

The concerts will be broadcast Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m. WAMC-FM will sign on the air at 6 p.m. Saturdays, beginning July 5, in order to carry the Tanglewood concerts.

For the opening concert, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 29, K. 201, Piano Concerto in C, K. 467 with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, and Symphony No. 39, K. 543.

The following evening, St., July 5, at 8 p.m., he has chosen another Mozart program: Symphony No. 35 in D,K. 385, "The Haffner," Piano Concerto in A, K. 48 with John Browning as soloist and Symphony No. 40, K. 550.

In addition to the weekend concerts, WAMC will air two special events from the 34th season at Tanglewood — the annual Boston Pops concert on Tues., Aug. 5, at 8 p.m., and Tanglewood on Parade, Tues., Aug. 19, also at 8 p.m.

The 1969 Berkshire Festival is being produced for radio by Jordan Whitelaw of Station WGBH, Boston. William Pierce is the symphony announcer.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUN 21 1969 New England

Tanglewood Concerts Live on WGBH-FM

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood will be broadcast by WGBH-FM, live and in stereo this summer, starting Friday, July 4 at 9 p.m.

To be held every Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m., the 1969 Berkshire Festival opens with two all-Mozart programs. On July 4 Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 29, Piano Concerto in C, with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist and Symphony No. 39.

The following evening, Saturday, July 5 at 8 p.m., he has chosen Mozart's Symphony No. 35 in D, "The Haffner," Piano Concerto in A, with John Browning as soloist and Symphony No. 40.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUN 26 1969 New England

SILLS SINGS

American soprano Beverly Sills heads the cast of Mozart's opera "Abduction from the Seraglio" to climax a full week of live Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts from the Berkshire Festival on WGBH radio (89.7 FM). The concerts will all be heard live and in stereo, on Sunday, July 6 at 2:30 p.m., Friday, July 11 at 9 p.m. and Saturday, July 12 at 8 p.m. when Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's famous opera.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUN 26 1969 New England

Wisconsin State Journal
MADISON, WISC.
D. 66,949 SUN. 104,944

MAY 27 1969

Music Festival to Be Featured

"Summer Showcase 1969," a new Sunday evening NET series focusing on some of the country's outstanding music festivals and other cultural events, will premiere on WHA-TV (Channel 21) on June 1.

Eighteen weeks of programs, from 90 minutes to two hours, will range the United States and will include festivals from classical music and opera to folk music, dance, and jazz. The series will be produced under a $1 million grant from the Corp. for Public Broadcasting and the Ford Foundation.

Among festivals contemplated for inclusion in Summer Showcase are the Berkshire Music Festival in Tanglewood, Mass., where Erich Leinsdorf will be making his final appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony.

CASH BOX
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 16,000

MAY 3 1969

Tuning In On. . .

WQXR - New York

'33 Years Of Classical Class'

In recent years, radio outlets across the country have been changing formats with increasing rapidity. WQXR-New York, however, has achieved consistent success by maintaining its fine music programming during the entire 33 years of its broadcasting history.

WQXR, the radio station of the New York Times, began operating on 50,000 watts in 1956, making the outlet the first fine music station to operate at the maximum power assigned to U.S. commercial radio stations. WQXR-FM, broadcasting WQXR's programs simultaneously, went on the air in 1939 as the first Frequency Modulation outlet in New York City. When the FCC ruled that AM and FM stations must separate their programs 50% of the broadcast day, WQXR began its separation on January 1, 1967, the date the ruling went into effect.

As is well known by New Yorkers, the bulk of WQXR's programming is classical music. The backbone of the outlet's schedule is the standard symphonic repertoire, which includes works by such classical chartmakers as Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Dvorak, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Stravinsky. WQXR aired the first concert from the new Philharmonic Hall in Lincoln Center, and features weekly broadcasts of the N. Y. Philharmonic concerts, broadcasts of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts from Boston and Tanglewood, the Boston Pops spring and summer concerts, taped concerts of the Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Cleveland Orchestras, and the Peabody Award winning music "specials." These "specials" honored personalities and events in the musical world, in many instances introducing well-known artists and persons associated with the event.

Robert Sherman, program director of WQXR, emphasizes that the music scheduled on the station is intended to be listened to. "We aim for people who are listening intently," he states. The music to which the WQXR audience is listening includes light music which is programmed on "After Midnight," hosted by Gene Lees, lyric writer and pop music reviewer for Hi Fi Magazine. Aired from 12:07 to 1:45 a.m. on Sunday mornings, the show features what Sherman calls "pop music with a point." Artists such as Frank Sinatra and Jack Jones receive airplay, and one "After Midnight" broadcast was a discussion of Frank Sinatra himself and of his influence on the music scene. On this program, and on Duncan Pirnie's "Cocktail Time" (5:07 — 6 p.m., Mondays through Saturdays), which also offers light, semi-jazz fare, WQXR is trying to "brighten and youngify" its pop sound, according to Sherman. The outlet is not changing its basic programming, says the program director, "we are revitalizing what we already have."

Two folk music shows are broadcast on WQXR on the weekends. On Saturdays, from 7:07 to 8 p.m. "Woody's Children," hosted by Sherman, presents contemporary folk music, which includes protest songs, modern pieces of various types, and the songs of both the left and right wings. Sherman prepares written scripts for "Woody's Children" and also for "Folk Music Of The World" (2:07 to 3 p.m., Sundays), a program which won an Ohio State University Award in 1967 for "Folk Music Of The World's Salute To Woody Guthrie." The Sunday afternoon folk show airs international folk songs of a traditional nature.

Other WQXR music programming features "The World Of Jazz," hosted by John Wilson, music critic of the Times (2:07 — 3 p.m., Saturdays); "Nights In Latin America," Pru Devon, host (7:30 — 8 p.m., Mondays); and "Music A La Carte," a daily luncheon broadcast which programs semi-classical music. Written scripts are prepared for WQXR's music programs, including the station's classical music shows. (An exception is "Music A La Carte," on which host George Edwards ad-libs his commentary.)

The news and public affairs programming of WQXR emanates from the New York Times, with the outlet presenting 22 five-minute news broadcasts daily and six daily features news programs. At 6:30 p.m., seven days a week, the Times editorial is broadcast a day ahead of publication. A different Times special correspondent has a five-minute news show on each day of the work week.

WQXR has been honored with six Peabody Awards and seven Ohio State Awards for its classical music programming. The station's adherence to a fine music format has proved highly rewarding: over 1,000,000 listeners tune in on WQXR. It might be said, with no levity intended, that WQXR is a classical gas.

On the Dial

NET Will Increase Cultural Offerings

NEW YORK (AP) — Sweeping changes in public television, aimed at bringing more cultural offerings and diversity to noncommerical airwaves, have been announced by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

The major reform announced Tuesday was creation of a Public Broadcasting System—PBS — within the next 90 days to manage the National Educational Television Network and its 140 member stations.

PBS, an arm of the corporation, will have broad power to allocate producers time on the NET network.

The plans were announced by John W. Macy Jr., the corporation president, and Fred W. Friendly, television consultant to the Ford Foundation, the largest contributor of noncommerical television. This year the foundation provided about $13 million.

Fred W. Friendly

First Change

The first programming change involves a new two-hour Sunday night program of news, poblic affairs, music and drama, premiering in October, to replace the controversial Public Broadcast Laboratory, which will leave the air in May.

For 18 Sunday evenings during the summer, NET will provide musical programs, including visits to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.; the Summer Music Camp at Interlochen, Mich., the Newport, R.I. Folk and Jazz Festivals, the Monterey Jazz Festival from California and the Cleveland Summer Festival.

Special Grant

The "Summer Showcase 1969" series will be produced with a special Ford grant of $1 million, Friendly said.

Other grants will create a television opera company and a New York Television Theater. A Negro variety series from Harlem, "Soul!," will be discontinued.

Macy said the new PBS would bring about "the most effective distribution of programming and insure that our growing network truly serves the stations and the total audience."

The changes were announced on the eve of the annual meetings of the National Association of Educational Broadcasters and of NET affiliates.

ADVOCATE
STAMFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 31,000

APR 10 1969 New England

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

APR 9 1969 New England

PRESS (e)
BRISTOL, CONN.
CIRC. 17,150

APR 9 1969 New England

Tanglewood broadcast in stereo

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood will be broadcast by WGBH-FM, live and in stereo this summer, starting Friday, July 4 at 9 p.m.

The concerts, direct from the famed 6000-seat Music Shed at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., continue through August and mark Erich Leinsdorf's final months as music director of the Berkshire Festival.

To be held every Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m., the 1969 Berkshire Festival opens with two all-Mozart programs. On July 4 Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 29, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467 with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist; and Symphony No. 39, K. 543.

The following evening, Saturday, July 5 at 8 p.m., he has chosen Mozart's Symphony No. 35 in D, K. 385, "The Haffner", Piano Concerto in A, K. 488 with John Browning as soloist and Symphony No. 40, K. 550.

Now in its 34th season, the Berkshire Festival will be heard not only in Boston, but throughout much of New England and New York State on Eastern Educational Radio Network stations WFCR (Amherst, Mass.), and WAMU-FM (Albany, N.Y.) and on WGBH-FM in Boston.

The 1969 Berkshire Festival is being produced for radio by Jordan Whitelaw; William Pierce is the symphony announcer.

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

JUN 19 1969 New England

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

JUN 19 1969 New England

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

JUN 19 1969 New England

Boston Pops On NET Sunday

Joan Kennedy, wife of Sen. Edward Kennedy, narrates Prokofiev's "Peter and the Wolf" as part of the Boston Pops Old Timers' Night to be seen on NET's "Sounds of Summer" Sunday (June 22) at 8 p.m. on Channel 24. Steve Allen is host.

Old Timers' Night includes a broad selection of light classics, popular tunes of the day, and sing-along favorites. Arthur Fiedler, since 1930 leader of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts the concert.

ELMIRA STAR GAZETTE
Saturday, June 21, 1969

Boston Symphony Concerts Will Be Broadcast Live

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer will be broadcast live by WAMC-FM (90.3 mc.), starting Friday, July 4, at 9 p.m.

The concerts, direct from the famed 6000-seat Music Shed at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, continue through Aug. 24 and mark Erich Leinsdorf's final months as music director of the orchestra.

The concerts will be broadcast Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon at 2.30 p.m. WAMC-FM will sign on the air at 6 p.m. Saturdays, beginning July 5, in order to carry the Tanglewood concerts.

For the opening concert, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 29, K. 201, Piano Concerto in C, K. 467 with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist, and Symphony No. 39, K. 543.

The following evening, St., July 5, at 8 p.m., he has chosen another Mozart program: Symphony No. 35 in D,K. 385, "The Haffner," Piano Concerto in A, K. 48 with John Browning as soloist and Symphony No. 40, K. 550.

In addition to the weekend concerts, WAMC will air two special events from the 34th season at Tanglewood — the annual Boston Pops concert on Tues., Aug. 5, at 8 p.m., and Tanglewood on Parade, Tues., Aug. 19, also at 8 p.m.

The 1969 Berkshire Festival is being produced for radio by Jordan Whitelaw of Station WGBH, Boston. William Pierce is the symphony announcer.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUN 21 1969 New England

Tanglewood Concerts Live on WGBH-FM

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood will be broadcast by WGBH-FM, live and in stereo this summer, starting Friday, July 4 at 9 p.m.

To be held every Friday at 9 p.m., Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m., the 1969 Berkshire Festival opens with two all-Mozart programs. On July 4 Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 29, Piano Concerto in C, with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist and Symphony No. 39.

The following evening, Saturday, July 5 at 8 p.m., he has chosen Mozart's Symphony No. 35 in D, "The Haffner," Piano Concerto in A, with John Browning as soloist and Symphony No. 40.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUN 26 1969 New England

SILLS SINGS

American soprano Beverly Sills heads the cast of Mozart's opera "Abduction from the Seraglio" to climax a full week of live Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts from the Berkshire Festival on WGBH radio (89.7 FM). The concerts will all be heard live and in stereo, on Sunday, July 6 at 2:30 p.m., Friday, July 11 at 9 p.m. and Saturday, July 12 at 8 p.m. when Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's famous opera.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUN 26 1969 New England

34.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 1 1969 New England

Radio To Air BSO Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer will be broadcast live over radio station WAMC-FM (90.3 mc) in Albany.

Broadcast time, starting July 4, will be Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m., and Sunday afternoons at 2:30.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
AUG 31 1969

FINAL BOW—Erich Leinsdorf takes his final bows with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Aug. 24. The program will be shown tonight on Channel 17's Sounds of Summer series. (Photo by Jim Leggett)

More announcements on pp. 79+80. (also pre-announcements - 73-74)

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
JUL 3 1969 New England

Tanglewood broadcast

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood will be broadcast by WGBH-FM, live and in stereo this summer, starting Friday, July 4 at 9 p.m.

The concerts, direct from the famed 6000-seat Music Shed at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., continue through August and mark Erich Leinsdorf's final months as music director of the Berkshire Festival.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JUL 3 1969 New England

Tanglewood Concerts Feature Rare Work

American pianist Earl Wild repeats his acclaimed performance of Scharwenka's long-neglected First Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, July 18, at 9 p.m. on WGBH Radio (89.7 FM).

The concert is one of three full-length Boston Symphony programs WGBH will air this week, live and in stereo, direct from the Music Shed at the Orchestra's summer home in Lenox.

The first Festival concert of the week Sunday, July 13 at 2:30 p.m. will be conducted by David Zinman and features Symphony for Strings in C by Graaf, Bach's concerto for Flute, Violin and Harpsichord in A Minor, Handel's Concerto Grosso in G, Op. 6 No. 1 and Symphony No. 36 by Mozart, "The Linz." Soloists in the Bach will be Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Joseph Silverstein, violin and Robert Levin, harpsichord.

The Friday concert, July 18, 9 p.m., will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will feature the Scharwenka concerto along with the Overture to Rossini's opera "Italian in Algiers" and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." The next evening, July 19 at 8 p.m., Mr. Leinsdorf will be joined by famed Soviet pianist Emil Gilels. Included in the program is music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet."

REPORTER
FOXBORO, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,250
JUL 9 1969 New England Newsclip

WGBH Broadcasts from Tanglewood

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood will be broadcast by WGBH-FM, live and in stereo this summer, starting Friday, July 4 at 9 pm.

The concerts, direct from the famed 6000-seat Music Shed at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., continue through August and mark Erich Leinsdorf's final months as music director of the Berkshire Festival.

To be held every Friday at 9 pm, Saturday at 8 pm and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 pm, the 1969 Berkshire Festival opens with two all-Mozart programs. On July 4 Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 29, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467 with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist; and Symphony No. 39, K. 543.

The following evening, Saturday, July 5 at 8 pm, he has chosen Mozart's Symphony No. 35 in D, K. 385, "The Haffner", Piano Concerto in A, K. 488 with John Browning as soloist and Symphony No. 40, K. 550.

Now in its 34th season, the Berkshire Festival will be heard not only in Boston, but throught much of New England and New York State on Eastern Educational Radio Network stations WFCR (Amherst, Mass.), and WAMU-FM (Albany, N.Y.) and on WGBH-FM in Boston.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JUL 9 1969

Inside Stuff—Radio-TV

A pair of Goldman Band concerts, one at Brooklyn's Prospect Park July 16 and the other at Manhattan's Central Park the following night, will mark the 75th birthday of arranger-composer Robert Russell Bennett. Highlight of "The Musical World of Robert Russell Bennett" will be the first public performance of a new work, "Down To the Sea In Ships," an orchestral suite for band that has grown out of the orchestral score he composed for the NBC-TV "Project 20" special of the same title which aired this past season. The suite was prompted by the publishers, Warner Bros.-Seven Arts Music. Bennett, who became associated with NBC in 1952 as arranger of the Richard Rodgers score for "Victory At Sea," has remained with the network as music director of its "Project 20" unit.

Reeves Telecom Corp. has combined three of its operations into a single new division, whose president will be Bruce R. Lang, formerly asst. to Richard L. Geismar, prez of the parent company. The new entity, Reeves Production Services Division, embraces Reeves Sound Studios, Reeves Video Division and Actron Corp., putting under a single aegis the company's production and post-production services for tape, film and audio shows and commercials. Other principals are John F. Vorisek, exec veepee who previously was prexy of Reeves Sound Studios; E. Grey Hodges, senior v.p. of marketing, previously acting general manager of the video division; and John H. Barwick, senior v.p. and formerly prexy of Actron Corp.

Lorne Greene, longtime star of "Bonanza," was named a Companion of the Order of Canada last week (and can put "O.C." after his name). He received the honor along with 11 non-showbiz prominents from Canada.

WLS Radio last week became the first Chi radio station to offer free shared computer time to clients, agencies and timebuyers for up-to-date market analysis. Cox Broadcasting, CBS, NBC and several magazines offer a similar service, but the Chi ABC-owned station is the first single station to do so. The system, called Instant Market profile (IMP), was designed by WLS' research and associate sales development director William Rice and utilizes a General Electric Mark I time-sharing service. The stored ARB and Brand Rating Index (BRI) data on the top ten Chi radio stations provide rating and viewer statistics for any station or combination of stations for any time period and also give cross-checks on reach and frequency estimates.

A German Radio & TV Exhibition is being staged in the city of Stuttgart Aug. 29-Sept. 7 showcasing latest developments in the German broadcasting and recording industries and featuring daylong presentations of color tv programs. Both of the country's networks are setting up complete studios to demonstrate how programs are staged. Admission prices are to be low: 75c for adults, about half that for children.

WAMC, Albany (N.Y.) Medical College FM station, Thursday night (3) aired a program taped at the Berkshire Music Center, with Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor Erich Leinsdorf as a speaker, and with other preliminaries re next day's opening of the season at Tanglewood. Program Manager Bob Wallace did the background commentary. WAMC regularly carries the Tanglewood concerts, piped from Boston.

NEWS-TRIBUNE
WALTHAM, MASS.
(E) 16,245
AUG 21 1969 New England

WCRB Planning Participation in Stereo Concerts

Waltham FM radio station WCRB will participate in the four - channel stereophonic broadcast of the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Tanglewood, starting Sept. 27 and running through April 25, 1970.

In conjunction with WGBH-FM, the Waltham station will create an effect designed to reproduce the sound heard in a concert hall.

This approach to sound reproduction attempts to record the exact sounds heard by a listener at a certain location in the concert hall. Each channel of the stereo records a direction from which sound reaches the location. Traditional monophonic or stereophonic recordings are generally thought to record the musical instruments for which the speaker systems are then substitutes.

For the listener to get the putting WGBH's left channel puting WGBH's left channel at their left rear, WGBH's right channel at their left front, WCRB's left channel at their right front, and WCRB's right channel at their right rear.

WCRB is located at 102.5 megacycles, and WGBH at 89.7 megacycles on the FM dial.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000
JUL 26 1969 New England

Berkshire Music Is Scheduled On Radio

By FRED H. RUSSELL

Seventeen concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the 1969 Berkshire Music Festival will be broadcast over WQXR radio on Sunday nights, from 8 to 10 o'clock, beginning Sunday, Aug. 3, and continuing into November.

The concerts, taped at the music center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will be conducted by the Boston Symphony's music director, Erich Leinsdorf and by several guest conductors Guest soloists will also be featured.

Mozart will be in the spotlight for four of the five broadcasts to be heard in August. The first (Aug. 3) will have Christoph Eschenbach as guest pianist in the Mozart Piano Concerto in C. John Browning will play the Mozart Piano Concerto in A on Aug. 10, and Claude Frank will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in B Flat on Aug. 17.

A complete performance of Mozart's The Abduction from the Seraglio" in German will be broadcast on Aug. 31. Leinsdorf will be the conductor for all August broadcasts. The program on Aug. 24 will present the four suites of Bach.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Wednesday, July 23, 1969

MAIL BAG

Station WAMC Offers Classical Music

TO THE EDITOR:

We blinked, to say the least, when we saw a recent KN-US headling: 'Cllassical Music Station Needed for Metroland." It was atop a mailbag letter from William and Roberta Batts lamenting the demise of WFLY as the area's "only classical music radio station."

And all this time we thought there were TWO such stations — the on e in Troy with its piles of phonograph records; and the one in Albany that broadcasts the Boston Symphony 52 weeks a year including the orchestra's Tanglewood performances in the summertime. And weekly concerts from the Ntw Englnd Consrvatory of Music. And a year-round schedule of programs of the classics from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Radio Nederland, Deutsche Welle, the French Broadcasting System and the Association of German Broadcasters. Not to mention such locally produced features as the concerts of the Schenectady Symphony, the South Mountain Association and he Albany Chamber Music Society; pianist Stanley Hummel's annual recitals; and many of the musical events at the State University at Albany, including the highly acclaimed appearances of pianist Findlay Cockrell.

The station, of course, is WAMC located right plunk in the middle of Metrland at the Albany Medical College. Granted there's a certain amount of talk on WAMC but like our music,it's the kind of talk that should appeal to the "intelligent, serious and sophisticated audience" cited by your correspondents.

The way we see it, Metroland has indeed had two classical music stations right along. NOW it has one. But without public support (WAMC is a non-commercial station which depends on its liesteners for financial assstance), the day could com when even that one migh disappear. Wt hope those among your readers wht feel they've been abandoned by the Troy station will tuen us in.

ROBERT WALLACE
Program Director, Station WAMC

Albany

PAGE ONE
AUDIO TIMES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 9,000
SEP 15 1969

4 Channel Stereo Could Be Boon

BOSTON, MASS.—"It's like discovering stereo all over again!" That's how one industry executive described his first encounter with four-channel stereo, which received its first public over-the-air test last month at nearby Tanglewood. Every Saturday from September 27 through April 25, FM stereo stations WCRB and WGHB here will carry live the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in four-channel stereo. On those Saturdays when the Symphony is not performing, the two stations will air specially-prepared four-channel tapes.

The four-channel system utilizes two speakers (left and right) in the rear of the listening room; and two more speakers (left and right) in front of these. The effect, according to a man who's heard the tapes, is to create not only left to right spatial effect, but depth as well. "You can not only tell that the trumpet is midway between the speakers, but that he's behind the violins and in front of the tympani," he said.

(Continued on page 15)

4 Channel Stereo . . .

(Continued from page 1)

Four-channel stereo is about to break upon us. In the next issue of AUDIO TIMES, we'll have complete details on how it works, how the WCRB and WGBH broadcasts are utilized in the home, comments from industry leaders.

34

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 1 1969 New England

Radio To Air BSO Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood this summer will be broadcast live over radio station WAMC-FM (90.3 mc) in Albany.

Broadcast time, starting July 4, will be Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m., and Sunday afternoons at 2:30.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
AUG 31 1969

FINAL BOW—Erich Leinsdorf takes his final bows with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tang'ewood on Aug. 24. The program will be shown tonight on Channel 17's Sounds of Summer series. (Photo by Jim Leggett)

More announcements on pp. 79-80. (also pre-announcements - 73-74)

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000

JUL 3 1969 New England

Tanglewood broadcast

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood will be broadcast by WGBH-FM, live and in stereo this summer, starting Friday, July 4 at 9 p.m.

The concerts, direct from the famed 6000-seat Music Shed at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., continue through August and mark Erich Leinsdorf's final months as music director of the Berkshire Festival.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 25,000

JUL 3 1969 New England

Tanglewood Concerts Feature Rare Work

American pianist Earl Wild repeats his acclaimed performance of Scharwenka's long-neglected First Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, July 18, at 9 p.m. on WGBH Radio (89.7 FM).

The concert is one of three full-length Boston Symphony programs WGBH will air this week, live and in stereo, direct from the Music Shed at the Orchestra's summer home in Lenox.

The first Festival concert of the week Sunday, July 13 at 2:30 p.m. will be conducted by David Zinman and features Symphony for Strings in C by Graaf, Bach's concerto for Flute, Violin and Harpsichord in A Minor, Handel's Concerto Grosso in G, Op. 6 No. 1 and Symphony No. 36 by Mozart, "The Linz." Soloists in the Bach will be Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Joseph Silverstein, violin and Robert Levin, harpsichord.

The Friday concert, July 18, 9 p.m., will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will feature the Scharwenka concerto along with the Overture to Rossini's opera "Italian in Algiers" and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." The next evening, July 19 at 8 p.m., Mr. Leinsdorf will be joined by famed Soviet pianist Emil Gilels. Included in the program is music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet."

REPORTER
FOXBORO, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,250

JUL 9 1969 New England Newsclip

WGBH Broadcasts from Tanglewood

All 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood will be broadcast by WGBH-FM, live and in stereo this summer, starting Friday, July 4 at 9 pm.

The concerts, direct from the famed 6000-seat Music Shed at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., continue through August and mark Erich Leinsdorf's final months as music director of the Berkshire Festival.

To be held every Friday at 9 pm, Saturday at 8 pm and Sunday afternoon at 2:30 pm, the 1969 Berkshire Festival opens with two all-Mozart programs. On July 4 Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Symphony No. 29, K. 201; Piano Concerto in C, K. 467 with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist; and Symphony No. 39, K. 543.

The following evening, Saturday, July 5 at 8 pm, he has chosen Mozart's Symphony No. 35 in D, K. 385, "The Haffner", Piano Concerto in A, K. 488 with John Browning as soloist and Symphony No. 40, K. 550.

Now in its 34th season, the Berkshire Festival will be heard not only in Boston, but throught much of New England and New York State on Eastern Educational Radio Network stations WFCR (Amherst, Mass.), and WAMU-FM (Albany, N.Y.) and on WGBH-FM in Boston.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W.-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 9 1969

Inside Stuff—Radio-TV

A pair of Goldman Band concerts, one at Brooklyn's Prospect Park July 16 and the other at Manhattan's Central Park the following night, will mark the 75th birthday of arranger-composer Robert Russell Bennett. Highlight of "The Musical World of Robert Russell Bennett" will be the first public performance of a new work, "Down To the Sea In Ships," an orchestral suite for band that has grown out of the orchestral score he composed for the NBC-TV "Project 20" special of the same title which aired this past season. The suite was prompted by the publishers, Warner Bros.-Seven Arts Music. Bennett, who became associated with NBC in 1952 as arranger of the Richard Rodgers score for "Victory At Sea," has remained with the network as music director of its "Project 20" unit.

Reeves Telecom Corp. has combined three of its operations into a single new division, whose president will be Bruce R. Lang, formerly asst. to Richard L. Geismar, prez of the parent company. The new entity, Reeves Production Services Division, embraces Reeves Sound Studios, Reeves Video Division and Actron Corp., putting under a single aegis the company's production and post-production services for tape, film and audio shows and commercials. Other principals are John F. Vorisek, exec veepee who previously was prexy of Reeves Sound Studios; E. Grey Hodges, senior v.p. of morketing, previously acting general manager of the video division; and John H. Barwick, senior v.p. and formerly prexy of Actron Corp.

Lorne Greene, longtime star of "Bonanza," was named a Companion of the Order of Canada last week (and can put "O.C." after his name). He received the honor along with 11 non-showbiz prominents from Canada.

WLS Radio last week became the first Chi radio station to offer free shared computer time to clients, agencies and timebuyers for up-to-date market analysis. Cox Broadcasting, CBS, NBC and several magazines offer a similar service, but the Chi ABC-owned station is the first single station to do so. The system, called Instant Market profile (IMP), was designed by WLS' research and associate sales development director William Rice and utilizes a General Electric Mark I time-sharing service. The stored ARB and Brand Rating Index (BRI) data on the top ten Chi radio stations provide rating and viewer statistics for any station or combination of stations for any time period and also give cross-checks on reach and frequency estimates.

A German Radio & TV Exhibition is being staged in the city of Stuttgart Aug. 29-Sept. 7 showcasing latest developments in the German broadcasting and recording industries and featuring daylong presentations of color tv programs. Both of the country's networks are setting up complete studios to demonstrate how programs are staged. Admission prices are to be low: 75c for adults, about half that for children.

WAMC, Albany (N.Y.) Medical College FM station, Thursday night (3) aired a program taped at the Berkshire Music Center, with Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor Erich Leinsdorf as a speaker, and with other preliminaries re next day's opehing of the season at Tanglewood. Program Manager Bob Wallace did the background commentary. WAMC regularly carries the Tanglewood concerts, piped from Boston.

NEWS-TRIBUNE
WALTHAM, MASS.
(E) 16,245

AUG 21 1969 New England

WCRB Planning Participation in Stereo Concerts

Waltham FM radio station WCRB will participate in the four - channel stereophonic broadcast of the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from Tanglewood, starting Sept. 27 and running through April 25, 1970.

In conjunction with WGBH-FM, the Waltham station will create an effect designed to reproduce the sound heard in a concert hall.

This approach to sound reproduction attempts to record the exact sounds heard by a listener at a certain location in the concert hall. Each channel of the stereo records a direction from which sound reaches the location. Traditional monophonic or stereophonic recordings are generally thought to record the musical instruments for which the speaker systems are ther substitutes.

For the listener to get the putting WGBH's left channe puting WGBH's left channel at their left rear, WGBH's right channel at their left front, WCRB's left channel at their right front, and WCRB's right channel at their right rear.

WCRB is located at 102.5 megacycles, and WGBH at 89.7 megacycles on the FM dial.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000

JUL 26 1969 New England

Berkshire Music Is Scheduled On Radio

By FRED H. RUSSELL

Seventeen concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra from the 1969 Berkshire Music Festival will be broadcast over WQXR radio on Sunday nights, from 8 to 10 o'clock, beginning Sunday, Aug. 3, and continuing into November.

The concerts, taped at the music center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will be conducted by the Boston Symphony's music director, Erich Leinsdorf and by several guest conductors Guest soloists will also be featured.

Mozart will be in the spotlight for four of the five broadcasts to be heard in August. The first (Aug. 3) will have Christoph Eschenbach as guest pianist in the Mozart Piano Concerto in C. John Browning will play the Mozart Piano Concerto in A on Aug. 10, and Claude Frank will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in B Flat on Aug. 17.

A complete performance of Mozart's The Abduction from the Seraglio" in German will be broadcast on Aug. 31. Leinsdorf will be the conductor for all August broadcasts. The program on Aug. 24 will present the four suites of Bach.

Wednesday, July 23, 1969

MAIL BAG

Station WAMC Offers Classical Music

TO THE EDITOR:

We blinked, to say the least, when we saw a recent KN-US heading: 'Cllassical Music Station Needed for Metroland." It was atop a mailbag letter from William and Roberta Batts lamenting the demise of WFLY as the area's "only classical music radio station."

And all this time we thought there were TWO such stations — the on e in Troy with its piles of phonograph records; and the one in Albany that broadcasts the Boston Symphony 51 weeks a year including the orchestra's Tanglewood performances in the summertime. And weekly concerts from the Ntw Englnd Consrvatory of Music. And a year-round schedule of programs of the classics from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Radio Nederland, Deutsche Welle, the French Broadcasting System and the Association of German Broadcasters. Not to mention such locally produced features as the concerts of the Schenectady Symphony, the South Mountain Association and he Albany Chamber Music Society; pianist Stanley Hummel's annual recitals; and many of the musical events at the State University at Albany, including the highly acclaimed appearances of pianist Findlay Cockrell.

The station, of course, is WAMC located right plunk in the middle of Metrland at the Albany Medical College. Granted there's a certain amount of talk on WAMC but like our music, it's the kind of talk that should appeal to the "intelligent, serious and sophisticated audience" cited by your correspondents.

The way we see it, Metroland has indeed had two classical music stations right along. NOW it has one. But without public support (WAMC is a non-commercial station which depends on its liesteners for financial assstance), the day could com when even that one migh disappear. We hope those among your readers wht feel they've been abandoned by the Troy station will tuen us in.

ROBERT WALLACE
Program Director, Station WAMC

Albany

PAGE ONE

4 Channel Stereo Could Be Boon

BOSTON, MASS.—"It's like discovering stereo all over again!" That's how one industry executive described his first encounter with four-channel stereo, which received its first public over-the-air test last month at nearby Tanglewood. Every Saturday from September 27 through April 25, FM stereo stations WCRB and WGHB, here will carry live the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in four-channel stereo. On those Saturdays when the Symphony is not performing, the two stations will air specially-prepared four-channel tapes.

The four-channel system utilizes two speakers (left and right) in the rear of the listening room: and two more speakers (left and right) in front of these. The effect, according to a man who's heard the tapes, is to create not only left to right spatial effect, but depth as well. "You can not only tell that the trumpet is midway between the speakers, but that

(Continued on page 15)

AUDIO TIMES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 9,000

SEP 15 1969

4 Channel Stereo . . .

(Continued from page 1)

he's behind the violins and in front of the tympani," he said.

Four-channel stereo is about to break upon us. In the next issue of AUDIO TIMES, we'll have complete details on how it works, how the WCRB and WGBH broadcasts are utilized in the home, comments from industry leaders.

35.

BSO Concerts last Week

Tanglewood Begins 1969 Season With Leinsdorf Conducting Mozart

Tanglewood begins 1969 season with Berkshire Music Center opening exercises and first weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts.

Erich Leinsdorf conducts three all-Mozart programs, July 4, 5, 6.

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS — The 1969 Boston Symphony Orchestra Tanglewood season gets under way in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall on Sunday afternoon, June 29, with the traditional Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center.

On Friday, July 4 at 9 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts the first of three all-Mozart programs as this season's opening Berkshire Festival concert.

Each of the first weekend's all-Mozart programs includes one of the last three symphonies and a late piano concerto. On July 4, Mr. Leinsdorf conducts the symphosy no. 39, and the 26-year old German pianist Christoph Eschenbach makes his Boston Symphony and Tanglewood debuts playing the concerto in C, K. 467. The symphony no. 29 opens the program. On Saturday July 5 at 8 p.m., John Browning is soloist in the piano concerto no. 23 in A, K. 488, and Mr. Leinsdorf conducts the symphony no. 40. The opening work is the 'Haffner' symphony. On Sunday afternoon, July 6, the soloist is Claude Frank, who will play Mozart's last piano concerto, in B flat, K. 595. Mr. Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's last symphony, the 'Jupiter'. Six of Mozart's German Dances, K. 571, open the program.

Each Tanglewood weekend begins with a Weekend Prelude, a brief concert at 7pm on Friday evenings. On July 4, Lillian Kallir and Claude Frank will perform Bach and Mozart music for two pianos joined by the Violone Ensemble, a five-man string group which is one of the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A ticket for the 9pm Boston Symphony concert admits the holder to the Weekend Prelude, for which seats are unreserved. The Preludes are particularly popular with concert goers who picnic on the Tanglewood lawn before the Friday evening concert.

Saturday morning, July 5, at 10.30 am, is the first of this season's Open Rehearsals. Seats are unreserved, and their sale, the morning of the concert, benefits the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund.

On Sunday afternoon, June 29, at 2.30, Erich Leinsdorf will be the principal speaker at the Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy for advanced music study. Mr. Leinsdorf retires from the dual post of Music Director of the Boston Symphony and Director of the Berkshire Music Center at the end of this summer. His address deals with the Center's work during his 1962-69 tenure and with present and future needs to link the earlier modern music of the 20th century with advanced contemporary music.

The Opening Exercises will also be addressed by Thomas D. Perry Jr., Manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and by Robert C. Alsop, Chairman of the Friends of Music at Tanglewood. Randell Thompson's Alleluia, a part of each opening ceremony since it was composed for the initial Exercises in 1940, will be sung by the students, directed by Charles Wilson, head of the Vocal Music activities of the Center, and Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
JUL 3 1969 New England

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUL 7 1969 New England

Symphony Soloist

Claude Frank, pianist.

During the first week-end of Berkhsire Festival Concerts, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct three all - Mozart programs, July 4, 5, 6. On Sunday afternoon, July 6, the soloist is Claude Frank, who will play Mozart's last piano concerto, in B flat, K. 593. Mr Leinsdorf conducts Mozart's last symphony, the 'Jupiter.' Six of Mozart's German Dances, K. 571, open the program.

Each Tanglewood week - end begins with a Week-End Prelude, a brief concert at 7 pm on Friday evenings. A ticket for the 9 pm Boston Symphony concert admits the holder to the Week-End Prelude, for which seats are unreserved. The Preludes are particularly popular with concert goers who picnic on the Tanglewood lawn before the Friday evening concert.

Saturday morning, July 5, at 10:30 am, is the first of this season's Open Rehearsals. Seats are unreserved, and their sale, the morning of the concert, benefits the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund.

BEE
LEWISTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000
JUL 4 1969 New England

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
JUL 7 1969

Mozart weekend at Tanglewood

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Critic

LENOX — The 1969 Berkshire Festival, the last under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, began this past weekend at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony playing three concerts of music by Mozart. Leinsdorf conducted all three programs, which included the last three symphonys as well as the Haffner and Number 29 in A major and the set of German Dances, K.571. Soloists were the pianist Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning and Claude Frank, respectively, in the concertos in C major, K.467, A major, K.488, and B flat major, K.595.

The great C major Concerto, which the Boston Symphony, being "molto snob," disdained to identify as the "Elvira Madigan," is festive and intimate at the same time. It is one of the few concertos with trumpets, but they make their most telling comment in pianissimo.

The first Allegro is enormously sophisticated in its working out, but even for Mozart the inspiration behind seven or eight themes sounds especially spontaneous. It is also a movement of unusual expressive range: Who, having experienced the hushed excitement of the first measures or the charming G major couplet that is introduced by the piano, could anticipate anything like the melancholy E minor solo in the development, a clear and touching print-through from the tragic 27 days older D minor Concerto?

For this moment, and not even for it alone, I reject the late John Burk's contention in his program notes that this is Mozart's "most carefree piano concerto."

The finale, which may be Mozart's gayest, amazes, like the first movement, with its prodigious inventiveness of one detail after another. Here as well, because the matter itself is so rich, the shadows are, too. Between the Allegros there stands a slow movement in F major, Mozart's most ecstatic, most romantic aria, an astonishing stream of melody, underlined by bold, heart-piercing harmony, by restless, troubled figurations, the whole movement incomparable for sheer sensuous beauty.

So subtle and rich, K.467 is a singularly difficult concerto to play. I should say, in fact, even remembering gratefully the best moments in the interpretations of Schnabel, Barenboim, Bishop, Fischer, that before Friday I had never heard a really satisfying performance of it; then, however, the ensemble achievement of Eschenbach with Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony seemed to me marvelous. My immediate, if not my considered, reaction was that this was the Mozart playing I had been waiting for all my life, that even a good many hours later I could think of only one comparably fulfilling experience with the Mozart concerto, and that was Claude Frank's performance with Leinsdorf at Tanglewood in 1966 of the other C major, K.503.

The most treasurable thing to me about Eschenbach's performance of K.467 was its sense of scale, his ability to realize the range from grandure to delicacy without making it sound gross, as a few pianists do, or producing a colorless tinkle, as many do.

Echenbach could take a 20th century Steinway and in the best sense make it suggest an 18th century Stein. The playing was concentrated yet relaxed, aware in matters both of expression and architecture, creatively and continually varied within the limits of a generally cool and crisp manner, and filled with an unusual lot of high spirits. The natural and brilliant piano playing was itself a joy. Leinsdorf provided a finely-made lively, and carefully integrated context for Echenbach's playing, and the Boston Symphony's participation except for the principal oboes rather course espressivo and some disagreeable blatting from the trumpets, was excellent.

The Week-end prelude earlier Friday evening, was also exceptionally enjoyable The pianists Claude Frank and Lilian Kallir played Bach's C major Concerto with five Symphony string players who work together as the Violone Ensamble, and also Mozart's D major sonata for two pianos. Bach is a rare and cerainly wonderful piece with a finale that is an exciting intersection of the fugal and the concertante styles. Both works were done with intelligence and tremendous verve.

Leinsdorf Begins Last Season

Boston Symphony Opens Tanglewood

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened the season at Tanglewood Friday night with a few Fourth of July fireworks of its own. The spectacular display of an exceptionally well-played concert came with Christoph Eschenbach's performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 1 in C, K. 467.

The 28-year-old German pianist gave a highly promising exhibition of his talents in his debut with the Boston Symphony Friday. His American debut was made earlier this year with the Cleveland Symphony and he already has a long list of European credits and prizes to his name.

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH

Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 21, specifically the second movement, is more familiarly known as the "Love Theme" from the film "Elvira Madigan." More than one member of the audience was tempted to hum along but was soon left in silent, rapt listening.

ESCHENBACH is a young performer not fully matured but he has a vibrance of keyboard presence and a remarkably clean, unfussy technique. His playing follows smooth flowing lines that have the feel of perfect progression and his crashing finale was greeted by a roar from the good-sized opening night audience. Prolonged applause and shouts of "bravo" trailed off reluctantly into the intermission break.

The Boston Symphony itself was in unusually good form also Friday night. Coordinated attention to detail and a zest of performance marked the orchestra that a year ago had the tendency to sound as damp and soggy as the surrounding lawns.

Opening all-Mozart program with the Symphony No. 29 in A the chamber-sized orchestra immediately gained control of a full, tempered sound touched by unusually sensitive strings. It was most listenable Mozart as was the Symphony No. 39 in E Flate which concluded a program which promised a good season ahead.

ERICH LEINSDORF appeared to be nearly bouncing with good spirits as he commenced his final season as conductor and music director of the BSO. His appearance was greeted by heavy and appreciative applause preceding the concert. In communicating with the orchestra he seemed to evoke with ease the response he wished, resulting in the sound already discussed.

The weekend's concerts at Tanglewood continued on Saturday night and Sunday afternoon in the chamber orchestra format which has become a long-standing tradition for the first two weeks of the season while the remainder of the orchestra gives pops concerts in Boston.

ON SATURDAY night, also under the direction of Leinsdorf, a second all-Mozart program featured John Browning playing the Piano Concerto No. 23 in A accompanied by Symphonies No. 35 and 40.

Sunday afternoon Claude Frank performed Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 27 in B Flat which was combined with Six German Dances and the Symphony No. 41, the "Jupiter," with Leinsdorf again conducting.

For the third summer a "Weekend Prelude" is being included in the total weekend offering. Presented at 7:00 p.m. Friday for the benefit of early arrivals, the prelude allows the concert-proper to be held off until 9:00 p.m. to accommodate weekend travelers.

This first Prelude Friday night presented the combined pianistic talents of Claude Frank and Lilian Kallir assisted by a violin ensemble playing Bach's Concerto for Two Pianos and Strings in C and Mozart's Sonata for Two Pianos in D.

Despite the not quite cooperating weather the Tanglewood opening was witnessed by a full shed and a considerable lawn crowd. Possibly because of the weather, it was also attended by a full share of mosquitos.

THE BERKSHIRE Music Festival season continues on Tuesday night with the first of the "Contemporary Trends" programs of the season with Janis Joplin and Orpheus at 8:00 p.m. in the shed.

36

Concert Review

Berkshire Festival Opening

BY MARTHA BEAVER

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center, opened its first weekend of concerts last Friday with all Mozart programs.

The bonus "Prelude," which precedes every Friday concert at 7 p.m. was given by pianists Claude Frank and Lillian Kallir, who included a Bach Concerto for two pianos and strings in C. They were assisted admirably by the Violone Ensemble including, two violins, viola, cello and bass.

Mozart's Sonata for two pianos in D was their other offering. Compatible in style, their finely drawn nuances, even their tonal strength, were impeccably complemented. The pianists, were nonetheless victims of acoustical imperfections. The basically clear structure and profound joys of Bach, the eloquent and elegant phrases of Mozart were evidenced, but only through a diffusion, even an impressionist aura, of sounds. This was not disagreeable in the slower movements, when musical action is less than the faster-paced. Knowing the sensitive and excellent musicianship of both Frank and Kallir, disappointment was keen.

The screen which is drawn around the smaller musical groups has been changed from the rather large one of former concerts, and both tops of the pianos were open, but lined up instead of being allowed to dovetail in the natural manner. Could this have been part of the acoustical difficulties? I miss hearing these first concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall, which is so much more suited to the smaller ensembles and soloists.

After standing to greet their conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, who retires from the dual post of music director of the BSO and director of the Berkshire Music Center at this summer's end, the musicians set the mood for the evening concert with Mozart's slender yet enchanting Symphony No. 29 in A, composed when he was 18. Open, artful, inventive, all four movements were delicately unrolled by Leinsdorf with finely balanced shape and spirit.

Then followed a young German pianist, Christoph Eschenbach, in his first appearance with the symphony and at Tanglewood, playing Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 21 in C. Its Andante was familiar to many through its use in the movie "Elvira Madigan." There are enough "daring modernities" in it to understand why. They were considered such in Mozart's time, and hearing them in the concerto's context seems quite audacious even now.

Eschenbach revealed a gem-like tone, diamond brilliant, clear, but without resonant warmth. With deeply thoughtful concentration he extracted and entwined phrases with fine technical skill and musicianly vigor. In drawing his nuances, the young pianist tended to lose endings at times with the completion of a phrase, in too-soft tones; although I prefer an overall graceful sweep to a heavily articulated finish. Balance of voices was not always deftly established, particularly in the first movement. Perhaps nervousness accounted for this. In blending with the various instruments, those lovely moments in the second, with oboe and flute, and finally full ensemble (the orchestra is necessarily diminished), Eschenbach showed great musical sensitivity. The young artist never let emotion get the upper hand. He was in good control throughout, answering to and feeling with the thoughtfully styled directions of Leinsdorf.

The concert ended with Symphony No. 39 in E flat, one of Mozart's last three great symphonies — all works of perfection and quite different.

This weekend's concerts will open tonight, at 9 with Leinsdorf conducting the four suites of Bach. The bonus prelude at 7 will be given by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, and principal cellist Juels Eskin, playing two Bach compositions for unaccompanied strings.

Saturday evening, Leinsdorf will conduct a complete concert performance in German of Mozart's Opera, The Abduction from the Seraglio. Beverly Sills sings the role of Constanze; George Shirley is Belmonte, and Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, and Raymond Michalski sing the other principal parts. The Tanglewood Choir also participates.

David Zinman, young American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, will conduct Sunday afternoon at 2:30. Included will be Mozart's Linz symphony, works by Graaf and Handel, Bach's Triple concerto in A minor with soloists Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Silverstein, and Harpsichordist Robert Levin. Open rehearsal Saturday morning is at 10:30.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 11 1969 New England

Hartford Times
Jul 6

Tanglewood Season Opens With All-Mozart Program

By GEORGE W. STOWE

The miracle of Mozart was once again evident when Erich Leinsdorf opened the 1969 Tanglewood season in Lenox, Mass. with a program devoted entirely to the composer's works.

And Friday night's concert in the Shed seemed to be much better attended than some of the early programs of the past few years. Perhaps it was the choice of works, which included two sympmphonies—Nos. 29 and 39—and the Piano Concerto No. 21, which has achieved a great deal of fame due to the use of the slow movement in the film, "Elvira Madigan."

* * *

Christoph Eschenbach, the young German pianist, was the soloist in the concerto and he aroused a prolonged ovation from the audience at the Friday night program. There was good reason for it; the pianist has amazing finger dexterity and at the same time the tonal fluidity that is suitable for Mozart.

In fact, I cannot remember the final movement taken at the quicksilver tempo that Eschenbach and Leinsdorf adopted. And yet the articulation was clean and smooth and the tone was never in the least bit percussive.

* * *

The "Elvira Madigan" theme of the second movement was not shortchanged. Eschenbach had everything under control and the Boston Symphony played with a suavity and unanimity here that represented this great orchestra at its best.

Mozart's Symphony No. 29 has always been one of this reviewer's favorite works in this form. (I will never forget the caressing warmth that Bruno Walter brought to the slow movement). And if there is a more joyous finale than the one to be found in this symphony, I do not know of it.

On this occasion Leinsdorf gave us a performance that was utterly devoid of sentimentality. In fact, I found the Andante somewhat lacking in warmth. However, the finale was genuinely exhilarating and played with the suavity and finesse that are the hallmarks of Leinsdorf's style.

The Symphony in E flat (No. 39) is, of course, one of the composer's most admired creations. The slow introduction, which was probably inspired by Haydn (whose "Paris" symphonies had appeared just before Mozart wrote this work), prepares the listener for the many delights to follow.

And the performance found the orchestra in top technical form. The only deterrent to complete enjoyment was the occasional sound of July 4th fireworks in the background. All things considered, it was a most auspicious beginning for Erich Leinsdorf's final season as director of the Tanglewood concerts.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

JUL 7 1969

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, July 7, 1969

Tanglewood begins

Leinsdorf pleases with summer stock in trade

by Rodney Myrvaagnes

The Tanglewood season opened July fourth with both a wet fizzle and an engaging bang. The grounds were as beautiful as ever except for a few patches of browned grass, and the crowd was predominantly New York, as always. The caterer was new, which is probably to the good. (Restaurant Associates now puts up an "American Picnic" for $2.50 and a "French Pique Nique" for $3.50. You can always bring your own, as we did, and if you want anything alcoholic with your picnic you must bring that, as there is none available.)

The early concert, called "Weekend Prelude," was performed at 7 o'clock by pianists Claude Frank and Lillian Kallir, with the Violone Ensemble in the Bach. First was the Bach Concerto for two pianos (saying it enough times will make it so) and strings in C (BWV 1061). There are a number of valid reasons possible for transcribing music for another instrument, and if there is a reason it should become evident in the performance. No reason became evident in this performance, in which it did not become idiomatic piano music, but lost all its harpsichord character. The playing was certainly competent, however, the trills were right sideup, and might have been enjoyable ten years ago.

The Mozart sonata for two pianos (K.448), on the other hand, I don't believe I would ever have liked as they did it. It was massive, almost gross throughout, and suggested a fourhand reduction of a Beethoven symphony.

The principal concert at 9 was like a breath of fresh air after the prelude. Except for a sloppy first four bars in Mozart's Symphony 29, in which the staccato notes sounded legato because the players weren't together, the strings sounded like a huge quartet, with everything together and lovingly placed where Leinsdorf thought it should go. The ensemble playing went downhill as more winds were added, and by the end of the evening the full passages of Symphony 39 were quite confused.

The high point of the evening, and a very high point indeed, was the piano concerto in C (K467). Sullied by its association with the film, "Elvira Madigan," the now familiar piece was redeemed here by Christoff Eschenbach's elegant pianism, and the beauty of the concerto itself, which swamps all associations. In the minor quibble department, Eschenbach left out some trills which appeared in my score and which seem reasonable, and some long series of sixteenth notes could have been phrased, but weren't. It was still delightful, and some of the best Mozart playing I have heard. Make it a point to hear Mr. Eschenbach again at the first opportunity.

"They've been playing like angels all weekend," said David Levenson, assistant to the B.S.O. Press Director, and the description couldn't have been more accurate. The opening two weekends of the orchestra's summer season at Tanglewood were devoted mostly to works of Mozart and Bach, and — at least at the first Saturday concert — the heavenly music was matched by performances little short of divine.

All three concerts during the first weekend were devoted to Mozart: two symphonies and a piano concerto. The program on Saturday presented the Haffner (#35) and G-minor (#40) Symphonies and the A-major (#23) piano concerto. The performances — under retiring Music Director Erich Leinsdorf — were all examples of clarity and understanding, and they confirmed the conductor's reputation as a Mozart specialist.

The Haffner Symphony is often considered a poorer relation of the other late symphonies — perhaps because Mozart "patched it together" from movements of a longer serenade. It is nonetheless a warm and charming piece which fully deserves the attention it is now — belatedly — receiving. In Leinsdorf's interpretation — alternately delicate and robust — it danced with a grace and naturalness which made it the most successful performance of the evening.

The second work on the program — the A-major concerto — enjoyed much the same treatment as the Haffner. Leinsdorf's attention to dynamics, phrasing, and balance was as exemplary here as in the symphony. Unfortunately, the pianist — John Browning — rarely exercised the soloists prerogative to provide an interpretive contrast to the orchestral tutti. The result was a performance in which everything was a bit too homogenized, in which a theme which was repeated several times by the orchestra and piano was always phrased in the same predictable way. Browning never took advantage of his opportunities to re-interpret in his solo passages material originally stated by the orchestra, and his playing was consequently deficient in spontaniety.

The performance was otherwise generally satisfying both technically and musically, but the fascinating interplay between soloist and orchestra which characterizes truly great concerto performances was missing. The drama, lyricism, and playfulness of Mozart were all present in the Leinsdorf-Browning interpretation, but the degrees of characterization were less subtly differentiated than they should have been, and therefore the performance lacked the last measure of interpretive excitement.

The G-minor Symphony is of course one of Mozart's greatest creations. So much of the romantic movement is presaged in this symphony, that the conductor is likely to forget that it is still constructed along essentially classical lines. He must, therefore, remain constantly aware of the work's eighteenth-century polish as well as its nineteenth-century passion.

Leinsdorf't balance of these opposite elements was convincing, and if the interpretation was not deeply personal or memorable, at least is also did not interfere with the character of the work.

—RALPH LOCKE

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

JUL 16 1969 N Eng.

At the Concert

Mozart's Works Hit at Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

Contrary to the predictions of some authorities, serious music, especially that of the classical school, is very much alive as the attendance of some 21,000 enthusiastic patrons at the first weekend of concerts at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra would confirm. An additional sign of health was the large percentage of young people, particularly at the Sunday afternoon concert.

This first weekend was devoted entirely to music by Mozart and included three of his greatest symphonies and three of his major piano concerti with three of the younger ranking pianists as soloists.

Christoph Escherbach made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday evening concert. A previous American appearance was with the Cleveland Orchestra earlier this year. This young pianist from West Germany has a fine European reputation based largely on his performance of music by Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Schubert.

MR. ESCHENBACH played the Piano Concerto No. 21 in C major, K.467, one of Mozart's sunniest and most carefree works. He is admirably suited to this music as his tone is lovely, he has the necessary technical fluency and bright crisp sound for the passage work and the melodic sense so essential in the slow movement. The Andante of this concerto is like an ideal aria freed of all the limitations of the human voice. The last movement was taken at a very rapid tempo, but with no loss of clarity or rhythmical balance.

On Saturday evening John Browining, who is better known here for his performances of Rachmaninoff and Prokofieff, played the Piano Concerto No. 23 in A major, K.488. Other music on this program included the "Haffner" Symphony and the most tragic of Mozart symphonies, the G minor, K.550.

The soloist for the Sunday afternoon concert was Claude Frank who has become a favorite of Tanglewood audiences during the past few seasons. His choice was the last piano concerto that Mozart wrote, No. 27 in B flat major, K.595, a subtle work having the highest mastery in invention, welding the solo and tutti parts into the richest, closest relation and having the most transparent sonority.

Mr. Frank played with the technical assurance, style and musicality that we have come to expect from him. His distinctively beautiful tone sensitivity and phrasing made the Largh-

JOHN BROWNING

CHRISTOPHER ESCHERBACH

etto a memorable musical experience while the last movement had a bounce and buoyancy that gave it a splendid contrast to the lyric slow movement.

THE ACCOMPANIMENTS provided the soloists by Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra were miracles of precision and lightness.

It was very apparent that the conductor has a special affection for Mozart and successfully communicated it to his men as everything had style, exceptional polish and conviction.

The strings have never sounded better and the winds had a roundness of tone at all dynamic levels. This was particularly apparent in the masterful performance of the Symphony No. 41 in C, K.551 popularly known as the "Jupiter." The difficult contrapuntal final movement had unusual grace and clarity. A most auspicious beginning for the current season.

Next Friday evening the program will be purely orchestral and include the Four Suites by Bach.

Saturday night will bring a concert performance of Mozart's opera "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail" with Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Sienna, Mac Morgan, Raymond Michalski and the Tanglewood Choir.

Sunday afternoon brings music by Graaf, Handel, Mozart and the Bach Concerto for flute, violin and harpsichord with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Joseph Silverstein, and Robert Levin as soloists.

CLAUDE FRANK

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 5 1969

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD—Saturday July 5: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in all-Mozart program of 'Haffner" Symphony, K. 385; Piano Concerto in A, K. 488; Symphony No. 40, K. 550, with Jchn Browning, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Open rehearsal, 10:30 a.m. . . . Sunday, July 6: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in all-Mozart program of Six German Dances, K. 571; Piano Concerto in B Flat, K. 595; "Jupiter" Symphony, K. 551, with Claude Frank, 2:30 p.m., Shed . . . Friday, July 11: Weekend Prelude, with Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin, 7 p.m., Shed; the BSO conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in a program of Bach suites, 9 p.m., Shed . . . Saturday, July 12: Erich Leinsdorf conducts the BSO in Mozart's "The Abduction from Seraglio," with soloists Sills, Shirley, Elgar, Siena, Michalski, and the Tanglewood Choir, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Sunday, July 13: David Zinman conducts the BSO in a program of Graff's Symphony for Strings; Bach's Triple Concerto in A Minor, with soloists Dwyer, Silverstein and Levin; Handel's Concerto Grosso Op. No. 6, No. 1, and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, K. 425, 2:30 p.m., Shed.

36-a

First Open Rehearsal Attracts 2531 Listeners to Tanglewood

By WALTER MAYFIELD
Republican Staff Writer

LENOX — Quiet, crisp, green lawns—acres of them— greeted the 2531 persons attending this summer's first open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday morning at Tanglewood.

Started At 10.30

Neatly lined gravel paths crunched beneath sandals, baby carriages, sneakers, bare feet and shoe heels when the gates to the 10.30 a. m., event opened.

An air of expectancy and readiness hangs over Tanglewood in these first few days of the season.

Fresh, dark red carpeting has been tacked into place on the conductor's podium and the one; small step leading up to it.

Some green moss is growing on the shed's dark brown earth beneath the audience's chairs down front on one side, not yet worn away by music lovers' feet.

New Paint on Girders

New coats of white paint have been given to the girders holding up the shed's roof and to the waist high posts where fresh lengths of rope are tied to guide visitors' steps.

Wide, maroon block letters have been neatly applied to designate rows and sections.

Tall, stately pines towered over the heads of young couples holding hands and carrying picnic lunches and blankets, old women with their aluminum folding chairs, and camp counselors with their young charges who have come over from nearby camps.

Orchestra Unpacking Tunes

Members of the orchestra begin to appear on stage, arranging music stands and unpacking their violins. More lights are turned on over their heads.

The black, triangular sound-baffles hang overhead, looking like bats scurring from a cave deep in the recesses of backstage.

More people arrive. A heavy set, old man takes off his shirt before lying down on a blanket in order to absorb the sun's rays which are beginning to break through gray mists overhead.

Scarves with brightly patterned colors wave in the breeze from around girls' waists and men's necks.

A young woman is setting up wooden directors' chairs for her elderly woman companion and herself. Both wear sweaters.

Leinsdorf Appears

Most of the musicians are now on stage. Erich Leinsdorf is walking into view. The audience applauds. The conductor smiles and acknowledges his musicians.

There is more warm up time. Then the instruments are tuned and it is time to start. The music begins, then suddenly ends. Leinsdorf has instructions for the players.

A second beginning and a second stop for more instructions.

Now they have it. Leinsdorf does not stop them again. When they are finished with the first piece, there is polite applause which the conductor does not formally acknowledge at the rehearsal.

Claude Frank Rehearses

Doors on the right of the stage swing open and workmen roll out a walnut-colored, concert grand piano. Someone carries its bench.

The piano's top is opened, not all the way up but only about 12 inches.

When pianist Claude Frank—a former refugee from Germany who later served in the U. S. Army during World War Two, according to the program left over from Friday night's opening concert—appears there is applause all 'round, even from members of the orchestra.

Women sitting under the shed and outside on the turf stop talking with each other and look. Frank is shaking hands with Leinsdorf and then they whisper something to each other.

Leinsdorf introduces the pianist to the first violinist and other musicians sitting in the first row before he sits down at the keyboard.

Chatting

When the symphony and Frank begin to play some of the women go back to their talking. The sunbathers turn over, adjusting their eye coverings.

A college-age girl reads a paperback book and somewhere a child starts to cry, then is hushed up.

Some couples go by speaking French. Families with restless children stroll over the lawns, pausing to let their youngsters play under the trees where the limbs touch the ground.

Some visit the glass reception room, book store and cafeteria near the main gate. Others walk down to the Hawthorne Cottage, a reylica of Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Little Red House" in which he lived in 1850-51.

Wrote Books There

While living in Leuox, Hawthorne wrote "The House of Seven Gables," and "The Wonder Book" and planned "Tanglewood Tales." The original cottage was destroyed by fire in 1891 and the present one was built and given to the orchestra by the National Federation of Music Clubs.

Over the tops of hemlock hedges which surround much of the former "gentleman's estate" can be seen Lake Mahkeenac and Monument Mountain to the south.

Attendants are quietly skewering litter on their poles and dropping it into plastic lined bags slung over their shoulders. Everything will be in order for the Saturday night concert.

Then Comes Lunch

The music stops and the rehearsal is over. Leinsdorf strolls off stage and the musicians begin packing up.

Several hundred morning rehearsal visitors sitting down front get up and begin filling up the rows past the 6000 seats, most of which have been empty during the morning.

On the lawn lunch hampers are opened, drink are poured and sandwiches are passed around. Everyone sits down to eat.

Following Friday custom, the main concert at 9 was preceded by a Weekend Prelude at 7, when Claude Frank and his wife Lillian Kallir, pianists well known here, played music of Bach and Mozart, the former with the assistance of the Violone Ensemble of five Boston Symphony string players.

An especially long intermission resulted when backstage officials waited for a key player, delayed en route from Boston.

Variety of Mood

Frank and Kallir, after offering sturdy and logical Bach, charmed the audience with variety of mood and skilled technique in Mozart's "Sonata for Two Pianos in D," K. 448. Unity of purpose and perfect dovetailing of parts resulted in the first two movements.

Phrase shapings varied slightly in the finale, but the total effect was that of delicious harmonies.

Eschenback, delightfully free from mannerisms, applied marvelous technical skill to the music as written, without flamboyancy. The rapid and perfect runs in the finale were models of form and singing quality.

Joyous Music

In an evening which brought four "Andante" movements of great beauty, the one in the "Piano Concerto in C," No. 21, K. 467, was the sole approach to pathos. The evening in general abounded with joyous music.

Mozart's "Symphony No. 29 in A," K. 201, had splendid carefree vim and youthful vigor. Leinsdorf brought out in "Symphony No. 39 in E flat," K. 543, the more mature approach of the composer, well voiced except for monotonous use of timpani.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 6 1969

Cool Mozart Opens Tanglewood Season

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — It was given to a young, slender, quiet, undemonstrative pianist from Germany to fill Tanglewood's first 1969 audience (6359) with the elegant spirit of Mozart Friday night.

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH

First Appearance

He was Christoph Escenbach, 29, from Breslau, who was making his first appearance at Tanglewood. He played Piano Concerto No. 21 in C (K. 467).

It was a cool view of Mozart, intelligent, articulate, sparkling expressive, even graceful . . . especially during the middle ("elvira madigan") movement . . . but mostly plaint and beautiful rather than warmly expressive.

In the meantime there was the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the precise guidance of Erich Leins dorf who is beginning the final two months of his tenure as music director.

Clean and Clear

The orchestra's strings are as incredibly clean and clear as ever. There were about 36 of them (plus winds) on stage Friday. (About half of the orchestra is playing at the Esplanade in Boston for the first couple of Tanglewood weekends.)

Leinsdorf set a freely easy pace for the opening symphony, No. 29 (K. 201), and the opening movements were light and airy . . . full of feathery, floating tones.

The finale was somewhat lumpy but not because of the players. There are times when Mozart sounds that way.

Substitution

The start of Symphony No. 39 after intermission was delayed about 15 minutes because of a missing clarinet player.

The regular occupant of the second chair, Pasquale Cardillo became ill shortly before the concert and a replacement was summoned from the second half of the orchestra in Boston, but he was too late.

The empty chair was filled nicely by Laurence Wheeler, 22, a fellow on the roster of the Berkshire Music Center.

Smooth, Uncluttered

Like the 29th which opened the concert, the performance of the 39th Symphony gave me no reason to change my feeling about how Leinsdorf deals with Mozart when standing in front of the Boston players.

The music was smooth, uncluttered, precise, expressive, comfortably paced and warm but unsentimental. I don't agree with those who think Leinsdorf's Mozart is cold. It is aristocratic and friendly, presumably like the composer.

Claude Frank and Lilian Kallir, pianists who often play together publicly, had the honor to serve as the center of attraction for the first official concert of the Tanglewood season . . . the weekend prelude which began at 7.

With five members of the orchestra's string sections they played Bach's Concerto for Two Pianos (harpsichords; and Strings in c major, and without the strings they played Mozart's Sonata for Two Pianos in D (K.448)

It was a tossup which was more delightful. The pianists played with clean articulation and light fingers, with steady rhythmic control and lyrical flow.

There was, it must be admitted, a somewhat suprprising degree of similarity evident in Bach and Mozart, not only because the musicians seemed to be approaching them in the same manner, but also because there are, in truth similarities in the music.

John Browning Tonight

Best, for my ears, were the beautifully melodic (next best was the third movement of the Bach). Of more than passing interest were the touches of "contemporary" dissonance in the opening movements of Mozart's sonata.

Tonight John Browning will be soloist for Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 23, and Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra through Mozart's Symphonies No. 35 ("Haffner"; and No. 40.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 5 1969

6359 in Attenda

Berkshire Opens

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette-Music Critic

LENOX — Aided by perfect weather, the opening of the 32nd Berkshire Festival drew the unusually large number of 6,359 to Tanglewood last night.

Erich Leinsdorf, beginning his last summer as music director, conducted ensembles of between 40 and 50 Boston Symphony players in works of

Gazette Review

Mozart. The soloist was 29-year-old German pianist Christophe Eschenbach, who won many "bravos."

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 5 1969

Pianist Triumphs At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The opening concert Friday night of the Berkshire Music Festival's 32nd summer season was a triumph for Mozart and a 26-year old German pianist by the name of Christoph Eschenbach who made his Tanglewood and Boston Symphony debut, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

It was also an evening that will long be remembered by Laurence Wheller, a 22-year old Berkshire Music Center fellowship student.

Wheeler substituted literally at the last minute for Boston Symphony clarinetist Pasquale Cardillo who was unable to appear because of sudden illness.

Near-Ovation

The audience of 6,359 gave Eschenbach a near-ovation.

It attested to the young pianist's musicianship that he dismissed all license and self-aggrandizement in Mozart's C Major Concerto.

Although no disclosure was made of the fact, the two bristling cadenzas were the pianist's own. Even here, the only digression was a slight trace of romanticism that may have raised an eyebrow or two. Eschenbach played the concerto as an adventure in pure sound. The brasses had a little more than enough to say in the introduction, but elsewhere orchestra and conductor backed the soloist to the hilt and didn't stand in his way.

Ordinarily, this concerto provides no ammunition whatever for the dramatic virtuoso. Eschenbach attained that status with beauty of sound, finesse of phrase, exact replicas of the composer's notes, and a digital dexterity that was nothing short of sensational.

His Mozart remained pure, unfettered and honest.

Lots of Efficiency

The program united some of Mozart's most carefree works. Symphonies Nos. 29 and 39 are loaded with light-hearted ebullience.

Leinsdorf's Mozart was straight from the loom. It allowed for no folderol. Direction was stereotyped in tempos, shadings and dynamics. The orchestra played both symphonies like a well-oiled machine. There was plenty of efficiency and little inspiration.

This is not to say that the orchestra would have sounded as well under any conductor. But the music could have received more sparkle, even fire in the finales of both symphonies.

Symphony in A Major careened its way lightly and flowingly. Muted strings made luscious matter of the slow movement. The finale raced along its merry way to the concluding scale sweep and abrupt chords. The old Mozart jokes are still good applause-getters.

Serious moments appeared briefly in the slow movement of the 39th Symphony.

Reserve Energy

The minuet bustled along with effervescence, paving the way for a finale that sounded as if it used up the evening's reserve energy.

Weekend Prelude was played by Claude Frank and Lillian Kallir, duo-pianists. They were assisted by the Violone Ensemble Inbach'a concerto for two pianos and strings in C Major.

The pianists soloed in Mozart's sonata for two pianos in D Major.

Festival Friday Night Concert Review
Program
(All Mozart)
Symphony No. 29 in A Major, K. 201
Piano Concerto No. 21 in C. Major, K. 467
Christoph Eschenbach Pianist
Symphony no. 39 in E Flat Major, K. 543

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 6 1969

Varied Personalities

Mozart Holiday At Tanglewood

By McLAREN HARRIS
HT Music Editor

LENOX—Every year, it seems, someone erects yet another sign directing visitors from the east on the Massachusetts Turnpike through Stockbridge or West Stockbridge on their way to Tanglewood, notwithstanding the fact the shortest (and busiest) route is still from Exit 2 through Lee and Lenox. Whichever way one came last weekend, however, the "No Vacancy" signs sprouted like wildflowers.

Tanglewood's first weekend attendance, surprisingly, was down from that of last year, reflecting Thursday night's sparsely-populated opening at Saratoga. Although Friday's Berkshire Festival audience was counted at more than 6000, nearly a third of these perched on the lawn, leaving many empty seats inside the Music Shed.

The entire weekend of Boston Symphony concerts conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, save for Bach's C major Concerto for two pianos and strings performed by Claude Frank, Lilian Kallir and the Violone Ensemble at the Weekend Prelude, was devoted to Mozart—five symphonies, three piano concertos with as many soloists and the Six German Dances, K. 571. The heart of each was in its concerto and soloist and the separate personalities involved—young Christoph Eschenbach with the Concerto No. 21 in C, K. 467 (Friday), John Browning with No. 23, A major, K. 488 (Saturday), and Claude Frank in No. 27 in B flat, K. 595 (Sunday).

The concertos themselves are possessed of differing personalities. No. 21 impresses as the most spontaneous, full of freely-moving melody and counterpoint. The A major is perhaps the best for organization and pure inventiveness, with a finale which engages the listener's attention anew with each bar. No. 27 in B flat is called the most serious-toned of the three, having been composed in Mozart's last year of life.

For analysis of mood that is as far as I will go, being unable to support wholeheartedly the speculations of various authors about the nostalgia, world-weariness, grim foreboding and resignation which seem to be read into every work of his in this period. Certainly his compositions owe their singularity as much to Mozart's particular human traits as to his musical talent, but he was not an unwitting craftsman; he was conscious of everything, technical and expressive, which went into them and he wrote primarily for his patrons and audiences—especially the piano concertos.

All three pianists displayed excellent technical gifts for the Mozartian idiom and all were warmly received, Friday night's audience mounting a brief standing ovation for Eschenbach. The young German, making his BSO debut, matched the C major Concerto's easily - flowing brilliance with pointed elan, the running figures and rising dynamic lines rippling from his fingers with mind's - eye clarity. A good part of his audience appeal stemmed from his two cadenzas, the first movement's extended and with a romantic-tinged virtuosity, the finale's with a lightning brilliance, beautifully integrated with the remaining substance.

Of the five symphonies on the weekend programs—No. 29 in A, the "Haffner" and the famous final three—the A major is the only one not in the orchestra's recent repertory. Its youthful passages are marked by unabashed simplicity in scale-work but teem with invention in their development. Leinsdorf's tempos, incidentally, have their own youthful ring; with few exceptions they are quicker-paced than used to be the vogue a few years back. The minuets may have sacrificed part of their true dance flavor, but there is small gain in arguing that point, for the connection with Mozart's symphonic minuets is more of derivation than duplication. The reduced-orchestra performances were generally well-articulated and transparently voiced, even with less than the desirable horn prominence in No. 29.

Next weekend will feature a concert performance Saturday night of Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio," sung in German by Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski, Mac Morgan and the Tanglewood Choir.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

JUL 7 1969

36-a

First Open Rehearsal Attracts 2531 Listeners to Tanglewood

By WALTER MAYFIELD
Republican Staff Writer

LENOX — Quiet, crisp, green lawns—acres of them— greeted the 2531 persons attending this summer's first open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday morning at Tanglewood.

Started At 10.30

Neatly lined gravel paths crunched beneath sandals, baby carriages, sneakers, bare feet and shoe heels when the gates to the 10.30 a. m., event opened.

An air of expectancy and readiness hangs over Tanglewood in these first few days of the season.

Fresh, dark red carpeting has been tacked into place on the conductor's podium and the one; small step leading up to it.

Some green moss is growing on the shed's dark brown earth beneath the audience's chairs down front on one side, not yet worn away by music lovers' feet.

New Paint on Girders

New coats of white paint have been given to the girders holding up the shed's roof and to the waist high posts where fresh lengths of rope are tied to guide visitors' steps.

Wide, maroon block letters have been neatly applied to designate rows and sections.

Tall, stately pines towered over the heads of young couples holding hands and carrying picnic lunches and blankets, old women with their aluminum folding chairs, and camp counselors with their young charges who have come over from nearby camps.

Orchestra Unpacking Tunes

Members of the orchestra begin to appear on stage, arranging music stands and unpacking their violins. More lights are turned on over their heads.

The black, triangular sound-baffles hang overhead, looking like bats scurring from a cave deep in the recesses of backstage.

More people arrive. A heavy set, old man takes off his shirt before lying down on a blanket in order to absorb the sun's rays which are beginning to break through gray mists overhead.

Scarves with brightly patterned colors wave in the breeze from around girls' waists and men's necks.

A young woman is setting up wooden directors' chairs for her elderly woman companion and herself. Both wear sweaters.

Leinsdorf Appears

Most of the musicians are now on stage. Erich Leinsdorf is walking into view. The audience applauds. The conductor smiles and acknowledges his musicians.

There is more warm up time. Then the instruments are tuned and it is time to start. The music begins, then suddenly ends. Leinsdorf has instructions for the players.

A second beginning and a second stop for more instructions.

Now they have it. Leinsdorf does not stop them again. When they are finished with the first piece, there is polite applause which the conductor does not formally acknowledge at the rehearsal.

Claude Frank Rehearses

Doors on the right of the stage swing open and workmen roll out a walnut-colored, concert grand piano. Someone carries its bench.

The piano's top is opened, not all the way up but only about 12 inches.

When pianist Claude Frank—a former refugee from Germany who later served in the U. S. Army during World War Two, according to the program left over from Friday night's opening concert—appears there is applause all 'round, even from members of the orchestra.

Women sitting under the shed and outside on the turf stop talking with each other and look. Frank is shaking hands with Leinsdorf and then they whisper something to each other.

Leinsdorf introduces the pianist to the first violinist and other musicians sitting in the first row before he sits down at the keyboard.

Chatting

When the symphony and Frank begin to play some of the women go back to their talking. The sunbathers turn over, adjusting their eye coverings.

A college-age girl reads a paperback book and somewhere a child starts to cry, then is hushed up.

Some couples go by speaking French. Families with restless children stroll over the lawns, pausing to let their youngsters play under the trees where the limbs touch the ground.

Some visit the glass reception room, book store and cafeteria near the main gate. Others walk down to the Hawthorne Cottage, a reylica of Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Little Red House" in which he lived in 1850-51.

Wrote Books There

While living in Leuox, Hawthorne wrote "The House of Seven Gables," and "The Wonder Book" and planned "Tanglewood Tales." The original cottage was destroyed by fire in 1891 and the present one was built and given to the orchestra by the National Federation of Music Clubs.

Over the tops of hemlock hedges which surround much of the former "gentleman's estate" can be seen Lake Mahkeenac and Monument Mountain to the south.

Attendants are quietly skewering litter on their poles and dropping it into plastic lined bags slung over their shoulders. Everything will be in order for the Saturday night concert.

Then Comes Lunch

The music stops and the rehearsal is over. Leinsdorf strolls off stage and the musicians begin packing up.

Several hundred morning rehearsal visitors sitting down front get up and begin filling up the rows past the 6000 seats, most of which have been empty during the morning.

On the lawn lunch hampers are opened, drink are poured and sandwiches are passed around. Everyone sits down to eat.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 6 1969

Cool Mozart Opens Tanglewood Season

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — It was given to a young, slender, quiet, undemonstrative pianist from

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH

Germany to fill Tanglewood's first 1969 audience (6359) with the elegant spirit of Mozart Friday night.

First Appearance

He was Christoph Escenbach, 29, from Breslau, who was making his first appearance at Tanglewood. He played Piano Concerto No. 21 in C (K. 467).

It was a cool view of Mozart, intelligent, articulate, sparkling expressive, even graceful . . . especially during the middle ("elvira madigan") movement . . . but mostly plaint and beautiful rather than warmly expressive.

In the meantime there was the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the precise guidance of Erich Leins dorf who is beginning the final two months of his tenure as music director.

Clean and Clear

The orchestra's strings are as incredibly clean and clear as ever. There were about 36 of them (plus winds) on stage Friday. (About half of the orchestra is playing at the Esplanade in Boston for the first couple of Tanglewood weekends.)

Leinsdorf set a freely easy pace for the opening symphony, No. 29 (K. 201), and the opening movements were light and airy . . . full of feathery, floating tones.

The finale was somewhat lumpy but not because of the players. There are times when Mozart sounds that way.

Substitution

The start of Symphony No. 39 after intermission was delayed about 15 minutes because of a missing clarinet player.

The regular occupant of the second chair, Pasquale Cardillo became ill shortly before the concert and a replacement was summoned from the second half of the orchestra in Boston, but he was too late.

The empty chair was filled nicely by Laurence Wheeler, 22, a fellow on the roster of the Berkshire Music Center.

Smooth, Uncluttered

Like the 29th which opened the concert, the performance of the 39th Symphony gave me no reason to change my feelings about how Leinsdorf deals with Mozart when standing in front of the Boston players.

The music was smooth, uncluttered, precise, expressive, comfortably paced and warm but unsentimental. I don't agree with those who think Leinsdorf's Mozart is cold. It is aristocratic and friendly, presumably like the composer.

Claude Frank and Lilian Kallir, pianists who often play together publicly, had the honor to serve as the center of attraction for the first official concert of the Tanglewood season . . . the weekend prelude which began at 7.

With five members of the orchestra's string sections they played Bach's Concerto for Two Pianos (harpsichords; and Strings in c major, and without the strings they played Mozart's Sonata for Two Pianos in D (K.448)

It was a tossup which was more delightful. The pianists played with clean articulation and light fingers, with steady rhythmic control and lyrical flow.

There was, it must be admitted, a somewhat suprprising degree of similarity evident in Bach and Mozart, not only because the musicians seemed to be approaching them in the same manner, but also because there are, in truth similarities in the music.

John Browning Tonight

Best, for my ears, were the beautifully melodic (next best was the third movement of the Bach). Of more than passing interest were the touches of "contemporary" dissonance in the opening movements of Mozart's sonata.

Tonight John Browning will be soloist for Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 23, and Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra through Mozart's Symphonies No. 35 ("Haffner"; and No. 40.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,227

JUL 5 1969

6359 in Attend[illegible] Berkshire [illegible]pens

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette-Music Critic

LENOX — Aided by perfect weather, the opening of the 32nd Berkshire Festival drew the unusually large number of 6,359 to Tanglewood last night.

Erich Leinsdorf, beginning his last summer as music director, conducted ensembles of between 40 and 50 Boston Symphony players in works of

Gazette Review

Mozart. The soloist was 29-year-old German pianist Christophe Eschenbach, who won many "bravos."

Following Friday custom, the main concert at 9 was preceded by a Weekend Prelude at 7, when Claude Frank and his wife Lillian Kallir, pianists well known here, played music of Bach and Mozart, the former with the assistance of the Violone Ensemble of five Boston Symphony string players.

An especially long intermission resulted when backstage officials waited for a key player, delayed en route from Boston.

Variety of Mood

Frank and Kallir, after offering sturdy and logical Bach, charmed the audience with variety of mood and skilled technique in Mozart's "Sonata for Two Pianos in D," K. 448. Unity of purpose and perfect dovetailing of parts resulted in the first two movements.

Phrase shapings varied slightly in the finale, but the total effect was that of delicious harmonies.

Eschenback, delightfully free from mannerisms, applied marvelous technical skill to the music as written, without flamboyancy. The rapid and perfect runs in the finale were models of form and singing quality.

Joyous Music

In an evening which brought four "Andante" movements of great beauty, the one in the "Piano Concerto in C," No. 21, K. 467, was the sole approach to pathos. The evening in general abounded with joyous music.

Mozart's "Symphony No. 29 in A," K. 201, had splendid carefree vim and youthful vigor. Leinsdorf brought out in "Symphony No. 39 in E flat," K. 543, the more mature approach of the composer, well voiced except for monotonous use of timpani.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,001

JUL 5 1969

Pianist Triumphs At Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The opening concert Friday night of the Berkshire Music Festival's 32nd summer season was a triumph for Mozart and a 26-year old German pianist by the name of Christoph Eschenbach who made his Tanglewood and Boston Symphony debut, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

It was also an evening that will long be remembered by Laurence Wheller, a 22-year old Berkshire Music Center fellowship student.

Wheeler substituted literally at the last minute for Boston Symphony clarinetist Pasquale Cardillo who was unable to appear because of sudden illness.

Near-Ovation

The audience of 6,359 gave Eschenbach a near-ovation.

It attested to the young pianist's musicianship that he dismissed all license and self-aggrandizement in Mozart's C Major Concerto.

Although no disclosure was made of the fact, the two bristling cadenzas were the pianist's own. Even here, the only digression was a slight trace of romanticism that may have raised an eyebrow or two. Eschenbach played the concerto as an adventure in pure sound. The brasses had a little more than enough to say in the introduction, but elsewhere orchestra and conductor backed the soloist to the hilt and didn't stand in his way.

Ordinarily, this concerto provides no ammunition whatever for the dramatic virtuoso. Eschenbach attained that status with beauty of sound, finesse of phrase, exact replicas of the composer's notes, and a digital dexterity that was nothing short of sensational.

His Mozart remained pure, unfettered and honest.

Lots of Efficiency

The program united some of Mozart's most carefree works. Symphonies Nos. 29 and 39 are loaded with light-hearted ebullience.

Leinsdorf's Mozart was straight from the loom. It allowed for no folderol. Direction was stereotyped in tempos, shadings and dynamics. The orchestra played both symphonies like a well-oiled machine. There was plenty of efficiency and little inspiration.

This is not to say that the orchestra would have sounded as well under any conductor. But the music could have received more sparkle, even fire in the finales of both symphonies.

Symphony in A Major careened its way lightly and flowingly. Muted strings made luscious matter of the slow movement. The finale raced along its merry way to the concluding scale sweep and abrupt chords. The old Mozart jokes are still good applause-getters.

Serious moments appeared briefly in the slow movement of the 39th Symphony.

Reserve Energy

The minuet bustled along with effervescence, paving the way for a finale that sounded as if it used up the evening's reserve energy.

Weekend Prelude was played by Claude Frank and Lillian Kallir, duo-pianists. They were assisted by the Violone Ensemble Inbach'a concerto for two pianos and strings in C. Major.

The pianists soloed in Mozart's sonata for two pianos in D Major.

Festival Friday Night Concert Review Program
(All Mozart)
Symphony No. 29 in A Major, K. 201
Piano Concerto No. 21 in C. Major, K. 467
Christoph Eschenbach Pianist
Symphony no. 39 in E Flat Major, K. 543

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 6 1969 N Eng

Varied Personalities

Mozart Holiday At Tanglewood

By McLAREN HARRIS
HT Music Editor

LENOX—Every year, it seems, someone erects yet another sign directing visitors from the east on the Massachusetts Turnpike through Stockbridge or West Stockbridge on their way to Tanglewood, notwithstanding the fact the shortest (and busiest) route is still from Exit 2 through Lee and Lenox. Whichever way one came last weekend, however, the "No Vacancy" signs sprouted like wildflowers.

Tanglewood's first weekend attendance, surprisingly, was down from that of last year, reflecting Thursday night's sparsely-populated opening at Saratoga. Although Friday's Berkshire Festival audience was counted at more than 6000, nearly a third of these perched on the lawn, leaving many empty seats inside the Music Shed.

The entire weekend of Boston Symphony concerts conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, save for Bach's C major Concerto for two pianos and strings performed by Claude Frank, Lilian Kallir and the Violone Ensemble at the Weekend Prelude, was devoted to Mozart—five symphonies, three piano concertos with as many soloists and the Six German Dances, K. 571. The heart of each was in its concerto and soloist and the separate personalities involved—young Christoph Eschenbach with the Concerto No. 21 in C, K. 467 (Friday), John Browning with No. 23, A major, K. 488 (Saturday), and Claude Frank in No. 27 in B flat, K. 595 (Sunday).

The concertos themselves are possessed of differing personalities. No. 21 impresses as the most spontaneous, full of freely-moving melody and counterpoint. The A major is perhaps the best for organization and pure inventiveness, with a finale which engages the listener's attention anew with each bar. No. 27 in B flat is called the most serious-toned of the three, having been composed in Mozart's last year of life.

For analysis of mood that is as far as I will go, being unable to support wholeheartedly the speculations of various authors about the nostalgia, world-weariness, grim foreboding and resignation which seem to be read into every work of his in this period. Certainly his compositions owe their singularity as much to Mozart's particular human traits as to his musical talent, but he was not an unwitting craftsman; he was conscious of everything, technical and expressive, which went into them and he wrote primarily for his patrons and audiences—especially the piano concertos.

All three pianists displayed excellent technical gifts for the Mozartian idiom and all were warmly received, Friday night's audience mounting a brief standing ovation for Eschenbach. The young German, making his BSO debut, matched the C major Concerto's easily - flowing brilliance with pointed elan, the running figures and rising dynamic lines rippling from his fingers with mind's - eye clarity. A good part of his audience appeal stemmed from his two cadenzas, the first movement's extended and with a romantic-tinged virtuosity, the finale's with a lightning brilliance, beautifully integrated with the remaining substance.

Of the five symphonies on the weekend programs—No. 29 in A, the "Haffner" and the famous final three—the A major is the only one not in the orchestra's recent repertory. Its youthful passages are marked by unabashed simplicity in scale-work but teem with invention in their development. Leinsdorf's tempos, incidentally, have their own youthful ring; with few exceptions they are quicker-paced than used to be the vogue a few years back. The minuets may have sacrificed part of their true dance flavor, but there is small gain in arguing that point, for the connection with Mozart's symphonic minuets is more of derivation than duplication. The reduced-orchestra performances were generally well-articulated and transparently voiced, even with less than the desirable horn prominence in No. 29.

Next weekend will feature a concert performance Saturday night of Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio," sung in German by Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski, Mac Morgan and the Tanglewood Choir.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,235 (S) 286,557

JUL 7 1969

36-6

Music Review

Opening Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

CONCERTS DEVOTED exclusively to Mozart on three successive days inaugurated the 1969 Tanglewood season. A piano concerto was sandwiched between two symphonies on each program with three brilliant soloists at the keyboard in turn. Yesterday afternoon the soloist was Claude Frank, in Concerto No. 27 in B Flat, K.595; Saturday night it was John Browning in No. 23 in A, K.488; and Friday evening, a newcomer to Tanglewood, Christoph Eschenbach, in No. 21 in C, K.467.

* * *

THE SMALLER nucleus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which habitually plays at these opening Mozart and Bach programs responded to the fastidious baton of their musical director, Erich Leinsdorf, with immaculate articulation and produced a tone of deep warmth, even in the subdued moods for which the conductor called in a substantial share of the performances.

Each last half of the programs was devoted to one of the great trilogy of Mozart's final symphonies, the ones written within a very few months in 1788. Never was the pure loveliness of their inspiration more transparent. Each program began with an earlier symphony, except for the program yesterday afternoon in which Leinsdorf played Six German Dances, K.571, a first performance by the Boston orchestra and quite possibly the last.

Leinsdorf ended yesterday's program with the C Major Symphony K.551, the one with which he had made his Tanglewood debut seven summers ago. The impression the new conductor made at that time was deep and effective; the performance yesterday had been changed now to accent a more meticulous refinement, practically to chamber music standards, touching on the precious. Yet no one who likes his Mozart more boisterous would have been displeased with the rousing molto allegro with which the finale was played.

On Friday night the same bold energy was applied to the finale of the D Major Symphony—the "Haffner." As yesterday, the audience response was one of such spontaneous combustion that Leinsdorf departed from the almost inviolable rule of dignified symphony concerts and repeated the movement, to the great satisfaction of the audience.

The musical formula for rousing an audience is fairly routine: take a swift tempo and give the trumpets and the tympani their head. However, if any movement of that "Haffner" were to be chosen to be repeated, I would have picked the slow movement, in which there is no trumpet nor drum of any kind. In it Leinsdorf reached an exquisitely delicate and plaintive murmur which was the most sublime moment of the evening.

* * *

FRIDAY EVENING (and the festival) began with the beloved A Major Symphony, No. 29, K201, written when Mozart was 18. What more gentle and tender music can there be? Leinsdorf exercised his interpretative option and decided to play it with the bows on the strings, and also at quite a slow ceremonious, tempo. In the two centuries since Mozart wrote this symphony, reams of paper have been filled marvelling at the maturity of a youngster able to set down such enchanting verses. It becomes a moot question whether this symphony warrants such a sophisticated reading as Leinsdorf gave it. It could be a bewitching youthful dance. Is it as truly a stately pas de quatre danced by aging diplomats at court?

Mozart used winds sparingly in the symphonies, rarely requiring the same number or same complement, but with unerring judgment he gave each symphony its character not only in content but in texture.

* * *

THE TWO SOLOISTS who were familiar artists on the Tanglewood stage lived up to their established reputations with complete fidelity. Eschenbach, the newcomer, introduced a technical competence of a transcendent degree, achieving a prodigious evenness of scale and a sense of tonal values and interrelationships not surpassed by many artists. The three concertos conform to the same pattern. A brisk opening chapter after, in each case, a long orchestral introduction, then a song-like and quite unadorned central slow movement and a rollicking finale.

Frank entered into the spirit of his assignment with an infectious joie-de-vivre. Browning was no less immersed in his allotment with equal verve and brilliance except that Mozart chose to alternate the orchestra and the solo in short antiphonal statements, thus appropriating some of the soloist's motor propulsion. Each soloist was vociferously applauded and recalled.

Tanglewood Gate 20,835 for Weekend

Attendance at Tanglewood for the opening weekend was 20,835, a few hundred more than for the opening last year. There were 6,359 at Friday night's concert, 2,531 for the Saturday morning rehearsal, 5,939 Saturday night and 6,016 Sunday afternoon.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 7 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 422,200

JUL 7 1969

LEINSDORF'S SELECTIONS

Mozart Tanglewood Concertos Excellent

By GEORGE GELLES
MUSIC CRITIC

LENOX — Quite the nicest thing about the opening Mozart weekend at Tanglewood was the choice of piano concertos that Erich Leinsdorf made, for whereas the symphonies he played with the BSO were those one might have expected—the last three, plus the 'Haffner' and the second A Major, K.201—the concerti gave a finely perceived picture of three clearly differing modes of late Mozartian thought.

The concerti we got were those in C Major (K. 467), in A Major (K. 488), and in B flat (K. 595), the first two from the mid 1780's, the third from the last year of Mozart's life, 1791, and they are pieces that bare their characters in two interrelated ways, through orchestration and key.

Above the basic body of strings and a common wind compliment of horns, bassoons, and a single flute, Mozart makes small and significant changes. The C Major Concerto, for example, adds the bright and ceremonial colors of oboes, trumpets and drums, relating the piece in its pomp to the earlier K. 415, whereas in the A Major Concerto only clarinets are used with the wind band, and as in so many other instances where Mozart uses clarinets and/or A Major, he is at his very sweetest, most mellifluous (though as we also find elsewhere, the sunny outer movements here enclose an inward-looking restrained statement in the relative F sharp minor).

And lastly, in the B flat Concerto, Mozart asks for oboes only with the winds, with this palette matching the original scoring of the late G Minor Symphony, and indeed, this concerto is among the most grandly planned and symphonically integrated of the entire series.

At the season's opening concert on Friday night, the young German Christoph Eschenbach made his Boston Symphony debut with the C Major, and judging by the reception from audience and orchestra alike, I'm sure he'll be back often. After a tentative, nervous-sounding start, much of the playing was really marvelous. Eschenbach has all he needs for a sensational career: technique to burn; a solid rhythmic sense; beautiful sound; temperament; and rarest of all, a keen musical intelligence.

As we heard in the Mozart (and as we know from recordings), he projects and sustains lines wonderfully, as the best of vocalists might, giving them direction and purpose, is full of imaginative ideas about the music (even if his cadenzas were from a world of which Mozart never dreamed), and at his very best, does work that is daring and breath-taking. Such a moment came at his entrance in the finale, where he slipped from the Eingang to the theme proper with stunning grace and dexterity; it was clearly the most impressive minute of music heard all weekend.

When Claude Frank played the B Flat Concerto in town this past season, I remember his approach as mousey and lacking lacking in the security and straight-forward good common sense that one expects from him. His performance on Sunday afternoon was better, with the last two movements coming off exceptionally well (and who else would dare to be so simple and understated in the slow movement?). But the opening allegro was still under par, more secure than before, though not fully grasped and technically incomplete.

However, many thanks to Frank and his wife Lilian Kallir for a ravishing reading of Mozart's D Major Sonata for Two Pianos (K. 448) heard at the Prelude concert on Friday evening. These two work wonderfully together, seeming absolutely agreed as to the musical meaning of the pieces they play, and setting a standard of interpretation—and meeting it consistently — that is notably high.

John Browning, who played the A Major Concerto on Saturday night, was hopelessly outclassed by both Frank and Eschenbach. His musical intelligence is modest and his pianism ordinary, sparked neither by wit nor real grace. How very flat, for instance, was the opening phrase of the first movement, unshaped and without direction. The record company blurb advertises Browning as the "Golden Boy" of today's pianists, but take a hint, it's fool's gold through and through.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 7 1969

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE, MONDAY, JULY 7, 1969

Tanglewood Soloists Vie In Mozart Competition

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Perhaps three all-Mozart concerts are too much Mozart for some listeners — not for me.

Frank Welcome Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's opening weekend at Tanglewood ended Sunday afternoon with the composer's last symphony, No. 41, "Jupiter," (K. 551). It was preceded by his last piano concerto, No. 27 (K. 595), and by a little collection of pieces called Six German Dances (K. 571), played for the first time by the Boston orchestra.

Claude Frank was soloist for the piano concerto, and a welcome fellow he is indeed. He has played several Mozart concertos at Tanglewood, always with the greatest of finesse and taste.

CLAUDE FRANK

Frank has a nice feel for Mozart's blend of purity and affection. It shows most in his handling of the lyrical middle movements, which is not to say that he doesn't negotiate the happy flurries of runs and trills and lacy decorations with glistening accuracy and joy.

Suitable Performance

I have heard Frank do Mozart concertos with greater effect than that achieved Sunday afternoon, but goodness comes in degrees, and his performance Sunday matched Tanglewood's weather — clean, bright, neutrally warm, benevolent, peaceful, satisfying.

Comparison of the weekend's three performances of Mozart concertos is inevitable among Tanglewood's regular patrons.

My first vote is cast for Christoph Eschenbach because of his sensitivity without schmaltz Friday with the "Elviramadigan" Concerto (K. 467). Browning wins no vote because of his romanticism.

Peasant Style

The little waltzy dances which opened the program were pure delight. They were written by Mozart for use at Emperor Joseph 2d's masquerade parties at carnival time in Vienna in 1789.

In style they follow the peasant Laendler and precede the sophisticated Strauss waltzes and are a perfect blend of the aristocratic and popular tastes of the time.

The "Jupiter" symphony, as expected, was mostly beautiful (except for the pompous passages, of course) . . . What is one to expect when one of the half dozen world's greatest orchestras plays one of the most important works of the world's greatest composer?

The 10 a. m. chamber music session in the theater offered a couple of hours of music by a trio, quartet and septet from the Berkshire Music Center — very young, highly accomplished, soon-to-be professionals.

The trio played a sonata for horn, trumpet and trombone by Poulenc, a pleasant extended fanfare with a middle section consisting largely of a plaintive trumpet melody.

The string quartet played a quartet by Schubert, a minor, Opus 29, and the septet played a 45-minute work by Beethoven called Septet for Strings and Woodwinds in E Flat Major, Opus 20, a long and lovely work.

The septet included violin, viola, cello, clarinet, bassoon, horn and bass, four of them played by girls.

The quartet and septet showed similar characteristics, clear and controlled articulation, surprisingly clean unity considering their lack of time together, beautiful tone production and a shy shortage of bite during assertive passages.

Their names are Michael Johns, Philip Collins, Harry Maddox, Yosef Yankelev, Carol Paine, Abigail Stoughton, Masayoshi Kataoka, Edith Haladjoff, Marjorie Rupp, Neal La Monaco, Phillip Bashor, Susan Wadsworth, Robert Watt and Michele Saxon.

About 300 listeners showed up for the Sunday morning session. 100 lolled on the lush grass in the sun at the rear of the theater.

The 6016 who appeared at the shed Sunday afternoon brought the week's attendance to 20,835.

Next weekend the programs will be more 18th Century, all Bach on Friday, a concert version of Mozart's opera "The Abduction From the Seraglio" Saturday night and a g conductor, David Zinman a program of Graaf, Handel and Mozart afternoon.

Tanglewood Debut Features Mozart

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

This past weekend saw the opening of Tanglewood's 1969 session. Three concerts comprised the prelude to the new Berkshire Festival season, all of them devoted to music by Mozart. Friday evening's performance included three works, the symphonies 29 and 39 and the piano concerto number 21.

* * *

Symphony No. 29 began the occasion, but unforunately conductor Erich Leinsdorf was a bit too aggressive in his interpretation. Tempos were on the brisk side, and a tendency towards tension marred an otherwise well thought out rendition. Observing Leinsdorf's podium manner, one noted his alert cueing was often a beat or two ahead of an actual instrumental entrance. The psychological effect, predictably, was to eliminate all relaxation in the musicians and cause them to play in a tense, brittle manner. Conductors occasionally use this technique to keep an otherwise slack or reposing score constantly moving, but in Mozart where relaxation and unhurried thoughtfulness constitute much of the very appeal of the music, such methods elicit sad results indeed.

Of course, certain parts of the score were delivered in wonderful fashion: the trio of the minuet was wonderfully alive, and the finale featured a superb integration of the alternating dramatic moods and happy rondo refrain.

* * *

The real highlight of the program, though, was the 21st piano concerto with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist. Not an instant of it was uninspired. To the introduction Leinsdorf brought the compound moods of anxiety, majesty, and sheer abandon that characterize this extremely difficult to conduct passage. Eschenbach responded in turn with an equally comprehensive account, catching nearly all the subtleties and providing a passionate, convincing solo that was as well-structured as it was musical. These qualities were most in evidence during the floating andante (lifted for the movie score to Elvira Madigan, by the way), which surely offered some of the most sensitive and delicate piano artistry (as well as poetic orchestral illumination) that ever graced the movement. The finale proved no less rewarding: the pianist's fluid technique, backed by a knowledgeable presentation of the gleeful modulations (also some wonderful backing from Leinsdorf and the orchestra) made this music sound fabulously organic (too often it falls apart in the hands of lesser talents).

Symphony No. 39 closed the Friday concert, and if you could accept Leinsdorf's fast introduction and somewhat deliberate first movement tempo, then possibly the performance would seem ideal. The andante just glowed, and the bumptious finale revealed a keen sense of humor Leinsdorf is sometimes forgotten to have.

Saturday evening's offering also consisted of three works, the symphonies number 35 and 40 and the piano concerto No. 23.

The Haffner began the program, and it received a lovely performance. Leinsdorf's frequent observation of repeats paid unexpected dividends in that they conferred upon the music an even firmer sense of balance and proportion. Furthermore, the conductor's delicate rubato was close to perfection itself: in the andante, for example, he flushed out the violin appogiaturas and trills like birds in a thicket, then could slow the pace ever so slightly to give breadth and depth to the solo wind, magnificent conducting. And the finale, for a change, was taken at a real presto and not just a fast allegro. So much was the audience impressed and enthusiastic that Leinsdorf encored the finale, this time even faster (but without repeats). To the best of my knowledge, this was the first time the conductor has done that in his tenure with the orchestra.

* * *

John Browning was piano soloist for the 23rd concerto, and the order of the day was melodiousness and deep emotional feeling. Once again it was the slow movement that made the biggest impression, Browning sensitively conveying the dark and somber opening. The brighter, very happy central core was magnificently brought off by the soloist and conductor, and the BSO winds provided lush playing indeed. At the return of the opening music the sad, dejected anguish Browning captured proved a rare interpretive moment; such tragedy is very difficult to realize effectively. The outer movements offered many pleasant moments, but that adagio was really something.

* * *

Saturday's concert concluded with the 40th symphony, possibly Mozart's greatest symphonic composition and certainly one of his finest works. Leinsdorf conducted the piece magnificently, stressing its opposing moods of brooding intensity and visionary revelation. By observing repeats in all but the 2nd movement he again brought out the work's symmetrical construction. Better still, the conductor's involvement in the agonizingly emotional score was a wonder to behold. The andante was of unsurpassable loveliness, and the stretto minuet all but brought down the walls of the universe. The best conductors achieve a kind of tension in this movement; Leinsdorf got fanatically brutal chaos, and that was much more to the point. The amazing thing was that he could balance this apocalytic eruption with a sublime trio of rapt stillness and peaceful quietude that even with the various player problem was no less intense.

* * *

Sunday afternoon's concert offered the first BSO performance of the six German Dances, K. 571 the 27th Piano Concerto, and the Jupiter Symphony.

New to this reviewer, the Dances were a sheer delight. They sounded like precious miniatures whose humble purpose of entertainment was somehow elevated to much more aesthetic regions. Cast in fast triple time, they are models of craftsmanship and content and should definitely be programmed more often.

36-c

Festival Features Mozart

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The last two Mozart concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival's opening weekend at Tanglewood had a refreshing uplift on Saturday night and a letdown yesterday afternoon.

Only Christoph Eschenbach's brilliant playing of Piano Concerto No. 21 on Friday night rescued the concert from commonplace.

Total weekend attendance was 20,835 including the Saturday morning open rehersal.

Music Review

Outstanding attractions of the Mozart trilogy were the composer's last three symphonies (Nos. 39, 40 and 41) played by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, and three young pianists in equally contrasted concertos.

John Browning was heard Saturday night in Concerto No. 23 and Claude Frank was soloist yesterday afternoon in Mozart's final piano concerto, No. 27 in B flat major.

Steady Glow

The G minor Symphony (No. 40) maintained a steady glow Saturday night except for the minuet when the horns fluffed. Leinsdorf adopted conservative speeds to clarify details. A kind of grandeur and poise replaced the symphony's usual restlessness.

Most pleasant surprise was a scintillating "Haffner" Symphony, No. 35. Applause was such that the finale was repeated, a most unusual procedure at Tanglewood.

Melodies in strings had unwarranted competition from percussion. But assets were heavy in firm rhythms and astute phrasing. Leinsdorf brought stateliness to the slow movement by making light of its "sing-song" melody and capricious ornaments. It was full speed ahead in the rondo without damage to technique or clarity.

Memorable Playing

After Browning had treated the comparatively trivial opening of the A major concerto with respect and moderate vitality, he settled down to some memorable playing.

He and the orchestra turned the Adagio into a flawless condensation of beauty and poetry. The pianist's sound and solid technique came to the fore in the finale for which he set a challenging speed.

Browning is a fine musician who plays the piano exceptionally well. It is almost unique to hear a young pianist who is more preoccupied with how his music sounds than how melodramatic it can be made to appear.

Yesterday's "Jupiter" Symphony was a respectable performance but hardly uplifting. It sounded like routine playing except for the finale in which the five separate themes were united with podium skill.

Mozart In A Hedonist Setting

TWO PIANISTS AT TANGLEWOOD — CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH, SHOWN ON LEFT, ENTRANCED THE TANGLEWOOD AUDIENCE IN A DEBUT PERFORMANCE FRIDAY EVENING. CLAUDE FRANK PLAYED IN THE "WEEKEND PRELUDE" AND IN THE SUNDAY CONCERT.

By Peter M. Knapp

In this Berkshire setting of carpeted lawns, emphatic pines and trim hemlock hedges the summer season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun at Tanglewood, adding music to a natural atmosphere fit for a hedonist.

In his final year presiding over this musical and leafy estate, Erich Leinsdorf opened the 1969 Berkshire music festival this weekend with a trio of all-Mozart programs built around the Austrian master's last three symphonies and three piano concerti.

Friday evening's opening concert, adjoined a pair of symphonies, the early No. 29 joined pair of symphonies, the early No. 29 in A, K. 201 and the late No. 39 in E-flat, K. 543, with the spectacular Tanglewood debut of Christoph Eschenbach.

The 29-year-old German pianist received the kind of audience acclaim usually given big-name artists playing heroic romantic concerti for his performance of the Mozart Concerto No. 21 in C, K. 467. (For the moment this may be known as the "Elvira Madigan" concerto because of its use in the film score and the misuse of its andante movement in hack pop versions.)

Heroic Posturing

It is unusual to find this amount of enthusiasm aroused for a pianist who avoids heroic posturing both in his keyboard manner and in his playing — along with the smaller-scaled music of the classical concerto. In Eschenbach's case "classical" does not mean prissy or music-box mechanical.

It does mean objectivity and a beautiful scale of proportions, in dynamic gradations of touch and a sure sense of note placement.

He has formidable technique — but it is that of an etcher, say, as against that of a Rubens. Each note that is meaningful, that needs to be heard, is perfectly articulated with the proper weight, and subsidiary material is kept in its secondary place. Eschenbach playing is thus marked by a seldom-encountered clarity of texture and expression, produced with a light, crystal tone.

The two symphonies were played with spirit and fine orchestral sound. No. 29 is a cheerful little symphony that contains simple but effective melodic ideas, and the predominant string parts were played with disciplined precision. No. 39 seems to be a Leinsdorf favorite. He leads it with buoyant good humor, underlining the horn parts in the finale.

In the weekend prelude, Claude Frank and Lilian Kallir (Mr. and Mrs. Frank) played two piano works of Bach and Mozart. Bach's concerto for two pianos (Klavier) and strings in C was badly out of balance between the two Steinways and the five strings of the violone ensemble. It might have worked with two harpsichords as in Bach's day, but setting five strings against two modern concert grands is no contest. Mozart's Sonata for two pianos in D, K. 448, completed these two exercises in imitation and counterpoint in a more stylish fashion.

Rare Encore

Saturday night's concert attended by 5,929, began with a rare Leinsdorf encore in the "Haffner" symphony No. 35 in D, K. 385, when the quick last movement was repeated. It is a show-stopper, with a coy main theme, several Mozartian surprises, and the composer's notation to play it as quickly as possible. For the Boston Symphony, this means fast — and one marvels at the speed at which the Bostonians can maintain poise and articulation — to say nothing of duplicating the feat.

Most of the movements were on the rapid side, with a certain hardness appearing in the first movement of the "Haffner" and the finale of the symphony No. 40 in G minor, K. 550, which concluded the program. On the other side, there was the airy quality of the "Haffner's" finale, and the fine mellow blend of the opening of No. 40 — a symphony of more subdued and profound expression than the richly-scored No. 35 with its fanfares and flourishes.

John Browning was the piano soloist of the evening in the lyrical concerto No. 23 in A, K. 488, into which Mozart poured inspired melodies. Regrettably, the performance by and large was superficial and hurried in the outer movements, syrupy romantic in the Adagio. Browning is an excellent pianist with lots of technique, but in this concerto he seemed to play on the surface of the music with more notes than expression — and the melting lyricism of the piece rarely surfaced in Leinsdorf's accompaniment.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
JUL 7 1969 Ne Engl

PROGRAMS
(All Mozart)

Saturday Night
Symphony No. 35 in D major, K. 385 (Haffner)
Piano Concerto No. 23 in A major, K. 488
John Browning, pianist
Symphony No. 40 in G minor, K. 550

Sunday Afternoon
Six German Dances, K. 571
Piano Concerto, No. 27 in B flat, K.595
Claude Frank, pianist
Symphony No. 41 in C major, K. 551 (Jupiter)

LEINSDORF SAMPLER

By GEORGE GELLES
MUSIC CRITIC

Mozart Smorgasbord

LENOX—With the opening weekend of his last Tanglewood season given solely to Mozart, Erich Leinsdorf fairly sampled the spectrum of the composer's symphonic music; each of the concerts ended with one of the last three symphonies, and each began with a smaller orchestral work: the late A Major Symphony, K. 201, the 'Haffner' Symphony, K. 385, and the Six German Dances, K. 571, on Friday, Saturday and Sunday respectively.

There are, first of all, two observations to be made, one positive, one negative, that in concert balanced each other out. First, Leinsdorf seemed more concerned than usual with what he was doing, more involved with his scores, and second, the orchestra, in general, was quite bad.

To start with this latter, there was dreadful playing heard each day, and from the same sources: the solo clarinetist, Cioffi, seemed incapable of playing in tune, and stone deaf to his aberration; the solo oboe, Gomberg, phrased consistently in a common and vulgar manner, and his tone quality was not of a piece with the ensemble; and the first violin section as a whole produced a wooden sound lacking warmth and vibrancy.

The weekend's worst performance came on Sunday with the German Dances, a not negligible set of six waltzes distinguished, among other ways, by some sophisticated rhythmic play in the fifth piece and an unbeatably simple and altogether winning close to the sixth. What we got was surely a sightreading, nothing more, for there were obviously missed entrances among the winds and no unanimity of thought as to bowing among the violins. Leinsdorf seemed annoyed afterwards, and he had every reason to be embarrassed.

But Leinsdorf himself, for the most part, did work that was creditable even if was rarely my favorite sort of Mozart. His reading of the big E flat Symphony, for instance, had a first movement that was well shaped and nicely paced, even though the lead back to the recapitulation didn't come off, and the G Minor, too, had an opening allegro that was particularly good, though interestingly enough it had the same weak spot as did the E flat: at the reprise, where the development and first theme so wonderfully dovetail, there was not nearly enough definition of line and clarification of these two strands.

Most every performance had its bizarreries, its peculiar Leinsdorfisms that tempt one to think that the man is bored with the music, and is led to fussing by boredom. Here are some of them: in the G Minor finale, the horns, with nothing of importance, were made to stick out of the fabric in a grotesque manner (just before the double bar and at the corresponding spot at the movement's end); in the A Major Symphony, the Minuet was led at such an exaggeratedly fast pace that the relationship between it and its Trio was lost; and in the "Haffner," Leinsdorf chose to repeat the first movement exposition, yet this is one of the exceedingly few symphonies in which Mozart didn't even allow for the possibility of a repeat (due, here, no doubt, to the monothematic nature of the movement), as the manuscrip facsimile, published last year, clearly shows. And to repeat here and not in the movement of K. 201, where a second hearing of the opening is clearly needed, is both illogical and musically weak.

I should add that in the piano concerti, discussed in these pages yesterday, Leinsdorf was variable. His best work was with Claude Frank in the B flat Concerto; they played the piece together several times this past winter, and the accompaniment is by now very good indeed, strong and supple and sure of the soloist's next move.

With the most creative of the pianists, Christoph Eschenbach, Leinsdorf seemed least sure. In part it's a question of familiarity; they simply didn't know one another, but in part, too, Eschenbach had something of the unpredictable about him, something that kept the listener bound, and that required a finer accompaniment than the BSO, in short rehearsal time, was able to provide.

And with John Browning and the A Major Concerto, Leinsdorf and the orchestra both seemed bored, and I don't blame them.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
JUL 8 1969 E

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
JUL 8 1969 E

Touches Of Brass

Sunday afternoon's program completed the cycle with Claude Frank soloing in the piano concerto No. 27 in B-flat, K. 595, six German dances, K. 571, and the symphony No. 41 in C, K. 551, the "Jupiter." Six-thousand-sixteen attended on a sunny afternoon.

The concerto, Mozart's last, again demonstrated Claude Frank's affinity for Mozart, though the performance was generally low key and he dropped a few notes and muddied some passages along the way, unusual for him. The horn work in the final movement was not the sharpest either. To compensate, there was the beauty of the Larghetto movement, with thoughtful, clear-toned playing by Frank and the liquid scoring for winds, and Frank's customary felicity for shaping phrases.

The majestic "Jupiter" symphony, Mozart's finale in this form, was a fit conclusion to this miniature Mozart festival. Leinsdorf led a splendid performance, not only in the unfolding of the last movement's fugue with its triumphant touches of brass, but also in the slow movement — one of the loveliest of the weekend. The strings were particularly luminous, giving Leinsdorf the spare, clean lines he favors for Mozart.

The German dances are among the many examples of charming music for ballroom and parties Mozart left; he could produce these apparent trifles with the same art lavished on more important pieces, and they hold wit and lilting rhythms. At the end of this set comes a surprise — a burst of "Turkish Music" with drum, cymbal and tamourine

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
JUL. 10 1969

Concerts At Tanglewood

Friday — July 4
By D. D.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opened its season this evening with the first of a series of all-Mozart programs, and featured the young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach, who is currently on tour in this country. For the first work Mr. Leinsdorf chose the Symphony number 29, a youthful, high-spirited piece, which in addition to its exuberant appeal, whets the appetite for more. A more serious, and thought-provoking work, the Piano Concerto in C, received a distinguished, highly sensitive reading at the hands of Mr. Eschenbach. A deep, personal involvement with this music was the framework within which was woven the delicate theme lines and exquisite melodic patterns. The artist's technical virtuosity, although well in evidence, was always controlled and focussed upon the lyric qualities inherent in this beautiful work. The program ended with the Symphony number 39, one of the famous last "three". The orchestra now thoroughly in form sailed into this music with evident pleasure! Mr. Leinsdorf, more at home in the larger orchestral works of Mozart, provided an entirely satisfying rendition of the symphony.

Saturday — July 5
By D. D.

For the second evening in a row the strains of Mozart echoed through the shed and over the lawns of Tanglewood. For the second time a record number of listeners responded with tremendous enthusiasm to music once destined for the happy few. The Haffner Symphony, a work of the composer's middle period was given a vigorous reading, perhaps excessively so in parts, certain climaxes being a bit brass-heavy and overwrought, particularly the last few cadences. The high point of the evening was undoubtedly John Browning's performance of the Piano Concerto in A. The introspective approach of Eschenbach was an interesting contrast to the more outgoing, nervous style of Mr. Browning, whose playing blended with the orchestral accompaniment with no lapse in continuity between the introductory movement, the fast stepping final allegro and the beautifully paced adagio. The second part of the program was filled by the well-known Symphony number 40 in G minor. Mr. Leinsdorf usually reserves the most exciting for the last, and this was no exception. A bit too theatrical, perhaps, with heavy brass emphasis, the reading was, nonetheless, a model of clarity and precision, a refreshing approach to an old stand-by.

Sunday — July 6
By S. L.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf concluded its opening weekend at Tanglewood this Sunday afternoon by presenting an all Mozart program. Mozart was also the featured composer at the other three concerts this weekend.

The opening work was "Six German dances," K. 571 (incidentally a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.) These delightful and light pieces seemed to befit the sunny afternoon and the numerous people lounging on the lawns of Tanglewood.

Next pianist Claude Frank performed the Piano Concerto no. 27 in B flat, K. 595 with seeming ease. This concerto is Mozart's final piano concerto and is marked by a certain feeling of melancholy and introspection. Although not one of the most popular of Mozart's piano concertos, there are many beautiful passages, especially in the chord modulation passages.

Mr. Frank's technique and phrasing are highly admirable.

However, one would better appreciate the performance if the spectator were not to watch Mr. Frank's somewhat exaggerated histrionic gestures and his behind the scenes conducting. The orchestra blended well with the piano and provided excellent support.

The afternoon ended on a high note with the well-known "Jupiter" symphony.

36-c

Festival Features Mozart

By RAYMOND MORIN

Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — The last two Mozart concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival's opening weekend at Tanglewood had a refreshing uplift on Saturday night and a letdown yesterday afternoon.

Only Christoph Eschenbach's brilliant playing of Piano Concerto No. 21 on Friday night rescued the concert from commonplace.

Total weekend attendance was 20,835 including the Saturday morning open rehersal.

Music Review

Outstanding attractions of the Mozart trilogy were the composer's last three symphonies (Nos. 39, 40 and 41) played by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, and three young pianists in equally contrasted concertos.

John Browning was heard Saturday night in Concerto No. 23 and Claude Frank was soloist yesterday afternoon in Mozart's final piano concerto, No. 27 in B flat major.

Steady Glow

The G minor Symphony (No. 40) maintained a steady glow Saturday night except for the minuet when the horns fluffed. Leinsdorf adopted conservative speeds to clarify details. A kind of grandeur and poise replaced the symphony's usual restlessness.

Most pleasant surprise was a scintillating "Haffner" Symphony, No. 35. Applause was such that the finale was repeated, a most unusual procedure at Tanglewood.

Melodies in strings had unwarranted competition from percussion. But assets were heavy in firm rhythms and astute phrasing. Leinsdorf brought stateliness to the slow movement by making light of its "sing-song" melody and capricious ornaments. It was full speed ahead in the rondo without damage to technique or clarity.

Memorable Playing

After Browning had treated the comparatively trivial opening of the A major concerto with respect and moderate vitality, he settled down to some memorable playing.

He and the orchestra turned the Adagio into a flawless condensation of beauty and poetry. The pianist's sound and solid technique came to the fore in the finale for which he set a challenging speed.

Browning is a fine musician who plays the piano exceptionally well. It is almost unique to hear a young pianist who is more preoccupied with how his music sounds than how melodramatic it can be made to appear.

Yesterday's "Jupiter" Symphony was a respectable performance but hardly uplifting. It sounded like routine playing except for the finale in which the five separate themes were united with podium skill.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 7 1969 Ne Engl

Mozart In A Hedonist Setting

TWO PIANISTS AT TANGLEWOOD — CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH, SHOWN ON LEFT, ENTRANCED THE TANGLEWOOD AUDIENCE IN A DEBUT PERFORMANCE FRIDAY EVENING. CLAUDE FRANK PLAYED IN THE "WEEKEND PRELUDE" AND IN THE SUNDAY CONCERT.

By Peter M. Knapp

In this Berkshire setting of carpeted lawns, emphatic pines and trim hemlock hedges the summer season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has begun at Tanglewood, adding music to a natural atmosphere fit for a hedonist.

In his final year presiding over this musical and leafy estate, Erich Leinsdorf opened the 1969 Berkshire music festival this weekend with a trio of all-Mozart programs built around the Austrian master's last three symphonies and three piano concerti.

Friday evening's opening concert, atjoined a pair of symphonies, the early No. 29 joined pair of symphonies, the early No. 29 in A, K. 201 and the late No. 39 in E-flat, K. 543, with the spectacular Tanglewood debut of Christoph Eschenbach.

The 29-year-old German pianist received the kind of audience acclaim usually given big-name artists playing heroic romantic concerti for his performance of the Mozart Concerto No. 21 in C, K. 467. (For the moment this may be known as the "Elvira Madigan" concerto because of its use in the film score and the misuse of its andante movement in hack pop versions.)

Heroic Posturing

It is unusual to find this amount of enthusiasm aroused for a pianist who avoids heroic posturing both in his keyboard manner and in his playing — along with the smaller-scaled music of the classical concerto. In Eschenbach's case 'classical" does not mean prissy or music-box mechanical.

It does mean objectivity and a beautiful scale of proportions, in dynamic gradations of touch and a sure sense of note placement.

He has formidable technique — but it is that of an etcher, say, as against that of a Rubens. Each note that is meaningful, that needs to be heard, is perfectly articulated with the proper weight, and subsidiary material is kept in its secondary place. Eschenbach playing is thus marked by a seldom-encountered clarity of texture and expression, produced with a light, crystal tone.

The two symphonies were played with spirit and fine orchestral sound. No. 29 is a cheerful little symphony that contains simple but effective melodic ideas, and the predominant string parts were played with disciplined precision. No. 39 seems to be a Leinsdorf favorite. He leads it with buoyant good humor, underlining the horn parts in the finale.

In the weekend prelude, Claude Frank and Lilian Kallir (Mr. and Mrs. Frank) played two piano works of Bach and Mozart. Bach's concerto for two pianos (Klavier) and strings in C was badly out of balance between the two Steinways and the five strings of the violone ensemble. It might have worked with two harpsichords as in Bach's day, but setting five strings against two modern concert grands is no contest. Mozart's Sonata for two pianos in D, K. 448, completed these two exercises in imitation and counterpoint in a more stylish fashion.

Rare Encore

Saturday night's concert attended by 5,929, began with a rare Leinsdorf encore in the "Haffner" symphony No. 35 in D, K. 385, when the quick last movement was repeated. It is a show-stopper, with a coy main theme, several Mozartian surprises, and the composer's notation to play it as quickly as possible. For the Boston Symphony, this means fast — and one marvels at the speed at which the Bostonians can maintain poise and articulation — to say nothing of duplicating the feat.

Most of the movements were on the rapid side, with a certain hardness appearing in the first movement of the "Haffner" and the finale of the symphony No. 40 in G minor, K. 550, which concluded the program. On the other side, there was the airy quality of the "Haffner's" finale, and the fine mellow blend of the opening of No. 40 — a symphony of more subdued and profound expression than the richly-scored No. 35 with its fanfares and flourishes.

John Browning was the piano soloist of the evening in the lyrical concerto No. 23 in A, K. 488, into which Mozart poured inspired melodies. Regrettably, the performance by and large was superficial and hurried in the outer movements, syrupy romantic in the Adagio. Browning is an excellent pianist with lots of technique, but in this concerto he seemed to play on the surface of the music with more notes than expression — and the melting lyricism of the piece rarely surfaced in Leinsdorf's accompaniment.

PROGRAMS
(All Mozart)

Saturday Night
Symphony No. 35 in D major, K. 385 (Haffner)
Piano Concerto No. 23 in A major, K. 488
John Browning, pianist
Symphony No. 40 in G minor, K. 550

Sunday Afternoon
Six German Dances, K. 571
Piano Concerto, No. 27 in B flat, K.595
Claude Frank, pianist
Symphony No. 41 in C major, K. 551 (Jupiter)

LEINSDORF SAMPLER

By GEORGE GELLES
MUSIC CRITIC

Mozart Smorgasbord

LENOX—With the opening weekend of his last Tanglewood season given solely to Mozart, Erich Leinsdorf fairly sampled the spectrum of the composer's symphonic music; each of the concerts ended with one of the last three symphonies, and each began with a smaller orchestral work: the late A Major Symphony, K. 201, the 'Haffner' Symphony, K. 385, and the Six German Dances, K. 571, on Friday, Saturday and Sunday respectively.

There are, first of all, two observations to be made, one positive, one negative, that in concert balanced each other out. First, Leinsdorf seemed more concerned than usual with what he was doing, more involved with his scores, and second, the orchestra, in general, was quite bad.

To start with this latter, there was dreadful playing heard each day, and from the same sources: the solo clarinetist, Cioffi, seemed incapable of playing in tune, and stone deaf to his aberration; the solo oboe, Gomberg, phrased consistently in a common and vulgar manner, and his tone quality was not of a piece with the ensemble; and the first violin section as a whole produced a wooden sound lacking warmth and vibrancy.

The weekend's worst performance came on Sunday with the German Dances, a not negligible set of six waltzes distinguished, among other ways, by some sophisticated rhythmic play in the fifth piece and an unbeatably simple and altogether winning close to the sixth. What we got was surely a sightreading, nothing more, for there were obviously missed entrances among the winds and no unanimity of thought as to bowing among the violins. Leinsdorf seemed annoyed afterwards, and he had every reason to be embarrassed.

But Leinsdorf himself, for the most part, did work that was creditable even if was rarely my favorite sort of Mozart. His reading of the big E flat Symphony, for instance, had a first movement that was well shaped and nicely paced, even though the lead back to the recapitulation didn't come off, and the G Minor, too, had an opening allegro that was particularly good, though interestingly enough it had the same weak spot as did the E flat: at the reprise, where the development and first theme so wonderfully dovetail, there was not nearly enough definition of line and clarification of these two strands.

Most every performance had its bizarreries, its peculiar Leinsdorfisms that tempt one to think that the man is bored with the music, and is led to fussing by boredom. Here are some of them: in the G Minor finale, the horns, with nothing of importance, were made to stick out of the fabric in a grotesque manner (just before the double bar and at the corresponding spot at the movement's end); in the A Major Symphony, the Minuet was led at such an exaggeratedly fast pace that the relationship between it and its Trio was lost; and in the "Haffner," Leinsdorf chose to repeat the first movement exposition, yet this is one of the exceedingly few symphonies in which Mozart didn't even allow for the possibility of a repeat (due, here, no doubt, to the monothematic nature of the movement), as the manuscrip facsimile, published last year, clearly shows. And to repeat here and not in the movement of K. 201, where a second hearing of the opening is clearly needed, is both illogical and musically weak.

I should add that in the piano concerti, discussed in these pages yesterday, Leinsdorf was variable. His best work was with Claude Frank in the B flat Concerto; they played the piece together several times this past winter, and the accompaniment is by now very good indeed, strong and supple and sure of the soloist's next move.

With the most creative of the pianists, Christoph Eschenbach, Leinsdorf seemed least sure. In part it's a question of familiarity; they simply didn't know one another, but in part, too, Eschenbach had something of the unpredictable about him, something that kept the listener bound, and that required a finer accompaniment than the BSO, in short rehearsal time, was able to provide.

And with John Browning and the A Major Concerto, Leinsdorf and the orchestra both seemed bored, and I don't blame them.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 422,300

JUL 8 1969

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 8 1969

Touches Of Brass

Sunday afternoon's program completed the cycle with Claude Frank soloing in the piano concerto No. 27 in B-flat, K. 595, six German dances, K. 571, and the symphony No. 41 in C, K. 551, the "Jupiter." Six-thousand-sixteen attended on a sunny afternoon.

The concerto, Mozart's last, again demonstrated Claude Frank's affinity for Mozart, though the performance was generally low key and he dropped a few notes and muddied some passages along the way, unusual for him. The horn work in the final movement was not the sharpest either. To compensate, there was the beauty of the Larghetto movement, with thoughtful, clear-toned playing by Frank and the liquid scoring for winds, and Frank's customary felicity for shaping phrases.

The majestic "Jupiter" symphony, Mozart's finale in this form, was a fit conclusion to this miniature Mozart festival. Leinsdorf led a splendid performance, not only in the unfolding of the last movement's fugue with its triumphant touches of brass, but also in the slow movement — one of the loveliest of the weekend. The strings were particularly luminous, giving Leinsdorf the spare, clean lines he favors for Mozart.

The German dances are among the many examples of charming music for ballroom and parties Mozart left; he could produce these apparent trifles with the same art lavished on more important pieces, and they hold wit and lilting rhythms. At the end of this set comes a surprise — a burst of "Turkish Music" with drum, cymbal and tamourine

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,613

JUL 10 1969

Concerts At Tanglewood

Friday — July 4
By D. D.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opened its season this evening with the first of a series of all-Mozart programs, and featured the young German pianist Christoph Eschenbach, who is currently on tour in this country. For the first work Mr. Leinsdorf chose the Symphony number 29, a youthful, high-spirited piece, which in addition to its exuberant appeal, whets the appetite for more. A more serious, and thought-provoking work, the Piano Concerto in C, received a distinguished, highly sensitive reading at the hands of Mr. Eschenbach. A deep, personal involvement with this music was the framework within which was woven the delicate theme lines and exquisite melodic patterns. The artist's technical virtuosity, although well in evidence, was always controlled and focussed upon the lyric qualities inherent in this beautiful work. The program ended with the Symphony number 39, one of the famous last "three". The orchestra now thoroughly in form sailed into this music with evident pleasure! Mr. Leinsdorf, more at home in the larger orchestral works of Mozart, provided an entirely satisfying rendition of the symphony.

Saturday — July 5
By D. D.

For the second evening in a row the strains of Mozart echoed through the shed and over the lawns of Tanglewood. For the second time a record number of listeners responded with tremendous enthusiasm to music once destined for the happy few. The Haffner Symphony, a work of the composer's middle period was given a vigorous reading, perhaps excessively so in parts, certain climaxes being a bit brass-heavy and overwrought, particularly the last few cadences. The high point of the evening was undoubtedly John Browning's performance of the Piano Concerto in A. The introspective approach of Eschenbach was an interesting contrast to the more outgoing, nervous style of Mr. Browning, whose playing blended with the orchestral accompaniment with no lapse in continuity between the introductory movement, the fast stepping final allegro and the beautifully paced adagio. The second part of the program was filled by the well-known Symphony number 40 in G minor. Mr. Leinsdorf usually reserves the most exciting for the last, and this was no exception. A bit too theatrical, perhaps, with heavy brass emphasis, the reading was, nonetheless, a model of clarity and precision, a refreshing approach to an old stand-by.

Sunday — July 6
By S. L.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf concluded its opening weekend at Tanglewood this Sunday afternoon by presenting an all Mozart program. Mozart was also the featured composer at the other three concerts this weekend.

The opening work was "Six German dances," K. 571 (incidentally a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.) These delightful and light pieces seemed to befit the sunny afternoon and the numerous people lounging on the lawns of Tanglewood.

Next pianist Claude Frank performed the Piano Concerto no. 27 in B flat, K. 595 with seeming ease. This concerto is Mozart's final piano concerto and is marked by a certain feeling of melancholy and introspection. Although not one of the most popular of Mozart's piano concertos, there are many beautiful passages, especially in the chord modulation passages.

Mr. Frank's technique and phrasing are highly admirable.

However, one would better appreciate the performance if the spectator were not to watch Mr. Frank's somewhat exaggerated histrionic gestures and his behind the scenes conducting. The orchestra blended well with the piano and provided excellent support.

The afternoon ended on a high note with the well-known "Jupiter" symphony.

36 d

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 10 1969

Tanglewood, Marlboro, Dartmouth

Festival time: Leinsdorf, Casals, Dallapiccola

By Louis Snyder

As inevitably as do-re-mi, three major New England festivals opened a summer of music-making last weekend.

On Friday, at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., Erich Leinsdorf began the final phase of his musical directorship of the Boston Symphony with a Mozart concert, which also served as the debut with the orchestra of the young German pianist, Christopher Eschenbach.

On Saturday, in Vermont, Pablo Casals made one of his rare conducting appearances in a combined chamber music and orchestral program at Marlboro.

On Sunday, Dartmouth College's Congregation of the Arts in Hanover, N.H. presented its festival orchestra, with Mario di Bonaventura directing a program which included three works by Luigi Dallapiccola, its first composer-in-residence of the summer.

Let no one assume that when you've investigated one festival you know them all. They are, in fact, as different as do-re-mi.

Eschenbach stars

Like "do," Tanglewood was the first of these three to be heard 35 years ago when music festivals were something one had to go abroad for. Through the years, certain constants have remained — the Boston "sound," the Valhalla-like setting, and a certain conservatism in programming. Audiences of varying sizes still seem to thrive on all three, as the 6,359 present on Friday indicated.

Friday's news was Mr. Eechenbach's debut in the Mozart Concerto No. 21 in C. Under his touch, this music achieved what was not always apparent in the orchestral playing during the rest of the evening—a clarity and balance that had its sources within the performer himself. With a technique that is strong, and a tone (in this instance) that was becomingly crystalline, he made of the concerto a fresh and lovely statement, in which Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra concurred.

Two symphonies, the early No. 29 and the late No. 39, were played as Mr. Leinsdorf is accustomed to have the orchestra do them — meticulously, almost ceremonially, but with only a sprinkle of humanity. There are, of course, infinite possibilities in Mozart, so one extracts what he chooses for interpretative purposes. And who shall say what is "right"? The audience was obviously pleased with everything and everyone, most especially with Mr. Eschenbach, whom it took immediately to its collective heart.

Evergreen Casals

There was a heartwarming occasion the next night, too, some 70 miles to the north at Marlboro, Vt. Here professionals, new and veteran, have assembled for 19 years to collaborate on one another's most dreamed-of musical projects, with results that are homespun only in the closeness and simplicity of the surroundings.

One of the evergreen ornaments of Marlboro since 1960 has been Pablo Casals, who occasionally appears unannounced as conductor of the festival orchestra, and did so on Saturday.

With eyes closed, ignorant of the circumstances, one would have recognized this performance of Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn as a special one. A sustained songfulness, an almost audible deep breath between variations, each of which emerged with an almost personal individuality, and an overall concept of majesty and strength, made this a hearing to cherish. Casals was accorded standing ovations before and after the orchestra's exemplary performance—first out of admiration and expectation; last in astonishment and humility.

Two sextets of boldly different stripe made up the opening half of the Marlboro program. First was Beethoven's virile, ebullient woodwind Sextet in E-flat major, Op. 71, given a rousing and at the same time neatly balanced performance by Harold Wright and Larry Combs, clarinets; Stephen Maxym and Charles Holdeman, bassoons; and Myron Bloom and John Serkin, horns.

Summer camp?

Then came an intriguing curiosity, Tchaikovsky's "Souvenior de Florence," which actually burst out of the realm of conventional chamber music by virtue of its tempestuous instrumental demands, met with dedicated virtuosity by Pina Carmirelli and Donald Weilerstein, violins; Martha Strongin Katz and Caroline Levine, violas; and Paul Katz and Richard Sher, cellos.

From its startling, turbulent beginning, this late work is far from the pressed-violets "Souvenir" Tchaikovsky-deprecators might have expected. True, there are characteristic touches—a lush melody for cello, later reprised by the first violin; pizzicati to arouse balletomanes; and an almost symphonic texture that belied the presence of only six players. There are also moments of pure camp (how could he, you think!) followed by absorbing passages of Tchaikovsky at his best. It's anything but syrupy travelogue music — if he had set "Gianni Schicchi" it might have sounded something like this—and now that this "Souvenir" is out of the archives, it deserves more frequent performances of the kind seriously conceived at Marlboro.

Youngest of the festivals, Dartmouth has begun its seventh Congregation of the Arts with a new general administrator, Peter Smith, who has succeeded Warner Bentley, retiring after 41 years at the college. In addition to an extensive music program, the eight-week Congress has scheduled a dazzling series of events in theater, films, and visual arts available in the handsome, workable Hopkins Center.

Sunday night's concert brought together the Festival Orchestra, in which both faculty and students participate under Mr. di Bonaventura's direction. Astonishing that, in a week, he had rehearsed and polished a program of great variety and no little complexity.

Peter Smith

. . . is the new general administrator of Hopkins Center, home of Dartmouth's Congregation of the Arts.

By Paul Conklin

Musicians everywhere

Young and veteran professionals, like these at Vermont's Marlboro Music Festival, have again become part of the country landscape this summer throughout New England.

Horn and holiday

It has been the fate of Ferruccio Busoni in the United States to be tolerated for his transcriptions and have his own works neglected. Not that the "Sarabande and Cortege" from his opera, "Doktor Faust," which opened the program, are easily assimilated. It is somber music, full of troubled and troubling phrases, fascinating in a morbid sort of way, and stunningly conveyed by conductor and orchestra. Is a Busoni revival on the way?

Barry Tuckwell, who is one of the great horn players of the world and is a member of the Congregation's faculty for the second year, was soloist in Haydn's First Concerto for Horn. This lovely work spread warmth and freshness after Busoni's pale cast of thought, and Mr. Tuckwell, who played his own cadenzas brilliantly, was equally dazzling in his ability to express and shade sound and meaning. The audience was lavish in its recognition of this spectacular performance.

Before the intermission, Charles Ives's "Washington's Birthday" from his "Holidays" Symphony was given a crisp reading. Full of problems for performers, it came off glowingly—a unique, compelling work by an American original of originals.

Three by Dallapiccola

Works by an Italian original of originals—Luigi Dallapiccola — comprised the second half of the evening. A dozen or more are being played during his two-week stay in Hanover, and three were on Sunday's program.

Most recent was the American premiere of "Four Lyrics of Antonio Machado," songs reset in an orchestral version in 1964, and sung expressively on this occasion by Christine Asher. The accompaniment is wispy and atmospheric, the vocal writing declarative and strong (stronger perhaps than Miss Asher's pleasing lyric voice can appropriately compass at this point), and the impression of alternating moods of harshness and beauty are tellingly conveyed.

A Machado poem also inspired the next number for orchestra, "Piccola Musica Notturna," composed in 1954. Dallapiccola's skill as an orchestrator is apparent in this quasi-impressionistic piece, in which dissonance and melodic feeling are equally present. Unlike its Mozartean namesake, it is night music with a difference — not so much to divert as to probe via tonal coloration into the light and shadow of a vast deserted town. Instrumental effects, both caressing and startling, result in the establishment of a surrealistic mood that is one of Mr. Dallapiccola's special achievements.

In the concluding "Symphonic Fragments" from a ballet, "Marsia," the Dallapiccola of 1943 was revealed in astonishing retrospect. Here he undertook a strongly individualistic musical idiom, certainly advanced for its time and, as later, intellectually inspired — in this case, "the prodigious attempt of Man to approach God." Three dances and a final scene were excerpted, enough to reveal the monolithic concept of the subject and a glimpse of the Dallapiccola to be.

At the end of the evening, the composer came to the stage to bow formally to the audience, Mr. di Bonaventura, and the performers, all of whom in their turn expressed their pleasure in having him among them.

Mozart Featured

AT OPENING OF TANGLEWOOD

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Mozart is a "natural" for large-scale human use as required by the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood which opened in Lenox, Mass., last weekend. His essential musical character is clean and strong, the athletic and emotive qualities inescapable, and the lace at the cuffs, if any, subordinate to sound tailoring. Such a quick dancer naturally spills over in motion with a "fine excess" and with a control that never denies the drama or the singing of the heart.

The three main programs were nicely balanced; each included a "small" symphony (or a first time for Six German Dances), a major piano concerto, and after intermission, a major symphony. The lesser works (No. 29 in A, No. 35 in D — the "Haffner" and the glorified beer-hall infectious German Dances) served to introduce the Mozart idiom on a relatively simple plane. The Haffner, a "college" of earlier "entertainments", comes off as an exciting symphony, well-balanced in modes of experience; and the German Dances suggest that Mozart could have been the Strauss of the 18th century.

Once broken-in and led into concentration we were ready to follow the concerto into deeper waters. No. 21 in C with Christoph Eschenbach at the piano (first time with the BSO), No. 23 in A with John Browning and No. 27 in B flat with Claude Frank — these are some of the richest works of the prematurely-mature genius, and appropriately played by young virtuosi (a bit below or above 30) and each capable of a special kind of pianistic revelation. Eschenbach, the latest arrival — though with great repute in Europe — was perhaps the strongest, most deeply thoughtful a la Schnabel. Browning highlighted the lyric changability and eclat — in cadenzas, advanced Mozart into Chopin's realm of subconscious dream but with plenty of fire at the appropriate moments. Claude Frank, with the advantage of long experience with chamber music and with the BSO came the closest to my own sense of the concertos, which seem to me like the piano quartets, writ large. Even without the piano being positioned in the orchestra (Beecham always insisted on this) his sound was clearly animating the orchestra from within (the way Stravinsky does it) or emerging into solo with orchestral support, or challenging the greater body in equal counterpoint of authority.

Maestro Leinsdorf, in the concertos, is amazingly deft and sensitive in his position as middleman, uses the scores to research the complications of dialogue and makes only useful motions. He is clearly the best in the business for this, which is not so different from controlling the forces of opera, his other field. In the symphonies, for which Leinsdorf dispenses with scores, he is naturally the synosure of a thousand eyes so that it is quite right for him to play the music in the air, but always cannily keen to anticipate entrances, contrasts and the internal in-fighting of development. On the evidence of his work with Mozart, here and elsewhere, he could be touted as a Mozart "specialist" with his functional feel for detail that always keeps it organically related to movement and character. This is the more obvious because a superb instrument — the orchestra itself (for which he has done so much for to keep it superb) was in these concerts, never lacking in skilled response. When the conductor asked for Mozart's own suggestion: that the presto-finale of the Haffner be played "as fast as possible", the orchestra compiled without dropping a stitch — spiccatos like sandpipers dodging waves on a beach, and the double basses running a race without scrub or sweat. In response to the almost frantic applause, Mr. Leinsdorf called for a repeat as encore. Mozart would have understood.

What can one say of the three last symphonies? (No. 39 in E flat, No. 40 in G minor and No. 41 in C.) They reached beyond the acceptable in the society of Mozart's time. Without the piano-protagonist of the concertos (no hero) they, like his last string quartets, achieve the heights and plumb the depths, with no displacement of fundamental humanity.

With these symphonies coming at the end of the three programs, I heard the first two from several hundred yards distance — off the rear of the grassers. As played here, the Mozart ideas projected with conviction even at a distance and were no insult to the trees and the sky. For the Jupiter, to end the last concert, I stayed put. The lovely nostalgia of the G minor the night before gained by the wide air carrying its dropping phrases, like the drop of maple seeds. (In the final Anatomy of Melancholy, Mozart will be, with Brahms, a classic assertion of life-in-death.) But the last symphony is a tremendous assertion of power — like the Beethoven Third — and one must confront it, stiffening to its chordal assault and giving to its lyric contrast. Even the Andante Cantabile has a surge of drama and the Menuetto a rich urgency. As for te last movement, instead of winding-up with variations of playfulness, as in most "classic" pieces, Mozart takes the bit in his teeth and runs away with the symphony — everything goes — a grand climax of complex experience only matched by the late Beethoven — including washes of harmonic color radically impressionistic. The orchestra has never played it so completely. I hope there was a tape.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 10 1969 New England

THE CLASSICS

Christopher Eschenbach, pianist; Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, and Erich Leinsdorf, conductor of the Berkshire Music Festival, as they appeared July 4 at Tanglewood.

A Weekend To Remember

IT STARTED to be a golden weekend of pianists, but the orchestra and Erich Leinsdorf stole the show.

Tanglewood's first weekend in this its 32nd year was all Mozart and all Boston Symphony. Three young stars of the piano were present—Christoph Eschenbach, John Browning, and Claude Frank. They performed exceptionally well, even brilliantly.

But only Eschenbach got anywhere near the cheers that Leinsdorf and the orchestra received. It was a triumph of discipline, togetherness, and the sheer joy of playing.

It was clear that Leinsdorf was having a good time. His face mirrored the love of Mozart and the pleasure of having this orchestra, which he will no longer direct after this summer, respond to his every wish.

Leinsdorf enjoyed himself so much (and the orchestra too, obviously) that he had the group encore the last movement of the Haffner Symphony Saturday night, the first time I've seen him do this, and the first time in recent memory for an American orchestra. The last group I saw do it was the Leningrad Symphony in a concert at Symphony Hall in Newark some 10 years ago.

That Haffner was something else! One onlooker described it as the most electric rendition he had ever heard. It wasn't only electric, it was breathtaking. The beautifully soft andante movement brought on paraxosyms in the audience. The clarity and tone of the work were right on the button by Leinsdorf.

Sunday afternoon, Leinsdorf and the orchestra outdid themselves in the Jupiter. This is Mozart's final statement to the world. Do as you will with my body and my goods, you cannot take from me my soul, says the music and the intent is triumphant, not mordant as so many critics are wont to say.

At the end of the final movement Leinsdorf was limp and so were the listeners. It was an emotional experience transcending the perfect summer setting, the tranquil weather, the brightness of the crowds.

THE WEEKEND began with Symphony Nos. 29 and 39 sandwiching the Piano concerto No. 21 played by a sensitive young man, Christoph Eschenbach. This was his first appearance with the Boston Symphony. He had made his American debut this year with the Cleveland Orchestra. At 29 he is a finished, competent technician and a musician of delight. The crowd loved him.

The Golden Boy himself, John Browning, played Saturday evening, doing the Piano concerto No. 23 in between the Haffner and No. 40. How's that for programming!

Browning plays well, there's no doubt about it. His Hollywood mannerisms seem to annoy some people, but that's the price you have to pay to listen to genius.

The delightful six German dances opened Sunday's concert and both Leinsdorf and the orchestra had a ball playing them. Claude Frank received an ovation for his performance of the Piano concerto No. 27, and it was well deserved. Of the whole weekend, he probably came off best. He has the sensitivity of Eschenbach and the sheer technical brilliance of Browning and none of the latter's obnoxious mannersims.

The afternoon's piece de resistance was the Jupiter and it sent the crowd off the grounds in a mood that no amount of Fourth of July weekend traffic could dissipate.

A weekend to remember!

By Mark Stuart

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD CALL
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 20 1969

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director
THIS WEEK AT THE
BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL
TANGLEWOOD
LENOX, MASS.

TODAY, SUNDAY, JULY 6
2:30 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
CLAUDE FRANK pianist
Mozart program
Six German Dances K. 571
Piano concerto in B flat K. 595
'Jupiter' Symphony

FRIDAY, JULY 11
7 pm SHED
WEEKEND PRELUDE
Music by Bach
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violinist
JULES ESKIN cellist
9 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Bach: The Four Suites

TIMES-UNION  Sunday, July 6, 1969 H-3

SATURDAY, JULY 12
10:30 am SHED
BSO—Open Rehearsal
8 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF conductor
Mozart:
The Abduction from the Seraglio
BEVERLY SILLS, GEORGE SHIRLEY, ANNE ELGAR, JEROLD SIENA, RAYMOND MICHALSKI, TANGLEWOOD CHOIR.

SUNDAY, JULY 13
2:30 pm SHED
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
DAVID ZINMAN conductor
DORIOT ANTHONY DWYER flute
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violinist
Graat: Symphony for strings
Bach: Concerto for flute, violin and harpsichord in A minor
Handel: Concerto grosso in G op. 6
Mozart: Symphony no. 36

Tickets: $3.50, 4.50, 5.50, 6.50, 7, 7.50, 8 and $8.50 (Box Seat).
Box contains 6 chairs.
Special parking provided.
Admission to lawn: $3
(available day of concert).
Open Rehearsal: $2.50, unreserved.
(available day of concert).
Ticket to Friday concert includes admission to Weekend Prelude.
All children regardless of age must have a ticket.

this week at
BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER
TODAY, SUNDAY, JULY 6
10 am THEATRE
Chamber Music

TUESDAY, JULY 8
8 pm SHED
the first of the
TUESDAY TANGLEWOOD TRENDS
JANIS JOPLIN
ORPHEUS
Ticket prices: $4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 6, 6.50 (Box Seat)
Admission to lawn: $3
(available day of concert)

WEDNESDAY, JULY 9
9 pm THEATRE
BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN conductor

THURSDAY, JULY 10
9 pm THEATRE
Vocal concert

SUNDAY, JULY 13
10 am THEATRE
Chamber Music

Programs subject to change.

the second of the
TUESDAY TANGLEWOOD TRENDS
July 15/SHED/8 pm
IRON BUTTERFLY
THE STAPLE SINGERS
Ticket prices: $4, 4.50, 5, 5.50, 6, 6.50 (Box Seat)
Admission to lawn: $3
(available day of concert)

For further ticket information:
LENOX (413) 637-1600
Baldwin Piano RCA Records

Coming Events

Highlights of the Season

Week of July 13

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday, July 13: BSO conducted by Zinman in works of Graff, Bach, Handel, and Mozart, 2:30 . . . Friday, July 18: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in a program of Rossini, Scharwenka, and Stravinsky for 9 p.m. concert . . . Saturday, July 19: Leinsdorf, soloist and concerto to be announced, program includes Prokofieff.

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: Hunger and Thirst . . . Colonie: The Student Prince . . . Storrowton: Happy Time . . . Williamstown: You Know I Can't Hear You When the Water's Running.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Ruth Mata and Eugene Hari "Love Is All You Need," a satirical program in multi-media, and Norman Walker & Co. Seven performances July 15-19.

Week of July 20

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday, July 20: BSO in a program of Tchaikovsky, conducted by Leinsdorf, 2:30 . . . Friday, July 25: Program of Beethoven and Brahms conducted by Leinsdorf, 9:00 p.m. . . . Saturday, July 26: Leinsdorf conducting BSO in a program of Verdi, with the Berkshire Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Boy Choir.

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: Hunger and Thirst . . . Colonie: George M. . . . Storrowton: Mame.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Maria Alba's Spanish Dance Company, seven performances, July 22-26.

Week of July 27

TANGLEWOOD — Sunday, July 27: BSO in a program of Sibelius and Beethoven conducted by Wilson . . . Friday, Aug. 1: Leinsdorf conducting the BSO in works by Stravinsky, Schoenberg, and Brahms . . . Saturday, Aug. 2: Boulez conducting the BSO in pieces by Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok.

DANCE — Jacob's Pillow: Gruppe Motion Berlin, and Teresa with Spanish dancers and Flamenco guitarist, seven performances July 29-Aug. 1.

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: Timon's Beach . . . Colonie: Hello Sucker . . . Storrowton: Mame . . . Williamstown: Sweet Bird of Youth.

Week of August 3

TANGLEWOOD—Sunday, Aug. 3: BSO conducted by Barenboim in a program of Mendelssohn, Elgar and Beethoven . . . Friday, Aug. 8: BSO conducted by Anceri in a program of Smetana . . . Saturday, Aug. 9: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in a program of Debussy, Weill and Brahms.

THEATRE — Berkshire Theatre Festival: "Timon's Beach" . . . Colonie: "How Now Dow Jones" . . . Storrowton: "Sweet Charity."

DANCE—Jacob's Pillow: Center Ballet of Buffalo, seven performances, Aug. 4-9.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 5 1969

38

2nd Week

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 6 1969

Leinsdorf to Conduct Bach Suites At Tanglewood's Second Weekend

LENOX — The second weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens Friday at 9 p. m. with music director Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four suites of Bach, the first time Leinsdorf has programmed them in a single concert.

Prelude at 7

The concert is preceded at 7 by the weekend prelude, in which the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, and principal cellist, Jules Eskin, will play two Bach compositions for unaccompanied strings.

On Saturday evening, Leinsdorf conducts a complete concert performance in German of Mozart's opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Beverly Sills sings the role of Constanze, George Shirley is Belmonte, and Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, and Raymond Michalski sing the other principal parts. The Tanglewood Choir also participates. This is the first of two complete concert operas Leinsdorf has programmed for the Berkshire Festival this season. The other is Verdi's "Otello," on Saturday July 26.

Zinman Returns

David Zinman, the young American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, returns to Tanglewood on Sunday at 2.30. As he did in his first appearance with the Boston Symphony last summer, he will conduct a program of music for chamber orchestra, including Mozart's "Linz" symphony, works by Graaf and Handel, and Bach's "Triple concerto in A minor" with soloists Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal flutist of the Boston Symphony, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, and harpsichordist Robert Levin.

The weekend's open rehearsal is Saturday morning at 10.30.

Tuesday Concert

The first of this season's five Tuesday evening "Contemporary Trends" concerts is this coming Tuesday at 8.30 in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed. Janis Joplin is the featured artist, joined on the bill by Orpheus.

The contemporary trends series was inaugurated in 1968 to present the best in current nonclassical musical expression. The series was so successful that it has grown to five this season, all on Tuesday evenings at 8 in the Shed.

On July 15, the second trends concert features the Iron Butterfly and The Staple Singers. On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin appear. On July 29, Mahalia Jackson, the great gospel singer, appears with Ornette Coleman and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra. August 12 brings a special program, "Bill Graham presents From the Fillmore: Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show."

Weekend Program

FRIDAY

7 P. m.

Shed

Weekend Prelude

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN Violinist

JULES ESKIN Cellist

Bach:

Unaccompanied Suite for Cello Sonato No. 3 for Violin alone

9 P. m.

Shed

BOSTON AYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

Bach:

The four suites

SATURDAY

10.30 A. M.

Shed

BSO—Open Rhearsal

8 P.m.

Shed

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

Mozart:

The Abduction from the Seraglio Beverly Sills George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski, Tanglewood Choir

SUNDAY

2.30 P. M.

Shed

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

DAVID ZINMAN Guest conductor

Graaf:

Symphony for strings

Bach:

Triple concerto

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Joseph Silverstein, Robert Levin

Handel:

Concerto grosso op. 6no. 1

Mozart:

'Line' symphony

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Friday, July 11, 1969

SOPRANO. Beverly Sills, the much-publicized diva of the New York City and Vienna State Operas, sings with the Boston Symphony tomorrow at 8 p.m. when it presents Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" in the Music Shed of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Other singers are George Shirley and Jerold Siena.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

JUL 14 1969

4 Premieres Feature Tanglewood Concert

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

David Zinman was guest conductor at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon. Four works were scheduled, three of which received their first performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Christian Ernst Graaf's String Sinfonia in C, op. 40, No. 4; J. S. Bach's A Minor Concerto for Flute, Violin, and Harpsichord, and Handel's Concerto Grosso in G, op. 6, No. 1.

* * *

Graaf's Sinfonia began the concert, and it proved an interesting experience. Historically, Graaf fits in roughly between Schubert and Mozart, being more or less contemporaneous with Haydn. His Sinfonia in C is part of a series of six such works, and is cast in three short movements. The first is bouncy and built around the interval of a rising major third. The second, in F minor, features the very interesting (and seemingly early for its time) effect of triplets against a firm duple meter during the major-key contrasting central interlude. A ¾ vivace finale rounds the work out, and sounds quite different from the ¾ minuets of Mozart and Haydn or the almost laendler waltzes of Schubert. Harpsichord continuo was provided, in keeping with baroque practices.

* * *

Next came Bach's Triple Concerto in A Minor. For the piece Zinman had the courage to reduce the orchestra to only 11 members, a move that elicited unusually balanced textures and a penertating sense of clarity. The adagio middle movement is scored for solo instruments alone, a curious gesture. Through out the first half of this movement the violin part consisted merely of a series of pizzicato argeggios accompanying a lonely flute line. Towards the conclusion of the movement, the roles were reversed, with the violin becoming florid and the flute solo being reduced to the accompaniment arpeggios.

The harpsicord solo was unassuming until the finale, when it became quite prominent indeed. Often the orchestra and soloists were silent to point up the harpsichord. Even the cadenza was for harpsichord alone, and one can only surmise the difficult keyboard part was conceived to be played by Bach, himself, who often wrote immensely complicated parts which only he could play.

* * *

Soloists, incidentally, were drawn from the orchestra. Doriot Anthony Dwyer and Joseph Silverstein are principal flute and concertmaster, respectively, and Robert Levin (though not a BSO member) has played with the orchestra many times in the past. Their contributions were highly artistic, particularly Levin's.

Following intermission Handel's First Concerto Grosso of the opus 6 cycle was given. Conductor Zinman was careful to distinguish between ripieno and concertante sections of the orchestra, and in general seemed to give the work an extraordinary vitality.

It was a shame that the only familiar work on the program, Mozart's Linz Symphony, received quite a disappointing reading. Zinman aimed for a subtle and gracious performance, but in trying to do so often distorted instrumental balances or allowed shadowy entrances which never made an impact. At times tempi were ill-chosen also, particularly the adagia introduction. Since Zinman's main allegro was a bit leisurely to begin with, the slow, steady introduction should not have been pressed so hard or fast.

* * *

By trying to emphasize emotionality in the slow movement, all that happened was a serious loss of profile. The eight-note basis figurations betrayed no sense of anxiety whatsoever, and the overly-curvaceous violin theme seemed quite out of place.

The minuet, too, fared badly, for the central trio was totally alienated by barely perceptible luftpausen and a fermated downbeat that simply did not belong. The concluding presto movement was better in comparison, but still nothing special.

CHRONICLE
HAMDEN, CONN.
WEEKLY 7,800

JUL 10 1969

New England

TANGLEWOOD

The second weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., opens Friday at 9 P.M. with Music Director Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four suites of Bach, the first time Leinsdorf has programmed the in a single concert. The Bost Symphony concert is preceded 7 P.M. by the Weekend Prelu

HERALD
CRANSTON, R. I.
WEEKLY 7,700

JUL 10 1969

New England

Tanglewood Concerts Scheduled

The following concerts are scheduled for the weekend at the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.:

Friday, July 11, 7 p.m. — Weekend Prelude: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, violinist; JULES ESKIN, cellist, performing Bach's "Unaccompanied Suite for Cello" and "Sonata #3 for Violin Alone." 9 p.m. in the Shed — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA in the fourt suites of Bach, conducted by ERICH LEINSDORF.

Saturday, July 12, 10:30 a.m. in the Shed — BSO Open Rehearsal. 8 p.m., Shed — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA in Graff's "Symphony for Strings," Bach's "Triple Concerto" with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Joseph Silverstein, and Robert Levin, Handel's "Concerto Grosso" opera 6, #1, and Mozart's "Linz Symphony" all conducted by DAVID ZINMAN.

INDEPENDENT
LITTLETON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,250

JUL 10 1969

RHODE ISLAND PENDULUM
EAST GREENWICH, R. I.
WEEKLY 3,210

JUL 10 1969

ASSABET VALLEY BEACON
MAYNARD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,950

JUL 10 1969

TIMES
NEW MILFORD, CO
WEEKLY 5,566

JUL 10 1969

RIDGEWOOD, N
HERALD-NEWS
W. 13,000

JUL 10 1969

CITIZEN
SUDBURY, MASS
WEEKLY 1,975

JUL 10 1969

Bach to Feature Second Weekend at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The second weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens on Friday evening, July 11 at 9 p.m. with Music Director Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four suites of Bach, the first time Mr. Leinsdorf has programmed them in a single concert. The 9 p.m., Boston Symphony concert is preceded at 7 p.m. by the Weekend Prelude, in which the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, and principal cellist, Jules Eskin, will play two Bach compositions for unaccompanied strings.

On Saturday evening, July 12, Erich Leinsdorf conducts a complete concert performance in German of Mozart's opera "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Beverly Sills sings the role of Constanze, George Shirley is Belmonte, and Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, and Raymond Michalski sing the other principal parts. The Tanglewood Choir also participates. This is the first of two complete concert operas Erich Leinsdorf has programmed for the Berkshire Festival this season. The other is Verdi's "Otello," on Saturday, July 26.

David Zinman, the young American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, returns to Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon, July 13 at 2:30. As he did in his first appearance with the Boston Symphony last summer, he will conduct a program of music for chamber orchestra, including Mozart's 'Linz' symphony, works by Graaf and Handel, and Bach's Triple concerto in A minor with soloists Dorit Anthony Dwyer, Principal flutist of the Boston Symphony, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, and harpsichordist Robert Levin.

The weekend's Open Rehearsal is Saturday morning, July 12 at 10:30.

Nashoba Free Press
Nashoba, N.H.

July 10, 1969

POST GAZETTE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 21,500

JUL 11 1969

New England

BETHEL HOME NEWS
BETHEL, CONN.
WEEKLY CONN. 1,820

JUL 9 1969

New England

FREE PRESS
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

JUL 10 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 9 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 10 1969

BEVERLY SILLS, one of world's leading sopranos, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Saturday in Mozart's "The Abduction of the Seraglio."

38

2nd Week

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 6 1969

Leinsdorf to Conduct Bach Suites At Tanglewood's Second Weekend

LENOX — The second weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens Friday at 9 p. m. with music director Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four suites of Bach, the first time Leinsdorf has programmed them in a single concert.

Prelude at 7

The concert is preceded at 7 by the weekend prelude, in which the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, and principal cellist, Jules Eskin, will play two Bach compositions for unaccompanied strings.

On Saturday evening, Leinsdorf conducts a complete concert performance in German of Mozart's opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Beverly Sills sings the role of Constanze, George Shirley is Belmonte, and Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, and Raymond Michalski sing the other principal parts. The Tanglewood Choir also participates. This is the first of two complete concert operas Leinsdorf has programmed for the Berkshire Festival this season. The other is Verdi's "Otello," on Saturday July 26.

Zinman Returns

David Zinman, the young American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, returns to Tanglewood on Sunday at 2.30. As he did in his first appearance with the Boston Symphony last summer, he will conduct a program of music for chamber orchestra, including Mozart's "Linz" symphony, works by Graaf and Handel, and Bach's "Triple concerto in A minor" with soloists Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal flutist of the Boston Symphony, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, and harpsichordist Robert Levin.

The weekend's open rehearsal is Saturday morning at 10.30.

Tuesday Concert

The first of this season's five Tuesday evening "Contemporary Trends" concerts is this coming Tuesday at 8.30 in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed. Janis Joplin is the featured artist, joined on the bill by Orpheus.

The contemporary trends series was inaugurated in 1968 to present the best in current nonclassical musical expression. The series was so successful that it has grown to five this season, all on Tuesday evenings at 8 in the Shed.

On July 15, the second trends concert features the Iron Butterfly and The Staple Singers. On July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin appear. On July 29, Mahalia Jackson, the great gospel singer, appears with Ornette Coleman and the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis Orchestra. August 12 brings a special program, "Bill Graham presents From the Fillmore: Jefferson Airplane, B. B. King, and special guest stars, The Who, with the Joshua Light Show."

Weekend Program

FRIDAY

7 P. m.

Shed

Weekend Prelude

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN Violinist

JULES ESKIN Cellist

Bach:

Unaccompanied Suite for Cello Sonato No. 3 for Violin alone

9 P. m.

Shed

BOSTON AYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

Bach:

The four suites

SATURDAY

10.30 A. M.

Shed

BSO—Open Rhearsal

8 P.m.

Shed

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

Mozart:

The Abduction from the Seraglio Beverly Sills George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski, Tanglewood Choir

SUNDAY

2.30 P. M.

Shed

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

DAVID ZINMAN Guest conductor

Graaf:

Symphony for strings

Bach:

Triple concerto

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Joseph Silverstein, Robert Levin

Handel:

Concerto grosso op. 6no. 1

Mozart:

'Line' symphony

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

JUL 14 1969

4 Premieres Feature Tanglewood Concert

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

David Zinman was guest conductor at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon. Four works were scheduled, three of which received their first performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Christian Ernst Graaf's String Sinfonia in C, op. 40, No. 4; J. S. Bach's A Minor Concerto for Flute, Violin, and Harpsichord, and Handel's Concerto Grosso in G, op. 6, No. 1.

* * *

Graaf's Sinfonia began the concert, and it proved an interesting experience. Historically, Graaf fits in roughly between Schubert and Mozart, being more or less contemporaneous with Haydn. His Sinfonia in C is part of a series of six such works, and is cast in three short movements. The first is bouncy and built around the interval of a rising major third. The second, in F minor, features the very interesting (and seemingly early for its time) effect of triplets against a firm duple meter during the major-key contrasting central interlude. A 3/4 vivace finale rounds the work out, and sounds quite different from the 3/4 minuets of Mozart and Haydn or the almost laendler waltzes of Schubert. Harpsichord continuo was provided, in keeping with baroque practices.

* * *

Next came Bach's Triple Concerto in A Minor. For the piece Zinman had the courage to reduce the orchestra to only 11 members, a move that elicited unusually balanced textures and a penertating sense of clarity. The adagio middle movement is scored for solo instruments alone, a curious gesture. Through out the first half of this movement the violin part consisted merely of a series of pizzicato argeggios accompanying a lonely flute line. Towards the conclusion of the movement, the roles were reversed, with the violin becoming florid and the flute solo being reduced to the accompaniment arpeggios.

The harpsicord solo was unassuming until the finale, when it became quite prominent indeed. Often the orchestra and soloists were silent to point up the harpsichord. Even the cadenza was for harpsichord alone, and one can only surmise the difficult keyboard part was conceived to be played by Bach, himself, who often wrote immensely complicated parts which only he could play.

* * *

Soloists, incidentally, were drawn from the orchestra. Doriot Anthony Dwyer and Joseph Silverstein are principal flute and concertmaster, respectively, and Robert Levin (though not a BSO member) has played with the orchestra many times in the past. Their contributions were highly artistic, particularly Levin's.

Following intermission Handel's First Concerto Grosso of the opus 6 cycle was given. Conductor Zinman was careful to distinguish between ripieno and concertante sections of the orchestra, and in general seemed to give the work an extraordinary vitality.

It was a shame that the only familiar work on the program, Mozart's Linz Symphony, received quite a disappointing reading. Zinman aimed for a subtle and gracious performance, but in trying to do so often distorted instrumental balances or allowed shadowy entrances which never made an impact. At times tempi were ill-chosen also, particularly the adagia introduction. Since Zinman's main allegro was a bit leisurely to begin with, the slow, steady introduction should not have been pressed so hard or fast.

* * *

By trying to emphasize emotionality in the slow movement, all that happened was a serious loss of profile. The eight-note basis figurations betrayed no sense of anxiety whatsoever, and the overly-curvaceous violin theme seemed quite out of place.

The minuet, too, fared badly, for the central trio was totally alienated by barely perceptible luftpausen and a fermated downbeat that simply did not belong. The concluding presto movement was better in comparison, but still nothing special.

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER
Friday, July 11, 1969

SOPRANO. Beverly Sills, the much-publicized diva of the New York City and Vienna State Operas, sings with the Boston Symphony tomorrow at 8 p.m. when it presents Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" in the Music Shed at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Other singers are George Shirley and Jerold Siena.

CHRONICLE
HAMDEN, CONN.
WEEKLY 7,800

JUL 10 1969 New England

TANGLEWOOD

The second weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., opens Friday at 9 P.M. with Music Director Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four suites of Bach, the first time Leinsdorf has programmed the in a single concert. The Bost Symphony concert is preceded 7 P.M. by the Weekend Prelu

HERALD
CRANSTON, R. I.
WEEKLY 7,700

JUL 10 1969 New England

Tanglewood Concerts Scheduled

The following concerts are scheduled for the weekend at the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.:

Friday, July 11, 7 p.m. — Weekend Prelude: JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN, violinist; JULES ESKIN, cellist, performing Bach's "Unaccompanied Suite for Cello" and "Sonata #3 for Violin Alone." 9 p.m. in the Shed — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA in the fourt suites of Bach, conducted by ERICH LEINSDORF.

Saturday, July 12, 10:30 a.m. in the Shed — BSO Open Rehearsal. 8 p.m., Shed — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA in Graff's "Symphony for Strings," Bach's "Triple Concerto" with Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Joseph Silverstein, and Robert Levin; Handel's "Concerto Grosso" opera 6, #1, and Mozart's "Linz Symphony" all conducted by DAVID ZINMAN.

INDEPENDENT
LITTLETON, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,250

JUL 10 1969

SHODE ISLAND PENDULUM
EAST GREENWICH, R. I.
WEEKLY 3,210

JUL 10 1969

ASSABET VALLEY BEACON
MAYNARD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,950

JUL 10 1969

TIMES
NEW MILFORD, CO
WEEKLY 5,566

JUL 10 1969

RIDGEWOOD, N
HERALD-NEWS
W. 13,000

JUL 10 1969

CITIZEN
SUDBURY, MASS
WEEKLY 1,975

JUL 10 1969

Bach to Feature Second Weekend at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The second weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens on Friday evening, July 11 at 9 p.m. with Music Director Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the four suites of Bach, the first time Mr. Leinsdorf has programmed them in a single concert. The 9 p.m., Boston Symphony concert is preceded at 7 p.m. by the Weekend Prelude, in which the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, and principal cellist, Jules Eskin, will play two Bach compositions for unaccompanied strings.

On Saturday evening, July 12, Erich Leinsdorf conducts a complete concert performance in German of Mozart's opera "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Beverly Sills sings the role of Constanze, George Shirley is Belmonte, and Anne Elgar, Jerold Siena, and Raymond Michalski sing the other principal parts. The Tanglewood Choir also participates. This is the first of two complete concert operas Erich Leinsdorf has programmed for the Berkshire Festival this season. The other is Verdi's "Otello," on Saturday, July 26.

David Zinman, the young American conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, returns to Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon, July 13 at 2:30. As he did in his first appearance with the Boston Symphony last summer, he will conduct a program of music for chamber orchestra, including Mozart's 'Linz' symphony, works by Graaf and Handel, and Bach's Triple concerto in A minor with soloists Doriot Anthony Dwyer, Principal flutist of the Boston Symphony, Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, and harpsichordist Robert Levin.

The weekend's Open Rehearsal is Saturday morning, July 12 at 10:30.

Nashoba Free Press
Nashoba, N.H.

July 10, 1969

POST GAZETTE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 21,500

JUL 11 1969 New England

BETHEL HOME NEWS
BETHEL, CONN.
WEEKLY CONN. 1,820

JUL 9 1969 New England

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

FREE PRESS
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

JUL 9 1969

JUL 10 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

JUL 10 1969

BEVERLY SILLS, one of world's leading sopranos, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday at Tanglewood in Mozart's "The Abduction of the Seraglio."

38a

BOSTON SUNDAY ADVERTISER, JULY 13, 1969

Abduction' Overture Unique

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

In his study of "Mozart's Operas," Edward Dent concludes his chapter on "The Abduction from the Seraglio" saying that this 1782 Singspiel is considered a great opera chiefly because so many operas unquestionably great flowed from Mozart's pen. That Dent seems to concur with this statement is regrettable, for 'The Abduction' — I'm tempted to say 'obviously' —is not a great opera; at the most elementary level, its libretto is worthless (except as it served as creative prod) and its musical structure is primitive, though many of the pieces are in their ways exceptional.

On the stage, 'Abduction' must work poorly, and so it was fortunate that the Tanglewood performance recently by Erich Leinsdorf was a concert version.

★

Let's start with the overture; the quality of its musical stuff is not nearly as distinguished as that of later Mozartian overtures, and formally its ABA pattern looks plain, indeed. But by the simplest stroke, the use of the tune heard in the contrasting mid-section as the first aria, Mozart binds this overture more tightly to the drama itself than he does the overture of any other opera. What we hear is this: ABA'B', and it's unique in all Mozart.

When one thinks of 'The Abduction,' the coloratura aria "Martern aller Arten" comes first to mind, and it's a shame, for though the piece is full of bravura and vocal fireworks, it's properly a concert aria (and one far less fine than Mozart's other pieces of this sort).

★

But even if the aria is atypical of the opera, it remains the only such work Mozart ever wrote for the dramatic stage. As Dent notes, Mozart here took his model from the instrumental concerto inverting the customary situation where we find the sole instrumental music based on vocal models. The aria begins with an extended exposition for four solo instruments: flue, oboe, violin and cello and only after 60 measures (which defy stage action) does the voice enter.

Of primary interest are these obbligato parts, for although the piece has some fancy fioratura, it is formally square (like the overture, ABA'B', but without the dramatic justification for its form that the overture provides) and harmonically tame, an overrated, albeit exciting piece.

With so little space left, I would only mention that gem of a drinking song, "Vivat Bachus," and note that its opening gesture of sequential arpeggiated descent is essentially that of the more famous Champagne aria' ('Fin ch'han dal vino") sung by Don Giovanni, and I'd also call attention to Pedrille's song "In Möhrenland," with its modal, slightly exotic flavor. This Romanze rests fragilely suspended between D Major and B Minor, striking a magic balance singular not here alone but in all of Mozart's opera, and offering one of the many sound reasons for knowing this score.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 12 1969

Bach's Fans Given Royal Treat Of Four Suites at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Bach's loyal fans were given a sumptuous serving of their favorite food Friday night at Tanglewood. All four of the orchestral suites were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf's direction.

Life of Its Own

One of them, No. 3 in D Major, has one of the world's most famous melodies . . . the second section is called "Air for the G String."

It floated across the damp green grass with the most wondrous grace and beauty . . . magical . . . as if it had a life of its own which, after all these years, I guess, it does.

Doriot Anthony Dwyer was soloist for the Suite No. 2, which has several passages for solo flute. She is the orchestra's first flutist and acquited herself with skill and daring as well as lyrical fluidity.

Orchestra Real Star

But as skillful as the occasional soloists were (including Robert Levin with the harpsichord during No. 3) the real star with music of this style must be the orchestra.

Friday night the relentless pulse of Bach's rhythms were as inevitable as the sum and the sublety of the internal accents were as caressing as a spring breeze.

This combination of stability and sensitivity is essential with Bach and it is rare because many orchestras lose the sensitivity in their pursuit of the stability.

4576 On Hand

Boston achieved the balance Friday as if it were easy. There were 4576 there to hear it.

All four of them were characterized by a nimble neat, compact, pliant ensemble sound. It's difficult to remember a summer when the Boston string section has sounded cleaner and more luminous.

The suites that opened the program were without solo passages such as those given the flute in No. 2 and the harpsichord in No. 3; but there were a pair of oboes in No. 1 that kept welling up with friendly melodies, and the 38 musicians in the opening No. 1 were joined for No. 4 by three trumpeters and a kettledrummr who added a bit of muscle here and there to augment the upper dynamic levels.

Most Bach students believe the four suites were written when he was at Cothen between 1717 and 1722 (age 32-38) where he wrote many of his most famous orchestral works including the Brandenburg concertos.

For Little Orchestra

They were written for a little orchestra of 16 to 24 players, half the size of the Boston contingent. For 20th-century ears however, it is difficult to imagine this music sounding more satisfying than it did Friday night.

Weekend Prelude

The program for the weekend prelude, which began at 7, offered a couple of fascinating works appreciated most by Bach's special fans, and by those who have an extra affinity for solo strings.

The Sonata No. 3 in C for unaccompanied violin was played by Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster and the Suite No. 5 in C Minor for unaccompanied cello was played by Jules Eskin, the orchestra's first cellist.

Both Eskin and Silverstein approached this incredibly difficult music with aplomb and technical mastery. They tended to favor the musical aspects rather than the opportunities for technical display, and the result was Bach with warmth and dulcet flexibility.

The cello piece seemed, Friday at least, more attractive than that for the violin, probably because it offered many more lyrical melodies and many fewer complex passages of double - stopped, semi - fugues.

Tonight the orchestra, five vocal soloists, a narrator, and the Tanglewood Choir will present a concert version of Mozart's first, big commercially successful opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio."

Disciples of Bach Are Given Treat At Berkshire 'Connoisseur' Program

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX —Boston Symphony and conductor Erich Leinsdorf opened the Berkshire Music Festival's second weekend on Friday night with the summer's most "connoisseur" program.

It consisted of the four Bach suites.

A fair percentage of the music public shies away from abundant Bach. There were 4,576 intent baroque disciples at Tanglewood for the Bach.

Actually it would take nothing more than the air from Suite No. 3 to settle that Bach could write even spiritual melody with romantic overtones.

Leinsdorf gave the four suites his intellectual advantage. For the most part, the orchestra obliged with beautifully clear enunciation.

The suites could easily have sounded like slightly contrasted products from the same loom. To some, this may have been the surface impression. But variegated traits were uncovered at the core of each suite, even in the French-styled overtures of the first two.

While a little grit sometimes seeps into the tone of the Boston Symphony strings, the sound more frequently has unparalled richness.

Maintaining unblemished articulation in these suits is like walking a high wire. Everything depends on practical tempos, plentiful cues, and perpetual alertness.

The only glaring instance of impractical tempo was in the overture to Suite No. 1 that opened the program. Symmetry of phrase was a little mangled, due obviously to an uncomfortable speed.

Sparkling Sound

Overall spectrum of the program was warm or sparkling sound, aliveness of spirit, decisive contrasts between dances and an academic rather than emotional approach.

A reduced orchestra of 35 players (the larger number were in Boston finishing up the Esplanade concerts) was a help to authenticity, as Bach's orchestra had about 22 players — so was the chordal background played on the harpsichord by Robert Levin.

Soloists, all first desk players with the orchestra, were not made to stand as previously but were seated with the [illegible] —even Doriot Anthony Dwyer, whose flute part in the second suite was concerto status. This made them contributors rather than spotlighted personalities.

A breakdown of each suite shows a profusion of assets and some imperfections.

Fine Work

In the first suite it was the high spirit and freedom of the forlane, also fine work by oboes and bassoons in the bourree.

Outstanding features of the fourth suite were stateliness of the overture and marvelous playing by strings and brasses in rejouissance of "rejoicing".

Mrs. Dwyers's technique was fluent and easy-going in the second suite. Her flute tone had crystaline purity and consistent strength throughout long phrases, sprinkled with ornaments.

Orchestral spark was dimmed in the overture of the third suite, except for concertmaster Joseph Silverstein's agile solo.

Soloists for the weekend prelude were Silverstein in Bach's unaccompanied violin Sonata No. 3 in C Major, and Jules Eskin in Bach's cello Suite No. 5 in C Minor, also unaccompanied.

PROGRAM

(All Bach)
Suite No. 1 in C Major
Suite No. 4 in D Major
Suite No. 2 in B Minor

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 13 1969 N Eng

18th-Century Music Still Much Alive

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — According to 39,203 persons who attended the first two weekends of Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, music of the 18th century is more alive and magnetic than ever.

Second weekend brought 18,368 to hear Bach, Mozart and their all-but-forgotten contemporary, Christian Ernst Graaf.

Two-thirds of the Boston Symphony's 105 players have been playing the Esplanade concerts in Boston. The past Friday and Saturday nights, the orchestra of 35 was conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Conductor yesterday afternoon was David Zinman of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra.

Mozart Opera

The much-heralded performances of Mozart's opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio," Saturday night was interesting for the most part, exciting in spots. But it was hardly an operatic triumph.

It was done in concert form, in German, with Beverly Sills as Constanze to provide the most memorable moments.

The Music Shed's marvelous acoustics wasn't enough to negate the effect of a little gem being displayed in a huge setting.

Leinsdorf set debatable tempos, dictated to singers as well as orchestra. But, he was also quite magnificent in preventing orchestral domination.

Soloists sang from a platform above chorus and orchestra. They were in formal attire and used modified dramatic action.

Relevant Satire

The audience was kept informed of developments by narrator Mac Morgan in a masterpiece of relevant satire prepared by Andrew Raeburn.

Applause after each aria and commentary interruptions gave the impression of a song recital with orchestral accompaniment and interludes.

Miss Sills was a coloratura wizard as the demure harem employe. George Shirley sometimes sang well as Belmonte (Constanze's passionate lover) — in spots he was pretty tepid.

Jerold Siena. (Pedrillo) and Raymond Michalski (Osmin) were effective enough except for weak low ranges. Anne Elgar was a dexterous soprano as Blonde (Constanze's servant) but a stridency marred the effect of her technique.

Tanglewood Choir

The Tanglewood Choir of 20 mixed voices matched their patience in long, silent interludes with brilliant ensemble sound when opportunities arrived.

Many impressive things were heard, vocally and instrumentally, but Mozart's "Abduction" is pretty barren without the fixings of an operatic production.

Zinman, the conductor, is a joy to hear and an irritation to watch.

One of the allegros from Handel's Concerto Grosso in G major reflected some of the most enlightened direction and polished playing of this festival, so far.

The same can be said of the final two movements of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony.

Zinman's picturesque style contains most of the garden-variety gimmicks — sweeping gestures, crouching, swaying, and a little bit of ballet.

A Poor Choice

The Graaf symphony was a poor choice. It's a work of lightweight value with pretty themes, a saccharine slow movement, and prancing finale.

It had every advantage of good performance.

Yesterday's jewel was Bach's Concerto in A minor for flute violin and harpsichord.

Harpsichordist Robert Levin achieved some kind of stardom with a brilliant technique, solid rhythmic force, and intended domination over the ensemble.

Other Soloists

Fellow soloists were Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute.

PROGRAMS
(Saturday Night)

Abduction from the Seraglio, K.384 — Mozart
Belmonte — George Shirley
Pedrillo — Jerold Siena
Osmin — Raymond Michalski
Constanze — Beverly Sills
Blonde — Anne Elgar
Chorus of Janissaries — Tanglewood Choir
Narrator — Mac Morgan

(Sunday Afternoon)

Symphony in C major, Opus 40, No. 4 — Graaf
Concerto in A minor for harpsichord violin, and flute — Bach
Concerto Grosso in G major, Opus 6, No. 1 — Handel
Symphony No. 36 in C major, K.425, "Linz" — Mozart

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 14 1969

At Tanglewood

Beverly Sills Is True Heroine In Mozart Opera Offering

LENOX — Mozart's "The Abduction From the Seraglio" is a good kind of opera to put on the concert stage . . . if you can get the singers to do it.

Frothy Comedy

Saturday night at Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra had Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Raymond Michalski and Jerold Siena with the 30 voices of the Tanglewood Choir.

The story is a frothy comedy, and the music has abstract beauty far beyond the demands of the plot. Some of it is exceedingly difficult to sing.

Sills was the Star Saturday, as she has been on occasion in most of the world's opera houses — especially with the New York City Opera, where she is a regular performer.

Shouts of Approval

She was Constanze, the heroine, and she sang with heroic vocal production. The incredibly difficult aria, "Martren Aller Artern," with which she wound up the first half of the concert, brought prolonged shouts of approval from the audience.

Her control of tone and note articulation was phenomenal, and the warmth and depth of her emotional expression were full and beautiful. She is still my favorite soprano.

The others on the wide platform high on stage behind the choir, where they could move about with modified dramatic action, also captured the audience's fancy . . . especially Miss Elgar, whose soprano was clear and pearly and neatly projected.

Audience Informed

At stage left was a grandiose podium behind which stook Mac Morgan, whose amplified voice narrated a whimsical condensation of plot developments between the arias prsented by orchestra and soloists.

Thus the audience was fully informed of the status of the action, which takes place in Turkey in and around the palace of Pasha Selim.

Composed as Entertainment

The opera was sung in German which, obliquely, is a testament to the quality of Mozart's music. It was written, as Broadway musicals are written today, to make money in the open entertainment market.

Consequently, it was built on a story of broad, farcical humor and couched in vernacular language. The success of the opera, and it was highly successful from the start, was entirely dependent upon the claity of the dialague.

The audience had to know what was going on. Now, almost exactly 187 years later in America, this foolish play is being listened to abstractly, without literal understanding, for the purity of its music.

Double Triangle

But for the record, here is what is going on: Three foreigners are held captive by a Turkish nobleman, Pasha Selim — Constanze, a Spanish lady, Blonde, her English maid; Pedrillo, formerly the servant of a Spanish nobleman, Belmonte. The only other major character is Osmin, the Pasha's overseer.

The Pasha and Belmonte love Constanze; Osmin and Pedrillo love Blonde; Blonde loves Pedrillo, and Constanze loves Belmonte. So Belmonte and Pedrillo conspire to rescue (abduct) their ladies from the harem (seraglio).

One of the funniest scenes occurs when Pedrillo get Osmin one reason why "The Abdrunk and wheels him out in a wheelbarrow. Another involves the confusion when the ladies are being rescued.

This plot skeleton indicates reason why "The Abduction" is not considered grand opera. It falls into that delightful classification called singspiel.

Saturday afternoon, as the sun shyly emerged from the aftermath of a morning downpour, a couple of hundred listeners showed up in the theater to hear the 41-member string orchestra of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute.

There were 20 violins, six violas, seven cellos, four doublebasses, two oboes and two horns, all 18 or younger. They played one of Mozart's youthful symphonies, No. 29, (K. 201), 27 minutes, with creditable skill under the direction of Roman Totenberg.

It wasn't the most immaculate of ensembles, but its intonation was comfortable, its gentle tone pleasant and its breadth of expression wider than expected.

The orchestra was followed by a woodwind quintet from the college chamber music program of the BU institute. It played Irving Fine's "Partita for Wind Quintet", a difficult, 17-minute 20th Century work which opens with an acrid, puckering flavor.

The fourth movement seemed most interesting of the five. It was loosely structured, highly contrapuntal and full of off-beat combinations of tone colors and melodic fragments.

This afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra program of 18th-Century music will be conducted by David Zinman, regular conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra.

He studied at the Berkshire Music Center and later with Pierre Monteux and the University of Minnesota. He was a guest conductor at Tanglewood last summer.

His program will include Christian Ernst Graaf's Symphony in C; Bach's Concerto for Flute, Violin and Harpsichord, Handel's No. 1 Concerto Grosso from Opus 6, and Mozart's 'Linz' 'symphony (K. 425).

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 13 1969

386

The Boston Globe — Monday, July 14, 1969

'The Abduction' in concert a petty crime

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

LENOX — The Berkshire Festival Saturday night presented a concert performance of Mozart's Abductions from the Seraglio and, on the whole, did a poor job of it. Anne Elgar and Jerold Siena, gave life and character to what they did as Blonde and Pedrillio; almost everything else was insipid. The Boston Symphony made exquisite sounds, and so, off and on did the singers; still, most of what Erich Leinsdorf's conducting produced was playing and singing that was all sense and no sensibility, all taste and no life, a textbook example of the boringly perfect and the perfectly boring.

The leading roles were taken by Beverly Sills and George Shirley. Miss Sills, as Constanze, sang with the virtuosity and taste one expects of her. On the other hand, her voice was rather beaty through much of the evening, and there was little variety in her singing and almost no verbal communication at all. Mr. Shirley, the Belmonte, is a cultivated musician, but his vocal production sounds so unnatural and makes him seem so uncomfortable that his singing gives small sensuous pleasure. Raymond Michalski is the sort of reliable bass who always makes a good impression as Ferrando or Sparafucile, but even though he has a certain charm, he lacks the artistic stature and personal force for Osmin, not to mention the low notes.

More than from the undistinguished singing and perhaps as much from the flaccid conducting, "The Abduction" suffered from what was done to it in order to adapt it for concert. To begin with, its three acts were changed to two, with an intermission after Constanze's most famous aria, "Martern Aller Arten." Mozart knew exactly what he was doing when he ended the first two acts with a trio and a quartet respectively.

They are texturally more elaborate than the music that precedes them, and they are clearly designed as structural climaxes. Stuck anyhow into the middles of acts, they not only lose their effect, but actually disturb the flow; moreover, "Martern Aller Arten" is not stuff of which finales are made. It has brilliance, but not the right weight.

The opera was sung in German, with spoken dialogue that connects the musical numbers being replaced by an English narration written by Andrew Raeburn and spoken by Mac Morgan. The very device proved a nuisance to "The Abduction" work in which Mozart was sometimes singularly ingenious in his ways of alternating music and talk.

To have Belmonte ask the unheeding Osmin questions between stanzas of their "Wer Ein Liebchen Hat Gefunden" is quite different from having the narrator stop the music, to explain that Belmonte now interrrupts and to tel what he says. The whispered dialogues of Belmonte and Pedrillio in the middle of Pedrillio's serenade continue the motion as well as interrupt it, but the alien voice of a non-participating narrator is only an interruption.

That that aspect of the narration was disturbing, its tone was infuriating. Insufferably cute at best, at its worst it misled the audience with its suggestion that the atimosphere of "The Abduction" is wholely unvaryingly frivolous. To hear the narrator tell it, you would suppose Belmonte's and Pedrillio's questioning of the women about their faithfulness to be funny. If, however, you listen to Mozart's music and you hear that slowing of pace and darkening of harmony when the joy of reunion gives way to the admission of doubt, you discover that there is nothing whatsoever funny about it.

Later, when the abduction plot has failed, with Constanze and Belmonte captured and believing themselves doomed, the narration prepared listeners fro mock pathos and camp.

Leinsdorf's Feeling For Opera Superb

The big event at Tanglewood in Lenox this weekend was a superbly sung and played Entfuhrung aus dem Serail. Erich Leinsdorf conducted Mozart's comic opera Saturday night in a concert version for which all of the spoken dialogue had been condensed into a part for narrator by the Boston Symphony's program annotater, Andrew Raeburn.

There are almost enough advantages to doing the piece in this kind of adaptation to make worthwhile the sacrifice of sets and costumes. Entfuhrung is by far the least stageworthy of Mozart's well-known operas. Even a really successful performance with brilliant stage direction makes such exhorbitant demands upon a viewer's dredulity that one might just as well turn the thing into a comic oratorio—as Leinsdorf and Raeburn did.

The latter's text, as read by MacMorgan, provided unobstrusive continuity spiced with an original sense of humor. Raeburn's adaptation deserves special credit for motivating the climactic events of the opera more fully and convincingly than does Gottlieb Stephanie the Younger's clumsy libretto.

At the head of Leinsdorf's cast was Beverly Sills, who once again sang like a queen and even managed to convey some sense of nobility and suffering in the character of Constanze. Not surprisingly, Miss Sills' performance got most of the cheers.

Hardly less satisfying, however, were George Shirley and Raymond Michalski in the roles of Blemonte and Osmin respectively. Michalski had some difficulty projecting the lowest part of his range, but for the most part his sturdy, resonant bass voice and ample supply of buffo gestures portrayed a properly pathetic villain. Shirley sang accurantly and pleasingly, and if his characterization was less impressive, it was partly because Belmonte is really not called upon to do much more than simper.

CRAIG STINSON

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 14 1969

Leinsdorf's Baton Conducts Mozart

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Erich Leinsdorf presented a concert version of Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio" Saturday night, the first of two opera productions to be seen at Tanglewood during the conductor's final season as director of the Festival.

And there was an element of nostalgia on this occasion, for Leinsdorf was the conductor when I first heard the work many years ago when he led the NBC Symphony and singers from the New York City Opera in a production at the Stratford Theater. And once again he supplied exemplary support for the singers onstage.

Beverly Sills, who has become the darling of the vocal connoisseurs, was the Constanze and she brought her amazing technique and musicianship to the sometimes taxing music of this delightful score. Her big aria, "Martern aller Arten" was a tour de force, which she carried off with tremendous aplomb.

And George Shirley, who has become something of a Mozart specialist at the Met, was a worthy collaborator as Belmonde. His tasteful singing, his noble bearing, and dependable technique were welcome qualities. His big duet with Miss Sills was one of the vocal highlights of the whole production.

Raymond Michalski's Osmin was spirited but he lacked the lower voice to do justice to the music. And the extravagant gesturing did not make up for his vocal shortcomings.

If Blonde is little more than a stock character in this Mozart singspiel, Anne Elgar brought a warmth to her singing that almost convinced us otherwise. The Pedrillo of Jerold Siena was certainly adequate to the demands of the role.

The ensemble singing, which is always an integral element of any Mozart opera, came off extremely well under Leinsdorf's precise conducting. And the chorus, which has only a small contribution, sang in vibrant fashion.

Mac Morgan was the narrator for the opera, which was sung in the original German, and he drew more than a few chuckles with his satiric treatment of the story. Even the omnipresent thunder and lightning outside the Shed did not disturb the magic of Mozart and the high quality of this performance.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 422,300

JUL 14 1969 E

COMPROMISE PIECE

Leinsdorf Is at Best In Mozart Production

By GEORGE GELLES
MUSIC CRITIC

LENOX —It was to be expected that Tanglewood's production of "The Abduction From the Seraglio" would be a compromise of sorts, for the festival lacks the facilities to properly present Mozart's singspiel. But if a concert version it had to be, it should have been one without many of the senseless features of the reading we heard Saturday night though I should add immediately that for all its faults, "The Abduction" found Erich Leinsdorf at his very best.

To fit the piece into the festival framework the three acts were squashed to two and a break made after the areia "Marten Aller Arten." Doing this kept the keys of the boundry pieces of our first act consistent with Mozart's own — C Major at start and close — but it extended the opening to a ludicrous length — and ended the act dramatically on an impossible note.

Similarly with the second half; to conform to Mozart's original key scheme.

Leinsdorf moved the tenor aria "Ich Baue Ganz" from its spot at the start of Act 3 to the opening of Act 2 (in fact, the middle of Ac t2.) Though the second half began and ended as did Mozart's final act, there was serious distortion chiefly because the quartet composed to close Act 2, was reduced in dramatic importance and robbed of its structural significance. The entire reading, in fact, misrepresented Mozart's ideas of harmonic and formal logic and dramatic architecture.

We had, too, to listen to a deadly narration tell us before each piece what we were about to hear. Any silent solution would have been more satisfactory: a text inserted in the program books or a summary projected on a screen, or even vaudeville-type cards. As it was, the wordy narrator broke all feeling off musical and dramatic continuity and forced the piece to be ill-paced.

Having said all this, I must say that I've rarely heard Leinsdorf lead in a livlier, more heads-up manner. He was clearly engaged with the score, and his work was detailed and dramatically coherent. It was the words themselves I imagine, that led Leinsdorf to such nicely judged tempo, a hair's breadth away from ideal (usually the slightest shade slow). I only wish that the far more than average interest shown on the podium might have gotten a response from the orchestra, from the violins in particular, a little less lackluster.

Beverly Sills was why many people were there, and I'm afraid the fans were disappointed. Not that the Constanze of Miss Sills was ill-sung, for it wasn't, but her vocal brilliancy and smart sense of style counted for little, for it was impossible to get any great feeling of intimacy or sense of presence from the soloists perched in back of the orchestra. They were just too hard to hear.

And the most valuable lesson we might have learned — that Miss Sills is a soprano suited both dramatically and vocally for far more than the Italian bel canto that brought her fame — this lesson was all but lost in the shed.

The other singers, briefly: Goegre Shirley (Belmonte) was in poor voice; the warmth of his sound is becoming hazy, and above the staff things are unpleasantly strained. Anne Elagr (Blonde) seemed rarely to get into the part, but sang on top of the note with a hard, fragile sound; intonation was at times questionable in her lower register but I suspect she's better than Blonde let her show.

Jerold Siena (Pedrillo) was weak of voice and personality he has a small not unpleasant sound. But to judge from "In Mohrenland" his toughest test, he has neither the sensitivity nor musical intelligence to put it to best use.

And lastly, Raymond Michalski (Osmin) made a fine impression, with much dramatic sense and a strong, resonant voice, though one that needs to be kept in rein.

None of these people were heard to optimal advantage because of the neither-here-nor-there staging and I hope that Leinsdorf comes up with a better solution to his problem two weeks hence when he leads Verdi's 'Otello;' especially regrettable if Leinsdorf is in comparably fine form.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(M)152,525 (S) 198,160

JUL 14 1969 E

At Tanglewood

Levin's Harpsichord Notable As Zinman Conducts Bach

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — David Zinman, guest conductor, brought three pieces to Tanglewood Sunday afternoon that had never before been performed publicly by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Damp Crowd Cheers

One of them drew a few cheers from the 5006 listeners even though they were dampened by a light rain. It was Bach's little Concerto in A Minor for Flute, Violin and Harpsichord, a 24-minute, three-movement work of modest intent and sublime delight.

The first and third movements are busy, complex textures of liveliness; the middle is eight minutes of beautifully graceful lyricism for flute, violin and harpsichord alone.

The trio was accompanied during the first and third movements by only 14 strings from the orchestra.

Levin Breathtaking

Star of the ensemble was Robert Levin, harpsichordist, who was graduated from Harvard only last year. He was required to pour forth a vast multitude of notes at great speed.

He did it not only with accuracy, but also with expression. At least one pianist in the audience with eyes popping said he was thinking of taking up the guitar.

It is rare to hear cheering for Bach.

The only element marring the performance of this fascinating little concerto was the imbalance affecting the solo violin of Joseph Silverstein, he was heard less than needful.

The flute of Doriot Anthony Dwyer was clear and soft and nimbel and smiling.

Graaf Composition Lyrical

The 10-minute symphony that opened the program had two things of interest going for it:

One, it was composed by an 18th-century gentleman of deep obscurity, Christian Graaf, whose best claim to fame is that at age 40 he conducted a little orchestra which accompanied the 9-year-old prodigy Mozart; and two, its middle movement offered sounds of more than usual lyrical beauty.

After intermission the program offered the No. 1 Concerto Grosso of Handel's famous Opus 6 collection (surprisingly receiving its first performance by the Boston Orchestra) and Mozart's Symphony No. 36 (K. 425) "The Linz."

Both were neat, tidy and nice. In fact, there were moments when Zinman's direction of the Mozart symphony caused it to be almost too nice . . . sort of nicely-nicely.

Zinman Mannered

The symphony has a special place in history because of its having been composed in three days, copied for its parts in two days and rehearsed and performed publicly on the sixth day.

Zinman, the conductor, is 33, looks like 22. He is slender and boyish. His motion on the podium is precise and exacting with jerky movements during speedy music and wide, sweeping movements when the going is slower.

He tends toward studied mannerisms, and I have the feeling that, although at first sight his manner is impressive, it would become tiresome to watch repeatedly.

He is a skillful and talented conductor, nevertheless, and the music Sunday was far superior to the weather, which was cloudy and rainy.

* * *

Chamber Music

The 10 a. m. morning chamber music session drew more than 300 listeners in spite of the glowering clouds. The performers were members of the Berkshire Music Center's string quartet, a quintet of piano and strings, and a woodwind quintet.

Most impressive was the piano-strings quintet, partly because of its young members' musical maturity and professional assurance and partly because of the depth and substance of the Brahms Quintet for Piano and Strings in F Minor, Opus 34, which it played.

The quartet which opened the program seemed to be younger and less experienced. It played Mozart's Quartet in C Major (K. 465) with occasionally insecure intonation but with a nice, mellow coordination and an expressive spirit.

The wind quintet played a 19-minute piece for five wind instruments written in 1956 by Walter Piston. The opening was as sonorous as a brass quintet.

There were passages of pliant, lonely, wandering melodies, of quirky clusters, and overlapping strings of quick little notes. It is a dry and spicy piece.

Next weekend the full orchestra will be in residence, the free concerts on the Esplanade in Boston having come to an end at about the same time as the 18th-century chamber-orchestra programs at Tanglewood.

On schedule will be the music of a few Russians (Stravinsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofiev, and Tchaikovsky) a Pole, Scharwenka, and an Italian, Rossini.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 14 1969

38 c

Music Review

Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE HIGH POINT of the Second Berkshire Festival weekend and very likely one of the peaks of the current Tanglewood range was the opera, Mozart's "The Abduction From the Seraglio," performed in concert form Saturday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Tanglewood choir and a constellation of vocal soloists led with masterful and confident control by Erich Leinsdorf.

Using an orchestra of about half the total strength of the BSO, as is usual in these annual early two weeks of the festival, and with the chorus seated to the rear of the stage, the soloists provided with a raised platform to and from which they entered and left as the drama unfolded, and with a narrator at the left front of the stage, the "Abduction" proved to be a consistently absorbing and often brilliant evening.

* * *

THE LIBRETTO requires a bit of charitable tolerance but by means of the narration, clearly enunciated by Mac Morgan and meaningfully inflected, it became transparently coherent. The bright overture, with its unexpected contrasting second mood, leads directly into the aria "Here I may hope to find her" of Belmonte, the heroic Spanish nobleman, sung with superb vocalism if with subdued characterization by George Shirley. It would be a gross intrusion to ask how the hero arrived in the garden of the Pasha seeking his beloved with her maid and his own servant who had been captured by Turkish pirates and sold into slavery. Suffice it to say that Mozart contrived to allow all the principals adequate and often unforgettable opportunities for vocal display.

* * *

THE PASHA'S overseer, Osmin, is given some of the most memorable chances in opera for a clownish basso and they were grasped with full viscidity, both vocally and in role-depiction by Raymond Michalski. In turn, Konstanze, the heroine and the scintillating star of the evening, Beverly Sills, appears to sing her "Ah, I was in love, was so happy." Miss Sills is an imposing and dominant presence. She wore a light blue tightly-sleeved gown with a huge blonde coiffure complementing her striking physiognomy. Her powerful and far reaching soprano encompassed her first aria with ease and skill, eschewing any hint of asperity even in the most lofty reaches. Mozart himself was to marry his own and real, Constanze, just a few weeks after the first performance of this opera, in 1782, and one has long wondered if there was an added but concealed significance to the message the stage Konstanze here is allotted.

* * *

MISS SILLS was given a tremendous ovation on the completion of her aria, as happened on each of her succeeding opportunities, especially later in her "Marten aller Arten" ("Torture me and flay me"), the great show-piece in which four solo instruments added an obbligato support The noisy appreciation this aria invoked equaled those she has received in her international appearances, notably early in May in Milan where at La Scala she sang the leading female role in Rossini's "Siege of Corinth." Indeed, there is a great deal to be said for concert performances of coloratura roles for the action necessarily stops while the flourishes and roulades burst into flower and the dramatic artificiality is less apparent than in stage presentations.

* * *

NO LESS meritorious, by any means, were the achievements of the maid Blonde, sung with remarkable persuasion by Anne Elgar, and of Jerold Siena as Belmonte's servant, Pedrillo. The opera abounds in concerted numbers. At the moment Osmin was fulminating against the unresponsive Blonde a more perceptible manifestation of a threatening storm above reinforced his grumbling laments. But it passed quickly and the rain interfered scarcely at all with the performance—although it certainly did with the attendance. Had the weather been more favorable, the brilliant cast of soloists would certainly have drawn a much greater audience as the lawns were not tenanted at all Saturday night.

There are many instances of the injection of what was then accepted as Turkish music, a fad, evidently, of the period. The overture contains such references, the choruses by the janizaries, sung with thrust by the Tanglewood Choir prepared by Charles Wilson, have a momentary injection of such a spirit, and the lovely aria allotted to Pedrillo and so well sung by Siena has an accompaniment by strings only played pizzicato throughout.

The opera, normally in three acts, was compressed into two. The outstanding aria of Shirley's, "When tears of joys flow," was transferred in the condensation but fortunately was not decimated in its appeal nor its entreating deliverance.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT Leinsdorf played the four Bach orchestral suites, an unusual offering. One might theoretically question the validity of such menus and ask whether a more balanced meal might not have been wiser instead of concentration solely on desserts, but the audience's reaction dispelled any such doubts. The "Badinerie," the playful banter with which the B Minor Suite ends, has become by usage close to a Tanglewood theme song. It is a pity the musical encyclopedias do not record the dedication of this movement to the Boston orchestra's outstanding flute soloist, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, so great a triumph does she always achieve on its repetition. The Anhalt-Cothen master could not have had anyone more worthy in mind.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 14 1969

* * *

YESTERDAY AFTERNOON a guest conductor, David Zinman, who made such a splendid impression on his initial appearance at Tanglewood last year, was again given a program. It was entirely for strings except the final number, the Mozart C Major Symphony, No. 36, (K. 425) known as "The Linz," and here Zinman gave an affectionate and warming performance.

The "Linz" is of the year following the opera heard on the previous evening. After the deliberate introduction, Mozart moves on into an allegro which Zinman, to our great pleasure, took with a relaxed tempo. It fitted the mood beautifully and was doubly justified by the juxtaposition of the presto finale which demonstrated that tempo is a substantial ingredient of a symphony. He gave character, too, to the andante and in the Landler-type minuet was fortified by the lovely solos of oboist Gomberg and bassonist Walt.

* * *

A NOVELTY opened the Sunday afternoon concert. A symphony by Christian Ernst Graaf, a man of some importance in Haydn's day but now unsung, was unearthed and proved to be extremely enjoyable. Zinman gave the first movement a champagne sparkle and the last a gay and pleasant lilt.

The Bach A Minor Concerto for Flute, Violin and Harpsichord was a paradoxical disaster. It was a pity that such beautiful music was conveyed to the audience through the wrong end of the telescope. A minimal support of the soloists was held in tight restraint but even though the harpsichord was allowed a microphone, it was almost inaudible except in the cadenza of the final coda in which Robert Levin played as a virtuoso. This is not suitable to be played under such ungrateful conditions.

Rain Dampens Tanglewood Gate

The rainy weekend held the Tanglewood gate down to 18,368 patrons. Friday night's concert drew 4,576, the Saturday morning rehearsal 2,004, Saturday night 6,782 and Sunday afternoon 5,006. Shed attendance held normal for the weekend, but few cared to sit on the wet lawn.

Wide-awake Music

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. David Zinman conducting Graaf: Symphony in C. Op. 40. No. 4; Bach: Concerto in A minor. BWV 1044, with Robert Levin, harpsichord, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, and Joseph Silverstein, violin; Handel: Concerto grosso in G. Op. 6, No. 1, with Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Krips, violins, and Jules Eskin, cello; and Mozart: Symphony No. 36 in C. K. 425, "The Linz." Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood.

LENOX — Sunday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood was conducted by David Zinman, a 33-year-old American who is now Szymon Goldberg's successor as music director of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra.

Zinman is very good indeed — musical, completely natural, assured, efficient, even pleasant to watch. I did not hear his concert at Tanglewood last Summer, but it was partly because of the enthusiasm of some of the Boston Symphony players then that I took pains not to miss him this year. At some point in Mozart's "Linz" symphony I suddenly thought: "Wow, what a good orchestra!"

What had struck me was that the playing was wide awake. There was a beautifully finished surface, and that is not uncommon with the Boston Symphony, but there was animation in the lines, too, and that made it really beautiful.

Zinman seems a low-pressure sort of musician. The inflexions of line, the variations in rhythm and pace are gentle and understated. His interpretation have little bite, but much grace. And there is that unaffectedness, that natural response to what is happening in the music that is rare and very precious indeed.

Like the music itself, the playing, when he conducts, is always a bit different and fresh.

The finale of the "Linz," with the difference between the urgent, excited sense of "Presto" in the scurrying eighth notes at the beginning and the playing of the second subject in which whole measures became mere beats within great macro-measures confidently striding along, was a wonderful example of the sort of vital music-making one hardly ever encounters, and least of all, it seems, from the Mozart specialists.

Zinman's program included a C major symphony by Christian Ernst Graaf, Bach's A minor Triple Concerto, the first Concerto grosso in Handel's Op.6, and the "Linz."

Graaf (or Graf or Graff) was a German contemporary of Haydn's who emigrated to Holland, where he acquired the second A. The three-movement C major symphony that Zinman brought with him is one of six published in London in 1775, with neat, delightful quick movements, and a slow movement with an affecting touch of 18th century "Empfindsamkeit" and really something a bit special.

That it had not been played by the Boston Symphony before is not surprising, but neither had the Bach or the Handel.

Bach's A minor Concerto, with a showy harpsichord part and somewhat more reticent ones for flute and violi is something of a rarity, being musically rather difficult and not nearly as sure-fire as the Brandenburg for the same combination.

It gets more interesting as it goes along, moving from a somewhat stiff Allegro (taken just a nail slowly Sunday), through a lovely Adagio (transcribel from the D minor organ Sonata), to a really splendid finale. astonishingly inventive thinking for instruments.

Unobtrusive and subtle though this side of the work is, it is full of instances of The use of pizzicato in the orchestra, so rare in Bach, is a special pleasure. I did feel that the work is more suited to the chamber than to the Berkshire Circus Maximus, but the performance was admirable in its super-refined way, with faultlessly sensitive solo playing by harpsichordist Robert Levin, flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, and violinist Joseph Silverstein.

The Handel Concerto, a fine piece, went well, too, with some inventive and attractive solo contributions by Joseph Silverstein and some fine phrasing of the cello sololine by Jules Eskin.

To return for a moment to Mr. Zinman, I think he is stronger at classical music than at Baroque, but the whole concert gave quite uncommon pleasure.

It occurs to me that one aspect of this gifted young conductor's education has been overlooked: evidently nobody has ever told him that Mozart is difficult.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 15 1969

N
Eng

38d

Music Mt., Red Fox And Tanglewood Reviewed

The Sound of Music

Outdoor Weekend Of Bach And Mozart

BEVERLY SILLS AND GEORGE SHIRLEY appeared Saturday at Tanglewood in the Boston Symphony Orchestra production of Mozart's Opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Miss Sills, a native New Englander, resides in Milton.

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — The opening weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival was all Mozart. Bach and Mozart shared the second weekend, continuing the Tanglewood tradition, with the major offering a concert version of Mozart's comic opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio," directed by Erich Leinsdorf on Saturday night.

"Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail", as this opera is known in German, is overshadowed by the likes of "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro," but is not as submerged in the repertory as "La Clemenza di Tito" or "Idomeneo." Hindered by flabby plot and text and characters who don't amount to much — except for Osmin and Blonde — "Die Entfuehrung" nevertheless has music of great charm and not a little inspiration.

The Tanglewood version, on a rainy evening punctuated by thunderstorms, followed the pattern Leinsdorf has established here: narration filling in the action, and the singers appearing on platforms behind the orchestra. Andrew Raeburn's narration, spoken by Mac Morgan, replaced the German dialogue and also interrupted the musical continuity.

Bouncy Mood

Leinsdorf was in a bouncy mood on the podium — and he had reason to be exultant. Both playing and conducting were superb — light and frothy from the first downbeat. Many delicious details of the score were happily realized, and the accompaniment to the arias was meticulously prepared.

Most of the singing hit the same artistic plane: George Shirley, in splendid lyric voice as Belmonte, fluent in Mozart's long sustained lines and assured in delivery; Beverly Sills, the Constanze, stunning in a blue gown and equally lovely in voice and command of Mozartian style, phrasing and coloratura demands; Raymond Michalski, a firm bass with the range and comic flair for Osmin; Anne Elgar, another attractive red head with posed production and intelligent vocalism in her solo and ensemble contributions as Blonde; and Jerold Siena, a light-voiced tenor in the smaller role of Pedrillo.

In all, a delightful production appreciated by a gathering of 6,782.

For Sunday afternoon's program, David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, returned for his second guest appearance on the Tanglewood podium for a concert emphasizing the baroque.

Zinman, a former student at Tanglewood and assistant to Pierre Monteux, is a redoubtable baroque interpreter. Sharply attired in white jacket, blue shirt and trousers, the 33-year-old dark-haired conductor trimmed down the BSO ensemble to true chamber proportions, getting a translucent string sound and using crisp rhythms and abrupt shifts of dynamics to good effect.

Pleasant

Christian Ernst Graaf's pleasant Symphony in C, Opus 40, No. 4, set the pace on a drizzly afternoon which kept the audience down to 5,006. Graaf (ca. 1726-1802) was a German who made his mark in Holland, where he conducted The Hague orchestra for the young Mozart and his sister in 1766. The rhythmic drive, the careful shaping of phrases, and the care to let the music breathe were elements of Zinman's direction also to be savored in Handel's Concerto Grosso in F, Opus 6, No. 1.

On even a smaller sound-scale was J. S. Bach's Concerto in A minor for flute, violin and harpsichord for which flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, violinist Joseph Silverstein and harpsichordist Robert Levein were soloists. This is delicate chamber music, suited for a salon, but perhaps not so ideal for the 6,000-seat shed at Tanglewood. One suspects the dainty sounds did not carry well to the lawn.

Acoustics aside, the performance was admirable, the concertino being backed by an appropriately small cluster of string players — a pleasing contrast to the usual mega-Bach here. Levin's harpsichord work — or rather, workout — was a dynamic display of keyboard virtuosity.

Zinman also is a nifty interpreter of Mozart, in this case the "Linz" Symphony No. 36 in C, K. 425. He is inclined to be less severe, less hurried, softer and warmer than Leinsdorf, yet brings a similar feeling for line and clarity of detail. Agile, alert and quick of gesture, David Zinman should be added to the list of gifted young conductors.

Misty Evening

Friday night's Bach concert, on a misty evening before 4,576 patrons, illustrated the kind of programming a summer festival can offer as Leinsdorf led the four orchestral suites. These regal scores, with their series of courtly French dances, are seldom performed in one chunk. Yet they provide enough variety for a satisfying program: Nos. 3 and 4 in a festive scoring with trumpets and timpani; No. 2, for solo flute and strings; No. 1, for string orchestra with oboe and bassoon concertino.

Unfortunately, the performances were less festive and sometimes downright messy. Leinsdorf is a consummate musician of considerable versatility, but he is not intimately tuned in to the baroque. The main deficit is in the lack of a true baroque beat, especially in its contrapuntal applications. If the parts wending their separate but interelated ways do not have their own decisive rhythmic impulse, the result can be shapeless and seemingly chaotic — even when the correct notes are played.

This is what happened all too often Friday night, usually in the overtures. The counterpoint needed more rhythmic bite against the main melodic flow — the celli and basses were rumbling soft in this regard — and the phrasing often lacked a point.

In the Suite No. 3 in D which concluded the program, this flaw was not as apparent — aside from the overture which was taken at a very fast pace and had little profile — and this suite was over-all the most successful, ending in a splendid blaze of trumpets. The famous Air, too, was beautifully played (though more emphasis could have been given to the bass part), with graceful phrasing and lovely upper string work.

Flute Work

Suite No. 2, in B minor opened in an unsettled way, but subsequently had the benefits of Doriot Anthony Dwyer's fine flute work — including a rapid will-o'-the-wisp Badinerie — and Leinsdorf's correct timing of the appoggiature. Nos. 1 and 4 had few bright spots, excepting the oboes in the concertino portions of No. 1. For once, the harpsichord was audible, and Robert Levin's continuo work was neatly accomplished.

Bach also was featured in the weekend prelude, when cellist Jules Eskin and violinist Joseph Silverstein, first-desk players in the BSO, performed solo string works. Eskin played the Suite No. 5 in c minor, and Silverstein, the Sonata No. 3 in C — receiving an ovation for his performance of the second movement fugue.

Friday, July 11
By D. D.

A damp, rainy evening undoubtedly kept many away from Tanglewood this evening, and from a rather unique program offering, the four Orchestral Suites by J.S. Bach. Devoid of sacred content and intended as a sort of divertissement, these works are made up of numerous and varied short movements, the majority of which are festive in mood, lively in rhythm, and full of pleasant surprises. In performing them Mr. Leinsdorf laid heavy stress on the rhythmic, dance-like elements of the many bourees and rondes; even the slow introductory sections, which are most frequently given ponderous and solemn treatment, moved with rather startling rapidity, detracting somewhat from the following allegros which, by way of contrast were taken at break-neck speed.

Plaudits go to Doriot Anthony Dwyer for impressive solo flute work in the third Suite. The orchestra playing was, as usual, about as near to perfection as one can get, whether it be ensemble effect or remarkable precision of detail. Noteworthy was the deft handling by the brass of dangerous high passages in the Second Suite. Leinsdorf's reading of these seldom played masterpieces was, original and exciting.

Saturday, July 12
By A. C. S.

A Mozart opera, this time an unfamiliar one, "The Abduction from the Serglio," was the work chosen for this weekend of concerts at Tanglewood. This is music that is obviously close to the heart of Leinsdorf and at which he excels.

With one exception, he assembled an enviable cast. George Shirley sang the part of Belmonte with a melting tenor voice. From his opening notes he was completely in character and met the difficulties of bel canto singing from start to finish. The weak link vocally, to my mind, was Jerold Siena who sang the role of Pedrillo.

The great drawing card of the evening was Beverly Sills who has gained an illustrious reputation in recent years. Her appearance on stage was enough to generate applause. Her singing is flawless and seemingly effortless. No roulade is too difficult, no phrase too long, nor a nuance too minute to escape her attention. This is an artist who equals, if not excels, any competition.

A joy for this reviewer was the singing of a young lady he had not previously heard. This was Anne Elgar who sang the part of Blonde. Full voiced and attractive, she was vocally and dramatically perfect for the part. Mac Morgan was a winning narrator.

The guiding force was was Leinsdorf whose tempi, shading, and general control of all elements was superb.

Sunday, July 13
By S. L.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a program predominantly of chamber music this Sunday at Tanglewood under the baton of guest conductor, David Zinman. Mr. Zinman is currently the conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. The opening work was the Symphony in C, op. 40, no. 4 by a German composer who later settled in Holland, Christian Ernst Graaf. Although played with the orchestra's usual precision, this rather uninspiring work seemed to lack gusto. The high point of the concert was Bach's Concerto in A minor, BWV 1044, for flute, violin and harpsichord. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, was the violinist: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute of the BSO played the flute part. Top honors go to the harpsichordist, Robert Levin, a recent graduate from Harvard, who has performed on numerous occasions with the symphony. Mr. Levin played the treacherously difficult runs and trills with clarity and gave a very original performance.

Next on the program was Handel's Concerto Grosso in G op. 6 no. 1, written for two violins, cello and harpsichord. This five movement concerto was a letdown after the Bach. The closing Mozart's Symphony no. 36 lacked Leinsdorf's exciting interpretation.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(□) 66,387

JUL 15 1969

38d

Music Mt., Red Fox And Tanglewood Reviewed

The Sound of Music

Outdoor Weekend Of Bach And Mozart

BEVERLY SILLS AND GEORGE SHIRLEY appeared Saturday at Tanglewood in the Boston Symphony Orchestra production of Mozart's Opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio." Miss Sills, a native New Englander, resides in Milton.

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — The opening weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival was all Mozart. Bach and Mozart shared the second weekend, continuing the Tanglewood tradition, with the major offering a concert version of Mozart's comic opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio," directed by Erich Leinsdorf on Saturday night.

"Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail", as this opera is known in German, is overshadowed by the likes of "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro," but is not as submerged in the repertory as "La Clemenza di Tito" or "Idomeneo." Hindered by flabby plot and text and characters who don't amount to much — except for Osmin and Blonde — "Die Entfuehrung" nevertheless has music of great charm and not a little inspiration.

The Tanglewood version, on a rainy evening punctuated by thunderstorms, followed the pattern Leinsdorf has established here: narration filling in the action, and the singers appearing on platforms behind the orchestra. Andrew Raeburn's narration, spoken by Mac Morgan, replaced the German dialogue and also interrupted the musical continuity.

Bouncy Mood

Leinsdorf was in a bouncy mood on the podium — and he had reason to be exultant. Both playing and conducting were superb — light and frothy from the first downbeat. Many delicious details of the score were happily realized, and the accompaniment to the arias was meticulously prepared.

Most of the singing hit the same artistic plane: George Shirley, in splendid lyric voice as Belmonte, fluent in Mozart's long sustained lines and assured in delivery; Beverly Sills, the Constanze, stunning in a blue gown and equally lovely in voice and command of Mozartian style, phrasing and coloratura demands; Raymond Michalski, a firm bass with the range and comic flair for Osmin; Anne Elgar, another attractive red head with posed production and intelligent vocalism in her solo and ensemble contributions as Blonde; and Jerold Siena, a light-voiced tenor in the smaller role of Pedrillo.

In all, a delightful production appreciated by a gathering of 6,782.

For Sunday afternoon's program, David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, returned for his second guest appearance on the Tanglewood podium for a concert emphasizing the baroque.

Zinman, a former student at Tanglewood and assistant to Pierre Monteux, is a redoubtable baroque interpreter. Sharply attired in white jacket, blue shirt and trousers, the 33-year-old dark-haired conductor trimmed down the BSO ensemble to true chamber proportions, getting a translucent string sound and using crisp rhythms and abrupt shifts of dynamics to good effect.

Pleasant

Christian Ernst Graaf's pleasant Symphony in C, Opus 40, No. 4, set the pace on a drizzly afternoon which kept the audience down to 5,006. Graaf (ca. 1726-1802) was a German who made his mark in Holland, where he conducted The Hague orchestra for the young Mozart and his sister in 1766. The rhythmic drive, the careful shaping of phrases, and the care to let the music breathe were elements of Zinman's direction also to be savored in Handel's Concerto Grosso in F, Opus 6, No. 1.

On even a smaller sound-scale was J. S. Bach's Concerto in A minor for flute, violin and harpsichord for which flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, violinist Joseph Silverstein and harpsichordist Robert Levein were soloists. This is delicate chamber music, suited for a salon, but perhaps not so ideal for the 6,000-seat shed at Tanglewood. One suspects the dainty sounds did not carry well to the lawn.

Acoustics aside, the performance was admirable, the concertino being backed by an appropriately small cluster of string players — a pleasing contrast to the usual mega-Bach here. Levin's harpsichord work — or rather, workout — was a dynamic display of keyboard virtuosity.

Zinman also is a nifty interpreter of Mozart, in this case the "Linz" Symphony No. 36 in C, K. 425. He is inclined to be less severe, less hurried, softer and warmer than Leinsdorf, yet brings a similar feeling for line and clarity of detail. Agile, alert and quick of gesture, David Zinman should be added to the list of gifted young conductors.

Misty Evening

Friday night's Bach concert, on a misty evening before 4,576 patrons, illustrated the kind of programming a summer festival can offer as Leinsdorf led the four orchestral suites. These regal scores, with their series of courtly French dances, are seldom performed in one chunk. Yet they provide enough variety for a satisfying program: Nos. 3 and 4 in a festive scoring with trumpets and timpani; No. 2, for solo flute and strings; No. 1, for string orchestra with oboe and bassoon concertino.

Unfortunately, the performances were less festive and sometimes downright messy. Leinsdorf is a consummate musician of considerable versatility, but he is not intimately tuned in to the baroque. The main deficit is in the lack of a true baroque beat, especially in its contrapuntal applications. If the parts wending their separate but interelated ways do not have their own decisive rhythmic impulse, the result can be shapeless and seemingly chaotic — even when the correct notes are played.

This is what happened all too often Friday night, usually in the overtures. The counterpoint needed more rhythmic bite against the main melodic flow — the celli and basses were rumbling soft in this regard — and the phrasing often lacked a point.

In the Suite No. 3 in D which concluded the program, this flaw was not as apparent — aside from the overture which was taken at a very fast pace and had little profile — and this suite was over-all the most successful, ending in a splendid blaze of trumpets. The famous Air, too, was beautifully played (though more emphasis could have been given to the bass part), with graceful phrasing and lovely upper string work.

Flute Work

Suite No. 2, in B minor opened in an unsettled way, but subsequently had the benefits of Doriot Anthony Dwyer's fine flute work — including a rapid will-o'-the-wisp Badinerie — and Leinsdorf's correct timing of the appoggiature. Nos. 1 and 4 had few bright spots, excepting the oboes in the concertino portions of No. 1. For once, the harpsichord was audible, and Robert Levin's continuo work was neatly accomplished.

Bach also was featured in the weekend prelude, when cellist Jules Eskin and violinist Joseph Silverstein, first-desk players in the BSO, performed solo string works. Eskin played the Suite No. 5 in c minor, and Silverstein, the Sonata No. 3 in C — receiving an ovation for his performance of the second movement fugue.

Friday, July 11
By D. D.

A damp, rainy evening undoubtedly kept many away from Tanglewood this evening, and from a rather unique program offering, the four Orchestral Suites by J.S. Bach. Devoid of sacred content and intended as a sort of divertissement, these works are made up of numerous and varied short movements, the majority of which are festive in mood, lively in rhythm, and full of pleasant surprises. In performing them Mr. Leinsdorf laid heavy stress on the rhythmic, dance-like elements of the many bourees and rondes; even the slow introductory sections, which are most frequently given ponderous and solemn treatment, moved with rather startling rapidity, detracting somewhat from the following allegros which, by way of contrast were taken at break-neck speed.

Plaudits go to Doriot Anthony Dwyer for impressive solo flute work in the third Suite. The orchestra playing was, as usual, about as near to perfection as one can get, whether it be ensemble effect or remarkable precision of detail. Noteworthy was the deft handling by the brass of dangerous high passages in the Second Suite. Leinsdorf's reading of these seldom played masterpieces was, original and exciting.

Saturday, July 12
By A. C. S.

A Mozart opera, this time an unfamiliar one, "The Abduction from the Serglio," was the work chosen for this weekend of concerts at Tanglewood. This is music that is obviously close to the heart of Leinsdorf and at which he excels.

With one exception, he assembled an enviable cast. George Shirley sang the part of Belmonte with a melting tenor voice. From his opening notes he was completely in character and met the difficulties of bel canto singing from start to finish. The weak link vocally, to my mind, was Jerold Siena who sang the role of Pedrillo.

The great drawing card of the evening was Beverly Sills who has gained an illustrious reputation in recent years. Her appearance on stage was enough to generate applause. Her singing is flawless and seemingly effortless. No roulade is too difficult, no phrase too long, nor a nuance too minute to escape her attention. This is an artist who equals, if not excels, any competition.

A joy for this reviewer was the singing of a young lady he had not previously heard. This was Anne Elgar who sang the part of Blonde. Full voiced and attractive, she was vocally and dramatically perfect for the part. Mac Morgan was a winning narrator.

The guiding force was was Leinsdorf whose tempi, shading, and general control of all elements was superb.

Sunday, July 13
By S. L.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a program predominantly of chamber music this Sunday at Tanglewood under the baton of guest conductor, David Zinman. Mr. Zinman is currently the conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra. The opening work was the Symphony in C, op. 40, no. 4 by a German composer who later settled in Holland, Christian Ernst Graaf. Although played with the orchestra's usual precision, this rather uninspiring work seemed to lack gusto. The high point of the concert was Bach's Concerto in A minor, BWV 1044, for flute, violin and harpsichord. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the orchestra, was the violinist: Doriot Anthony Dwyer, principal flute of the BSO played the flute part. Top honors go to the harpsichordist, Robert Levin, a recent graduate from Harvard, who has performed on numerous occasions with the symphony. Mr. Levin played the treacherously difficult runs and trills with clarity and gave a very original performance.

Next on the program was Handel's Concerto Grosso in G op. 6 no. 1, written for two violins, cello and harpsichord. This five movement concerto was a letdown after the Bach. The closing Mozart's Symphony no. 36 lacked Leinsdorf's exciting interpretation.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(□) 66,387

JUL 15 1969

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

JUL 14 1969

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, July 14, 1969

Tanglewood Opera Outstanding Event

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, Mass. — The outstanding event of the second weekend at Tanglewood was the presentation Saturday night of a concert version of Mozart's seldom-performed opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio."

The score is unusually rich in the number of exceptional arias, which are well-distributed among the two sopranos, two tenors and bass comprising the principal characters. But astonishing as is this exhibition of solo virtuosity, it is outdone by the ensemble pieces of which the finale to the second act is the crown. Here is the first great example of the skill with which Mozart could weave together a series of movements — each representing a different mood or stage is the action — into a complete unity that is completely satisfying to the musical sense.

★ ★ ★

FOR THIS PRODUCTION Mr. Leinsdorf assembled a cast of unusual quality, including Beverly Sills as Constanza, Anne Elgar as Blonde, George Shirley as Belmonte, Jerold Siena as Pedrillo and Raymosd Michaelski as Osmin.

George Shirley was a particularly happy choice in one of the few major Mozart roles written for a tenor. His lyric quality, beautiful legato, phrasing and complete command of the "Mozart" style made his contribution outstanding. In the last two years he has gained in vocal strength without a loss of quality.

There was much interest in the appearances of Beverly Sills. Fresh from triumphs at La Scala as well as her critically acclaimed performances in Handel's "Julius Caesar" with the New York City Opera where she made her debut as a bel canto coloratura, she is now considered one of the leading sopranos.

Her voice has great range and flexibility, with the top and bottom having exceptional quality. It is difficult to make a complete appraisal of her many vocal gifts on the basis of an appearance in the vast confines of the Tanglewood Shed.

★ ★ ★

ENOUGH CANNOT BE SAID about the superb playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the beautifully paced and sympathetic direction of Mr. Leinsdorf. In this opera, a first for the Boston, he surely added to his stature as an interpreter of Mozart.

We only wish that we could hear this splendidly prepared production in a smaller auditorium better suited to the subtleties of Mozart's score.

BEVERLY SILLS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

. . . and on Sunday

By MICHAEL WEINER

First performances were the order of the day as David Zinman led members of the Boston Symphony on Sunday at Tanglewood. This was the concluding concert of the chamber orchestra series which the Berkshire Festival offers during the opening two weeks of its season.

These concerts present a cross-section of the baroque and classical works, areas relatively neglected at the Philadelphia Orchestra's SPAC performances in favor of the romantic warhorses. Of the four works on yesterday's predominantly baroque program, only one had previously been performed by the orchestra.

★ ★ ★

The concert also marked the return to Tanglewood of Mr. Zinman, the young American whose initial training as a conductor was at the Berkshire Music Center. He is currently conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra.

The program opened with the Symphony for Strings in C Major by the eighteenth century German composer, Christian Ernst Graff. It is a light, tuneful work whose three movements make frequent use of canonic effects: a theme introduced by one instrument is echoed by the other instruments at a different pitch and dynamic level.

Bach drew on two of his previous works when composing the Triple Concerto in A minor, BWV 1044. The concerto that resulted is no mere arrangement, but an organically conceived masterpiece that can be enjoyed as pure sound or admired for its ingenious solution of contrapuntal problems. Robert Levin, harpsicord, and two of the orchestra's first desk players, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, and Joseph Silverstein, violin, were the able soloists.

★ ★ ★

HANDEL'S Concerto grosso Op. 6 no. 1 features the interplay between two violins and a cello (the concertino) and a larger string orchestra (the ripieno). An interesting and continually changing texture results.

The concert concluded with the program's on'y standard work, Mozart's Symphony No. 36 in C Major, K. 425 ("Linz").

Throughout the afternoon, Mr. Zinman's readings were well-phrased and lyrical. In the Graff and Bach, this was sometimes at the expense of forward motion, but the buoyancy he gave to the Handel and Mozart works made those performances particularly enjoyable.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 17 1969

New England

Zinman Conducts

SECOND WEEKEND AT TANGLEWOOD

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

For the Week-end Prelude, always a 7 p.m. do before the big program at 9, Erich Leinsdorf, as musical director, had the intelligent temerity to present Jules Eskin, cello, and Joseph Silverstein, violin, in two of the greatest solo pieces by J. S. Bach — in fact, two of the greatest of all his works: the Suite No. 5 in C minor for cello and the Sonata No. 3 for violin, both unaccompanied. The audience was predictably half-size, but full-size in response to these distinguished offerings.

One looks at the regularity of notation for these pieces — pure mechanisms of sound, bird tracks on a tidal beach — and wonders at the musical intelligence that resolves them into emotive human experience. Mr. Silverstein projected a strong, sensitive, believable Bach, more convincing than I have heard him in solo passages of concertos (perhaps Bach recalls the best in us). It was no surprise, considering his virtuosity, to hear such double-stops and chords, by which Bach gave an illusion of multi-instruments — a tour-de-force warmly accurate in the concertmaster's production. But it was reassuring to hear how nobly he interpreted the Bach line, with one reservation: like Rubenstein on piano, he tended to diminish climaxes for the sake of smoothie transitions, and so, softened the shock of contrasts.

With Eskin's solo cello, there were no reservations. The C minor Suite begins with a Prelude that Eskin rightly interpreted as a rich rhapsody (Casals never did it better); and as the movements added up, I felt that this man surpassed Casals in certain aspects of imaginative conception — matched up to that standard in a convincing way of his own. Besides the rhapsodic give, Mr. Eskin also drove dance rhythms to hair-raising climax, made the Sarabande into a Baroque approximation of Chopin-dream, and swarmed over the strings in the running-rhythm of the Gigue to make us sit up and cheer.

Then, at 9 p.m., Leinsdorf led the Symphony in the four Bach Suites for Orchestra; No. 1 in C, No. 4 in D, No. 2 in B minor, and No. 3 in D. It looks like piling Ossa on Pelion, and it was — with the redeeming fact that each Suite varies in the balance of instruments and shifts in color and character. There was never a dull moment, except with the four opening Overtures. On the French plan that Bach adopted, they begin and end with a slow regal rhythm — pompous but with tension, — then relax, after the stage has been set, into a variety of dances.

It seems that royal pomp and circumstances is out now, so that one pushes the heavy, dotted rhythms into a frenetic scramble to make them consistent with a juke-box introduction. The orchestra, with the best will, could not make sense of this abberation, but certainly did of the following movements. Leinsdorf has a fine feeling for dance rhythms and Bach's inner contrapuntal structure.

As I sometimes do, I heard the last Suite No. 3 from a distance, back in the shadows of the great trees. The far-off stage and its manikens is a glowing source, and with Bach and Mozart, the message carries over the long stretch of lawn, purified by space. With a positive speech, like Bach's, there is a final pathos in this latter-day reception, under old trees and the loom of hills. A brave assertion in time of trouble.

Sunday afternoon young David Zinman led the orchestra with subtle fire in three Baroqu pieces and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony. The thirty-three year old conductor proved once again his fine musicianship and control. The orchestra has never played with more subtle justice to the composers.

The two pieces before intermission — Christian Ernst Graf's Symphony in C (opus 40 no. 4) overlaps the careers of J. S. Bach and Mozart (this symphony published in 1775. Imagine European court life, when this talented German functioned as conductor-composer at the Hague while we were messing around with a colonial war.). And then J. S. Bach's Triple Concerto in A minor for violin, flute and harpsichord with strings, composed in the master's Leipzig period for a coffee-garden concert on Friday evenings, when the sacred Klatsch gave over to new music (Now we have Muzak, God help us).

Graf's piece, although he conducted Mozart's early work, is conventional Baroque in the tradition of Vivaldi, with a strong Allegro, an Affetuoso that recalls operatic laments and a Vivace — a dance in three-beat meter with a graceful dignity and some kick of syncopation. Zinman asked the orchestra to revive the inherent life of convention, and it did — judicious accents, contrasting dynamics, melodic counterpoint without struggle and a slow movement that was really "Affetuoso".

Bach, even with entertaining stuff, contrives a richer pattern of sound without confounding the cafe mood of place. It is action-music, Persian carpets in process of weaving but with unmistakable impulse, clean involutions of line and, of course, exciting juxtapositions of heavy and light, loud and soft that happen in all Baroque dynamics. Zinman got from the B.S.O. an electrifying sensitivity to this built-in chairscuro so that conventionalities common to all European composers recovered their underlying impulsive reason.

In this work the flute and violin which act as a trio with the harpsichord, for intensive contrast to the body of strings, have nothing too different to offer except for the harpsichord. Dorio Anthony, flute, and Joseph Silverstein, violin, did a gracious job of it, and Robert Levin made brilliant use of the plucked strings especally in a solo passage — a cadenza of radiant figuration. But why, oh why use a harpsichord that can only sound with the necessary resonance in a small place with acres of shed and thousands of bodies to kill the sound? The flute and violin sounded lonely. And there are some newer harpsichords with more body and even some with amplification. The purist of instruments should give way to the purist of musical effect.

Handel's Concerto Grosso in G (Op. 6, No. 1) made more solid fare (in spite of inaudible harpsichord). Conceived as entr'actes for opera its five movements have a gusto (What guts!) and felicities of melody and harmony that must have kept opera audiences alive with driving impulse and social sentiment while scenes were changing.

timent while scenes were changing.

Mozart dashed off his 36th Symphony (in C, K425) on a visit to Linz. It is not one of the great symphonies we heard last week, — more in scale with the Graf, Bach and Handel preceding — but as played today, as if with the freshness and surprise of a piece with ink still wet on the manuscripts, it was stunning entertainment. In fact, Zinman paid such sensitive attention to dynamics that the loud-soft contrasts seemed basically Baroque, and the romantic modernisms of thematic and harmonic development a benign extension without revolution (Mozart-as-Rousseau is yet to be explained.

Mr. Zinman, for all his quickness and mobility, is no young-man-in-a-hurry: an Allegro Spiritoso is allowed a moderato pace in which the inner movements of sound can realize themselves with effective spirit. The Andante took time to be tenderly shapely — the Menuetto, frankly just a good courtly dance and the final Presto not pressed beyond time for delicious phrasing of butterfly wit.

It it too late to regret that the B.S.O. trustees passed over such an inspired and commanding young conductor, who might have developed into even more than a Bernstein with the N. Y. Philharmonic, instead of compromising on a clutch of aged "greats" who certainly have some genius and know their business — but naturally with some hardening of the arteries and small future. It is impossible to play safe in art.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

JUL 19 1969

The Summer Circuit

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Tanglewood, Mass. One doubts that even nature's most spectacular conjurations could dampen the buoyancy of Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio" or the lustre of Beverly Sills. Thus, the steady rain falling around the music shed on the sumptuous grounds of the Boston Symphony's summer home bothered the blanket-bearing segment of the sizable audience far more than the stage participants. Miss Sills has found a second home with Maestro Leinsdorf and his orchestra. She rises to her awesome best in her appearances with them, and she tossed off the humidity as easily as her exquisitely wrought arias. George Shirley, in music well-suited to his beautiful light voice, and Anne Elgar, singing as she did several seasons back, contributed strongly to the superb musical effort. What nature could not do—flaw a near-perfect performance—was achieved by the inept narration which replaced the German text passages. The idea wasn't bad, but the pompously declaimed, Peter-in-the-Wolf-style pap was insulting to the intelligence of the audience and the integrity of Mozart's art. Fortunately, nothing like it is planned for the rest of the season—just beautiful music speaking for itself in an idyllic setting.

—STANLEY NEWMAN

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

JUL 14 1969

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, July 14, 1969

Tanglewood Opera Outstanding Event

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, Mass. — The outstanding event of the second weekend at Tanglewood was the presentation Saturday night of a concert version of Mozart's seldom-performed opera, "The Abduction from the Seraglio."

The score is unusually rich in the number of exceptional arias, which are well-distributed among the two sopranos, two tenors and bass comprising the principal characters. But astonishing as is this exhibition of solo virtuosity, it is outdone by the ensemble pieces of which the finale to the second act is the crown. Here is the first great example of the skill with which Mozart could weave together a series of movements — each representing a different mood or stage is the action — into a complete unity that is completely satisfying to the musical sense.

★ ★ ★

FOR THIS PRODUCTION Mr. Leinsdorf assembled a cast of unusual quality, including Beverly Sills as Constanza, Anne Elgar as Blonde, George Shirley as Belmonte, Jerold Siena as Pedrillo and Raymosd Michaelski as Osmin.

George Shirley was a particularly happy choice in one of the few major Mozart roles written for a tenor. His lyric quality, beautiful legato, phrasing and complete command of the "Mozart" style made his contribution outstanding. In the last two years he has gained in vocal strength without a loss of quality.

There was much interest in the appearances of Beverly Sills. Fresh from triumphs at La Scala as well as her critically acclaimed performances in Handel's "Julius Caesar" with the New York City Opera where she made her debut as a bel canto coloratura, she is now considered one of the leading sopranos.

Her voice has great range and flexibility, with the top and bottom having exceptional quality. It is difficult to make a complete appraisal of her many vocal gifts on the basis of an appearance in the vast confines of the Tanglewood Shed.

★ ★ ★

ENOUGH CANNOT BE SAID about the superb playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the beautifully paced and sympathetic direction of Mr. Leinsdorf. In this opera, a first for the Boston, he surely added to his stature as an interpreter of Mozart.

We only wish that we could hear this splendidly prepared production in a smaller auditorium better suited to the subtleties of Mozart's score.

. . . and on Sunday

By MICHAEL WEINER

First performances were the order of the day as David Zinman led members of the Boston Symphony on Sunday at Tanglewood. This was the concluding concert of the chamber orchestra series which the Berkshire Festival offers during the opening two weeks of its season.

These concerts present a cross-section of the baroque and classical works, areas relatively neglected at the Philadelphia Orchestra's SPAC performances in favor of the romantic warhorses. Of the four works on yesterday's predominantly baroque program, only one had previously been performed by the orchestra.

★ ★ ★

The concert also marked the return to Tanglewood of Mr. Zinman, the young American whose initial training as a conductor was at the Berkshire Music Center. He is currently conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra.

The program opened with the Symphony for Strings in C Major by the eighteenth century German composer, Christian Ernst Graff. It is a light, tuneful work whose three movements make frequent use of canonic effects: a theme introduced by one instrument is echoed by the other instruments at a different pitch and dynamic level.

Bach drew on two of his previous works when composing the Triple Concerto in A minor, BWV 1044. The concerto that resulted is no mere arrangement, but an organically conceived masterpiece that can be enjoyed as pure sound or admired for its ingenious solution of contrapuntal problems. Robert Levin, harpsicord, and two of the orchestra's first desk players, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, and Joseph Silverstein, violin, were the able soloists.

★ ★ ★

HANDEL'S Concerto grosso Op. 6 no. 1 features the interplay between two violins and a cello (the concertino) and a larger string orchestra (the ripieno). An interesting and continually changing texture results.

The concert concluded with the program's only standard work, Mozart's Symphony No. 36 in C Major, K. 425 ("Linz").

Throughout the afternoon, Mr. Zinman's readings were well-phrased and lyrical. In the Graff and Bach, this was sometimes at the expense of forward motion, but the buoyancy he gave to the Handel and Mozart works made those performances particularly enjoyable.

BEVERLY SILLS

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 17 1969

New England

Zinman Conducts

SECOND WEEKEND AT TANGLEWOOD

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

For the Week-end Prelude, always a 7 p.m. do before the big program at 9, Erich Leinsdorf, as musical director, had the intelligent temerity to present Jules Eskin, cello, and Joseph Silverstein, violin, in two of the greatest solo pieces by J. S. Bach — in fact, two of the greatest of all his works: the Suite No. 5 in C minor for cello and the Sonata No. 3 for violin, both unaccompanied. The audience was predictably half-size, but full-size in response to these distinguished offerings.

One looks at the regularity of notation for these pieces — pure mechanisms of sound, bird tracks on a tidal beach — and wonders at the musical intelligence that resolves them into emotive human experience. Mr. Silverstein projected a strong, sensitive, believable Bach, more convincing than I have heard him in solo passages of concertos (perhaps Bach recalls the best in us). It was no surprise, considering his virtuosity, to hear such double-stops and chords, by which Bach gave an illusion of multi-instruments — a tour-de-force warmly accurate in the concertmaster's production. But it was reassuring to hear how nobly he interpreted the Bach line, with one reservation: like Rubenstein on piano, he tended to diminish climaxes for the sake of smoothie transitions, and so, softened the shock of contrasts.

With Eskin's solo cello, there were no reservations. The C minor Suite begins with a Prelude that Eskin rightly interpreted as a rich rhapsody (Casals never did it better); and as the movements added up, I felt that this man surpassed Casals in certain aspects of imaginative conception — matched up to that standard in a convincing way of his own. Besides the rhapsodic give, Mr. Eskin also drove dance rhythms to hair-raising climax, made the Sarabande into a Baroque approximation of Chopin-dream, and swarmed over the strings in the running-rhythm of the Gigue to make us sit up and cheer.

Then, at 9 p.m., Leinsdorf led the Symphony in the four Bach Suites for Orchestra; No. 1 in C, No. 4 in D, No. 2 in B minor, and No. 3 in D. It looks like piling Ossa on Pelion, and it was — with the redeeming fact that each Suite varies in the balance of instruments and shifts in color and character. There was never a dull moment, except with the four opening Overtures. On the French plan that Bach adopted, they begin and end with a slow regal rhythm — pompous but with tension, — then relax, after the stage has been set, into a variety of dances.

It seems that royal pomp and circumstances is out now, so that one pushes the heavy, dotted rhythms into a frenetic scramble to make them consistent with a juke-box introduction. The orchestra, with the best will, could not make sense of this abberation, but certainly did of the following movements. Leinsdorf has a fine feeling for dance rhythms and Bach's inner contrapuntal structure.

As I sometimes do, I heard the last Suite No. 3 from a distance, back in the shadows of the great trees. The far-off stage and its manikens is a glowing source, and with Bach and Mozart, the message carries over the long stretch of lawn, purified by space. With a positive speech, like Bach's, there is a final pathos in this latter-day reception, under old trees and the loom of hills. A brave assertion in time of trouble.

Sunday afternoon young David Zinman led the orchestra with subtle fire in three Baroqu pieces and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony. The thirty-three year old conductor proved once again his fine musicianship and control. The orchestra has never played with more subtle justice to the composers.

The two pieces before intermission — Christian Ernst Graf's Symphony in C (opus 40 no. 4) overlaps the careers of J. S. Bach and Mozart (this symphony published in 1775. Imagine European court life, when this talented German functioned as conductor-composer at the Hague while we were messing around with a colonial war.). And then J. S. Bach's Triple Concerto in A minor for violin, flute and harpsichord with strings, composed in the master's Leipzig period for a coffee-garden concert on Friday evenings, when the sacred Klatsch gave over to new music (Now we have Muzak, God help us).

Graf's piece, although he conducted Mozart's early work, is conventional Baroque in the tradition of Vivaldi, with a strong Allegro, an Affetuoso that recalls operatic laments and a Vivace — a dance in three-beat meter with a graceful dignity and some kick of syncopation. Zinman asked the orchestra to revive the inherent life of convention, and it did — judicious accents, contrasting dynamics, melodic counterpoint without struggle and a slow movement that was really "Affetuoso".

Bach, even with entertaining stuff, contrives a richer pattern of sound without confounding the cafe mood of place. It is action-music, Persian carpets in process of weaving but with unmistakable impulse, clean involutions of line and, of course, exciting juxtapositions of heavy and light, loud and soft that happen in all Baroque dynamics. Zinman got from the B.S.O. an electrifying sensitivity to this built-in chairscuro so that conventionalities common to all European composers recovered their underlying impulsive reason.

In this work the flute and violin which act as a trio with the harpsichord, for intensive contrast to the body of strings, have nothing too different to offer except for the harpsichord. Dorio Anthony, flute, and Joseph Silverstein, violin, did a gracious job of it, and Robert Levin made brilliant use of the plucked strings especally in a solo passage — a cadenza of radiant figuration. But why, oh why use a harpsichord that can only sound with the necessary resonance in a small place with acres of shed and thousands of bodies to kill the sound? The flute and violin sounded lonely. And there are some newer harpsichords with more body and even some with amplification. The purist of instruments should give way to the purist of musical effect.

Handel's Concerto Grosso in G (Op. 6, No. 1) made more solid fare (in spite of inaudible harpsichord). Conceived as entr'actes for opera its five movements have a gusto (What guts!) and felicities of melody and harmony that must have kept opera audiences alive with driving impulse and social sentiment while scenes were changtiment while scenes were changing.

Mozart dashed off his 36th Symphony (in C, K425) on a visit to Linz. It is not one of the great symphonies we heard last week, — more in scale with the Graf, Bach and Handel preceding — but as played today, as if with the freshness and surprise of a piece with ink still wet on the manuscripts, it was stunning entertainment. In fact, Zinman paid such sensitive attention to dynamics that the loud-soft contrasts seemed basically Baroque, and the romantic modernisms of thematic and harmonic development a benign extension without revolution (Mozart-as-Rousseau is yet to be explained.

Mr. Zinman, for all his quickness and mobility, is no young-man-in-a-hurry: an Allegro Spiritoso is allowed a moderato pace in which the inner movements of sound can realize themselves with effective spirit. The Andante took time to be tenderly shapely — the Menuetto, frankly just a good courtly dance and the final Presto not pressed beyond time for delicious phrasing of butterfly wit.

It it too late to regret that the B.S.O. trustees passed over such an inspired and commanding young conductor, who might have developed into even more than a Bernstein with the N. Y. Philharmonic, instead of compromising on a clutch of aged "greats" who certainly have some genius and know their business — but naturally with some hardening of the arteries and small future. It is impossible to play safe in art.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

JUL 19 1969

The Summer Circuit

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Tanglewood, Mass. One doubts that even nature's most spectacular conjurations could dampen the buoyancy of Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio" or the lustre of Beverly Sills. Thus, the steady rain falling around the music shed on the sumptuous grounds of the Boston Symphony's summer home bothered the blanket-bearing segment of the sizable audience far more than the stage participants. Miss Sills has found a second home with Maestro Leinsdorf and his orchestra. She rises to her awesome best in her appearances with them, and she tossed off the humidity as easily as her exquisitely wrought arias. George Shirley, in music well-suited to his beautiful light voice, and Anne Elgar, singing as she did several seasons back, contributed strongly to the superb musical effort. What nature could not do—flaw a near-perfect performance—was achieved by the inept narration which replaced the German text passages. The idea wasn't bad, but the pompously declaimed, Peter-in-the-Wolf-style pap was insulting to the intelligence of the audience and the integrity of Mozart's art. Fortunately, nothing like it is planned for the rest of the season—just beautiful music speaking for itself in an idyllic setting.

—STANLEY NEWMAN

40.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD CALL
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 27 1969

THE CLASSICS

By Mark A. Stuart

Tanglewood Weathers A Storm

The informal ambience of Tanglewood must bring out the best in a performer. Beverly Sills was brilliant in a recent concert there. and so was the rest of the cast.

NEITHER GLOOM, nor rain, nor the loss of $20,000 in lawn admissions could keep the Boston Symphony and those who made it to Tanglewood's July 12 production of Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" from having the time of their lives.

I say "production", although this was billed as a concert evening. First of all there was unmistakable theatrical air abounding. The arias were tied together by a narration prepared by Andrew Raeburn and delivered with just the right Camp air by Mac Morgan. The Pasha, an acting part, does not appear at all. His praises were sung by a group of janissaries made up of choristers from the Tanglewood Choir.

About the singing. There was nothing Camp about it. It was, in a word, glorious. Of course, Beverly Sills was on hand and as brilliant as a diamond. Her genius shone throughout the murky evening, overshadowing even the thunderstorm that broke on cue in the last part of the second act.

The bonuses in singing came from Anne Elgar, George Shirley, and Raymond Michalski. Miss Elgar has been underrated long enough at the New York City Opera Company. Given the opportunity, not even the superb singing of Beverly Sills could keep Miss Elgar from putting on a show of her own. The audience responded with the joy of those who had been happy enough to hear one glorious singer and suddenly realized they were hearing two.

Mr. Shirley has a lovely tenor voice which needs some work. In the middle register he is superb. His top tones are forced and if someone could teach him to relax he has the equipment to overcome this straining. By any standard, however, he was better than adequate that evening.

Mr. Michalski, a Bayonne boy, was a big surprise too. His small stature gives no inkling of the robust, rolling basso tones that come pouring forth with consummate ease from that so-small chest. His acting was excellent.

That acting, by the way, was another plus during the evening. This was no stilted concert opera, with singers standing at music stands and intoning their pieces. A cunning arrangement of the screens at back of the shed stage allowed the performers to make their entrances and exits with ease and appropriateness. Mr. Morgan's well-timed narration heightened the illusion that we were seeing grand opera in all its panoply. All that was missing were the costumes — and who needs those silly Turkish harem styles anyway?

The only disappointment was the Pedrillo of Herold Siena. His voice is small and in the vastness of the concert shed it was lost.

But those women! Wow!

Now to Eric Leinsdorf. It was apparent the maestro's operatic touch hasn't deserted him in these years of self-exile from the opera house. That it was Mozart he was conducting only added to the mix.

The rain kept all but the hardiest from sitting around. It was figured that 6,000 could have sat on the green if the weather had been only mildly decent.

The wet weather kept even the crowd in the shed down on Sunday afternoon and more's the pity. Young David Lidman led a delightful afternoon beginning with the Christian Ernst Graaf's Symphony in C. That led into Bach's Concert in A minor for flute, violin, and harpsichord. With Doriot Anthony Dwyer on flute, Joseph Silverstein on the violin, and young Robert Levin on the harpsichord, it was a gem. Mr. Levin had the crowd standing and cheering.

Handel's Concerto Grosso in G opened the post-intermission section and lest anyone thought Mr. Lidman, whose forte was chamber music, could not do well with a full symphony, let me commend to you his conducting of Mozart's "Linz" Symphony No. 36. The young man is a comer, as they say in advertising circles.

REPUBLICAN (m)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 26,100

JUL 16 1969 New England

Rain Fails To Dampen Tanglewood

Intermittent rain f .ed to dampen spirits for the fourth musical event of the second weekend of concerts at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

Nearly 19,000 attended the concert at the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Festival.

The concert f e a t u r e d the young and talented 33-year-old guest conductor, David Zinman, one of the gifted young conductors today whose meteoric career started under the tutelage of Pierre Monteaux as a pupil and in 1961 was invited to be Monteaux's assistant in Europe. At present he is the conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra and has conducted seven concerts with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the spring of 1967 and made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 1968 Berkshire Festival.

His training and musical brilliance eminently suited the program he conducted at Tanglewood which f e a t u r e d three chamber works that were first performances by the Boston Symphony. Zinman conducted Christian Ernst Graaf's (a contemporary of Mozart), Symphony in C op.40 no. 4, with exquisite delicacy, but this small work would be better suited if performed in the intimacy of a small chamber concert hall. Bach's Concerto in A minor for flute, violin and harpsichord followed, with three virtuoso soloists, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Robert Levinn harpsichord, which was singularly exceptional. This young musician has performed on the piano and harpsichord in chamber concerts across the country to critical acclaim.

The third first performance by the orchestra, Handel's Concerto Grosso in G op. 6 no.1 featured once again the orchestra's virtuoso concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Krips, concertino violins, Jules Eskin, first chair cello and Robert Levin, harpsichord continuo. Zinman's interpretation and conducting of this work was most spirited and inspired.

The concert concluded with Mozart's Symphony no. 36 in C K. 425 "The Linz," which Mozart had composed in five days, to the astonishment of music lovers the world over, and the genius that as Mozart, was matched by today's brilliant and effervescent performance, distinguished by both orchestra and conductor, the finale of a most delightful, beautiful and fine concert.

Saturday evening Erich Leinsdorf presented Mozart's opera in concert form, the "Abduction From The Seraglio," with Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Raymond Michalski and Jerold Siena with the 30 voices of the Tanglewood Choir. This was a wonderful opera to present on the concert stage, and Beverly Sills triumphed in the role of Constanze.

The enthusiastic a u d i e n c e gave her and the others a prolonged ovation. Mac Morgan narrated a whimsical condensation of the plot developments between arias presented by the orchestra and soloists. It was indeed a most memorable and dramatic presentation, t h o r oughly enjoyed by the audience.

SSM

AMERICAN e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 42,170

JUL 15 1969 New England

Weekend Tanglewood Concerts Enjoyable

Despite the intermittent rain throughout the weekend, it did not dampen the spirits of the audience of 18,368 which attended the fourth musical event of the second weekend of concerts at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Berkshire Festival.

The concert f e a t u r e d the young and talented 33-year-old guest conductor, David Zinman, one of the gifted young conductors today whose meteoric career started under the tutelage of Pierre Monteaux as a pupil and in 1961 was invited to be Monteaux's assistant in Europe. At present he is the conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra and has conducted seven concerts with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the spring of 1967 and made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 1968 Berkshire Festival.

His training and musical brilliance eminently suited the program he conducted at Tanglewood which f e a t u r e d three chamber works that were first performances by the Boston Symphony. Zinman conducted Christian Ernst Graaf's (a contemporary of Mozart), Symphony in C op.40 no. 4, with exquisite delicacy, but this small work would be better suited if performed in the intimacy of a small chamber concert hall. Bach's Concerto in A minor for flute, violin and harpsichord followed, with three virtuoso soloists, Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Robert Levinn harpsichord, which was singularly exceptional. This young musician has performed on the piano and harpsichord in chamber concerts across the country to critical acclaim.

The third first performance by the orchestra, Handel's Concerto Grosso in G op. 6 no.1 featured once again the orchestra's virtuoso concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Krips, concertino violins, Jules Eskin, first chair cello and Robert Levin, harpsichord continuo. Zinman's interpretation and conducting of this work was most spirited and inspired.

The concert concluded with Mozart's Symphony no. 36 in C K. 425 "The Linz," which Mozart had composed in five days, to the astonishment of music lovers the world over, and the genius that as Mozart, was matched by today's brilliant and effervescent performance, distinguished by both orchestra and conductor, the finale of a most delightful, beautiful and fine concert.

Saturday evening Erich Leinsdorf presented Mozart's opera in concert form, the "Abduction From The Seraglio," with Beverly Sills, George Shirley, Anne Elgar, Raymond Michalski and Jerold Siena with the 30 voices of the Tanglewood Choir. This was a wonderful opera to present on the concert stage, and Beverly Sills triumphed in the role of Constanze.

The enthusiastic a u d i e n c e gave her and the others a prolonged ovation. Mac Morgan narrated a whimsical condensation of the plot developments between arias presented by the orchestra and soloists. It was indeed a most memorable and dramatic presentation, t h o r oughly enjoyed by the audience.

SSM

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

JUL 14 1969

BEVERLY SILLS

Unscheduled Thunder Effects

Mozart's 'Abduction' Sung at Tanglewood

By JOAN SIMMONS
Times-Union Music Critic

A less than inviting weekend for the outdoor festival plagued summer concerts this weekend at Tanglewood and elsewhere.

Saturday night's presentation of a concert-staging of Mozart's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" came complete with unscheduled thunder and lightning effects.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this fourth and last all-Mozart program (last weekend was entirely devoted to Mozart) with the assistance of the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus and five soloists.

George Shirley as Belmonte and Beverly Sills as Constanze led the production with exceptional performances, Miss Sills particularly intriguing the audience with her strong, well-conceived presentation of the heroine. Her clear, lilting voice drew long applause following several exercises including the aria "Marten aller Arten."

Lesser roles were sung ably by Jerold Siena, Raymond Michalski and Ann Elgar.

"The Abduction" is an early effort of Mozart in opera done in the popular operetta style of the time. It has the charm and comic aspects of its form but in more durable musical substance.

CONCERT OPERA is always a difficult vehicle to handle. Tanglewood makes a practice of including them during every summer season and has come up with some devices that avoid the flatness that is a perennial danger. By placing the soloists on a platform at the rear of the stage instead of in chairs lined in front of the orchestra the singers are given a minimum of dramatic opportunity where they are allowed to address each other rather than a microphone. Their gestures and expression are highlighted against the plain background rather than lost in a sea of musicians.

Saturday's performance included the narration of Matt Morgan to carry the evening along. While filling in the plot and heightening the theatrical appeal it did have the side effect of slowing down the music, a minor fault.

IT WAS MORE the content of the narration, written by Andrew W. Rayburn, that was difficult to accept. Opera plots, this one included, are kind of ridiculous when reduced to basic terms. The explanation of the pasha's demand "You will love me by tomorrow," is a necessary part of the silliness of the libretto. But even an opera plot is no excuse for stooping to such lines as, "The plot thickens."

The Boston Symphony for its part continued in the excellent form in which it began the season, also with Mozart, a particular talent of Leinsdorf, a week ago. It continues with the promise of a very easy listening summer if only the weather will cooperate.

COMPLETING the second weekend lineup at the Berkshire Music Festival were an all-Bach program on Friday conducted by Leinsdorf and Sunday afternoon's concert works of Handel, Graff and Mozart and Bach's Triple Concerto in A Minor with soloists from the orchestra conducted by David Zinman.

This Friday, opening the third week of the festival, the full orchestra will take up residence with the music of Rossini, Swarwenka and Stravinsky.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 31 1969 New England

YOUR WORLD OF OPERA

By WILLIAM D. MIRANDA

BSO TANGLEWOOD OPERAS

As the tenure of Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony comes to a close one fact is undisputed. The bulk ~~and quality~~ of his contribution to Boston's operatic life, the many arias, scenes and complete concert performances introduced into the symphony's regular and Tanglewood seasons have set a standard of musical performance rarely achieved by any operatic organization in the area. It is not surprising that much of Mr. Leinsdorf's future career as mapped out to the press i s operatic. After many years devoted to concert music he is still pre-eminent among operatic conductors with the widest versatility of any. The two concert operas presented at Tanglewood on July 12 and 26 stand as monuments to his skill and understanding. This kind of opera in Boston and environs will be sorely missed.

MOZART'S ABDUCTION

The Abduction from the Sereglio, which won a permanent following in Boston five or so years ago when Sarah Caldwell produced it so magnificently, could not fail to generate excitement with Beverly Sills in the role of Constanze. Her star was just beginning to rise when she sang that role with the Boston opera; now it is fully resplendent and her credentials for all kinds of bel canto singing are giltedged. If the dampness made her tones a bit less sharp on this occasion than ordinarily few in the audience cared. Sporting the broad grin that shows just how much she enjoys her chosen work she breezed through Martern aller arten as though she had known it from birth and exquisitely delineated all the tender passages with authority and assurance. What an electricity her presence produced! Audiences cheer their approbation and the flagging operatic art form gets another shot in the arm.

The rest of the cast was reminiscent of the Toscanini broadcasts, competent (with exceptions), "but why didn't they get so-and-so while they were at it." Anne Elgar and Jerold Siena were mildly amusing as the servant lovers and sang well, but George Shirley was badly miscast as the hero Belmonte. He finally overcame excessive vocal dryness as the evening wore on. Raymond Michalski was totally unacceptable as Osmin. He showed no profundity, little flexibility, and complete absence of humor in the part. What a pity when such singers as Flagello might have performed it with distinction. Mac Morgan narrated Andrew Raeburn's commentary which replaced the dialogue in a patronizing fashion. One can make any plot look ridiculous, but that is no service to the art form. Mozart no more neglected to write music for the part of Selim than Weber did for the part of Samiel, but Mr. Morgan did perform his assigned task admirably. Once again the clarity of Leinsdorf's Mozart was brilliantly served by the expertise of the B.S.O. musicians, but this is one opera that was not benefitted by removing it from the realm of staged theatre.

MONUMENTAL OTELLO

On paper this didn't give promise of greatness. Three singers from different operatic arenas, none of them renowned locally for their roles nor even for roles of these types. Nonetheless three admirable singers added diamond clusters to their distinguished operatic service medals and Mr. Leinsdorf molded them into a reading of the Verdi masterpiece, the memory of which will outlast the tenure of more than one of his successors on this podium.

If memory serves correctly Richard Cassilly was last heard in opera in Boston a decade ago in Carmen with the Boston Opera. After mastering the American opera repertoire at City Center he went on to seasons of grooming as a Heldentenor. Now he emerges a giant, an Otello of power and control, passion and restraint, and with the bloom still on the voice he enthralled the audience with a portrayal of the part that could stand with any we have heard in Boston during the last ten years. Let us hope to hear him again soon.

Maralin Niska was the finest jewel of the Met National Company when she performed here in Susannah. She now sings with New York City Opera. We knew she had power, but the marvellous Verdian control for Desdemona is an exciting new dimension of her work for Bay State audiences. She also devastated the audience for her artistry as a performer. This reviewer must confess that he had skepticism over the abilities of Sherrill Milnes to convey the sinister nature of Iago. His bel canto purity for Verdian baritone roles is unexcelled, but after a tame Di Luna last April with the Met one could scarcely have been prepared for his fine appreciation of the evil nuances of Verdi's most fascinating role.

I should mention that added to the vocal glories described above was all the necessary dramatic action staged by Andrew Raeburn in creative fashion. Even a prop or two helped make up for the absence of sets and costumes.

The snippets of choral work were superb under Charles Wilson with a chorus composed of the Tanglewood Choir, The Berkshire Chorus, The Framingham Choral Society Chorale and the Berkshire Boychoir under Allan Wicks.

Three minor parts were especially well sung. Joaquin Romaguera was a light voiced, almost puerile sounding Cassio. Rose Taylor's Emilia featured a rich sound and Ara Berberian gave Lodovico's all too brief part a dignity and projection it seldom attains.

Enveloping all was the Maestro's awesome rendition of the multi faceted score. Such music making with a Verdian score is rare indeed and should be saluted. Thank you Maestro Leinsdorf for what you have done for opera in Boston.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

JUL 23 1969 New England

tanglewood: abduction

Camp opera in comic concert

by Eleanor Weber

Can a German composer, in Italianate-cum-Viennese style, create a successful opera about a Spanish nobleman come to rescue his beloved from the harem of a Turkish pasha? Yes, if his name is Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and the opera is "The Abduction from the Seraglio."

Can such an opera be given a successful performance in a concert version, with the original German dialogue cut (a tongue-in-cheek narration by Andrew Raeburn replacing it), no scenery — and even no Pasha (who, poor man, only had a speaking part)? Yes, if the place is Tanglewood, the "star" Beverly Sills, and the music director Erich Leinsdorf.

After the overture, played straight and even a bit sluggishly by Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony Orchestra, the audience was caught up in the mood of the evening set by narrator Mac Morgan, whose too, too sardonic, almost "fruity" rendering of the inane narration soon had the audience chuckling and hissing. But the unquestioned focus of the evening was on the coloratura flair of Beverly Sills as Constanza, beloved of Belmonte, the Spanish nobleman (sung by tenor George Shirley).

And that, probably, was as it should have been. Mozart even wrote the opera as a series of arias designed more to exploit the skills of his singer friends than to create an integral musical and dramatic mood. Because of the style of the opera, then, the lack of consistent stage direction and only superficial development of character were not the disabilities they might have otherwise been.

Occasionally, the singers were able to enliven their characterizations beyond merely singing. Notable in this case was Raymond Michalski, the evil overseer of the Pasha's palace in love with Blonde, Constanze's maid. They kept saying he was mean, but actually he was rather endearing, investing his role with the proper flippancy his commedia dell'arte role required. In his aria "O wie will ich triumphiren," Mr. Michalski may not have had the range or the power, but he sure had the personality!

George Shirley was stiff in his role as the daring Belmonte, investing his arias with great care but not too much flair. His voice, somewhat heavy for a tenor, was sometimes strained in the upper register, but he is a tenor of good training and was at all times competent and smooth. His sidekick Pedrillo, lyric and gay as portrayed by Jerold Siena, created and thoroughly enjoyed a good moment o fsinging and acting in his aria "Im Mohreniand gefangen war," accompanied with delightful pizzicato precision by the orchestra.

But "Abduction", when all is said and done, succeeds or fails on the strength of the lead soprano's ability to blaze through Constanze's arias, particularly "Martern aller Artern." The Tanglewood audience that Saturday night (July 12) was with Miss Sills even before she began. Keeping pace with the violins in a stunning series of runs, Miss Sills finished the aria to standing ovations, not only from the audience, but from the orchestra and chorus as well. There is no question that it was a virtuoso performance, but Miss Sills was equally effective in the tender arias. Her calculatedly dazzling displays, I felt, couldn't quite compare with the beauty of the high, sustained pianissimo passages in such arias as "Traurigkeit ward mir zum Lose."

Miss Sills was nicely complimented by Anne Elgar as her maid, Blonde. Somewhat less free on the runs, and occasionally shrill, Miss Elgar was nonetheless consistent in tone, saucy in manner, and lovely to listen to as well as look at, particularly in her aria "Durch Zartlichkeit und Schmeicheln."

It may not have been grand opera, but it certainly was great fun!

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 12 1969 New England

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD—Saturday, July 12: Erich Leinsdorf conducts the BSO in Mozart's "The Abduction from Seraglio," with soloists Sills, Shirley, Elgar, Siena, Michalski, and the Tanglewood Choir, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Sunday, July 13: David Zinman conducts the BSO in a program of Graff's Symphony for Strings; Bach's Triple Concerto in A Minor, with soloists Dwyer, Silverstein and Levin; Handel's Concerto Grosso Op. No. 6, No. 1, and Mozart's "Linz" Symphony, K. 425, 2:30 p.m., Shed. . . . Friday, July 18: Weekend Prelude with Paul Zukofsky and Gilbert Kalish, 7 p.m., Shed; Erich Leinsdorf conducts the BSO in Rossini's "L'Italiana in Alegri" overture, Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No. 1 and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," 9 p.m., Shed . . . Saturday, July 19: Leinsdorf conducts the BSO in Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" 8 p.m., Shed . . . Sunday, July 20: Leinsdorf conducts the BSO in a program of Tchaikovsky, including the introduction to Act II of "Swan Lake" and violin concerto, Symphony No. 5; Pinchas Zukerman, soloist, 2:30 p.m., Shed.

Additional review of "The Abduction . . ." on page 32a.

41.

MASSACHUSETTS

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL. Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Today 2:30 p.m. Zinman: Graff, Symphony for strings; Bach, Triple concerto in A. Minor — Dwyer, Silverstein, Levin; Handel, Concerto grosso op. 6 no. 1; Mozart; "Linz", Symphony K. 425. E. Leinsdorf, conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fri., 7 p.m. Zukofsky and Kalish. Weekend prelude.

Fri. 9 p.m. Leinsdorf, conducting; Rossini: 'L'Italiana in Algeri' Overture; Scharweka: Piano concerto no. 1; Wild Stravinsky: The rite of spring. E. Leinsdorf, conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sat. Open Rehearsal 10:30 a.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sat. 8 p.m. Rimsky Korsakov, Prelude and march from 'Le Coq d'or'; Tchaikovsky, Piano concerto, No. 2 Graffman; Prokofiev, Scenes from Romeo and Juliet suite. E. Leinsdorf, conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra.

July 20 Sun. 2:30 p.m. Tchaikovsky Program. Introduction to Act II "Swan Lake"; violin concerto. Zukerman, Symphony No. 5. E. Leinsdorf, conducting Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER: Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Theater. Today 10 a.m., Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music II.

Wed. 9 p.m., Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, Conducting Fellows Conducting. Theater.

Thurs. 9 p.m. Vocal Concert II, Opera Scenes. In Theater.

Thurs. Youth Concert, 2:30 p.m. in Theater.

Sat. 2:30 p.m., Boston University Tanglewood Institute Concert in Theater.

Sun. July 20, 10 a.m., Berkshire Music Center Chamber Music III in Theater.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL, Tanglewood, Lenox Mass.

Tuesday Tanglewood Trends, presents Iron Butterfly; The Staple Singers; in Shed at 8 p.m. Tickets available day of concert.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, July 13, 1969

42.

Wild, Graffman, Zuckerman at Tanglewood

At right, Erich Leinsdorf, duct the Boston Symphony musical director, will con- Orchestra this weekend.

Pianist Earl Wild, left is soloist tonight at 9.

Pinchas Zukerman, at right, appears Sunday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Above, Gary Graffman will appear Saturday night as soloist in the 8 p.m. concert, playing Tchaikovsky's second piano concerto.

Joni Mitchell (above) and Tim Hardin (right) will be joined by the Butterfield Blues Band Tuesday at 8 in the Shed.

Earl Wild is soloist with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 9 p.m., opening the third weekend of the 1969 Tanglewood season.

Mr. Leinsdorf, Mr. Wild, and the orchestra will repeat their much-discussed performance of the first piano concerto of Xaver Scharwenka, which they revived and recorded last winter after it had not been played by the Boston Symphony for over half a century. Mr. Wild will play the Scharwenka on the new Baldwin electronic grand piano, the ED1, which he and Mr. Leinsdorf agree has the particular qualities of brilliance appropriate to the concerto.

The program opens with Rossini's Overture to 'L'Italiana in Algeri. Mr. Leinsdorf devotes the second half of the concert entirely to a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring.

Gary Graffman is piano soloist on Saturday evening at 8 p.m. with Erich Leinsdorf as conductor, Mr. Graffman will play the infrequently-heard second piano concerto of Tchaikovsky, a work he has recorded. Mr. Leinsdorf has also programmed two other works, Rimsky-Korsakov's Prelude and wedding march from 'Le coq d'or,' which opens the concert, and Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet suite.

On Sunday afternoon July 20 at 2.30, the program is an all-Tchaikovsky one, with violinist Pinchas Zukerman making his Boston Symphony debut in the violin concerto, and Erich Leinsdorf leading the orchestra in the Introduction to Act II of Swan Lake, and the Fifth Symphony.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m., open to ticket holders for the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert, is a recital by violinist Paul Zukofsky and pianist Gilbert Kalish, including rarely-heard music by Webern and Busoni.

Next Week

The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens next Friday with the 7 p.m. Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andrew Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto no. 2 in B flat. Mr. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony no. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be given Saturday evening July 26 at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

On Sunday afternoon July 27 at 2.30 p.m., Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony no. 2 of Sibelius and the Emperor concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

An Open Rehearsal, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is on Saturday mornings each week at 10.30 a.m.

Tanglewood Tuesday Trends

In addition to this full schedule of classical music, Tanglewood presents, in its contemporary trends series, this Tuesday Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin, beginning at 8. On the 29th Mahalia Jackson will be joined by Ornette Coleman, Thad Jones and the Mel Lewis Orchestra, for the fourth of five Tanglewood Tuesday Trends programs.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
JUL 18 1969
New England

Full Boston Symphony Gives Lift to Berkshire Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The presence of the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, had a rejuvenating effect Friday night on the Berkshire Music Festival's third weekend. The audience numbered 4,556.

A reduced orchestra played baroque and classic music during the first two weeks.

Friday night's program held and fulfilled a lot of promise.

The overture to Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri" started it off with a grand slam and huge applause. Orchestra and conductor fully released its sparkling energy.

Beautifully Played

Top tempos didn't downgrade beautifully played oboe and flute solos. Elsewhere, Leinsdorf let it burst at the seams in the best Rossini tradition. He seemed imbued with the music's effervescence.

Pianist Earl Wild covered the keyboard with technical extravagances and himself with glory in Scharwenka's razzle-dazzle Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor.

The "electro concert grand" (so advertized) that Wild played had a sharp metallic sound.

It's a work of superb keyboard workmanship that doesn't say much. Lyrical sections are reminiscent of Schumann and Chopin. Bravura passages, derived from Tchaikovsky and Liszt.

Impressive.

Wild's usually good, serviceable technique approached virtuosity in this one. Sizzling passagework was clean, octaves had full sonority and singing melody prevailed over poetic areas.

Some unrest appeared in the scherzo when the soloist hastened tempos. Leinsdorf was an expert at making prompt adjustments. Bluster of the first movement was renewed in the finale, again mixing sentiment with splash.

Wild is one of the least affected pianists on the platform today. Everything is a stony procedure, even to rigid bows. But there's something refreshing about his all-business approach, whether he's concerned with drooling melody or geysers of notes.

Used Score

It came as something of a surprise to see Leinsdorf conduct Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring" with score. Most conductors use it as a memory feat and dramatic display without such impediment.

There were two strong impressions. One was the dynamic performance it received from the orchestra. The other, how tame Stravinsky's "Rite" has become in recent years compared to the new, unrestrained cacophony.

Leinsdorf approaced it generally with a standard, traditional point of view. One did hear below the surface details, particularly in brasses and perucssion, that increased intrigue.

The performance was midway between Leonard Bernstein's sensational version and te late Pierre Monteux' realistic but tempered treatment.

Valuable Innovation

A valuable innovation was the repeat of Webern's "Vier Stucke," Opus 7 at the end of the program, even if it wasn't more persuasive the second tine. At least it helped confirm the original impression.

Weekend prelude was played by Paul Zukovsky, violinist, and Gilbert Kalish, pianist, both teachers at the Berkshire Music Center.

Busoni's rarely performed Second sonata for Violin and Piano, Opus 36A was of clinical interest. It's a long fantasia-styled piece with accent on turbulence. There would have been a better distribution of interest with more repressed and less-thickly pedalled piano.

PROGRAM
Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" ..... Rossini
Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor Opus 32 .... Scharwenka
Earl Wild, pianist
The Rite of Spring ..... Stravinsky

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
JUL 20 1969
New England Newsclip

ROSELLE, N. J.
SPECTATOR
W. 3,000
JUL 10 1969

Boston Symphony set to play in Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. -- Earl Wild will be featured soloist with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday July 18 at 9 p.m. opening the third weekend of the 1969 Tanglewood season.

Leinsdorf, Wild, and the orchestra will repeat their performance of the first piano concerto of Xaver Schwarwenka, which they revived and recorded last winter, it had been played by the Boston Symphony more than half a century ago. Wild will play the Scharwenka on the new Baldwin electronic grand piano, the edl.

The program will open with Rossini's Overture to " 'L' Italiana in Algeri."

← Week 3 →

Earl Wild Soloist at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox—Earl Wild is the soloist with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday evening, July 18 at 9 p.m., opening the third weekend of the 1969 Tanglewood season. Mr. Leinsdorf, Mr. Wild, and the Orchestra will repeat their much-discussed performance of the first piano concerto of Xaver Scharwenka.

Gary Graffman is piano soloist on Saturday evening July 19 at 8 p.m. With Erich Leinsdorf as conductor, Mr. Graffman will play the infrequently-heard second piano concerto of Tchaikovsky, a work he has recorded.

On Sunday afternoon July 20 at 2:30, the program is an all-Tchaikovsky one, with violinist Pinchas Zukerman making his Boston Symphony debut in the violin concerto, and Erich Leinsdorf leading the Orchestra in the Introduction to Act II of Swan Lake, and the Fifth symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 13 1969

American Pianist To Play Concerto

American pianist Earl Wild repeats his acclaimed performance of Scharwenka's long-neglected First Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday, July 18, at 9 p.m. on WAMC Radio (90.3 FM).

The concert is one of three full-length Boston Symphony programs WAMC will air next week, live and direct from the Music Shed at the Orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass.

The first Berkshire Festival concert of the week on Sunday, July 13, at 2.30 p.m. will be conducted by David Zinman and features Symphony for Strings in C by Graaf, Bach's concerto for Flute, Violin and Harpsichord in A Minor, Handel's Concerto Grosso in G, Op. 6 No. 1 and Symphony No. 36 by Mozart, "The Linz." Soloists in the Bach will be Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Robert Levin, harpsichord.

The Friday concert (July 18, 9 p.m.) will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and will feature the Scharwenka concerto along with the Overture to Rossini's opera "Italian in Algiers" and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." The next evening, July 19 at 8 p.m., Mr. Leinsdorf will be joined by famed Soviet pianist Emil Gilels. Included in the program is music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet."

All three concerts are produced for radio by Jordan Whitelaw.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 12 1969 New England

TWO AT TANGLEWOOD: Piano soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Erich Leinsdorf conductor, will be Earl Wild (right) on Friday, July 18th, repeating his highly-acclaimed performance of the rarely-played first piano concerto of Scharwenka; and Gary Graffman, playing Tchaikovsky's second piano concerto. Both concerts will be at 8 p.m. in Tanglewood's 6,000 seat Music Shed.

TOWN CRIER
WESTPORT, CONN.
(W) 11,050 (S) 9,100

JUL 12 1969 New England

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 13 1969

At Tanglewood July 18-20

Berkshire Festival Weekend Will Feature Three Concerts

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — Earl Wild is soloist with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday at 9 p.m. opening the third weekend of the 1969 Tanglewood season. Leinsdorf, Wild, and the orchestra will repeat their much - discussed performance of the first piano concerto of Xaver Scharwenka, which they revived and recorded last winter after it had not been played by the Boston Symphony for over half a century. Wild will play the Scharwenka on the new Baldwin electronic grand piano, the ED1, which he and Leinsdorf agree has the particular qualities of brilliance appropriate to the concerto.

Program Opener

The program opens with Rossini's Overture to 'L' Italiana in Algeri. Leinsdorf devotes the second half of the concert entirely to a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring.

Gary Graffman is piano solist Saturday at 8 p.m. With Erich Leinsdorf as conductor, Graffman will play the infrequently - heard second piano concerto of Tchaikovsky, a work he has recorded. Leinsdorf has also programmed two other works, Rimsky - Korsakov's Prelude and wedding march from 'Le coq d'or', which opens the concert, and Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet suite.

On Sunday afternoon at 2.30, the program is an all - Tchaikovsky one, with violinist Pinchas Zukerman making his Boston Symphony debut in the violin concerto, and Erich Leinsdorf leading the orchestra in the Introduction to Act II of Swan Lake, and the Fifth symphony.

Weekend Prelude

The weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m., open to ticket holders for the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert, is a recital by violinist Paul Zukofsky and pianist Gilbert Kalish, including rarely - heard music by Webern and Busoni.

The open rehearsal is on Saturday morning at 10.30.

PINCHAS ZUKERMAN

GARY GRAFFMAN

WEEKEND PROGRAMS
Friday, July 18, 1969

7 P.M. Shed
Weekend Prelude
Paul Zukofsky
Gilbert Kalish
Webern: Vier Stucke, Op. 7.
Busoni: Second Sonata for Violin and Piano op. 36a
Webern: Vier Stucke, Op. 7.

9 P.M. Shed
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Erich Leinsdorf conductor
Earl Wild pianist
Rossini: Overture to 'L'Italiana in Algeri'.
Scharwenka: Piano concerto no. 1 in B flat.
Stravinsky: Le sacre de printemps.
Stravinsky: Le sacre de printemps.

SATURDAY JULY 19, 1969
10.30 A.M. Shed

BSO—Open Rehearsal
8 P.M. Shed
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Erich Leinsdorf conductor
Gary Graffman pianist
Rimsky - Korsakov: Prelude and wedding march from 'Le coq d'or'.
Tchaikovsky: Piano concerto no. 2 in G, op. 44.
Prokofiev: Scenes from Romeo and Juliet'.

SUNDAY JULY 20, 1969
2.30 P.M. Shed

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Erich Leinsdorf conductor
Pinchas Zukerman violinist
Tchaikovsky: Introduction to Act two 'Swan Lake'. Violin concerto in D op. 35. Symphony no. 5 in E minor op. 64.

EARL WILD

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 15 1969 New England

This Weekend At Tanglewood

LENOX — Tanglewood's third weekend will present the complete Boston Symphony Orchestra of 102 players under Erich Leinsdorf.

High points of the three concerts:

Friday, July 18 at 9 p.m., Earl Wild, pianist (in the Scharwenka Concerto Leinsdorf resurrected in Boston this season), and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Saturday at 8 p.m., Gary Graffman, pianist (in Tchaikovsky's Second Concerto) and Prokofiev's Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet."

Sunday at 2:30 p.m., All-Tchaikovsky program, with Pinchas Zukerman, violinist, and the Fifth Symphony.

The Weekend Prelude on Friday at 7 p.m. brings Paul Zukofsky, violinist, and Gilbert Kalish, pianist, with music of Webern and Busoni.

The Tuesday Tanglewood Trends concerts were launched on July 8, when 7,671 came to hear Janis Joplin and Orpheus.

The next events, at 8 p.m. in the big music shed: 'tonight,' Iron Butterfly and the Staple Singers; July 22, Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band, and Tim Hardin.

Students and faculty of Berkshire Music Center present low-priced programs of high interest each week in the Theater - Concert hall. Events for the next two weeks include:

Sundays at 10 a.m., chamber music; tomorrow at 9 p.m., Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, led by young conductors; Thursday, 2:30 p.m., youth concert.

Saturday, 2:30 p.m., Boston University Tanglewood Institute concert; Wednesday, July 23, 9 p.m., composers' forum.

Thursday, July 24, 9 p.m., faculty recital (Roman Totenberg, violin, Artur Balsam, piano).

Saturday, July 26, 2:30 p.m., New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute Concert.

Programs for the Festival of Contemporary Music (July 30 - August 3 and August 11-16) will be listed soon.

— J.F.K.

Earl Wild

Pianist Opens 4th Weekend

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass.—The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens on Friday, July 25 with the 7 p.m. Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto no 2 in B flat. Mr. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony no. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be give Saturday evening July 26 at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

On Sunday afternoon July 27 at 2:30 p.m., Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony no. 2 of Sibelius and the Emperor concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

The Open Rehearsal, for benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., with all seats $2.50, unreserved. The Tanglewood box office is open from 9-6.

HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER STAR
D. 9,500

JUL 14 1969

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 11 1969 New England

Seats Available For Bus Trip To Tanglewood

EAST HARTFORD — A few additional seats are available for a bus trip to Tanglewood, Mass., being planned by the First Federal Savings of East Hartford.

The trip is scheduled July 20, leaving East Hartford at 10 a.m. and returning about 8 p.m.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will present an all Tchaikovsky program featuring the Symphony No. 5 and his popular Violin Concerto in D, with Pinchas Zulerman as soloist.

The cost of the trip, including transportation and admission to the concert, is $9.50. Meals are the responsibility of the individual.

Reservations are necessary and may be made by sending a check, made payable to Community Services, to Miss Doris Rayner, care of First Federal Savings of East Hartford, 1137 Main St., East Hartford. Further information can be obtained by calling 289-6401.

34

Tanglewood Artists Revive Works Of 19th Century Composers

By MARTHA deB. BEAVER

It was only fitting that the works of a long-neglected composer, Ferruccio Busoni, revived last season by several artists, should be accorded a spot at Tanglewood.

His second sonata for violin and piano op. 36a (1898), its last movement on a theme from a Bach chorale, was given a magnificent performance by Paul Zukofsky and Gilbert Kalish, violinist and pianist, respectively, during the bonus prelude preceding the third weekend's concerts. It was the hearty, romantic, lushly conceived meat between the outer layers of Webern's Vier Stucke op. 7, repeated, we know not why, at beginning and end of the hour-long recital.

And, like Busoni, another seldom-heard composer was given the featured role in Friday's main concert, namely Scharwenka. Polish-born (1850-1924), he was one of the composers who brought nationalism into the musical field of the late 19th century, plus the inevitable rhapsodic, romantic and virtuosic writing that was also a mark of that period.

In the hands of Earl Wild, favorite of musicians and composers, whose technical prowess is conceived with the utmost aplomb, and whose ability to commit a piece of music to memory is almost instant, the lengthy, flamboyant sonata was just that, but perhaps more interesting because of the electronic piano being used to display its characteristics. In spite of, or perhaps because of, the overstated themes, not outstanding in themselves, but handled with interest, the music appealed to many. We remember the second movement's dancing, swooping swirls and couplets . . . the chordal progressions of the third, more piano than orchestra, giving in to a nostalgic melody but still harmonic and very schmaltzy . . . the sonata ending in a gushing rush of sounds that brought the inevitable bravos from 4,556 listeners . . . but this reviewer was still unmoved musically by its content.

The concert opened with Leinsdorf's spirited and quivering direction of Rossini's Overture to L'Italiana in Algeri (The Italian Woman in Algiers), its blend of elegance and effervescent comedy brought out in grand style. An incomparable ready of Stravinsky's virile and fertile Rite of Spring brought the cool evening to a sparkling close. The first performance of this great piece was conducted by the late Pierre Monteux in Paris where it was not received with any degree. of enthusiasm Leinsdorf shared honors with the principal bassoonist, Sherman Walt, the winds and percussion players, who were responsible for its magnificent effects.

Saturday evening the Tschaikowsky second piano concerto, (the other) in G, op. 44, was given a first performance at Tanglewood, with Gary Graffman splendidly equal to its almost interminable demands, but nonetheless unable to impart any kind of appealing acceptance to this perhaps understandably seldom - heard work. Rimsky-Korsakov's Prelude and wedding march from Le Coq d'Or was brilliantly gay; and at Leinsdorf's infectious directions, Prokofiev's Scenes from Romeo and Juliet, op. 64, became translucently beguiling, graphic and dramatic, as the composer intended, and the orchestra so wonderfully projected.

The all-Tschaikowsky program Sunday afternoon was given added distinction at the end when Leinsdorf, being recalled repeatedly for a distinguished performance of the Fifth Symphony, announced that the Eagle had landed safely on the moon, and asked the overjoyed audience to stand with the musicians as they played "The Star Spangled Banner."

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 11,900

JUL 25 1969

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 19 1969

Complete Ensemble

Symphony Heard at Lenox

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — An audience of moderate size attended last night's concert at Tanglewood by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is the first of six weekends devoted to programs by the complete ensemble, with more than 100 players available.

Erich Leinsdorf had devised an evening of strong contrasts, unleashing musical moods which came close to concealing the efficient and methodical structure of his approach.

It was a far cry from Rossini's bubbling "Overture to the Italian Woman in Algiers" to the rhythmic and savage "The Rite of Spring" by Stravinsky. In between was sandwiched a novelty in the form of an "oldie" which was far more fresh and timely than the audience could have foreseen.

Gazette Review

Polish Composer

Xaver Scharwenka, a Polish composer and pianist (1850-1924), founded conservatories and made friends on both sides of the Atlantic. Boston records reveal six performances of his Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, heard last night.

The Worcester Festival of 1892 found Scharwenka as soloist in the concerto and his famous Polish Dance, and as conductor of the overture to his one opera.

Leinsdorf unearthed the concerto last winter at Boston and in New York, and Earl Wild last night repeated his success in projecting the brilliant, and melodious episodes of the 19th century piece.

Stravinsky's Music

1913 was also the year of the demonstrations in Paris at the premiere of Stravinsky's ballet music. Logic thrusts itself at us now, in Stravinsky's dances, which are sometimes delightfully soft and often fronted with immensities of brass sound.

Leinsdorf had platoons of wind players and percussionists rise in turn and take bows at the end of a

Scharwenka Concerto Heard at Tanglewood

By GEORGE W. STOWE

There is a surprising interest these days in obscure 19th Century music. This summer at Newport a series of concerts devoted to unfamiliar chamber music of this period is scheduled to be heard in some of the fabulous old mansions, such as the Elms and the Breakers.

At Tanglewood Friday night Erich Leinsdorf programmed Xaver Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Earl Wild as the soloist with the Boston Symphony. A German composer of the mid-19th Century, Scharwenka had a great vogue around the turn of the century but is practically unknown today.

* * *

This concerto is nothing if not brilliant. No one will argue that this is great music but as a showpiece it hardly fails to make its impact. With its scintillant arpeggios, powerful chordal passages, and headlong tempi, it requires a technician to bring it to life.

And Earl Wild, who has made a specialty of this type of music in the last few years, was just the man to carry off the assignment. Nothing seemed to bother him Friday night, as far as the technical demands of the concerto were concerned. Needless to say, he aroused plenty of enthusiasm at the end.

* * *

The piano used on this occasion was the Baldwin Electro Concert Grand, which has a very brittle and bright sound and helped to project the vivid effect the music demands.

Almost as rarely heard in the concert hall is Stravinsky's "La Sacre du Printemps." Despite its reputation as one of the great modern classics, very few orchestras have the temerity to put it on the musical agenda. It takes a great orchestra to give it the cohesion and striking impact that it needs.

Leinsdorf, the precisionist, and the Boston Symphony were the ideal collaborators for such a project. The melding of all the orchestral elements into an integrated whole was worth the trip to Tanglewood. Rarely have I heard this great orchestra in better form.

* * *

In fact, where can you find a woodwind ensemble (with the exception of the Philadelphia Orchestra's) which can handle their music with more authority? The clarity of texture in this performance was something to remember for a long time.

Rossini's Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" opened the festivities Friday night in a performance that was more in the nature of a warmup than something to put away in your memory book.

Incidentally, for those interested in the Scharwenka Concerto, it has been recorded by Friday night's participants and will be released in August by RCA Victor.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 20 1969

JOINS BOSTON. Pianist Earl Wild solos with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the First Piano Concerto of Scharwenka tomorrow at 8 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., as part of the Berkshire Music Festival. Music director Erich Leinsdorf asked Wild last season to revive the concerto which had not been heard in more than 50 years. It's popularity prompted a repeat performance this year.

Lenox Performance on Grand Scale

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The final section of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood, coincided with the moon landing of the astronauts.

An ovation got started for the music. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf interrupted with the announcement. Applause was resumed, really in earnest this time.

Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony topped it off with a rousing performance of the National Anthem.

As 7,815 persons left the grounds, there was little talk about music.

First audience outburst of the afternoon was for 21-year-old Pinchas Zukerman of Israel, who made his Boston Symphony debut in the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto.

Already On the Road

The young man's tone wasn't large and some of his treatment was surfaceful, probably due to noticeable nervousness.

But, make no mistake about it — this young fellow is already on the road traveled by Stern, Francescatti and Milstein.

He brought a freshness to the concerto, and enough technique to dazzle the eye and ear. His tone was rich and Leinsdorf let him do just about as he pleased.

The introduction to Act II, "Swan Lake," was grand scale orchestral sound compared to more familiar performances in ballet production.

Leinsdorf conducted the Tchaikovsky Fifth methodically and efficiently, but it was the orchestra that provided the fire.

There was nothing but fire and thunder in Gary Graffman's performance of the rarely heard and absurdly difficult Second Piano Concerto by Tchaikovsky, Saturday night.

Graffman is the only painist to tackle this keyboard monstrosity in decades. He told us that it took him a full summer to learn the notes and another year of toil before it was ready for the public.

Except for the slow movement that overflows with saccharine sighs, the work is a catchall for histrionic displays and bobbytraps. It pummels the keyboard unmercifully and ransacks the pianist's pyrotechnical equipment.

Only Graffman's determination and qualification to grapple with such nonsense prevented a tedious tirade of keyboard calisthenics.

The tremendous applause must have been for a decisive victory by pianist and orchestra over the tasteless ogre of flamboyance.

Leinsdorf stressed the brassy brilliance of the Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Le Coq d'Or." The way had been paved in the prelude with sensitive woodwind solos to harp background.

As the boiling point was reached, Leinsdorf almost took off from the podium and the audience came through with a stadium reception.

Prokofieff's lengthy "Romeo and Juliet" Suite wilted through some of its parched sections. Spirited and raucous dances revived the spirit.

One couldn't hope for more polished, vibrant and assertive playing from the orchestra.

PROGRAMS
Saturday Night
Prelude and Wedding March, "Le Coq d'Or" — Rimsky-Korsakoff
Piano Concerto No. 2 in G major, Opus 44 — Tchaikovsky
Gary Graffman
Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet," Opus 64 — Prokofieff
Sunday Afternoon
Introduction to Act II, "Swan Lake" — Tchaikovsky
Violin Concerto in D major, Opus 35 — Tchaikovsky
Pinchas Zukerman
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Opus 64 — Tchaikovsky

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 21 1969

New England Newsclip

Gary Graffman

Fitting Homage To Tchaikovsky

By MICHAEL WIENER

Most works by a major composer reflect that composer's particular style. Some compositions, however, are so representative of their creator that they provide an almost perfect definition of the composer's aesthetic. Three such works were included in the all-Tchaikovsky program which Erich Leinsdorf conducted Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood: the prelude to Act II of "Swan Lake," the Violin Concerto in D Major, Op. 35 and the Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Op. 64.

The program was, in fact, so representative of Tchaikovsky's output that it could provide limitless ammunition for the composer's supporters and for his critics.

Tchaikovsky's admirers could point to the big tunes, the colorful orchestration, the brooding melancholy, and the many dramatic climaxes. The composer's detractors could criticize the melodrama, the bombast, and the textural and melodic sameness.

THE CONCERTO was written in 1878, but, because of its difficulty, had to wait three years for performance. Tchaikovsky had studied piano and composition, but not violin, and perhaps unintentionally had written an incredibly demanding showpiece that extended what were then considered the boundaries of violin playing.

Pincus Zuckerman, the young Israeli violinist, was soloist in the concerto. A first prize winner in the Leventritt Competition, he studied at the Julliard School in New York City.

Mr. Zuckerman displayed a rich tone and near-flawless intonation, but what particularly distinguished his interpretation was his involvement with the music. He gave a warm, committed reading of the first two movements and a really sizzling account of the finale.

THE BSO'S music director was less successful with the remainder of the program. The "Swan Lake" excerpt was stiffly performed, and the Fifth Symphony was something of a disaster: although some sections were phrased with great beauty, Mr. Leinsdorf's overemphatic accents, and emphasis on the trumpets and tympani bludgeoned much of the music to death. Substandard ensemble playing finished things off.

Following the concert, Mr. Leinsdorf announced that the U.S. astronauts had successfully landed on the moon only minutes before. He then led the orchestra in the national anthem.

Next week's concerts at Tanglewood will include orchestral music by Beethoven, Brahms, and Sibelius, and will feature a concert performance of Verdi's "Otello."

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, July 21, 1969

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

JUL 17 1969

At the Concert

Brilliant Music At Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

Saturday evening's all-Russian program at Tanglewood was distinguished by the brilliant playing of both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the guest soloist, pianist Gary Graffman.

NE

Mr. Graffman was heard in the infrequently played Concerto No. 2 in G major Opus 44 by Tchaikovsky, a work displaying both the strength and weakness in that composer's writing.

The strength lies in the rich orchestration, the boldness of some of the themes and the brilliant part given the solo piano. Unfortunately Tchaikovsky used many pianistic "cliches" to obtain some of this brilliance, and a few of the lyric sections seem too sugar sweet and lacking in depth.

AS A WHOLE it lacks much of the cohesiveness and spontaneity of the more familiar first concerto which is one of the great romantic display pieces.

The difficult solo part was played with apparent ease by the always technically secure pianist, and his wide dynamic range enabled him to meet the expressive demands of the concerto in a convincing manner.

The slow movement was notable for the delicate accompanying figuration the piano provided for the solo violin and cello. In this entire movement the piano was a supporting rather than dominant figure.

Wrists of steel are a must for the octave and rapid chordal sequences in the first and last movements and it was evident that Mr. Graffman possessed this technical attribute in abundance. While this is a display concerto, the pianist is a close to the keys performer with no disturbing mannerisms.

PIANIST, conductor and orchestra were enthusiastically received for a splendid performance of a piece last performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1912.

The principal ochestral offering, "Scenes from Romeo and Juliet" Opus 64 by Prokofieff, composed in answer to a request that he write a ballet on the theme of Shakespeare's tragedy.

It uses a leitmotif system with descriptive theses for the various characters. Juliet's music is at first simple; then as her love for Romeo grows, becomes deeply passionate. A similar development is found in the music for Romeo.

For this performance Erich Leinsdorf selected movements from the original ballet score, some of which are not in the three orchestral suites usually performed.

THE MUSIC is extremely melodic in character and has little of the sarcastic and grotesque dissonance associated with Prokofieff's earlier music.

Mr. Leinsdorf exploited the expressive possibilities of the score with his customary good taste and clarity of detail. Worthy of mention were the sharp rhythms of the Gavotte in Part One, which is an expanded version of the D major Gavotte from the "Classical Symphony."

A charming interlude was "Morning Serenade" from Part Two which was a duet for mandolin and piano beautifully played by Robert Karol and Joseph Silverstein, who is probably one of the finest concert masters now active.

To begin the concert the orchestra did full justice to the exotic Prelude and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy tale opera, "Le coq d'or."

Friday's concert which was the first for the full Boston Symphony Orchestra offeed the Stravinsky "Rites of Spring" and the B flat minor Concerto by Scharwenka for Piano and Orchestra with Earl Wild as soloist.

The Sunday afternoon concert featured an all Tchaikovsky program with Pinchas Zuckerman as soloist in the D major violin concerto.

44

Tanglewood Artists Revive Works Of 19th Century Composers

By MARTHA deB. BEAVER

It was only fitting that the works of a long-neglected composer, Ferruccio Busoni, revived last season by several artists, should be accorded a spot at Tanglewood.

His second sonata for violin and piano op. 36a (1898), its last movement on a theme from a Bach chorale, was given a magnificent performance by Paul Zukofsky and Gilbert Kalish, violinist and pianist, respectively, during the bonus prelude preceding the third weekend's concerts. It was the hearty, romantic, lushly conceived meat between the outer layers of Webern's Vier Stucke op. 7, repeated, we know not why, at beginning and end of the hour-long recital.

And, like Busoni, another seldom-heard composer was given the featured role in Friday's main concert, namely Scharwenka. Polish-born (1850-1924), he was one of the composers who brought nationalism into the musical field of the late 19th century, plus the inevitable rhapsodic, romantic and virtuosic writing that was also a mark of that period.

In the hands of Earl Wild, favorite of musicians and composers, whose technical prowess is conceived with the utmost aplomb, and whose ability to commit a piece of music to memory is almost instant, the lengthy, flamboyant sonata was just that, but perhaps more interesting because of the electronic piano being used to display its characteristics. In spite of, or perhaps because of, the overstated themes, not outstanding in themselves, but handled with interest, the music appealed to many. We remember the second movement's dancing, swooping swirls and couplets . . . the chordal progressions of the third, more piano than orchestra, giving in to a nostalgic melody but still harmonic and very schmaltzy . . . the sonata ending in a gushing rush of sounds that brought the inevitable bravos from 4,556 listeners . . . but this reviewer was still unmoved musically by its content.

The concert opened with Leinsdorf's spirited and quivering direction of Rossini's Overture to L'Italiana in Algeri (The Italian Woman in Algiers), its blend of elegance and effervescent comedy brought out in grand style. An incomparable ready of Stravinsky's virile and fertile Rite of Spring brought the cool evening to a sparkling close. The first performance of this great piece was conducted by the late Pierre Monteux in Paris where it was not received with any degree. of enthusiasm Leinsdorf shared honors with the principal bassoonist, Sherman Walt, the winds and percussion players, who were responsible for its magnificent effects.

Saturday evening the Tschaikowsky second piano concerto, (the other) in G, op. 44, was given a first performance at Tanglewood, with Gary Graffman splendidly equal to its almost interminable demands, but nonetheless unable to impart any kind of appealing acceptance to this perhaps understandably seldom - heard work. Rimsky-Korsakov's Prelude and wedding march from Le Coq d'Or was brilliantly gay; and at Leinsdorf's infectious directions, Prokoflev's Scenes from Romeo and Juliet, op. 64, became translucently beguiling, graphic and dramatic, as the composer intended, and the orchestra so wonderfully projected.

The all-Tschaikowsky program Sunday afternoon was given added distinction at the end when Leinsdorf, being recalled repeatedly for a distinguished performance of the Fifth Symphony, announced that the Eagle had landed safely on the moon, and asked the overjoyed audience to stand with the musicians as they played "The Star Spangled Banner."

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 11,900

JUL 25 1969

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 19 1969

Complete Ensemble

Symphony Heard at Lenox

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — An audience of moderate size attended last night's concert at Tanglewood by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is the first of six weekends devoted to programs by the complete ensemble, with more than 100 players available.

Erich Leinsdorf had devised an evening of strong contrasts, unleashing musical moods which came close to concealing the efficient and methodical structure of his approach.

It was a far cry from Rossini's bubbling "Overture to the Italian Woman in Algiers" to the rhythmic and savage "The Rite of Spring" by Stravinsky. In between was sandwiched a novelty in the form of an "oldie" which was far more fresh and timely than the audience could have foreseen.

Gazette Review

Polish Composer

Xaver Scharwenka, a Polish composer and pianist (1850-1924), founded conservatories and made friends on both sides of the Atlantic. Boston records reveal six performances of his Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, heard last night.

The Worcester Festival of 1892 found Scharwenka as soloist in the concerto and his famous Polish Dance, and as conductor of the overture to his one opera.

Leinsdorf unearthed the concerto last winter at Boston and in New York, and Earl Wild last night repeated his success in projecting the brilliant, and melodious episodes of the 19th century piece.

Stravinsky's Music

1913 was also the year of the demonstrations in Paris at the premiere of Stravinsky's ballet music. Logic thrusts itself at us now, in Stravinsky's dances, which are sometimes delightfully soft and often fronted with immensities of brass sound.

Leinsdorf had platoons of wind players and percussionists rise in turn and take bows at the end of a

Lenox Performance on Grand Scale

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The final section of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood, coincided with the moon landing of the astronauts.

An ovation got started for the music. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf interrupted with the announcement. Applause was resumed, really in earnest this time.

Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony topped it off with a rousing performance of the National Anthem.

As 7,815 persons left the grounds, there was little talk about music.

First audience outburst of the afternoon was for 21-year-old Pinchas Zukerman of Israel, who made his Boston Symphony debut in the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto.

Already On the Road

The young man's tone wasn't large and some of his treatment was surfaceful, probably due to noticeable nervousness.

But, make no mistake about it — this young fellow is already on the road traveled by Stern, Francescatti and Milstein.

He brought a freshness to the concerto, and enough technique to dazzle the eye and ear. His tone was rich and Leinsdorf let him do just about as he pleased.

The introduction to Act II, "Swan Lake," was grand scale orchestral sound compared to more familiar performances in ballet production.

Leinsdorf conducted the Tchaikovsky Fifth methodically and efficiently, but it was the orchestra that provided the fire.

There was nothing but fire and thunder in Gary Graffman's performance of the rarely heard and absurdly difficult Second Piano Concerto by Tchaikovsky, Saturday night.

Graffman is the only painist to tackle this keyboard monstrosity in decades. He told us that it took him a full summer to learn the notes and another year of toil before it was ready for the public.

Except for the slow movement that overflows with saccharine sighs, the work is a catchall for histrionic displays and bobbytraps. It pummels the keyboard unmercifully and ransacks the pianist's pyrotechnical equipment.

Only Graffman's determination and qualification to grapple with such nonsense prevented a tedious tirade of keyboard calisthenics.

The tremendous applause must have been for a decisive victory by pianist and orchestra over the tasteless ogre of flamboyance.

Leinsdorf stressed the brassy brilliance of the Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Le Coq d'Or." The way had been paved in the prelude with sensitive woodwind solos to harp background.

As the boiling point was reached, Leinsdorf almost took off from the podium and the audience came through with a stadium reception.

Prokofieff's lengthy "Romeo and Juliet" Suite wilted through some of its parched sections. Spirited and raucous dances revived the spirit.

One couldn't hope for more polished, vibrant and assertive playing from the orchestra.

PROGRAMS
Saturday Night
Prelude and Wedding March, "Le Coq d'Or" — Rimsky-Korsakoff
Piano Concerto No. 2 in G major, Opus 44 — Tchaikovsky
Gary Graffman
Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet," Opus 64 — Prokofieff
Sunday Afternoon
Introduction to Act II, "Swan Lake" — Tchaikovsky
Violin Concerto in D major, Opus 35 — Tchaikovsky
Pinchas Zukerman
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Opus 64 — Tchaikovsky

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 21 1969

New England Newsclip

Scharwenka Concerto Heard at Tanglewood

By GEORGE W. STOWE

There is a surprising interest these days in obscure 19th Century music. This summer at Newport a series of concerts devoted to unfamiliar chamber music of this period is scheduled to be heard in some of the fabulous old mansions, such as the Elms and the Breakers.

At Tanglewood Friday night Erich Leinsdorf programmed Xaver Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Earl Wild as the soloist with the Boston Symphony. A German composer of the mid-19th Century, Scharwenka had a great vogue around the turn of the century but is practically unknown today.

* * *

This concerto is nothing if not brilliant. No one will argue that this is great music but as a showpiece it hardly fails to make its impact. With its scintillant arpeggios, powerful chordal passages, and headlong tempi, it requires a technician to bring it to life.

And Earl Wild, who has made a specialty of this type of music in the last few years, was just the man to carry off the assignment. Nothing seemed to bother him Friday night, as far as the technical demands of the concerto were concerned. Needless to say, he aroused plenty of enthusiasm at the end.

* * *

The piano used on this occasion was the Baldwin Electro Concert Grand, which has a very brittle and bright sound and helped to project the vivid effect the music demands.

Almost as rarely heard in the concert hall is Stravinsky's "La Sacre du Printemps." Despite its reputation as one of the great modern classics, very few orchestras have the temerity to put it on the musical agenda. It takes a great orchestra to give it the cohesion and striking impact that it needs.

Leinsdorf, the precisionist, and the Boston Symphony were the ideal collaborators for such a project. The melding of all the orchestral elements into an integrated whole was worth the trip to Tanglewood. Rarely have I heard this great orchestra in better form.

* * *

In fact, where can you find a woodwind ensemble (with the exception of the Philadelphia Orchestra's) which can handle their music with more authority? The clarity of texture in this performance was something to remember for a long time.

Rossini's Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" opened the festivities Friday night in a performance that was more in the nature of a warmup than something to put away in your memory book.

Incidentally, for those interested in the Scharwenka Concerto, it has been recorded by Friday night's participants and will be released in August by RCA Victor.

JOINS BOSTON. Pianist Earl Wild solos with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the First Piano Concerto of Scharwenka tomorrow at 8 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., as part of the Berkshire Music Festival. Music director Erich Leinsdorf asked Wild last season to revive the concerto which had not been heard in more than 50 years. It's popularity prompted a repeat performance this year.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 20 1969

Gary Graffman

Fitting Homage To Tchaikovsky

By MICHAEL WIENER

Most works by a major composer reflect that composer's particular style. Some compositions, however, are so representative of their creator that they provide an almost perfect definition of the composer's aesthetic. Three such works were included in the all-Tchaikovsky program which Erich Leinsdorf conducted Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood: the prelude to Act II of "Swan Lake," the Violin Concerto in D Major, Op. 35 and the Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Op. 64.

The program was, in fact, so representative of Tchaikovsky's output that it could provide limitless ammunition for the composer's supporters and for his critics.

Tchaikovsky's admirers could point to the big tunes, the colorful orchestration, the brooding melancholy, and the many dramatic climaxes. The composer's detractors could criticize the melodrama, the bombast, and the textural and melodic sameness.

THE CONCERTO was written in 1878, but, because of its difficulty, had to wait three years for performance. Tchaikovsky had studied piano and composition, but not violin, and perhaps unintentionally had written an incredibly demanding showpiece that extended what were then considered the boundaries of violin playing.

Pincus Zuckerman, the young Israeli violinist, was soloist in the concerto. A first prize winner in the Leventritt Competition, he studied at the Julliard School in New York City.

Mr. Zuckerman displayed a rich tone and near-flawless intonation, but what particularly distinguished his interpretation was his involvement with the music. He gave a warm, committed reading of the first two movements and a really sizzling account of the finale.

THE BSO'S music director was less successful with the remainder of the program. The "Swan Lake" excerpt was stiffly performed, and the Fifth Symphony was something of a disaster: although some sections were phrased with great beauty, Mr. Leinsdorf's overemphatic accents, and emphasis on the trumpets and tympani bludgeoned much of the music to death. Substandard ensemble playing finished things off.

Following the concert, Mr. Leinsdorf announced that the U.S. astronauts had successfully landed on the moon only minutes before. He then led the orchestra in the national anthem.

Next week's concerts at Tanglewood will include orchestral music by Beethoven, Brahms, and Sibelius, and will feature a concert performance of Verdi's "Otello."

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, July 21, 1969

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

JUL 17 1969

At the Concert

Brilliant Music At Tanglewood

By EDWARD FRENCH

Saturday evening's all-Russian program at Tanglewood was distinguished by the brilliant playing of both the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the guest soloist, pianist Gary Graffman.

NE

Mr. Graffman was heard in the infrequently played Concerto No. 2 in G major Opus 44 by Tchaikovsky, a work displaying both the strength and weakness in that composer's writing.

The strength lies in the rich orchestration, the boldness of some of the themes and the brilliant part given the solo piano. Unfortunately Tchaikovsky used many pianistic "cliches" to obtain some of this brilliance, and a few of the lyric sections seem too sugar sweet and lacking in depth.

AS A WHOLE it lacks much of the cohesiveness and spontaneity of the more familiar first concerto which is one of the great romantic display pieces.

The difficult solo part was played with apparent ease by the always technically secure pianist, and his wide dynamic range enabled him to meet the expressive demands of the concerto in a convincing manner.

The slow movement was notable for the delicate accompanying figuration the piano provided for the solo violin and cello. In this entire movement the piano was a supporting rather than dominant figure.

Wrists of steel are a must for the octave and rapid chordal sequences in the first and last movements and it was evident that Mr. Graffman possessed this technical attribute in abundance. While this is a display concerto, the pianist is a close to the keys performer with no disturbing mannerisms.

PIANIST, conductor and orchestra were enthusiastically received for a splendid performance of a piece last performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1912.

The principal ochestral offering, "Scenes from Romeo and Juliet" Opus 64 by Prokofieff, composed in answer to a request that he write a ballet on the theme of Shakespeare's tragedy.

It uses a leitmotif system with descriptive theses for the various characters. Juliet's music is at first simple; then as her love for Romeo grows, becomes deeply passionate. A similar development is found in the music for Romeo.

For this performance Erich Leinsdorf selected movements from the original ballet score, some of which are not in the three orchestral suites usually performed.

THE MUSIC is extremely melodic in character and has little of the sarcastic and grotesque dissonance associated with Prokofieff's earlier music.

Mr. Leinsdorf exploited the expressive possibilities of the score with his customary good taste and clarity of detail. Worthy of mention were the sharp rhythms of the Gavotte in Part One, which is an expanded version of the D major Gavotte from the "Classical Symphony."

A charming interlude was "Morning Serenade" from Part Two which was a duet for mandolin and piano beautifully played by Robert Karol and Joseph Silverstein, who is probably one of the finest concert masters now active.

To begin the concert the orchestra did full justice to the exotic Prelude and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy tale opera, "Le coq d'or."

Friday's concert which was the first for the full Boston Symphony Orchestra offeed the Stravinsky "Rites of Spring" and the B flat minor Concerto by Scharwenka for Piano and Orchestra with Earl Wild as soloist.

The Sunday afternoon concert featured an all Tchaikovsky program with Pinchas Zuckerman as soloist in the D major violin concerto.

At Tanglewood

Graffman's Agility Spectacular In Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —There were a few thousand listeners at Tanglewood Saturday night who must have been wondering why they hadn't heard Tchaikovsky's second Piano Concerto before; it has much to recommend it.

Maturity, Too

Admittedly, it requires a keyboard technician of massive ability and has relatively little intrinsic musical beauty, but it is a spectacular showpiece.

Gary Graffman is the man who can do it — he can juggle four Indian clubs and do handsprings on the keyboard — no technical requirements deter him. They didn't hold him back at Tanglewood Saturday.

And more than that, at 41 he is beginning to acquire the mature attitudes that infuse such theatrical concoctions as this with dramatic substance.

Long Silence

The concerto hadn't been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1912. Perhaps now that it has been given an airing, its nice violin-cello-piano trio in the middle movement will help induce pianists to labor to learn the horrendously difficult first movement.

Anyway, there are now a few listeners who, when they hear a know-it-all refer to "The Tchaikovsky Concerto," will be able to say, "Which one?"

However, as it was Friday night when the orchestra played the "Rite of Spring," the best of the music came after intermission.

15 Scenes

Saturday it was a suite of scenes put together by Erich Leinsdorf, music director, from Prokofiev's 1935 ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," Opus 64.

There are 15 short scenes in two parts and they consist of some of Prokofiev's most appealing sounds. (There are three other suites, all constructed by the composer.)

The ballet was written immediately after Prokofiev returned to Moscow to stay after an extended stay in Paris. His style became more lyrical, less caustic, and there are several movements in this ballet when the listener can hear strains from the widely-known children's tale, "Peter and the Wolf."

Lightfooted, Sassy

All of the suites are entertaining and colorful and under Leinsdorf's guidance Saturday the orchestra was especially lightfooted and polished, sometimes even witty and sassy.

The afternoon performance by the orchestra of high schoolers in the Boston University Tanglewood Institute conducted by James Yannatos failed to diminish the good impression the group made last Saturday.

The program offered parts of Charles Ives' Symphony No. 3 and Debussy's "Nocturns" and all of Braham's Symphony No. 2, Opus 73.

The music was leisurely and comfortable, nicely cohesive and graced by stable intonation.

The talk of the campus during the morning however, was the glowing performance by Pinchas Zuckerman, 21, Israeli Violinist, at the open rehersal.

He will play Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto with the orchestra in the shed this afternoon, and his appearance is being anticipated eagerly by Tanglewood's permanent residents.

Also on today's program will be Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, a great symphony, but it will follow Zuckerman and may turn out to be anti-climactic.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 21 1969

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

JUL 18 1969

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 20 1969

At Tanglewood

Zukerman's Violin Possessed By Angels, Devils, Tchaikovsky

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There were a few hints Sunday afternoon in the vast shed at Tanglewood that Pinchas Zukerman may become one of the great ones. He played the violin as if possessed by angels, also by devils.

Accomplished Technician

Zukerman is only 21 and already has established a world-wide reputation as a first-class soloist. Sunday he played the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D, Opus 35, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

Some of the hints of his stature came during the titanic first movement, an acrobatic display piece requiring the most accomplished of instrumental technicians.

It is music of unabashed theatrical romanticism, and Zukerman pranced through it without falter. It ended to prolonged applause.

Expression Beyond Years

More hints came during the beautiful second movement, a piece of lyricism and grace. Zukerman played it with depth of emotional expression far beyond his years.

He is a big boy, tall and wide with a burly manner and a shock of thick black hair that swings into his eyes as he sways to the impassioned passages.

His demeanor, however, was generally unpretentious and his concentration intense.

Tone Impressive

Most impressive was the tonal quality he drew from his violin. It was cool, clean, dry and sweet — clean even during the dense, multiple-stop passages; dry enough to take the worst of the schmalz out of Tchaikovsky, and sweet enough to be appropriate to the romance of the balladic melodies.

There were 7815 listeners, a large audience for a Sunday afternoon, the largest of the season. A big section of it was driven into the shed because of a drizzle that began about the time the concert began.

The opening piece was the introduction to Act Two of Tchaikovsky's ballet, "Swan Lake," a beautifully lush, three-minute melody, and the program after intermission was taken up with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, Opus 64.

Soloist's Day

I like to hear Tchaikovsky played by Boston and Cleveland because both orchestras, under the guidance of Leinsdorf and Szell, tend to play it a bit on the cool side.

There already is plenty of heat in Tchaikovsky, so a bit of calm control over the excesses helps to expose the basic beauty of Tchaikovsky's unmatched melodies.

But it really was not Tchaikovsky's day at Tanglewood — it was Zukerman's.

* * *

Young Professionals

Of the three pieces offered during the 10 a. m. Berkshire Music Center chamber-music session in the theater, the most satisfying by far was the third, a Brahms' quartet for piano and three string players, Opus 60.

It was best not only because of the Brahmsian depth and breadth but also because of the entirely professional skill with which the young players played it.

It was spirited (strong where it should be strong, and expressive), full of dynamic subtleties and ensemble accuracy. The tonal quality was on the dry side, which is all to the good with Brahms, which can become oppressively heavy when expressed too bountifully.

The other works on the program were a quintet for brass by John Huggler, composer in residence with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1964-65 season, and a Mozart quintet for piano and oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn, K. 452.

The brass is a contemporary piece with a few passages of odd or pleasant or interesting sonority, but for me it is another example of contemporary pretentiousness, a collection of trickery which seems to have sudden changes of direction and tone color as its sole purpose.

The Mozart piece was pleasant, relaxing, amiable and played without special distinction.

* * *

Next weekend two of the world's more exciting young pianists will be here. Andre Watts Friday and Vladimir Ashkenazy Sunday, and Saturday there will be the concert performance of Verdi's great opera "Otello" with three soloists, the Tanglewood Choir, the Berkshire Chorus and the Berkshire Boy Choir.

PINCHAS ZUCKERMAN is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Sunday, July 20, under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf.

Tanglewood Weekend Will Faeture Pianists

Earl Wild is soloist with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow at 9 p.m., opening the third weekend of the 1969 Tanglewood season, Lenox, Mass. Leinsdorf, Wild, and the orchestra will repeat their much-discussed performance of the first piano concerto of Xaver Scharwenka, which they revived and recorded last winter after it had not been played by the Boston Symphony for over half a century. Wild will play the Scharwenka on the new Baldwin electronic grand piano, the EDI, which he and Leinsdorf agree has the particular qualities of brilliance appropriate to the concerto.

The program opens with Rossini's Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri. Leinsdorf devotes the second half of the concert entirely to a performance of Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring.

Gary Graffman is piano soloist on Saturday at 8 p.m., with Erich Leinsdorf as conductor, Graffman will play the infrequently-heard second piano concerto of Tchaikovsky, a work he has recorded. Leinsdorf has also programmed two other works, Rimsky-Korsakov's Prelure and wedding march for, Le coq d'or', which opens the concert, and Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet suite.

On Sunday at 2:30, the program is an all-Tchaikovsky one, with violinist Pinchas Zukerman making his Boston Symphony debut in the violin concerto, and Erich Leinsdorf leading the Orchestra in the Introduction to Act II of Swan Lake, and the Fifth Symphony.

The weekend prelude, tomorrow at 7 p.m. open to ticket holders for the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert, is a recital by violinist Paul Zukofsky and pianist Gilbert Kalish, including rarely-heard music by Webern and Busoni.

The Open Rehearsal is on Saturday morning at 10:30.

Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass, phone 413-637-1600; performances Fris at 9 pm, Sats 8 pm, Suns 2:30 pm, week-end preludes Fris 7 pm, open rehearsals Sats 10:30 am; write the Festival at Tanglewood for complete schedule. Season ends Aug 31.

BEE
...TOWN, CONN.
...KLY 11,000

JUL 18 1969

RIDGEWOOD, N.J.
HERALD-NEWS
W. 13,000

JUL 17 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 21 1969

Music Review

Tanglewood Salutes Moon Landing

By JAY ROSENFELD

THE 7,815 PEOPLE who, despite the threat of drizzle, attended the last concert of the third Berkshire Festival weekend at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon experienced a series of thrills they may never again enjoy so memorably.

As Erich Leinsdorf, the Boston Orchestra's musical director, was returning to the front of the stage for one of the many recalls the playing of the Tchaikovsky fifth symphony had aroused, he raised his hand for quiet and announced that our men in "Eagle" were on the moon and asked the delirious audience to stand with the musicians while they played "The Star Spangled Banner."

That historic moment had been but one of the several exciting events of the afternoon. At the end of three great programs, a Tchaikovsky symphony could tax the musical digestive capacity of some concertgoers but it proved to be one of the orchestra's most lofty flights. The deeply gratifying tone which the Bostonians at their best can produce, the composer's marvelous orchestration which is too often taken for granted, the interweaving fabric of contrapuntal devices and the conductor's inspiring baton achieved a performance not often surpassed by the orchestra on any stage, here, or in Boston.

Continuing to render a cancrizans report of the all-Tchaikovsky afternoon, no one in that great Shed will forget the debut of Pinchas Zukerman with the Boston orchestra in the violin concerto. In an instrumental era when dazzling technique is no longer a rarity, that feature of his equipment rates as a lesser phenomenon. Yet, for a mop-haired 6-footer who, one might have guessed, had been called in from a sandlot football scrimmage, told to get cleaned up and get out on stage as the orchestra was already invading the concerto's introduction, to play with such transcendent pathos was an event few of the most sophisticated concertgoers will ever forget.

* * *

IN AN AGE when speed in so many of this generation's activities is a sine qua non, velocity must probably be tolerated as inadvisable and inappropriate as it can be at times. When the Tchaikovsky was last played at Tanglewood, Francescatti was the soloist and Fritz Kreisler was in the audience. Kreisler congratulated Francescatti at the end of the afternoon and the soloist with indelible respect thanked Kreisler and rebutted "but the last movement was too fast, wasn't it, Maitre?" "To tell you the truth," said Kreisler, "yes." Francescatti continued, "But you know, if I don't take it at that tempo they will say I can't play as fast as the Russians!"

The legend has been repeated so many times of Leopold Auer's rejection of the concerto, which Tchaikovsky dedicated to him, that it is now practically sculpted in solid rock. Yet, pupils of the revered pedagogue aver that to state that when he was 34, he had to give way on technical grounds to Brodsky is pure balderdash. That he repudiated it for musical reasons may have had some basis in fact but for performing hurdles, his pupils insist, it could not be true.

Zukerman, when in the clear of pyrotechnical opportunities, carved himself a niche where his heart-twisting prompting sang with unsurpassable restraint and understatement. A bow which, on demand, could cut through the entangling underbrush of some of the most involved passages or could suddenly become a tear-jerking appeal of the most deliciously sensitive quality placed the young man in a category thinly populated.

FOR THIS THIRD weekend, Leinsdorf brought the entire personnel symphony of the orchestra to Tanglewood for three programs happily weighted with Russian music.

It was really a weekend for musical archeologists. They didn't dig too deep but they did unearth several treasures from, of all people, the consistently popular Tchaikovsky. The introduction to Act 2 of "Swan Lake" was played for the first time by the Boston orchestra. Gary Graffman gave a rapturously involved performance of "the other" piano concerto, also a first for these festivals.

The Piano Concerto No. 2 in G, Opus 44, is rarely played and it became apparent why, after but a short few pages. It hasn't the inspiration of the better-known concerto and seeks to make up for its near vacuity by a superfluity of notes. Graffman played heroically but no amount of brilliance and fleet muscularity could convey any sort of an appeal. Tchaikovsky even resorts to the device Brahms was to use at nearly the same time in his B flat concerto of having a string solo obbligato in the slow movement. Yet, it just doesn't come off, a fact in no way attributable to those involved Saturday.

* * *

THE PURELY orchestral offerings on this program however, proved to be extremely enjoyable. The prelude and wedding march from Rimsky - Korsakov's "Golden Cockerel" is light and delightful. Scenes from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet might better be called "Pictures at an Exhibition." Leinsdorf played them with obvious personal gratification. Prokofieff, at one time, was scolded by the Soviet Politburo for the cosmopolitanism of his music. Indeed, there is no more witty and saucy writer in the roster of composers of all times and, in this ballet, he is at the apogee of his mischievous flight, plainly writing most of the time with his tongue in Czech.

The music was made decidedly graphic by the orchestra. One could visualize poor Juliet's tomb in Verona (as the house of Shylock is pointed out in Venice and, in London, 221 B Baker St. is marked). And is there a more engaging romp in all music than the care-abandoned pesante in which "the Montagues and the Capulets" cavort in apparent amity?

Friday night the orchestral concert and the "weekend prelude" program informed the audiences of two composers whose names appear rarely now but who, in their way and in their day, were men with whom to reckon with deep respect.

* * *

LEINSDORF gave Earl Wild a deserved opportunity to appear on a "regular" Tanglewood series after having invited him as the piano soloist at the fringe-benefit concerts for several years heretofore. He let him ride a proud, prancing horse—the Scharwenka B Flat Minor Concerto (Opus 32). On the earlier hour of the evening, Paul Zukofsky, violinist and Gilbert Kalish, pianist, played the Busoni Second Sonata (Opus 36a).

Scharwenka and Busoni are about the same generation, the one being born in 1850 in Poland, the latter, in 1866 in Tuscany. They both ended their illustrious careers in Berlin which served as a launching pad for their long and frequent concert tours.

Busoni, in some quarters, had acquired a reputation as a revolutionary composer but he was probably only an ultraromantic original. Furthermore, he was also always a deeply serious student whereas Scharwenka was one of the last of the virtuosos of the grand style. They are both remnants of a vanished species—that of composer soloist. They both appeared often in their own compositions, not exclusively to be sure, but each enhanced his reputation as a performing artist by his composing. This is a category of musicians which has practically ceased to exist.

The Zukofsky-Kalish duo performance of the Busoni was magnetic. The sonata has a great and long variety of rhythms and moods and is played without interruption but the performance held one's interest unflaggingly.

Wild was in his element in the demanding and bombastic Scharwenka. It starts with a fetching little idiosyncratic device of a short descending chromatic idiom which is woven into much of the ensuing fabric, and there is virtually never a reposeful moment. The excitement may be a bit too insistent but everybody profited by making the reacquaintance of this antique in such extraordinarily capable hands as those of Wild.

* * *

LEINSDORF played the Stravinsky "Rite of Spring" for the last half of the evening. Boston and Tanglewood have some, if tenuous, alliances with this piece. It was Monteux, later a Boston Symphony musical director, who conducted its first performance in Paris when it was played as ballet music. The conductor's wife sat in a box at the Theatre Champs Elysees. The auditorium's manager rushed to her as the concert was about to begin. "Le vieux est en bas," (the old man is downstairs) he ejaculated, meaning, in those days, Saint-Saens. There wasn't room for a mouse in the hall. What to do? Madame Monteux could not remember who was displaced but "le vieux" (he was then 78) found himself at her side and, as the music progressed, he kept turning to her, asking in querulous phrases, "Vous aimez ca?" (you like that?).

As history now records, the first audience did not like it but it has persisted either in spite of its orgiastic, savage and brutal mordacity or because of its consanguinity with the spirit of today's youth. It is a holiday for wind instruments and percussion and Leinsdorf called them all up in the tremendous acclaim his performance evoked. He particularly brought forward the principal bassoon, Sherman Walt, to whom falls the unique opportunity in the opening bars for a solo. For the strings it is not so much fun. The endless grunts in such irregular meter are fagging.

Tanglewood Hosts Ballet July 31

Tanglewood will present its first dance program, 'Beyond the Ghost Spectrum," on July 31.

The ballet was choreographed by James Waring with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Robert Ceely of the New England Conservatory of Music has arranged the score. Dancers and set designers are from Indian Hill, a summer arts workshop in Stockbridge.

46.

TANGLEWOOD REVIEWS

Tanglewood Friday, July 18
By A. C. S.

A sparkling performance of Rossini's Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" began the evening's major concert. Paul Zukofsky and Gilbert Kalish had given a program ealier. The soloist with the Boston Symphony was the pianist Earl Wild who played the Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor by his former teacher Xaver Scharwenka. Not only is the concerto a rarity (this was its first performance at the Festival concerts), but Mr. Wild used a Baldwin Electro concert grand.

The concerto itself is a tour de force requiring an immense technical facility. It follows a more or less standard format with typically romantic license. The new electrified piano sounded quite natural except in the lower register where it seemed thin. Earl Wild appeared happily at home with both the concerto and the piano.

Erich Leinsdorf chose Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring to complete the program. His reading seemed more controlled and somewhat less exuberant than one often encounters. Nonetheless, it was warmly received by a large audience.

Saturday, July 19
By S. L.

Saturday's performance began with the Prelude and Wedding March from "Le coq d'or" by Rimsky-Korsakov. This melodious and gay work provided a delightful opening for the concert.

Soloist Gary Graffman performed the Piano Concerto no. 2 in G op. 44. Although a brilliant concerto, the second concerto does not begin to match the well-known first piano concerto. The first movement is a trifle long and tends to wander in places. However, the second movement in which there is a beautiful duet for piano and violin is refreshing after the frenzied first movement. Due to the somewhat rushed tempi, Mr. Graffman was not able to execute clarity in certain places. In addition, there did not seem to be a perfect blend between orchestra and soloist; consequently the one seemed to be fighting the other.

The concert hit its peak with a dazzling performance of Prokofiev's Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet." Prokofiev adapted three orchestral suites from his original ballet score which was coldly received in 1936. Mr. Leinsdorf chose movements from the original ballet score as well as movements from the orchestral suites. The music well portrays the changing emotions of the Shakespeare tragedy. Mr. Leinsdorf gave a thrilling reading of this work. Plaudits should go to the brass section which really makes the emotion of the piece rise.

Sunday, July 20
By S. L.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf chose to open this Sunday afternoon's all Tchaikovsky program with the Introduction to Act two of "Swan Lake" with Laurence Thornstenberg playing the haunting English horn solo. The opening work was shortened to save everyone's energy (including the audience's) for the two momentous works to follow.

Violinist Pinchas Zukerman, born in Israel in 1948, gave a thrilling performance of the Violin Concerto in D, op. 35. Mr. Zukerman, who became so involved with his own performance that he continually gyrated and occasionally even stomped his foot, never lost control and managed to keep up with the orchestra, although from time to time his original nuances with the rhythm conflicted with the orchestra's usual precision. Mr. Zukerman received a spontaneous standing ovation from the full house at the end of his memorable performance. The last work was Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 5 in E minor, op. 64, a work with which the composer was dissatisfied. The Tanglewood audience was far from dissatisfied as Erich Leinsdorf led the symphony in a most exhilarating performance of this triumphant-sounding work. Mr. Leinsdorf ended with The Star-Spangled Banner in honor of the moon shot.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
JUL 24 1969
New England Newsclip

Boston Performance Great At Tanglewood

Just as the Lunar Module was making exciting history in outer space, in a somewhat modest but also exciting way, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its full complement for the first big weekend at Tanglewood made new and great music history in first performances at the Berkshire Festival.

Friday evening presented a little-known mid-19th century concerto by Xaver Scharwenka, "Piano Concerto No. 1" with Earl Wild as soloist, who very ably and brilliantly met the great demands of this showpiece concerto with its scientillating arpeggios, powerful choral passages and exciting tempo.

Wild has made a specialty of this type of music in the last few years and met the difficult technical demands of the concerto, helped by playing the Baldwin Electro Concert Grand, which produces a very brittle and bright sound to project the vivid effect of this music.

Mr. Wild scored a great success and aroused tremendous enthusiasm from the appreciative audience. The Boston Symphony recorded this work that night with Wild, which will be released in August.

Rossini's Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" opened the concert and after intermission Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston were heard in Stravinsky's "La Sacre du Printemps," one of the great contemporary classics, played as only a great symphony orchestra like the Boston can perform this exciting work. Despite the spasmodic showers, there was an audience of 4,556. Saturday morning's open rehearsal had an audience of 2,523.

Saturday evening's concert started with the shimmering and colorful Prelude and Wedding March from "Le Coq D'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov, followed by a little-heard piano concerto by Tchaikovsky, No. 2 in G op 44, with Gary Graffman as soloist, and this was a first performance at the festival. While Graffman began quite modestly and in a somewhat fuzzy opening, he warmed up to the piano and the concerto most brilliantly and sensitively. His was a most moving and exciting performance, attesting to his genius.

He studied with Vladmir Horowitz for 10 years, after being accepted as a pupil at the Curtis Institute at the age of 7, and made his debut at 18 with the Philadelphia Orchestra. At 21 he was the winner of the coveted Leventritt Award, and has been a frequent soloist with the Boston Symphony and has concertized in six continents. It was indeed a musical treat to hear this gifted pianist in the debut of this lovely concerto at Tanglewood.

Fine Orchestration

But the piece de resistance of Saturday's concert came after intermission when Leinsdorf conducted Prokofiev's "Scenes from Romeo and Juliet" op.64. Every nuance of the Shakespeare tragedy is orchestrated with such dramatic quality and intensity with leitmotive portraying the emotions of every character in themes hat lift the listener to experience the entire tragedy of this great play.

The orchestra chose most of the movements from the original ballet score, part of which was borrowed in the recent Romeo and Juliet film by Zeffirelli. This was truly a great and thrilling performance, Leinsdor and the orchestra were given a standing ovation, truly deserved by the audience of 6,385.

Sunday's program, on the face of it, did not promise anything other than one first performance at the festival, TChaikovsky's Introduction to Act Two of "Swan Lake," and two other familiar works by this composer. However, the "Violin Concerto in D" op. 35, as performed by the 21-year-old Israeli-born violinist Pinchas Zukerman, making his debut at Tanglewood, gave the hackneyed concerto new meaning and exquisite beauty with his virtuoso performance. He received an accolade of applause and took his bows most modestly. He was brought out again and again bythe audience which literally went wild.

The closing work—Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5 in E minor," op. 64, proved to be a most inspired performance, and Leinsdorf was given another standing ovation, as the audience cried "more"..."more"..."more". Finally, Maestro Leinsdorf quieted the audience of 7815 and most dramatically announced that the astronauts had reached the moon, and in tribute, the orchestra wished to play the National Anthem. The reaslization of this great and fantastic scientific feat, sobered the audience and the orchestra's performance was so moving that everyone stood transfixed, emotionally charged, and people were standing with tears streaming down their faces. It was a most triumphant and moving finale to the historic significance of the day, July 21st, on the moon and at Tanglewood.

SSM

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127
JUL 24 1969
New England Newsclip

Berkshire debut

The young Israeli violinist, Pinchas Zukerman, appears for the first time with the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, at Tanglewood, on Sunday afternoon, July 20.

Tanglewood Third Week

Leinsdorf Conducts Full Orchestra

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Now that the Boston Symphony is off on its grand slam, the Friday Preludes at 7 p.m. become more precious to musical afficionados. Three or four hundred rushed their suppers to hear Paul Zukofsky, violin, and Gilbert Kalish, piano, play an amazingly beautiful short program of Webern, Vier Stuckle, op. 7, and Busoni's great Second Sonata for violin and piano, op. 36a. clean contrapuntally and controlled with impressionistic color — and never covering the one valiant violin. The piano is often Brahmsian (without imitation) with the violin riding lyrically on top of the waves. The 4th movement acknowledges Bach in its theme, and then proceeds to expand the idea into the "modern" world, including Cesar Franck an chromaticism. Unlike Reger, Busoni (at least as here sounded) never allows richness to become swampy — there is always a clean edge and control. It would be interesting to record the subsequent composers Busoni launched by the soundness and sophistication of his teaching, but in this Sonata he somehow electically justifies and refines the century behind him. (For a different summing up, see Schwarenka later.)

Kalish and Zukofsky ended by repeating the inspired momentalism of the Webern.

The first concert of the full orchestra was certainly full — every player, from the eight double basses on up, earned his union pay. Everything (Rossini, Schwarenka, Stravinsky) was sensational in a way characteristic of each style and stepped up to a climax of sophisticated barbarity.

Rossini — Overture to "L'Italiana in Algieri" — had, of course, nothing to do with Algiers but used every trick of his inspired trade. The lilting oboe and prancy flute, the violins spiccato or cantabile — no orchestra does this better than the B.S.O.

Earl Wild came out to man the piano for Schwarenka's Concerto No. 7 in B flat minor. Wild is a chunky, greying athlete — it is years since Toscanini tapped him to play the Gershwin Rhapsody with NBC. But the absolute rhythm and coruscation of pianistic fire are still there.

Schwarenka, out of Poland, wowed all Europe with his piano and established conservatories in Germany and the U.S. Like Busoni, he ingested the whole 19th, but unlike Busoni, skimmed off merely the virtuoso cream of moods and techniques. The result, delivered with meticulous sonority by orchestra and pianist was an hilarious riot. (Thank God one riot was fun.) The piano sounds suspiciously like Rachmaninoff at first but later settles into improved Chopin when the orchestra makes quick crescendos up to a bang that jets the piano into cadenza (shot from guns). I think Concerto No. 1 might be entitled The Concerto of an Hundred Cadenzas.

Wild's career as a man-for-all occasions was vividly glamorized again and the orchestra, as usual, delighted in showing off.

The intermission gave me time for deep breathing and a swallow of restorative. Popped in a chair on the porch of the old mansion a few hundred years off the deep end of the Shed I heard the Rite of Spring in the right ambience. Clear as the call of Pan, himself, the wild, high bassoon figuration sprang out into the night and the "Dance of the Earth" made the ancient trees shiver with young ideas. Again, no other orchestra does it beter, including the raucous moments in the winds and the gut-thumps of the bass drum. Delicacy, too—after all, Stravinsky was appearling to Parisian In-The-Knowers. Granted the limitation of his repetitions of motifs, what invention, with only his ear and all-round musicality as a non-system! It even won over old Monteux, who could only hear a mess when Stravinsky first read it to him, with the composer stamping and jumping at the piano. Bostonians should remember Monteux for his classical style and generous imagination when he was with us.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JUL 16 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JUL 24 1969
New England

R.H. Brewer: 'A Greek Afternoon'

To The Editor:

Last Sunday, July 20th, it was the privilege of a group of East Hartfordites and some others to go by chartered bus to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshires for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This trip was sponsored by the First Federal Savings and Loan Association of East Hartford.

The orchestra had just finished its' afternoon concert in the 6,000 seat music shed. It was an All-Tchaikovsky concert and the final number had been his Symphony #5 in E Minor, Opus 64.

The applause had been tumulterous and long - the audience didn't want to stop showing its' appreciation for an afternoon of thrilling music.

The applause was just about drawing to a close when there came from the stage the announcement that our astronauts had landed on the moon, and that the orchestra would play our National Anthem.

There in silence we stood. (We had been standing for the applause.) And as we had acclaimed the orchestra with our applause, the orchestra took over our acclaimation for our astronauts by playing our National Anthem.

A great afternoon of music had been unfolded for us. Inspiration had been given and constant through the entire concert.

And then with the announcement of the moon landing and that the orchestra would play our National Anthem, our spirits rose to another climax - joy and pride in the achievement of our astronauts.

It was a great afternoon for music lovers at Tanglewood. It was a great day for America and the whole world.

Sincerely,
Raymond H. Brewer

GAZETTE
EAST HARTFORD, CONN.
WEEKLY 8,100
JUL 24 1969

46.

TANGLEWOOD REVIEWS

Tanglewood Friday, July 18
By A. C. S.

A sparkling performance of Rossini's Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" began the evening's major concert. Paul Zukofsky and Gilbert Kalish had given a program ealier. The soloist with the Boston Symphony was the pianist Earl Wild who played the Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor by his former teacher Xaver Scharwenka. Not only is the concerto a rarity (this was its first performance at the Festival concerts), but Mr. Wild used a Baldwin Electro concert grand.

The concerto itself is a tour de force requiring an immense technical facility. It follows a more or less standard format with typically romantic license. The new electrified piano sounded quite natural except in the lower register where it seemed thin. Earl Wild appeared happily at home with both the concerto and the piano.

Erich Leinsdorf chose Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring to complete the program. His reading seemed more controlled and somewhat less exuberant than one often encounters. Nonetheless, it was warmly received by a large audience.

Saturday, July 19
By S. L.

Saturday's performance began with the Prelude and Wedding March from "Le coq d'or" by Rimsky-Korsakov. This melodious and gay work provided a delightful opening for the concert.

Soloist Gary Graffman performed the Piano Concerto no. 2 in G op. 44. Although a brilliant concerto, the second concerto does not begin to match the well-known first piano concerto. The first movement is a trifle long and tends to wander in places. However, the second movement in which there is a beautiful duet for piano and violin is refreshing after the frenzied first movement. Due to the somewhat rushed tempi, Mr. Graffman was not able to execute clarity in certain places. In addition, there did not seem to be a perfect blend between orchestra and soloist; consequently the one seemed to be fighting the other.

The concert hit its peak with a dazzling performance of Prokofiev's Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet." Prokofiev adapted three orchestral suites from his original ballet score which was coldly received in 1936. Mr. Leinsdorf chose movements from the original ballet score as well as movements from the orchestral suites. The music well portrays the changing emotions of the Shakespeare tragedy. Mr. Leinsdorf gave a thrilling reading of this work. Plaudits should go to the brass section which really makes the emotion of the piece rise.

Sunday, July 20
By S. L.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf chose to open this Sunday afternoon's all Tchaikovsky program with the Introduction to Act two of "Swan Lake" with Laurence Thornstenberg playing the haunting English horn solo. The opening work was shortened to save everyone's energy (including the audience's) for the two momentous works to follow.

Violinist Pinchas Zukerman, born in Israel in 1948, gave a thrilling performance of the Violin Concerto in D, op. 35. Mr. Zukerman, who became so involved with his own performance that he continually gyrated and occasionally even stomped his foot, never lost control and managed to keep up with the orchestra, although from time to time his original nuances with the rhythm conflicted with the orchestra's usual precision. Mr. Zukerman received a spontaneous standing ovation from the full house at the end of his memorable performance. The last work was Tchaikovsky's Symphony no. 5 in E minor, op. 64, a work with which the composer was dissatisfied. The Tanglewood audience was far from dissatisfied as Erich Leinsdorf led the symphony in a most exhilarating performance of this triumphant-sounding work. Mr. Leinsdorf ended with The Star-Spangled Banner in honor of the moon shot,

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 24 1969 New England Newsclip

Boston Performance Great At Tanglewood

Just as the Lunar Module was making exciting history in outer space, in a somewhat modest but also exciting way, the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its full complement for the first big weekend at Tanglewood made new and great music history in first performances at the Berkshire Festival.

Friday evening presented a little-known mid-19th century concerto by Xaver Scharwenka, "Piano Concerto No. 1" with Earl Wild as soloist, who very ably and brilliantly met the great demands of this showpiece concerto with its scientillating arpeggios, powerful choral passages and exciting tempo.

Wild has made a specialty of this type of music in the last few years and met the difficult technical demands of the concerto, helped by playing the Baldwin Electro Concert Grand, which produces a very brittle and bright sound to project the vivid effect of this music.

Mr. Wild scored a great success and aroused tremendous enthusiasm from the appreciative audience. The Boston Symphony recorded this work that night with Wild, which will be released in August.

Rossini's Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" opened the concert and after intermission Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston were heard in Stravinsky's "La Sacre du Printemps," one of the great contemporary classics, played as only a great symphony orchestra like the Boston can perform this exciting work. Despite the spasmodic showers, there was an audience of 4,556. Saturday morning's open rehearsal had an audience of 2,523.

Saturday evening's concert started with the shimmering and colorful Prelude and Wedding March from "Le Coq D'Or" by Rimsky-Korsakov, followed by a little-heard piano concerto by Tchaikovsky, No. 2 in G op 44, with Gary Graffman as soloist, and this was a first performance at the festival. While Graffman began quite modestly and in a somewhat fuzzy opening, he warmed up to the piano and the concerto most brilliantly and sensitively. His was a most moving and exciting performance, attesting to his genius.

He studied with Vladmir Horowitz for 10 years, after being accepted as a pupil at the Curtis Institute at the age of 7, and made his debut at 18 with the Philadelphia Orchestra. At 21 he was the winner of the coveted Leventritt Award, and has been a frequent soloist with the Boston Symphony and has concertized in six continents. It was indeed a musical treat to hear this gifted pianist in the debut of this lovely concerto at Tanglewood.

Fine Orchestration

But the piece de resistance of Saturday's concert came after intermission when Leinsdorf conducted Prokofiev's "Scenes from Romeo and Juliet" op.64. Every nuance of the Shakespeare tragedy is orchestrated with such dramatic quality and intensity with leitmotive portraying the emotions of every character in themes hat lift the listener to experience the entire tragedy of this great play.

The orchestra chose most of the movements from the original ballet score, part of which was borrowed in the recent Romeo and Juliet film by Zeffirelli. This was truly a great and thrilling performance, Leinsdor and the orchestra were given a standing ovation, truly deserved by the audience of 6,385.

Sunday's program, on the face of it, did not promise anything other than one first performance at the festival, TChaikovsky's Introduction to Act Two of "Swan Lake," and two other familiar works by this composer. However, the "Violin Concerto in D" op. 35, as performed by the 21-year-old Israeli-born violinist Pinchas Zukerman, making his debut at Tanglewood, gave the hackneyed concerto new meaning and exquisite beauty with his virtuoso performance. He received an accolade of applause and took his bows most modestly. He was brought out again and again bythe audience which literally went wild.

The closing work—Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5 in E minor," op. 64, proved to be a most inspired performance, and Leinsdorf was given another standing ovation, as the audience cried "more"..."more"..."more". Finally, Maestro Leinsdorf quieted the audience of 7815 and most dramatically announced that the astronauts had reached the moon, and in tribute, the orchestra wished to play the National Anthem. The reaslization of this great and fantastic scientific feat, sobered the audience and the orchestra's performance was so moving that everyone stood transfixed, emotionally charged, and people were standing with tears streaming down their faces. It was a most triumphant and moving finale to the historic significance of the day, July 21st, on the moon and at Tanglewood.

SSM

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

JUL 24 1969 New England Newsclip

Berkshire debut

The young Israeli violinist, Pinchas Zukerman, appears for the first time with the Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, at Tanglewood, on Sunday afternoon, July 20.

Tanglewood Third Week

Leinsdorf Conducts Full Orchestra

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Now that the Boston Symphony is off on its grand slam, the Friday Preludes at 7 p.m. become more precious to musical afficionados. Three or four hundred rushed their suppers to hear Paul Zukofsky, violin, and Gilbert Kalish, piano, play an amazingly beautiful short program of Webern, Vier Stuckle, op. 7, and Busoni's great Second Sonata for violin and piano, op. 36a. clean contrapuntally and controlled with impressionistic color — and never covering the one valiant violin. The piano is often Brahmsian (without imitation) with the violin riding lyrically on top of the waves. The 4th movement acknowledges Bach in its theme, and then proceeds to expand the idea into the "modern" world, including Cesar Franck an chromaticism. Unlike Reger, Busoni (at least as here sounded) never allows richness to become swampy — there is always a clean edge and control. It would be interesting to record the subsequent composers Busoni launched by the soundness and sophistication of his teaching, but in this Sonata he somehow electically justifies and refines the century behind him. (For a different summing up, see Schwarenka later.)

The Webern is now classic touch-and-go modern — tiny, condensed movements, like the "Trivia" of Logan Pearsall Smith (1920's) but not trivial. All the fat has been burned off in conception so that each second of sound is a finality. It would all be neurasthetically frenetic except for the rhythmic silences and the complete aplomb of the two performers. Mr. Kalish has often proved that he can play a big piano (to rival the Ribes and Paderewskis) and here the Baldwin is still big in flashing moments, but delicate as Debussy or staccatto as a sandpiper, as needed. Mr. Zukovsky is also, by now, known for his keen command of the chamber music idiom. Delicacy, brutality and dream, all in six minutes.

Busoni, in 1898, rounds out the large century of imperialistic musical expansion, a distinguished parallel to Mahler in his all-knowing and accepting way, but with none of Mahler's post-Wagner melting into nostalgic despair. Busoni gathered up all possibilities from Beethoven on, indeed recreated J. S. Bach again. Kalish with an intuition for Busoni's own pianism, kept it

Kalish and Zukofsky ended by repeating the inspired momentalism of the Webern.

The first concert of the full orchestra was certainly full — every player, from the eight double basses on up, earned his union pay. Everything (Rossini, Schwarenka, Stravinsky) was sensational in a way characteristic of each style and stepped up to a climax of sophisticated barbarity.

Rossini — Overture to "L'Italiana in Algieri" — had, of course, nothing to do with Algiers but used every trick of his inspired trade. The lilting oboe and prancy flute, the violins spiccato or cantabile — no orchestra does this better than the B.S.O.

Earl Wild came out to man the piano for Schwarenka's Concerto No. 7 in B flat minor. Wild is a chunky, greying athlete — it is years since Toscanini tapped him to play the Gershwin Rhapsody with NBC. But the absolute rhythm and coruscation of pianistic fire are still there.

Schwarenka, out of Poland, wowed all Europe with his piano and established conservatories in Germany and the U.S. Like Busoni, he ingested the whole 19th, but unlike Busoni, skimmed off merely the virtuoso cream of moods and techniques. The result, delivered with meticulous sonority by orchestra and pianist was an hilarious riot. (Thank God one riot was fun.) The piano sounds suspiciously like Rachmaninoff at first but later settles into improved Chopin when the orchestra makes quick crescendos up to a bang that jets the piano into cadenza (shot from guns). I think Concerto No. 1 might be entitled The Concerto of an Hundred Cadenzas.

Wild's career as a man-for-all occasions was vividly glamorized again and the orchestra, as usual, delighted in showing off.

The intermission gave me time for deep breathing and a swallow of restorative. Popped in a chair on the porch of the old mansion a few hundred years off the deep end of the Shed I heard the Rite of Spring in the right ambience. Clear as the call of Pan, himself, the wild, high bassoon figuration sprang out into the night and the "Dance of the Earth" made the ancient trees shiver with young ideas. Again, no other orchestra does it beter, including the raucous moments in the winds and the gut-thumps of the bass drum. Delicacy, too—after all, Stravinsky was appearling to Parisian In-The-Knowers. Granted the limitation of his repetitions of motifs, what invention, with only his ear and all-round musicality as a non-system! It even won over old Monteux, who could only hear a mess when Stravinsky first read it to him, with the composer stamping and jumping at the piano. Bostonians should remember Monteux for his classical style and generous imagination when he was with us.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 16 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 24 1969 New England

R.H. Brewer: 'A Great Afternoon'

To The Editor:

Last Sunday, July 20th, it was the privilege of a group of East Hartfordites and some others to go by chartered bus to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshires for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This trip was sponsored by the First Federal Savings and Loan Association of East Hartford.

The orchestra had just finished its' afternoon concert in the 6,000 seat music shed. It was an All-Tchaikosky concert and the final number had been his Symphony #5 in E Minor, Opus 64.

The applause had been tumulterous and long - the audience didn't want to stop showing its' appreciation for an afternoon of thrilling music.

The applause was just about drawing to a close when there came from the stage the announcement that our astronauts had landed on the moon, and that the orchestra would play our National Anthem.

There in silence we stood. (We had been standing for the applause.) And as we had acclaimed the orchestra with our applause, the orchestra took over our acclaimation for our astronauts by playing our National Anthem.

A great afternoon of music had been unfolded for us. Inspiration had been deep and constant through the entire concert.

And then with the announcement of the moon landing and that the orchestra would play our National Anthem, our spirits rose to another climax - joy and pride in the achievement of our astronauts.

It was a great afternoon for music lovers at Tanglewood. It was a great day for America and the whole world.

Sincerely,
Raymond H. Brewer

GAZETTE
EAST HARTFORD, CONN.

JUL 24 1969 E

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE, MONDAY, JULY 21, 1969

Tanglewood Concert Proves Crisp and Interesting

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

After the traditional two weeks of music by pre-Romantic composers, this past weekend's Tanglewood fare inaugurated the remaining six weeks of music for full orchestra.

* * *

Friday's concert proved especially interesting: selections included Rossini's overture to An Italian in Algiers, Xaver Scharwenka's First Piano Concerto, and the Rite of Spring by Stravinsky.

The Rossini served as curtain-raiser and conductor Erich Leinsdorf brought to the music a crispness and definition as subtle as it was theatrical. Surely the ravishing wind playing, particularly during the very opening and again near the conclusion, contributed to this most successful performance.

But the important thing was Leinsdorf's intuitive feel for presenting the various episodes in a fashion that insured continuity. Admittedly, textures in certain spots sounded thin and the expected explosive gestures were all but tamed, yet this was not sufficient to detract from an otherwise noteworthy performance.

Scharwenka's Piano Concerto was a new listening experience for most in the audience, myself included. The composer's life spanned nearly 75 years, from 1850 to 1924. His music is unashamedly romantic, but it would be unkind to say it is merely derivative. Even though one is often strongly reminded of Rachmaninoff, Liszt, and Saint-Saens, it might be more correct to regard these more famous composers as influences rather than models.

* * *

Scharwenka, after all, sums up the Romantic Age and by necessity must imitate, to a degree, its more celebrated exponents. What keeps him from being just a plagiaristic mirror is a high degree of extraordinarly difficult virtuousity and some relatively outstanding compositional ingenuity (Busoni, the up-and-coming "in Composer" is less interesting by comparison if only because he is less successful at manipulating the material at hand).

Musically, the work begins with a raging, stormy orchestral recitative in the boldest operatic tradition. A lyrical second section, hinted at in the piano's first entry, forms the perfect contrast with its dreamy and brightly colored nostalgic horn and wind passages. At times there is an almost Mahlerian yearning in the strings or in the piano solo.

The scherzo is right out of Saint-Saens and Litloff, a bouncing, straightforward frolic. In the finale, the storm again returns, but even a brief major-key respite just before the close cannot turn back the tide of grimness and pathos which are the work's utimate culmination.

Earl Wils was soloist in the work, and as a musician he seems to become more and more interesting as time goes on. His technique is florid, yet secure, and the sound produced is always vividly colorful and original. He played the Baldwin Electro Concert Grand for the performance, whose sound seemed exactly like a conventional instrument except that it seemed to have more depth and projection, particularly in the orchestrally-dominated parts.

* * *

Surely when large orchestral forces are pitted against a single piano the balances achieved (especially outdoors) are never as clear or ideal as might be hoped for, so the Electro Grand may represent a highly significant and musically justified apparatus (now if only someone would invent an Electro cello so we could at last hear Dvorak's lovely but sorely imbalanced concerto for that instrument).

The pianist was aided by what seemed to be an ideal accompaniment from Leinsdorf and the orchestra, the joint forces being applauded for their efforts after every movement. Incidentally, the Scharwenka work is being released by RCA Victor records next month and may be a runaway bestseller.

After intermission Stravinsky's monumental Rite of Spring was given what can only be called a powerful rendition. Having heard on a transcription broadcast not so long ago a poor reading by Leinsdorf, I expected his two bad habits of anxiously pushing the music and concentrating on a single rank of the orchestra (to the detriment of a more coherent orchestral sound) to mar the Friday performance.

But happily, the conductor has really changed his outlook. He conducted firmly without driving the musicians and so balanced the orchestra as to make each choir a prismatic segment of the manifold aggregation.

Very few mistakes were made, and those only small ones (wrong transposition of a horn part midway through the soft prelude to the second half, for example, or horrid intonation during the very opening). But considering the epic sweep and dynamic surge Leinsdorf brought out of the music, the performance was stunning indeed.

Saturday's program was devoted to music by Russian composers. The Prelude and Wedding Barch from Rimsky- Korsakov's Le Coq d'or opened the evening, and it received an incredibly brilliant performance. Leinsdorf caught the atmospheric opening mood of airy stillness and sensuous beauty with unbelievable realism, then launched into an overwhelming march that by the conclusion generated such intense animal excitement many members of the audience were brought to their feet.

Tchaikovsky's Second Piano Concerto was played next. Soloist was Gary Graffman, who played the mediocre work with neither brilliance nor mastery. Frekuently he had difficulty realizing the correct notes, and because of excessive pedal abuse rendered most of his textures opaque and turgid.

Besides all that, the performance was impaired even further due to Graffman's inability to relate to the orchestra, resulting in a disproportionate and crassly prominent solo. Leinsdorf contributed a fine accompaniment and some fine playing was heard from cellist Eskin and Concertmaster Silverstein during the andante, but the total experience proved a loss.

Following intermission the 55 minute suite of music from Prokofiev's ballet Romeo and Juliet was featured. Arranged by BSO assistant conductor Charles Wilson, the work has been played many times by the orchestra and has become a familiar staple over the past few years.

Although the first few sections were immoderately rushed, Leinsdorf again turned in a splendid performance. Best were the soaring romantic sections, the tomb scene, and the transfiguring conclusion. Other fine parts were the lovely serenade with its charming mandolin solo and the mechanistic duel scene. Throughout, the playing was just magnificent.

* * *

Sunday afternoon an all-Tchaikovsky program was offered. Amazingly, performances of the three familiar chestnuts were outstanding, never sounding anything but fresh and vital.

The feature work was the Fifth Symphony, which received an altogether thrilling interpretation.

Swedish pilots are manning Biafran planes.

Macy's

Why not get fine quality ZENITH hearing aids

ACCESSORIES and BATTERIES

CALL 459-1950 MONDAY FOR HOME DEMONSTRATION

ZENITH HEARING AID CENTER MACY'S FIRST LEVEL

For this all that sound critical writing about Zukerman is left

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000

JUL 18 1969 New England

Pinchas Zuckerman, violinist
—Goldenberg photo

Pinchas Zukerman, is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Sunday July 20 with Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Mr Zukerman, began the study of the violin at seven with his father, also a talented performer. Soon afterwards his formal training began at the Israel Conservatory and the Academy of Music in Tel-Aviv.

When he was 13, he played for Isaac Stern and Pablo Casals. On their recommendation he enrolled at the Juillard School to study with Ivan Galamian. In 1966 he performed at the Spoleto Festival of two worlds, and won first prize in the Leventritt Competition.

The concert on July 20, Sunday, is at 2:30 pm. Week-end preludes are Fridays at 7 pm, open rehearsals Saturdays at 10:30 am.

47

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 24 1969 New England Newsclip

"Otello" At Tanglewood

The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens on Friday, July 25 with the 7 p.m. Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p..m Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven/Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto no. 2 in B flat. Mr. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony no. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be given Saturday evening, July 26 at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

On Sunday afternoon, July 27 at 2:30 p.m. Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony no. 2 of Sibelius and the Emperor concerto of Beethoven.

The Open Rehearsal, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., with all seats unreserved. The Tanglewood box office is open from 9-6; the phone number is (413) 637-1600.

EARL WILD . . . will play romantic 19th-Century piano music as a prelude to the Friday evening concert at Tanglewood.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000

JUL 25 1969 New England

Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass, phone 413-637-1600; performances Fris at 9 pm, Sats 8 pm, Suns 2:30 pm, week-end preludes Fris 7 pm, open rehearsals Sats 10:30 am; write the Festival at Tanglewood for complete schedule. Season ends Aug 31.

NEW YORK POST
Wednesday, July 23, 1969

47

Summer Music Festivals

Berkshire Festival: Continues through Aug. 24, Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m., Sundays at 2:30. For further information write the Festival office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., or consult Parker Tours, N.Y. City. Tel: 581-1234.

Saratoga Performing Arts Center: N. Y. City Ballet through July 27; Philadelphia Orchestra July 31 through Aug. 24, Thursdays, Fridays, Saturdays at 8:30 p.m., Sundays at 3:30 p.m. For further information write the Center at Saratoga Springs, N. Y. 12866, or consult Parker Tours, N. Y. City. Tel: 581-1234.

Newport Music Festival, 31 through Aug. 9, oper- instrumental con-

Festival: Continues through Aug. 30 . . . Aug. 2, Metropolitan Opera soprano Roberta Peters, and Met Opera tenor Jan Peerce with Newell Jenkins conducting Clarion Orchestra . . . Aug. 9, Eddie Arnold, vocalist . . . Aug. 23, "Viennese Night," with Julius Rudel conducting Caramoor Festival Orchestra, pianis Gary Graffman as soloist . Aug. 30 to be announc Tickets can be obtained telephone, (Code 201) 347 or 45, or by mail to th tival, Stanhope, N. J. All concerts begin at

Garden State Ar July 28-Aug. 2, let Theater tractions Aug

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE, MONDAY, JULY 21, 1969

Tanglewood Concert Proves Crisp and Interesting

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

After the traditional two weeks of music by pre-Romantic composers, this past weekend's Tanglewood fare inaugurated the remaining six weeks of music for full orchestra.

* * *

Friday's concert proved especially interesting: selections included Rossini's overture to An Italian in Algiers, Xaver Scharwenka's First Piano Concerto, and the Rite of Spring by Stravinsky.

The Rossini served as curtain-raiser and conductor Erich Leinsdorf brought to the music a crispness and definition as subtle as it was theatrical. Surely the ravishing wind playing, particularly during the very opening and again near the conclusion, contributed to this most successful performance.

But the important thing was Leinsdorf's intuitive feel for presenting the various episodes in a fashion that insured continuity. Admittedly, textures in certain spots sounded thin and the expected explosive gestures were all but tamed, yet this was not sufficient to detract from an otherwise noteworthy performance.

Scharwenka's Piano Concerto was a new listening experience for most in the audience, myself included. The composer's life spanned nearly 75 years, from 1850 to 1924. His music is unashamedly romantic, but it would be unkind to say it is merely derivative. Even though one is often strongly reminded of Rachmaninoff, Liszt, and Saint-Saens, it might be more correct to regard these more famous composers as influences rather than models.

* * *

Scharwenka, after all, sums up the Romantic Age and by necessity must imitate, to a degree, its more celebrated exponents. What keeps him from being just a plagiaristic mirror is a high degree of extraordinarly difficult virtuousity and some relatively outstanding compositional ingenuity (Busoni, the up-and-coming "in Composer" is less interesting by comparison if only because he is less successful at manipulating the material at hand).

Musically, the work begins with a raging, stormy orchestral recitative in the boldest operatic tradition. A lyrical second section, hinted at in the piano's first entry, forms the perfect contrast with its dreamy and brightly colored nostalgic horn and wind passages. At times there is an almost Mahlerian yearning in the strings or in the piano solo.

The scherzo is right out of Saint-Saens and Litloff, a bouncing, straightforward frolic. In the finale, the storm again returns, but even a brief major-key respite just before the close cannot turn back the tide of grimness and pathos which are the work's utimate culmination.

Earl Wils was soloist in the work, and as a musician he seems to become more and more interesting as time goes on. His technique is florid, yet secure, and the sound produced is always vividly colorful and original. He played the Baldwin Electro Concert Grand for the performance, whose sound seemed exactly like a conventional instrument except that it seemed to have more depth and projection, particularly in the orchestrally-dominated parts.

* * *

Surely when large orchestral forces are pitted against a single piano the balances achieved (especially outdoors) are never as clear or ideal as might be hoped for, so the Electro Grand may represent a highly significant and musically justified apparatus (now if only someone would invent an Electro cello so we could at last hear Dvorak's lovely but sorely imbalanced concerto for that instrument).

The pianist was aided by what seemed to be an ideal accompaniment from Leinsdorf and the orchestra, the joint forces being applauded for their efforts after every movement. Incidentally, the Scharwenka work is being released by RCA Victor records next month and may be a runaway bestseller.

After intermission Stravinsky's monumental Rite of Spring was given what can only be called a powerful rendition. Having heard on a transcription broadcast not so long ago a poor reading by Leinsdorf, I expected his two bad habits of anxiously pushing the music and concentrating on a single rank of the orchestra (to the detriment of a more coherent orchestral sound) to mar the Friday performance.

But happily, the conductor has really changed his outlook. He conducted firmly without driving the musicians and so balanced the orchestra as to make each choir a prismatic segment of the manifold aggregation.

Very few mistakes were made, and those only small ones (wrong transposition of a horn part midway through the soft prelude to the second half, for example, or horrid intonation during the very opening). But considering the epic sweep and dynamic surge Leinsdorf brought out of the music, the performance was stunning indeed.

Saturday's program was devoted to music by Russian composers. The Prelude and Wedding Barch from Rimsky- Korsakov's Le Coq d'or opened the evening, and it received an incredibly brilliant performance. Leinsdorf caught the atmospheric opening mood of airy stillness and sensuous beauty with unbelievable realism, then launched into an overwhelming march that by the conclusion generated such intense animal excitement many members of the audience were brought to their feet.

Tchaikovsky's Second Piano Concerto was played next. Soloist was Gary Graffman, who played the mediocre work with neither brilliance nor mastery. Frekuently he had difficulty realizing the correct notes, and because of excessive pedal abuse rendered most of his textures opaque and turgid.

Besides all that, the performance was impaired even further due to Graffman's inability to relate to the orchestra, resulting in a disproportionate and crassly prominent solo. Leinsdorf contributed a fine accompaniment and some fine playing was heard from cellist Eskin and Concertmaster Silverstein during the andante, but the total experience proved a loss.

Following intermission the 55 minute suite of music from Prokofiev's ballet Romeo and Juliet was featured. Arranged by BSO assistant conductor Charles Wilson, the work has been played many times by the orchestra and has become a familiar staple over the past few years.

Although the first few sections were immoderately rushed, Leinsdorf again turned in a splendid performance. Best were the soaring romantic sections, the tomb scene, and the transfiguring conclusion. Other fine parts were the lovely serenade with its charming mandolin solo and the mechanistic duel scene. Throughout, the playing was just magnificent.

* * *

Sunday afternoon an all-Tchaikovsky program was offered. Amazingly, performances of the three familiar chestnuts were outstanding, never sounding anything but fresh and vital. The feature work was the Fifth Symphony, which received an altogether thrilling interpretation.

Swedish pilots are manning Biafran planes.

Macy's

Why not get fine quality ZENITH hearing aids

ACCESSORIES and BATTERIES

CALL 459-1950 MONDAY FOR HOME DEMONSTRATION

ZENITH HEARING AID CENTER MACY'S FIRST LEVEL

For this all that critical writing about Zukerman is!

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000

JUL 18 1969 New England

Pinchas Zuckerman, violinist
—Goldenberg photo

Pinchas Zukerman, is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Sunday July 20 with Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Mr Zukerman, began the study of the violin at seven with his father, also a talented performer. Soon afterwards his formal training began at the Israel Conservatory and the Academy of Music in Tel-Aviv.

When he was 13, he played for Isaac Stern and Pablo Casals. On their recommendation he enrolled at the Juillard School to study with Ivan Galamian. In 1966 he performed at the Spoleto Festival of two worlds, and won first prize in the Leventritt Competition.

The concert on July 20, Sunday, is at 2:30 pm. Week-end preludes are Fridays at 7 pm, open rehearsals Saturdays at 10:30 am.

47

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 24 1969 New England Newsclip

"Otello" At Tanglewood

The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens on Friday, July 25 with the 7 p.m. Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p..m Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven/Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto no. 2 in B flat. Mr. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony no. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be given Saturday evening, July 26 at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

On Sunday afternoon, July 27 at 2:30 p.m. Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony no. 2 of Sibelius and the Emperor concerto of Beethoven.

The Open Rehearsal, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., with all seats unreserved. The Tanglewood box office is open from 9-6; the phone number is (413) 637-1600.

EARL WILD . . . will play romantic 19th-Century piano music as a prelude to the Friday evening concert at Tanglewood.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000

JUL 25 1969 New England

Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass, phone 413-637-1600; performances Fris at 9 pm, Sats 8 pm, Suns 2:30 pm, week-end preludes Fris 7 pm, open rehearsals Sats 10:30 am; write the Festival at Tanglewood for complete schedule. Season ends Aug 31.

NEW YORK POST
Wednesday, July 23, 1969

47

Summer Music Festivals

Berkshire Festival: Continues through Aug. 24, Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m., Sundays at 2:30. For further information write the Festival office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., or consult Parker Tours, N.Y. City. Tel: 581-1234.

Saratoga Performing Arts Center: N. Y. City Ballet through July 27; Philadelphia Orchestra July 31 through Aug. 24, Thursdays, Fridays, Saturdays at 8:30 p.m., Sundays at 3:30 p.m. For further information write the Center at Saratoga Springs, N. Y. 12866, or consult Parker Tours, N. Y. City. Tel: 581-1234.

Newport Music Festival, 31 through Aug. 9, oper- instrumental con-

Festival: Continues through Aug. 30 . . . Aug. 2, Metropolitan Opera soprano Roberta Peters, and Met Opera tenor Jan Peerce with Newell Jenkins conducting Clarion Orchestra . . . Aug. 9, Eddie Arnold, vocalist . . . Aug. 23, "Viennese Night," with Julius Rudel conducting Caramoor Festival Orchestra, pianis Gary Graffman as soloist . Aug. 30 to be announc Tickets can be obtained telephone, (Code 201) 347 or 45, or by mail to the tival, Stanhope, N. J. All concerts begin at 48.

Garden State Ar July 28-Aug. 2, let Theater tractions Aug

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902
JUL 18 1969

Tanglewood Opens 4th Week July 25

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., July 25 finds Erich Leinsdorf leading the Boston Symphony in a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat Major. The concert begins at 9 p.m. but at 7 p.m. pianist Earl Wild will play a short recital in the Music Shed prior to the orchestral concert at no extra cost to ticket holders.

July 26th Leinsdorf will lead Verdi's "Requiem" at 8 p.m. Soloists will include tenor Richard Cassilly, soprano Marilan Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes. July 26th at 2:30 p.m. Charles Wilson will lead the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 and the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist.

Prior to each Friday event during the Festival season which continues for eight weeks, concluding Aug. 24, there will be a "weekend prelude" at 7 p.m., that is, a recital by a solo artist preceding the orchestral concert by the Bostonians at 9 p.m. All of these recitals are free to ticket holders.

4th

Concert Performance of Otello On Tanglewood Program

ANDRE WATTS

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens July 25 with the 7 p.m. weekend prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven - Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto no. 2 in B flat. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony no. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be given Saturday evening at 8. Tenor Richard Cassil y sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milness sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
JUL 20 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD: Vladimir Ashkenazy will be guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, July 27th, at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000
JUL 20 1969
& Republican -7-27-'69

Tanglewood Starts 4th Weekend

LENOX, Mass. — The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens tonight at 7 o'clock, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the 19th Century.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at 7, conducted by music director Erich Leinsdorf, is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 in B flat. Leinsdorf will open the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony No. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Othello will be given Saturday at 6 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus will participate in the performance.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony No. 2 of Sibelius and the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

The open rehearsal for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund is scheduled Saturday at 10:30 a.m.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127
JUL 25 1969

Fourth Weekend Program At Berkshire Festival

The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens on Friday, July 25, with the 7 p.m., Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic music of the 19th century.

The 9 p.m., Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Sirector Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 in B flat. Mr. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony No. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be given Saturday evening, July 26, at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

On Sunday afternoon, July 27, at 2:30 p.m., Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony No. 2 of Sibelius and the Emporer concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

The Open Researsal, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, is on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., with all seats $2.50, unreserved. The Tanglewood box office is open from 9-6; the phone number is (413) 637-1600.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JUL 15 1969

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900
JUL 23 1969

WGBH to Broadcast Tanglewood Concerts

Soviet pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy and French conductor Pierre Boulez will be guest artists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of July 27 on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

The three concerts will all be aired live and in stereo direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood. On Sunday, July 27, at 2:30 p.m. the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor Charles Wilson will direct Symphony No. 7 by Sibelius and Beethoven's Emperor Piano Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist.

The following Friday, Aug. 1 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf will be the conductor in a program that includes "Le Chant du Rossignol" by Stravinsky, "A Survivor from Warsaw" by Schoenberg and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Third Concert

Guest conductor Pierre Boulez will be on the podium Saturday, August 1 at 8 p.m., and for this third concert of the week he has chosen Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat, Op. 84 (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Ralph Gombert, Oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and Jules Eskin, cello); "Jeux" by Debussy, Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra with Mr. Silverstein again as soloist; and "La Mer" by Debussy.

The concerts are produced for radio by Jordan Whitelaw.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
JUL 11 1969

WEEK

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(E) 42,315
JUL 25 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JUL 17 1969
New England Newsclip

Earl Wild To Play At Tanglewood

The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens today with the evening Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the 19th century.

The evening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Ahdre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 in B. flat. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony No. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera "Othello" will be given Saturday evening. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role.

Sunday afternoon, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony No. 2 of Sibelius and the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

The open rehearsal, for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, is on Saturday at 10:30 a.m.

Ashkenazy, Boulez With BSO from Lenox

Soviet pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy and conductor Pierre Boulez will be guest artists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of July 27 on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

The three concerts will all be aired live and in stereo direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood. On Sunday, July 27 at 2:30 p.m. the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor Charles Wilson will direct Symphony No. 7 by Sibelius and Beethoven's Emperor Piano Concerto with Mr. Ashkenazy as soloist.

The following Friday, Aug. 1 at 9 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf will conduct a program that includes "Le Chant du Rossignol" by Stravinsky, "A Survivor from Warsaw" by Schoenberg and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Guest conductor Pierre Boulez will be on the podium Saturday, Aug. 1 at 8 p.m. and has chosen Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat, Op. 84 (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Ralph Gombert, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Jules Eskin, cello); "Jeux" by Debussy, Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra with Mr. Silverstein as soloist and "La Mer" by Debussy.

Earl Wild at festival

The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens Friday with the 7 p.m. Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by music director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven and Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's "Egmont Overture" and Symphony no. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera "Otello" will be given Saturday at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings "Iago". The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

Next Sunday afternoon at 2:30, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony no. 2 of Sibelius and the "Emperor Concerto" of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

Sunday, July 20, 1969

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000
JUL 20 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD: Andre Watts will be guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, July 25, at 9 p.m.

VLADIMIR ASHKENAZY will be guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Sunday afternoon at 2:30.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 12 1969

BSO Plans Verdi 'Otello' For 4th Weekend Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present Verdi's "Otello" next Saturday evening at 8 as the featured performance on the fourth weekend program of concerts at Tanglewood.

Italian Dialogue

Tenor Richard Cassilly will sing the title role, with soprano Maralin Niska as Desdemona and baritone Sherrill Milnes as Iago. All roles will be sung in Italian. The Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus will also participate in the performance.

Vladimir Ashkenazy, Soviet pianist, will be the soloist in the Sunday afternoon concert at 2:30. He will do the "Emperor" concerto by Beethoven. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, will also direct the BSO in Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

Friday evening at 9, the Boston Symphony will present a Beethoven-Brahms program with Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf will open the program with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Symphony No. 1 in C. Pianist Earl Wild will present a medley of 19th-century romantic music at the 7 p.m. weekend prelude.

Open rehearsals for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund are held every Saturday morning at 10:30.

Tanglewood Weekend

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, — The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens on Friday July 25 with the 7 p.m. Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 in B flat. Mr. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony No. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be given Saturday evening July 26 at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

On Sunday afternoon July 27 at 2:30 p.m., Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of ohe Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony No. 2 of Sibelius and the Emperor concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

The Open Rehearsal, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., with all seats $2.50, unreserved. The Tanglewood box office is open from 9-6; the phone number is (413) 637-1600.

48

4th WEEK

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

JUL 18 1969

Tanglewood Opens 4th Week July 25

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., July 25 finds Erich Leinsdorf leading the Boston Symphony in a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat Major. The concert begins at 9 p.m. but at 7 p.m. pianist Earl Wild will play a short recital in the Music Shed prior to the orchestral concert at no extra cost to ticket holders.

July 26th Leinsdorf will lead Verdi's "Requiem" at 8 p.m. Soloists will include tenor Richard Cassilly, soprano Marilan Niska and baritone Sherrill Milnes. July 26th at 2:30 p.m. Charles Wilson will lead the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 and the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist.

Prior to each Friday event during the Festival season which continues for eight weeks, concluding Aug. 24, there will be a "weekend prelude" at 7 p.m., that is, a recital by a solo artist preceding the orchestral concert by the Bostonians at 9 p.m. All of these recitals are free to ticket holders.

Concert Performance of Otello On Tanglewood Program

ANDRE WATTS

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 20 1969

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens July 25 with the 7 p.m. weekend prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven - Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto no. 2 in B flat. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony no. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be given Saturday evening at 8. Tenor Richard Cassil y sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milness sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

AT TANGLEWOOD: Vladimir Ashkenazy will be guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, July 27th, at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 20 1969

& Republican - 7-27-'69

Tanglewood Starts 4th Weekend

LENOX, Mass. — The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens tonight at 7 o'clock, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the 19th Century.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at 7, conducted by music director Erich Leinsdorf, is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 in B flat. Leinsdorf will open the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony No. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Othello will be given Saturday at 6 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus will participate in the performance.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony No. 2 of Sibelius and the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

The open rehearsal for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund is scheduled Saturday at 10:30 a.m

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

JUL 25 1969

Fourth Weekend Program At Berkshire Festival

The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens on Friday, July 25, with the 7 p.m., Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic music of the 19th century.

The 9 p.m., Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Sirector Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 in B flat. Mr. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony No. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be given Saturday evening, July 26, at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

On Sunday afternoon, July 27, at 2:30 p.m., Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony No. 2 of Sibelius and the Emporer concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

The Open Researsal, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, is on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., with all seats $2.50, unreserved. The Tanglewood box office is open from 9-6; the phone number is (413) 637-1600.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 15 1969

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(T) 14,900

JUL 23 1969

WGBH to Broadcast Tanglewood Concerts

Soviet pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy and French conductor Pierre Boulez will be guest artists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of July 27 on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

The three concerts will all be aired live and in stereo direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood. On Sunday, July 27, at 2:30 p.m. the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor Charles Wilson will direct Symphony No. 7 by Sibelius and Beethoven's Emperor Piano Concerto with Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist.

The following Friday, Aug. 1 at 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf will be the conductor in a program that includes "Le Chant du Rossignol" by Stravinsky, "A Survivor from Warsaw" by Schoenberg and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Third Concert

Guest conductor Pierre Boulez will be on the podium Saturday, August 1 at 8 p.m., and for this third concert of the week he has chosen Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat, Op. 84 (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Ralph Gombert, Oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and Jules Eskin, cello); "Jeux" by Debussy, Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra with Mr. Silverstein again as soloist; and "La Mer" by Debussy.

The concerts are produced for radio by Jordan Whitelaw.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 11 1969

Earl Wild at festival

The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens Friday with the 7 p.m. Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by music director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven and Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's "Egmont Overture" and Symphony no. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera "Otello" will be given Saturday at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings "Iago". The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

Next Sunday afternoon at 2:30, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony no. 2 of Sibelius and the "Emperor Concerto" of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

Sunday, July 20, 1969

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 20 1969

AT TANGLEWOOD: Andre Watts will be guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, July 25, at 9 p.m.

VLADIMIR ASHKENAZY will be guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Sunday afternoon at 2:30.

Earl Wild To Play At Tanglewood

The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens today with the evening Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the 19th century.

The evening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 in B. flat. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony No. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera "Othello" will be given Saturday evening. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role.

Sunday afternoon. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony No. 2 of Sibelius and the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

The open rehearsal, for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, is on Saturday at 10:30 a.m.

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(E) 42,315

JUL 25 1969

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 21,000

JUL 17 1969

New England Newsclip

Ashkenazy, Boulez With BSO from Lenox

Soviet pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy and conductor Pierre Boulez will be guest artists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of July 27 on WGBH radio (89.7 FM).

The three concerts will all be aired live and in stereo direct from the Music Shed at Tanglewood. On Sunday, July 27 at 2:30 p.m. the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor Charles Wilson will direct Symphony No. 7 by Sibelius and Beethoven's Emperor Piano Concerto with Mr. Ashkenazy as soloist.

The following Friday, Aug. 1 at 9 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf will conduct a program that includes "Le Chant du Rossignol" by Stravinsky, "A Survivor from Warsaw" by Schoenberg and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Guest conductor Pierre Boulez will be on the podium Saturday, Aug. 1 at 8 p.m. and has chosen Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat, Op. 84 (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Ralph Gombert, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Jules Eskin, cello); "Jeux" by Debussy, Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra with Mr. Silverstein as soloist and "La Mer" by Debussy.

BSO Plans Verdi 'Otello' For 4th Weekend Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present Verdi's "Otello" next Saturday evening at 8 as the featured performance on the fourth weekend program of concerts at Tanglewood.

Italian Dialogue

Tenor Richard Cassilly will sing the title role, with soprano Maralin Niska as Desdemona and baritone Sherrill Milnes as Iago. All roles will be sung in Italian. The Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus will also participate in the performance.

Vladimir Ashkenazy, Soviet pianist, will be the soloist in the Sunday afternoon concert at 2:30. He will do the "Emperor" concerto by Beethoven. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, will also direct the BSO in Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

Friday evening at 9, the Boston Symphony will present a Beethoven-Brahms program with Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf will open the program with Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Symphony No. 1 in C. Pianist Earl Wild will present a medley of 19th-century romantic music at the 7 p.m. weekend prelude.

Open rehearsals for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund are held every Saturday morning at 10:30.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 12 1969

Tanglewood Weekend

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, — The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens on Friday July 25 with the 7 p.m. Weekend Prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto No. 2 in B flat. Mr. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony No. 1 in C.

A complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera Otello will be given Saturday evening July 26 at 8 p.m. Tenor Richard Cassily sings the title role, soprano Maralin Niska sings Desdemona, and baritone Sherrill Milnes sings Iago. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir, and Berkshire Chorus participate in the performance.

On Sunday afternoon July 27 at 2:30 p.m., Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor of ohe Boston Symphony, leads a program consisting of two works, the Symphony No. 2 of Sibelius and the Emperor concerto of Beethoven. Soviet piano virtuoso Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist in the Beethoven.

The Open Rehearsal, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., with all seats $2.50, unreserved. The Tanglewood box office is open from 9-6; the phone number is (413) 637-1600.

Advocate Arts

- ART
- CINEMA
- DANCE
- LITERATURE
- MUSIC
- OPERA
- THEATRE

At Tanglewood

Soloists Wild and Watts

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Friday's offering demonstrated the circus aspect of Tanglewood at the expense of musical festival in any terms a musician could respect.

The 7 p.m. Prelude forgot its earlier distinction and presented Earl (Smoothie) Wild in an entirely unneeded piano recital out of the hoary tradition of such tittilation for 11 a.m. pre-cocktail hours or artist-series in the hinterland—or television culture. Mr. Wild is terribly skillful and his program terribly appropriate to his genius (genius is not necessarily intelligent).

Tausig's hopped-up arrangement of the Bach Organ Toccata in D minor, like Busoni's similar but more musical interpretations, is sure-fire excitement. And it should be (rapid figurations on organ or harpsichord can make a glorious impresionism of glowing harmony—see also Belinese Gamelons) but between Tausig and Wild so many inner reasons and connections were missing that while Bach himself would cheer the powerful sensations he would certainly have shown his famous temper at such rootless exploitation.

The rest of the Prelude program was of-a-piece: Mendelssohn and Brahms reduced to sentimental dream and dash—the dash more speed than rhythm. Rubatos were always a path of least resistance rather than shapings of musical impulse with inner tension. The Balakivev Fantasy on Glinka's Life for the Czar made a conclusion all-too fitting, beginning with a fine nostalgic folk song and then proceding to beat hell out it with all the possible mayhem the pianoforte is capable of. Does "Tanglefoot" really need this? The only thing missing was a pool of spotlight on the vaudeville hero.

The Boston Symphony at 9 p.m. under Leinsdorf continued the plausible superficiality of E. Wild, although Beethoven and Brahms could not be completely denied. The Egmont Overture with its condensed drama of implacable power and the concomitant plaint of the victims, its popular anger and struggle, and at last the Trumpets of the Marines,—it was all brilliantly there, although at moments the down-beating of inhuman tyranny sounded more like Beethoven making-a-muscle.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 was treated with casual condescention—plenty of brio but all too fast for the ideas and slippery with suntan oil. The lovely Andante Cantable—its first lifting motif like Mozart's in the G minor but then expanding by inner stress into a longer line, the development needing space and time—this became a lilting allegretto, pretty and clever. (Beethoven interpreters should recall a touchstone—the songs To A Distant Beloved). The earlier Beethoven music needs more insight than the later) and all we got this night was a fine orchestra putting-in-time.

The Brahms Concerto No. 2 is also unkillable, providing that piano and orchestra can play the notes—loud and soft, so rich in action—feeling it might even be defensible to skim it for effects. At any rate, that's what Andre Watts and Erich Leinsdorf did (Leinsdorf is impeccable as an accompanist but certainly made no effort to transcend the triviality of the pianistic ideas). The orchestra did its beautiful best when allowed to,—the lovely, lonely Frenchhorn at the start leading in the piano (the central music is always central, though Brahms a pianist) the cello solo, brooding—like the song of half-waking desire it must derive from—that Mr. Eskin sang with such conviction of tone and mood, etc. But to what avail if the piano, instead of lifting from inside the orchestral sound, attacks like a soloist who has been impatiently awaiting to show, or in the conclusion of the Andante where the cello calls the tune, obtrudes percussive trills that should be merely a febrillation inside the cello and orchestra. The concluding Allegretto Grazioso had more allegro and little grace. The grand swing of the second tune, slipped back and forth from protagonist-piano to orchestra aiding and abetting in abandon (this is Brahm's the careful student of counterpoint, the Bavarian who flowered in Italy, when he contemplated this Concerto on his first tour, who never got over his passion for gypsy music, whose love songs belie the beard). I'm sorry to say that the present dialogue sounded merely like a bickering of gossips and that I could only recover Brahms, as I swung home over the Berkshire Hills, by singing all the parts myself to the clean night air.

It occurred to me that if spell-binding soloists are wanted for Preludes, you could not be more musically discriminating than by importing Louis Armstrong.

If sophistry, as Socrates believed, is to make the lesser appear the greater reason then this Friday was a triumph of sophistication.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 31 1969 New England

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 21 1969 New England Newsclip

Andre Watts

This Week at Tanglewood

LENOX — The forthcoming weekend at Tanglewood bids fair to be the most notable of the summer, though several other single concerts seem destined to draw larger crowds.

Pity the music-lover who has to choose between the programs of July 25, 26 and 27.

Friday at 9 p.m. the main concert, after the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture and First Symphony under Leinsdorf, is climaxed by the sensationally gifted young Negro pianist, Andre Watts, in the Brahms Second Piano Concerto.

Watts, who became 23 recently, has just completed a five-week tour of Japan and other points in the Far East.

The 7 o'clock bonus to early comers Friday will be Earl Wild's Weekend Prelude of 19th century romantic piano music of the virtuoso type.

Saturday at 8 p.m. brings a complete performance in concert form of Verdi's opera, "Otello," sung in Italian, with tenor Richard Cassilly as Otello, soprano Maralin Niska as Desdemona, and Sherrill Milnes as Iago. Also under Leinsdorf's baton will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Boy Choir.

Soviet Pianist

Sunday, at 2:30 p.m., Charles Wilson will conduct the Sibelius Symphony No. 2, and the distinguished Soviet pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy, will be featured in the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto.

Wilson, who has been B.S.O.'s assistant conductor for three seasons, is returning soon to his old love, conducting at New York City Opera.

Tomorrow night's "Tuesday Tanglewood Trends" concert brings Joni Mitchell, the Butterfield Blues Band and Tim Hardin. Mahalia Jackson heads next Tuesday's talent.

The Fesitval of Contemporary Music, staged by Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, will be presented from July 30 to August, 2, and August 11 to 17.

—J. F. K.

At Tanglewood

Andre Watts Plays Brahms With Mature Sensitivity

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Brahms' Second Piano Concerto is one of those rare concertos that shoots for breath and depth and succeeds without becoming infected with suggestions of pomposity.

Largest Friday Audience

It is mature music, and its solo keyboard score was played by Andre Watts at Tanglewood Friday night with breath, Depth, maturity and modesty.

Watts is only 23 but he has been playing with maturity, modesty and sensitivity for six years . . . for six years in public, that is, ever since he first attracted world attention by substituting for the ill Glenn Gould in 1963 at a couple of New York Philharmonic concerts.

There were 7417 listeners to hear his first performance at Tanglewood, the largest Friday night audience this year, a testament to Watts' growing popularity, inasmuch as the concerto he offered has been heard here many times, the latest in 1966 and 1963.

Fine Career Seen

Watts appears to be destined for a fine career as a soloist. He plays with a confidence that gives his music strength and a sensitivity that indicates a thoughtful and reflective nature.

His technical equipment is entirely sufficient to handle a difficult work like Brahms' Second Concerto, but it is not overtly displayed.

The music is the issue with Watts, not the piano, and his Brahms Friday was deeply satisfying.

Nearly all of the week's rehersal time for the orchesera has been spent in preparation for tonight's "Otello" so the Friday night performance was, in a way, a demonstration of the orchestra's virtuosity.

Beethoven's "Egmont"

The Brahm's Concerto, preceded by Beethoven's "Edmont" is a tidy piece written to precede performances of a drama by Goethe, and the first symphony was written to fill out the program, of the first public concert in Vienna Beethoven gave "for his own benefit." It reflects the Haydn-Mozart style.

For the orchestra they were, as the saying goes, a piece-of-cake. . . . .a deed well done with ease, clean, smooth, mellow and lively.

Romantic Program

Earl Wild, a romantic American, gave his fans a romantic program for the 7 p.m. prelude concert. It was a nice little collection of bon bons for the piano composed by Bach-Tausig, Mendelshson, Brahms, Medtner, D. Albert and Balakirev.

The first was an arrangement of a Bach toccata and fugue for organ made by a 19-th century piano virtuoso. It is an attempt to make the piano sound like an organ and, in that respect, is a failure. It sounds phony.

Inoffensive Sentiment

Otherwise, the program was both pleasing and astonishing. The music is inoffensively sentimental and lyrical, and the performance was secure in the midst of extreme difficulty.

Wild plays this romantic music warmly, without passion but with loving affection. In other hands it can be oppressive with excess or empty of expression.

And he plays its endless scales, rounds, trills, arpeggios and machine-gun staccatos with light-fingered accuracy and agility.

Tonight, Erich Leinsdorf will lead the orchestra, 10 soloists, the Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chiors, Framingham Choral Society and Berkshire Boys Chior through Verdi's four-act opera "Otello", for almost three hours including an intermission.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 26 1969 New England Newsclip

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, July 28, 1969

Tanglewood Program

Andre Watts Soloist In Brahms Concerto

By JAKE SHERMAN

The stunning performance of Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat op. 83 by 23-year-old guest soloist Andre Watts was easily the high point in the distingushed evening offered by the Boston Symphony Friday night at Tanglewood.

The Brahms work, in four movements as opposed to the usual three, is not a bombastic one though it is deeply dramatic and technically demanding. It is notable for the color and variety of the piano part and the general richness of instrumentation.

It is in the concerto's first two movements, the first labeled allegro non troppo, the second allegro appassionate, that the soloists's technical prowess and sheer stamina are called into play. Particularly in the highly charged second movement, Watts played with a sustained power and intensity that never degenerated into more display.

IF THERE was one movement, however, in which the large crowd seemed specially entranced by Watts' playing, it was the third. This is the slow movement, and its melancholy theme is first stated by the cellos and then picked up by various other strings before arriving at the piano. It is in the gentle and drawn out concluding section of the movement where Watts' control and subtle lyricism were most evident. But as his sprightly handling of the gay final movement proved, the young pianist can shift gears quickly.

The Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf offered the kind of full-bodied support that demonstrated the orchestra's confidence in the strength of the soloist. Perhaps the most striking example of superb musicianship was the exquisite work of the strings in the third movement.

TWO WORKS by Beethoven — the Overture to the opera "Egmont," based on Goethe's play, and the First Symphony, filled with the classical influences of the composer's immediate predecessors,—were also featured on the program. In general, Leinsdorf's interpretation of the Overture lacked the heroic cast one might have expected. The symphony, however, fared well, receiving a treatment that was both elegant and fully captured the witty caprices of the minuet and finale.

The Weekend Prelude Friday night featured pianist Earl Wild in a program of short works by such composers as Bach, Mendelsshon, Brahms, Medtner, D'Albert and Balakirev.

SATURDAY NIGHT the Boston Sympony together with guest singers and the Tanglewood Choir and Berkshire Chorus presented a full-length concert version of Verdi's "Otello." On Sunday, Charles Wilson was scheduled to conduct the orchestra in a program that included Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D op. 43 and Beethoven's "Emperor" Piano Concerto. The latter work featured guest loist Vladimir Ashkenazy.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230

JUL 24 1969 New England

4th Tanglewood Weekend: Brahms and Beethoven

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX—The fourth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood opens tomorrow, Friday July 25 with the 7 p.m. weekend prelude, when pianist Earl Wild plays a program of virtuoso romantic piano music of the nineteenth century.

The 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Orchestra concert conducted by Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is a Beethoven-Brahms program with pianist Andre Watts as soloist in the Brahms piano concerto no. 2 in B flat. Mr. Leinsdorf opens the program with Beethoven's Egmont overture and Symphony no. 1 in C.

On Saturday evening, a complete performance in concert form will be given of Verdi's opera Otello.

Sunday afternoon, July 27, the Tanglewood weekend will conclude with a Boston Symphony presentation of Sibelius' Symphony no. 2 and the Emperor concerto of Beethoven.

The Open Rehearsal, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m., with all seats $2.50, unreserved. The Tanglewood box office is open from 9-6.

50.

Mus 7/28

Beethoven's Egmont Overture Given Taut Performance at Tanglewood

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Music by Beethoven and Brahms was featured at Tanglewood Friday evening. For openers, Beethoven's Egmont overture was given a taut performance which wasn't really that exciting.

* * *

Orchestral playing was somewhat ragged, but the string sound hurt the overture most. Conductor Leinsdorf has a paradigm about playing Beethoven with the (larger) contemporary orchestra.

In order to make up for imbalances, "the winds should be doubled frequently, the horns seldom, and the trumpets not at all."

This is very nice, but wouldn't reducing the size of the modern string section a bit elicit a more coherent (not to mention historically accurate) over-all sound? Why conductors insist on using a string section 50 per cent larger than any orchestra Beethoven assembled is beyond me.

* * *

The same remarks apply for the performance of Beethoven's First Symphony. For the most part, problems were compounded considerably by didicuiously hasty tempos that truly bruised the music. The slow introduction was really rushed, and even those familiar with Leinsdorf's cavalier manner with such introductions must have been shocked at such a distortion.

The tempo, after all, calls for adagio MOLTO. The main allegro was not much faster, but its relentless drive constricted the wind parts to the point of claustrophobia.

* * *

Now, all this undue haste could be justified if you consider that the second movement andante is appended con moto, but for my taste Leinsdorf took the instruction too literally.

You see, were the first movement to go slower it wouldn't provide the contrast implicit in a fast-slow movement relationship.

The end result was precipitate tempi in both movements, not just one or the other. One perceives just how the conductor's organic thinking can spoil a piece just as much as it can strengthen and enhance it.

* * *

Of the third movement it may be said the music was pushed a bit in deference to the preceding quick tempi, but it is a movement that can bear a heated pace.

Leinsdorf conducted it more as a spiritual precursor to the first true scherzo (the Eroica third movement) than as a minuet, but the results were good.

Fabulous is the only word to describe the finale, which offered wonderful string articulation and superlative thrust. As a whole, though, the symphony didn't make sense. Incidentally, Leinsdorf observed repeats in the outer movements, but not in the andante.

* * *

Brahms Second Piano Concerto was featured after intermission. Andre Watts was soloist, and he brought to the part an olympian grandeur and technical accomplishment far beyond the range of words.

His tone is not exactly large, but it is astonishingly precise and balanced. The clarity he achieves is just splendid; and much left-hand work that escapes other pianists is brought penetratingly to light.

* * *

Suffice it to say this was one of the finest Brahms seconds I have ever heard; it was boldly outlined and very baroque in profile, yet searchingly romantic at the same time. Only two spots were flawed, the recap cello rhapsody near the close of the andante was a shade too loud, and Leinsdorf slipped back during the last 50 bars into that bad habit of hurrying things along.

The whole ending sounded terribly out of joint that way; even Watts' gentle urging to hold back slightly did no good, the conductor just whipped right through in a cloddy manner.

But the rest of the performance was of such a high caliber these inconsistencies could be overlooked. The orchestral playing was of a rare order, and the beautiful horn, cello and oboe work should be singled out for outstanding accomplishment.

* * *

Sunday afternoon's concert was under the direction of BSO assistant conductor Charles Wilson. Only two works were scheduled, Sibelius' Second Symphony and Beethoven's Emperior Concerto.

The symphony received a routine reading that was marked by poor organization on Wilson's part. The score's parts simply did not gel, they only barely hung together. Here is a piece where construction is very important since the sheer expansiveness and diversity of mood tends to break down continuity. Unfortunately, Wilson couldn't unify the work to any great degree, and so the performance seemed tired and choppy.

* * *

The playing wasn't bad, but there was a blunder when the high winds missed an entrance following the visionary string ascent during the latter half of the finale.

As for the Emperor, Vladimir Ashkenazy was piano soloist, and he distinguished the part with melodious phrasing. There weren't many fireworks, but the fluidity that characterized the playing was most interesting. Wilson provided a decent accompaniment, but a low-key one to match the soloist.

Albany, Knickerbocker News
Saturday, July 26, 1969

At Tanglewood

A Perfect Match for Brahms

By MICHAEL WIENER

Soloist and composition were perfectly matched Friday night when Andre Watts performed Brahms' Second Piano Concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

The Concerto No. 2 in B flat, Op. 83 is a work of many paradoxes. The piano writing is inflamboyant yet extremely demanding. The work is in four movements rather than the usual three and is symphonic in scope, but Brahms does not seem uncomfortable, as he sometimes does, with the instrumental combination he has chosen to express his ideas. The concerto is Brahms at his most monumental yet least self-consciously epic.

The concert marked Mr. Watts' first performance at Tanglewood. The 23-year-old American began to study the piano at the age of 7 and made his debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra at 9. His dramatic last-minute debut with the New York Philharmonic as replacement for the ailing Glenn Gould launched his career in 1963.

Mr. Watts showed a complete understanding of the work's structural requirements, and he possessed the technical fluency and sheer muscle power that the music demands.

Mr. Watts' performance was essentially a dramatic one, but he did not slight the gentle lyricism of the slow movement or the light, dancelike quality of the gypsy - inspired finale. It was a magnificent performance.

Mr. Leinsdorf seconded his soloist in a manner which was as instructive as it was brilliant. He had conducted the score last summer with a pianist who lacked Mr. Watts' technical equipment and dynamic power. Rather than fight his soloist, Mr. Leinsdorf had then tailored an accompaniment which was of almost chamber music proportions. The rseult was rather emasculated Brahms, but it prevented an artistic fiasco. Last night, with a soloist equal to the concerto's demands, Mr. Leinsdorf pulled out the stops and delivered a performance of surging power.

The remainder of the program was devoted to two works of Beethoven: the "Egmont" overture and the Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Op. 21. Part of the incidental music which Beethoven wrote for Goethe's heroic tragedy "Egmont," the overture closes with the triumphant music which is played when the protagonist goes to his martyr's death. It received a lightly inflected reading which was so lacking in weight that the lower strings almost seemed to have been given the night off. The same approach produced a performance of the symphony which was taut, classically proportioned, and more admirably suited to the music.

This Sunday's concert features another young pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy, in a perfirmance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. Charles Wilson will conduct the program, which also includes the Symphony No. 2 in D Major of Jean Sibelius.

ANDRE WATTS

Negro Pianist Shows Polish at Lenox

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Formal readings of two Beethoven works by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, and a glowing Brahms second piano concerto with Andre Watts as soloist were a good start Friday night for the Berkshire Music Festival's fourth weekend at Tanglewood.

Attendance for the main concert and Earl Wild's weekend prelude piano recital was 7,414.

In the the heavily populated world of dazzling young pianists, it would appear that 23-year-old Watts is here to stay.

The list of casualties during the past two decades is greater than the survivors. Pyrotechnic is taken for granted. If the newcomer isn't prepared with a dozen or more concertos, along with a gigantic recital repertory, he might as well eliminate himself from the competition.

Watts' performance of the Brahms second was musically absorbing. That alone was enough to raise it above the norm.

Most of the young keyboard giants can't resist trying to transform this magnificent masterwork into a "blowhard" piece. It resists such treatment every time.

Watts was intensely bent on transmitting the concerto's structual and emotional grandeur. In the first respect he received wonderful assistance from Leinsdorf. The emotional content was uplifted by Jules Eskin's warmly addressed cello solo in the slow movement.

No Rash Splurges

Nowhere did Watts indulge in virtuosic splurge. Leinsdorf and the orchestra were in agreement every note of the way.

The young Negro pianist has all the digital resource needed to express what's on his mind. The first movement coda and climax of the finale were tossed off with aplomb.

None of this would have amounted to much without the intelligence, discernment and feeling to deliver the work's emotional content.

Such performances as Watts' are rare. One usually witnesses maturity or razzle-dazzle in the Brahms second. It makes Watts something of a phenomenon that he achieved both qualities (the latter, tastefully) so early in his career.

Beethoven's First Symphony was played with impeccable loyalty to the text. Everything was so correct tonally and structually — and technically polished — that one was primarily impressed and secondarily moved.

Nor was anything of basic importance omitted from Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Leinsdorf welded it into a tight-knit drama.

Almost Pictorial

The sequence of oppression, rebellion and triumph was almost pictorial in clarity. The orchestra endowed it with tonal warmth technical proficiency and a concerted effort that spread throughout the ranks.

For his recital program, Wild dug deep into a bag of chestnuts that are distinguished for their historical curiosity.

Except for Tausig's well-constructed arrangement of the Bach D Minor toccata and fugue Mendelssohn's rondo capriccioso (played at a frantic pace) and a Brahms capriccio, the rest did nothing more than grand-stand Wild's fluent fingerwork.

They were firework displays by Mediner, D'Albert and Balakirew.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
JUL 27 1969
New England Newsclip

Additional July 25 Concert Review on page 55.

André Watts—"a roomy apartment across the street from Carnegie Hall, in a building preferred by members of New York's musical establishment."

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
JUL 26 1969

MY MAN ANDRÉ

by NORMAN DARDEN

I know I would be saying nothing if I said Vladimir Horowitz and Artur Rubinstein are the kingfish at the piano. Everybody knows it, and their public has paid them well for being so. Horowitz, they say, collected a quarter of a million for his now famous television recital. Rubinstein continues to be a sellout no matter how often he plays, and French TV spent a bundle making a long feature that will be shown in this country next fall.

But Horowitz is in his sixties and Rubinstein in his eighties, and the miracle of their superman playing will eventually come to an end, leaving the public to mourn the passing of their fingers. But while most admiring fans will be saddened, good times will not wither and die with them. A piano talent good enough to match theirs is in our midst right now. It belongs to André Watts, whose playing is as homegrown and as natural as Huck Finn.

It's true that Watts was born in Nuremberg, Germany, twenty-three years ago. But this doesn't make him any less American, because his American Negro father, a career soldier, was doing his stint for Uncle Sam at the time and lived with his Hungarian wife on a U.S. Army post. When André got big enough to go to regular school, his parents brought him back to Philadelphia to prepare for the big life. By sixteen, he was such a shot at the piano Leonard Bernstein chose him for a New York Philharmonic debut. When I heard him I knew he was the big piano talent I was waiting for. And he has been making it ever since—even the past few months he was on a Far East tour, in part for the State Department. He's due back at the end of July for a Tanglewood date with the Boston Symphony and Erich Leinsdorf, which is a nice kind of homecoming for anybody.

Watts is a killer. He puts bounce into long hair, and the teen-age girls love him. The first time he played the bi halls, the critics wrote he was a talent, and I thought from wh said he might be the one I for—a young brother to and make it on class became hard to heard him sa that you c the sea find

Norman Darden studied piano at The Juilliard School, has given a Town Hall recital, holds a B.A. in mathematics from New York University, and is currently an associate editor for the Macmillan Company.

50.

Mon 7/28

Beethoven's Egmont Overture Given Taut Performance at Tanglewood

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Music by Beethoven and Brahms was featured at Tanglewood Friday evening. For openers, Beethoven's Egmont overture was given a taut performance which wasn't really that exciting.

* * *

Orchestral playing was somewhat ragged, but the string sound hurt the overture most. Conductor Leinsdorf has a paradigm about playing Beethoven with the (larger) contemporary orchestra.

In order to make up for imbalances, "the winds should be doubled frequently, the horns seldom, and the trumpets not at all."

This is very nice, but wouldn't reducing the size of the modern string section a bit elicit a more coherent (not to mention historically accurate) over-all sound? Why conductors insist on using a string section 50 per cent larger than any orchestra Beethoven assembled is beyond me.

* * *

The same remarks apply for the performance of Beethoven's First Symphony. For the most part, problems were compounded considerably by didicuiously hasty tempos that truly bruised the music. The slow introduction was really rushed, and even those familiar with Leinsdorf's cavalier manner with such introductions must have been shocked at such a distortion.

The tempo, after all, calls for adagio MOLTO. The main allegro was not much faster, but its relentless drive constricted the wind parts to the point of claustrophobia.

* * *

Now, all this undue haste could be justified if you consider that the second movement andante is appended con moto, but for my taste Leinsdorf took the instruction too literally.

You see, were the first movement to go slower it wouldn't provide the contrast implicit in a fast-slow movement relationship.

The end result was precipitate tempi in both movements, not just one or the other. One perceives just how the conductor's organic thinking can spoil a piece just as much as it can strengthen and enhance it.

* * *

Of the third movement it may be said the music was pushed a bit in deference to the preceding quick tempi, but it is a movement that can bear a heated pace.

Leinsdorf conducted it more as a spiritual precursor to the first true scherzo (the Eroica third movement) than as a minuet, but the results were good.

Fabulous is the only word to describe the finale, which offered wonderful string articulation and superlative thrust. As a whole, though, the symphony didn't make sense. Incidentally, Leinsdorf observed repeats in the outer movements, but not in the andante.

* * *

Brahms Second Piano Concerto was featured after intermission. Andre Watts was soloist, and he brought to the part an olympian grandeur and technical accomplishment far beyond the range of words.

His tone is not exactly large, but it is astonishingly precise and balanced. The clarity he achieves is just splendid; and much left-hand work that escapes other pianists is brought penetratingly to light.

* * *

Suffice it to say this was one of the finest Brahms seconds I have ever heard; it was boldly outlined and very baroque in profile, yet searchingly romantic at the same time. Only two spots were flawed, the recap cello rhapsody near the close of the andante was a shade too loud, and Leinsdorf slipped back during the last 50 bars into that bad habit of hurrying things along.

The whole ending sounded terribly out of joint that way; even Watts' gentle urging to hold back slightly did no good, the conductor just whipped right through in a cloddy manner.

But the rest of the performance was of such a high caliber these inconsistencies could be overlooked. The orchestral playing was of a rare order, and the beautiful horn, cello and oboe work should be singled out for outstanding accomplishment.

* * *

Sunday afternoon's concert was under the direction of BSO assistant conductor Charles Wilson. Only two works were scheduled, Sibelius' Second Symphony and Beethoven's Emperior Concerto.

The symphony received a routine reading that was marked by poor organization on Wilson's part. The score's parts simply did not gel, they only barely hung together. Here is a piece where construction is very important since the sheer expansiveness and diversity of mood tends to break down continuity. Unfortunately, Wilson couldn't unify the work to any great degree, and so the performance seemed tired and choppy.

* * *

The playing wasn't bad, but there was a blunder when the high winds missed an entrance following the visionary string ascent during the latter half of the finale.

As for the Emperor, Vladimir Ashkenazy was piano soloist, and he distinguished the part with melodious phrasing. There weren't many fireworks, but the fluidity that characterized the playing was most interesting. Wilson provided a decent accompaniment, but a low-key one to match the soloist.

Albany, Rensselaer Co., N.Y.
Saturday, July 26, 1969

At Tanglewood

A Perfect Match for Brahms

By MICHAEL WIENER

Soloist and composition were perfectly matched Friday night when Andre Watts performed Brahms' Second Piano Concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

The Concerto No. 2 in B flat, Op. 83 is a work of many paradoxes. The piano writing is unflamboyant yet extremely demanding. The work is in four movements rather than the usual three and is symphonic in scope, but Brahms does not seem uncomfortable, as he sometimes does, with the instrumental combination he has chosen to express his ideas. The concerto is Brahms at his most monumental yet least self-consciously epic.

The concert marked Mr. Watts' first performance at Tanglewood. The 23-year-old American began to study the piano at the age of 7 and made his debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra at 9. His dramatic last-minute debut with the New York Philharmonic as replacement for the ailing Glenn Gould launched his career in 1963.

Mr. Watts showed a complete understanding of the work's structural requirements, and he possessed the technical fluency and sheer muscle power that the music demands.

Mr. Watts' performance was essentially a dramatic one, but he did not slight the gentle lyricism of the slow movement or the light, dancelike quality of the gypsy - inspired finale. It was a magnificent performance.

Mr. Leinsdorf seconded his soloist in a manner which was as instructive as it was brilliant. He had conducted the score last summer with a pianist who lacked Mr. Watts' technical equipment and dynamic power. Rather than fight his soloist, Mr. Leinsdorf had then tailored an accompaniment which was of almost chamber music proportions. The rseult was rather emasculated Brahms, but it prevented an artistic fiasco. Last night, with a soloist equal to the concerto's demands, Mr. Leinsdorf pulled out the stops and delivered a performance of surging power.

The remainder of the program was devoted to two works of Beethoven: the "Egmont" overture and the Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Op. 21. Part of the incidental music which Beethoven wrote for Goethe's heroic tragedy "Egmont," the overture closes with the triumphant music which is played when the protagonist goes to his martyr's death. It received a lightly inflected reading which was so lacking in weight that the lower strings almost seemed to have been given the night off. The same approach produced a performance of the symphony which was taut, classically proportioned, and more admirably suited to the music.

This Sunday's concert features another young pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy, in a perfirmance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. Charles Wilson will conduct the program, which also includes the Symphony No. 2 in D Major of Jean Sibelius.

ANDRE WATTS

André Watts—"a roomy apartment across the street from Carnegie Hall, in a building preferred by members of New York's musical establishment."

Negro Pianist Shows Polish at Lenox

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Formal readings of two Beethoven works by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, and a glowing Brahms second piano concerto with Andre Watts as soloist were a good start Friday night for the Berkshire Music Festival's fourth weekend at Tanglewood.

Attendance for the main concert and Earl Wild's weekend prelude piano recital was 7,414.

In the the heavily populated world of dazzling young pianists, it would appear that 23-year-old Watts is here to stay.

The list of casualties during the past two decades is greater than the survivors. Pyrotechnic is taken for granted. If the newcomer isn't prepared with a dozen or more concertos, along with a gigantic recital repertory, he might as well eliminate himself from the competition.

Watts' performance of the Brahms second was musically absorbing. That alone was enough to raise it above the norm.

Most of the young keyboard giants can't resist trying to transform this magnificent masterwork into a "blowhard" piece. It resists such treatment every time.

Watts was intensely bent on transmitting the concerto's structual and emotional grandeur. In the first respect he received wonderful assistance from Leinsdorf. The emotional content was uplifted by Jules Eskin's warmly addressed cello solo in the slow movement.

No Rash Splurges

Nowhere did Watts indulge in virtuosic splurge. Leinsdorf and the orchestra were in agreement every note of the way.

The young Negro pianist has all the digital resource needed to express what's on his mind. The first movement coda and climax of the finale were tossed off with aplomb.

None of this would have amounted to much without the intelligence, discernment and feeling to deliver the work's emotional content.

Such performances as Watts' are rare. One usually witnesses maturity or razzle-dazzle in the Brahms second. It makes Watts something of a phenomenon that he achieved both qualities (the latter, tastefully) so early in his career.

Beethoven's First Symphony was played with impeccable loyalty to the text. Everything was so correct tonally and structually — and technically polished — that one was primarily impressed and secondarily moved.

Nor was anything of basic importance omitted from Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Leinsdorf welded it into a tight-knit drama.

Almost Pictorial

The sequence of oppression, rebellion and triumph was almost pictorial in clarity. The orchestra endowed it with tonal warmth technical proficiency and a concerted effort that spread throughout the ranks.

For his recital program, Wild dug deep into a bag of chestnuts that are distinguished for their historical curiosity.

Except for Tausig's well-constructed arrangement of the Bach D Minor toccata and fugue Mendelssohn's rondo capriccioso (played at a frantic pace) and a Brahms capriccio, the rest did nothing more than grand-stand Wild's fluent fingerwork.

They were firework displays by Mediner, D'Albert and Balakirew.

Music Review

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 27 1969

New England Newsclip

Additional July 25 Concert Review on page 55.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

JUL 26 1969

MY MAN ANDRÉ

by NORMAN DARDEN

I know I would be saying nothing if I said Vladimir Horowitz and Artur Rubinstein are the kingfish at the piano. Everybody knows it, and their public has paid them well for being so. Horowitz, they say, collected a quarter of a million for his now famous television recital. Rubinstein continues to be a sellout no matter how often he plays, and French TV spent a bundle making a long feature that will be shown in this country next fall.

But Horowitz is in his sixties and Rubinstein in his eighties, and the miracle of their superman playing will eventually come to an end, leaving the public to mourn the passing of their fingers. But while most admiring fans will be saddened, good times will not wither and die with them. A piano talent good enough to match theirs is in our midst right now. It belongs to André Watts, whose playing is as homegrown and as natural as Huck Finn.

It's true that Watts was born in Nuremberg, Germany, twenty-three years ago. But this doesn't make him any less American, because his American Negro father, a career soldier, was doing his stint for Uncle Sam at the time and lived with his Hungarian wife on a U.S. Army post. When André got big enough to go to regular school, his parents brought him back to Philadelphia to prepare for the big life. By sixteen, he was such a shot at the piano Leonard Bernstein chose him for a New York Philharmonic debut. When I heard him I knew he was the big piano talent I was waiting for. And he has been making it ever since—even the past few months he was on a Far East tour, in part for the State Department. He's due back at the end of July for a Tanglewood date with the Boston Symphony and Erich Leinsdorf, which is a nice kind of homecoming for anybody.

Watts is a killer. He puts bounce into long hair, and the teen-age girls love him. The first time he played the bi halls, the critics wrote he was a r talent, and I thought from wh said he might be the one I w for—a young brother to and make it on class became hard to heard him sai that you c the sea find

Norman Darden studied piano at The Juilliard School, has given a Town Hall recital, holds a B.A. in mathematics from New York University, and is currently an associate editor for the Macmillan Company.

FADED TEXT

57

At Tanglewood

Opera Lovers Cheer 'Otello' Triumph

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The house and yard were full of opera lovers Saturday night at Tanglewood. They were there for the high point of the Berkshire Music Festival season . . . a concert version of Verdi's "Otello."

One of Greatest

And judging by their cheering they were happy. But then, of course, opera lovers always cheer. Judging by my own personal reaction, their cheers were not misplaced.

The performance was a triumph.

"Otello," of course, is one of the two greatest operas composed by one of the two greatest opera composers of the passionate 19th century. (The others are "Falstaff" and Wagner.)

Expect Drama

So a casual listener might well expect the music to be dramatic. If he was paying attention Saturday, he could not remain casual. The music is indeed passionate.

The forces who offered this tour de force to 6240 listeners Saturday were led by Erich Leinsdorf on the podium and included 10 soloists, the Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, Framingham Choral Society Chorale, Berkshire Boy Choir (adding up to about 100 voices) and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (106 instrumentalists).

Leading voices were Sherrill Milnes as Iago, Richard Cassilly as Otello and Maralin Niska as Desdemona.

Elemental Emotion

Are there any who don't know the gist of the plot? It is a story from the 15th century dramatized by Shakespeare and vocalized most successfully by Verdi.

It is a story of elemental emotion, of neurotic jealousy aroused by a revengful villain and intensified to tragic murder.

At Tanglewood the actors were dressed in black trousers and white jackets; Otello's Moorish heritage was symbolized by a black turtleneck shirt, Iago's villainy by a Machiavellian beard, narrow black bow tie and black vest. Desdemona was slim and vulnerable in a pale green gown.

Language Barrier

Their movement modified by the narrow platform on which they moved high (and a bit remotely) behind the orchestra, conveyed their changing relationships with surprising accuracy.

But it must be admitted the details of the action were lost on those who couldn't understand the Italian libretto.

The great power of opera, however, is in its ability to convey its message abstractly through the emotion of the music alone. And the forces at Tanglewood Saturday were magnificently eloquent.

Voices Similar

One of the more interesting aspects of the soloists was the similarity between the voices of Milnes, a baritone and Cassilly, a tenor.

Cassilly, Otello, is a big man and his voice is heroic, almost like Wagnerian Heldentenor. It is on the high side of baritone.

Milnes, Iago, has a baritone high enough to move into the tenor range. There are times when their brilliant, ringing tones seemed interchangeable.

The similarity helped emphasize the equality of their personal power and justify the intensity of their dramatic conflict.

But that isn't really any purpose in hoping that the emotional impact of a performance such as that at Tanglewood Saturday can be reported.

It can only be said that even if a recording is eventually made available from the tapes, its excellence will not be the same as being there.

The afternoon chamber music session in the theater didn't help to dispel the grey gloominess under the low foggy clouds.

The performance was okay; it was the choice of program that [illegible] a [illegible] quartet by Schubert (Op[illegible]). That, for him, is musical [illegible] serious, and a [illegible] for strings plus [illegible] (No. 2, Opus 10) by Arnold [illegible]berg.

The musicians were [illegible] Boston String Quartet from [illegible] New England Conservatory [illegible] Tanglewood Institute fellows [illegible] Kenneth Sarch, violin; Tibor Pusztai, violon; Yaci Orbach, viola; Jay Hummeston, cello; Joan Heler, soprano.

Variation, Unity

Their Schubert had plenty of [illegible] dynamic variation [illegible] a professional ensemble [illegible]. The tonal balance, however, was marred by a first violin that had an element of shrillness.

The first and second movements of the Schoenberg are full of dissonance and [illegible] sense, clustering chromaticisms (made sharper by the first violin), and moribund sound on a moribund day.

The third and fourth movements were made powerfully dramatic, however, by the full, rich soprano voice and its tragic lament that tempered into sad resignation.

This afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be joined by Vladimir Ashkenazy for Beethoven's Emperor Concerto, a happier piece. The sun will shine.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 27 1969 New England Newsclip

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 28 1969 New Engl

'Otello' at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

WITHIN THE WEEK in which we reached the moon, it has been necessary and appropriate to use all the near-hyperbolic and elaborate praise our vocabulary contains. This is fortunate. It provides readily at hand the terms which may be used again for a project of slightly less magnitude and rarity yet which, too, involves the coordination of large and diverse forces for a common purpose.

The praise for this latter achievement descends on the ample and adequate shoulders of Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for his performance Saturday night at Tanglewood of Verdi's "Otello."

* * *

GIUSEPPE VERDI is usually "Exhibit A" whenever there is what Arnold Toynbee (when he recently reached 80) called a list of "working survivors." A composer's age at the time of writing a masterpiece is always of importance. More often, however, as in the cases of Mozart and Mendelssohn, it is on the youthful ascent than on the senectitudian slope. Verdi's last two operas, "Otello" and "Falstaff," were written on Shakespearean books when he was in his 74th and 80th years. They have been doubly revered, primarily for their inspiration but secondly for the product of an Olympian hand so long applied to the musical stage.

"Otello," as Verdi used it, was on the libretto of Boito, himself a composer of weighty consequence and who, in his function as librettist, was unequaled.

The reason "Otello" is played so infrequently depends on several factors, of which the main one is the difficulty of finding a competent representative of the title role. He must have a "voice like a trumpet and a physique like a bull." Such a singer was available Saturday. Richard Cassilly has the stature and required vocal dominance. While the opera was presented in concert form, there were a few attempts at dramatic realization when the honorable Otello in the final scene strangles Desdemona. Many of us, who had become infatuated with Maralin Niska for her personableness and her vocal distinction, feared that a light touch from Cassilly might be more than we wished our heroine to sustain.

The malignant Iago of Sherrill Milnes was also of outstanding fitness, and it is a pity that space allows but a mere mention of Richard Taylor as Montano; Rose Taylor (his wife) as Iago's wife, Emilia; Joaquin Romaguera, as Cassio; Luther Enstad as Roderigo; Ryan Edwards as a sailor; Eugene Rabine, a herald; and Ara Berberian as Lodovico.

* * *

THIS WAS A first performance for the Boston Symphony, and "Otello" alone would serve to mark the 1969 season as memorable. Leinsdorf's responsibility in dovetailing the many forces was discharged with an admirable confidence and conspicuously effective realization.

The action takes place in Cyprus at the end of the 15th century. There is no overture proper to the opera. There are a few very tempestuous bars of prelude, whereupon the scene gives a chorus of sailors and Cypriots opportunity to express alternate hope and terror for the safety of the expected Moor, Otello, a general in the Venetian army.

The choruses, trained more than ably by Charles Wilson and his assistant John Oliver, happily met an unusual share of demands and conveyed Verdi's magnificent choral writing. The Cypriot citizens, soldiers of the Republic, Albanian sailors and various other detachments were supplied by the Tanglewood choir, the Berkshire Chorus and the Framingham Choral Society chorale, and the Cypriot children were sung by the Berkshire Boy Choir, of which Allan Wicks is the music director.

Leinsdorf proved to be a one-man MASA (Master Accountable for Supreme Achievements). The vividness of the drama and the unceasing continuance of the musical narrative were maintained with unfailing magnetism.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT the phenomenally-gifted Andre Watts made his Tanglewood debut in the Brahms B Flat Piano Concerto. This concerto at one time was considered the highest and most formidable bunker an assieger must attack before conquering the summit of pianism. Young men, especially those only 22, normally stood aside and made obeisance to the mature giants of the guild when Brahms' Opus 82 was opened. For young Watts to ride to glory, as he did on that concerto, was indeed a triumph.

His steel-like fingers denied him nothing. Profiting by Leinsdorf's abundant benevolence and excessive paternalism, the performance literally took off at many pages. Its magnificence was realized in the main, alternating with superficial penetration at other times.

Watts, to begin, was possibly himself awed by the extent of the huge auditorium bursting with an audience exuding an urgent good will even before he depressed a key, and his initial simple ascending avowal was not marked by an adequate spaciousness. But as the concerto progressed and he became immersed in its majesty, one could sense an expansive manifestation of inner fervor.

The beautiful theme which introduces the slow movement which Brahms allots to the cello fell to the orchestra's principal, Jules Eskin, whom Leinsdorf called forward to share the ovation given Watts.

* * *

YESTERDAY AFTERNOON, the orchestra's assistant conductor was given his day at court. Charles Wilson chose the Sibelius Second Symphony. The soloist was Vladimir Ashkenazy in the Beethoven E Flat Piano Concerto, the "Emperor."

The Sibelius is a doubly attractive vehicle for a young conductor. There are few symphonies which permit, indeed which invite, so much color and variety in their reading. Wilson was obviously aware of this potentiality and strove with overeagerness to exploit every possible detail.

Sibelius drags out his points like a wordy storyteller; Wilson accentuated this feature of the Finn's type of writing. It was our view that the long gradual approaches of Sibelius could have been taken with a more powerful motor rather than make a weaker one labor to get to the summit. Wilson did bring out many of the gorgeous sonorities Sibelius writes and the orchestra gave of their most radiant tonal splendor.

Ashkenazy was playing with the Boston orchestra for the first time. There have been few pianists who have surmounted the difficulties of the "Emperor" with more aplomb and apparent nonchalance, and few who have injected so powerful a rhythmic rationality and so balanced a sense of tonal validity.

And even if it fell short of the touch-tone Toscanini reading, it was not without its marvelous moments and showed Leinsdorf doing work he loves best.

Verdi, it is clear, was not fascinated by, and even considered naming his opera after his villain whose jealousy spurs the drama and who effects its final tragedy.

Iago's is the richest role, and Sherrill Milnes handled it knowingly.

As we saw when the Metropolitan Opera played Boston Milnes is a singer of singular presence, commanding voice and much intelligence and taste. What we got Saturday was necessarily an incomplete portrait of Iago, for the stage action was no more than sketched in by the singers stage rear. But vocally and personally Milnes was wonderfully convincing, although his grandest set piece, the Act 2 'Credo,' fell somehow flat.

Milnes seems temperamentally best suited for scenes that are dramatically in flux in states of 'becoming' rather and 'being'. Just as in the Boston 'Trovatore,' where his singing of 'Il Balen' was a bit pale, so was his 'credo' here a piece of singing less forceful than it might have been.

From the work I remember hearing at the New York City Opera, I expected Maralin Niska to be good, but not really as good as her Desdemona showed her to be. The role may be a bit big for her voice and so not quite ideal, but she sang it with a clear and lucid sound and excellent intonation over a two-octave range of remarkable uniform timbre She struck me as personally somewhat cool. Excessively inaccessible (her cry to Emilita for instance at the close of the 'Willow Song' didn't catch us unexpecting and break our heart as it should have) but Miss Niska nevertheless did a good job.

The title role was taken by Richard Cassilly who might have been hired for his decible rating alone. For though his voice was powerful enough to carry over chorous and orchestra, his musicality was pedestrian, his sound unsubstantial, his range incomplete, his intonation of variable accurracy.

Smaller parts were filled mostly by student singers from the Berkshire Music Center, most of whom were adequate.

By and large, the orchestral work Leinsdorf got from the BSO was outstanding and especially distinguished work came from English hornist Laurence Thorstenberg in his Act 4 obligato.

"Otello" was a BSO first performance was a work that held the interest of the players —and thus, of us—and showed handsomely that things can be far better than they usually are.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 28 1969 New England

Leinsdorf 'At Home' Conducting 'Otello'

GEORGE GELLES
MUSIC CRITIC

LENOX — As Erich Leinsdorf moves towards the end of his tenure with the Boston Symphony, he's giving us more of what he did before he came to the orchestra — opera, that is.

Saturday's "Otello" at Tanglewood, like Mozart's "Abduction" two weeks earlier, was a special sort of attraction, meant to draw crowds larger than usual. If it didn't, having suffered the same wet weather that dampened the Mozart, it was, at least a more than satisfactory performance.

In the next-to-last opera of Verdi, dramatically his most concise, and musically closest in mood and manner to the "Requiem," Leinsdorf was fully at home. I wasn't moved by everything he did—the choruses early on lacked pointedness and delicacy, many of the recitatives went slack and silences vere occasionally rushed right through —but when there were extended stretches of compressed dramatic action the performance had life and direction (as did the last two acts.)

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUL 28 1969 Ex

Tanglewood's Otello saved by Cassilly

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

LENOX — For all his musical seriousness, Erich Leinsdorf is not the right conductor for Verdi's 'Otello", of which he led a concert performance at Tanglewood Saturday. His conducting has neither the fire for it, nor the humor either, and lacking those qualities, a musician is really at a loss with "Otello."

Also, the tempi were not always convincing. I don't mean that they were perverse or silly: well-meant, they were not rightly, naturally, felt. Adjacent tempi, maybe off by no more than a nail's breath, sat uncomfortably together, so that transitions were awkward and scenes like the Otello-Desdomona confrontation at the beginning of the third act, where the impact depends on beautifully fitted tempo relationsips, tended to drift aimlessly.

Spongy at its core, the performance could not succeed as a whole. It was, even so. one uncommonly worth hearing because of an Otello and an Iago of stunning dramatic, musical and vocal magnificance. Sherrill Milnes was the Iago, and his singing had an astonishing richness and variety of verbal, timbral, rhythmic and articulatory nuance. Subtle and witty, Milnes' characterization, though of course his voice is heavier, had something of the lithe elegance that made Giuseppe Valdengo's performance for Toscanini so ramarkable. The sound itself was splendid.

Richard Cassilly, the Otello, is not the familiar figure in America that the phenomenal and giftedo Milnes has become in the last couple of years. At the New York City Opera he seemed to be quite an interesting tenor with a constricted sound. After he had dropped from sight for some time. he came to Montreal and New York with the Hamburg Opera in 1967 and gave performances in "Jenufa" and "Mathis" that showed him to have become a singing actor of unusual force and artistry (havin the year before done a good job in a Boston Beethoven Ninth).

I had heard enough to expect a good Otello, but I was not prepared for the overwhelming one Cassilly delivered Saturday. The voice is enormous and rather open and bright. It is perhaps not sensously beautiful in any conventional sense, but it has so much intensity and so much character that it is a marvelously exciting instrument.

Verdi wrote Otello for a voice one can hardly imagine existing, one that can freeze the marrow with "Abbasso le stade!" Some moments later, the tenderness and vocal elegance for the love duet, and still later in "Vio! Mi potevi scagliar," have available a fantastic intensity in pianissimo and in that low register where most tenors just breathe horsely.

I have not heard another Otello send his opening "Esultate!" rining out so fearlessly and brilliantly and Cassilly's whole performance was astoundingly and in my experience unprecedentedly, equal to the demands of the role.

As an interpreter of Otello, Cassilly belongs with the best, with McCracken and Vinay and Vickers. Something wild is in his voice from the beginning, his singing is that of a first-rate musician, he knows how to act with his voice. At the end of the second act I still had the impression that he was stronger, the more "musical," the less conversational the part was.

In the third act, though, it seemed to me that Cassily found himself, and that he proved himself a master at using words. He was than a complete and a moving artist, perseptive and resourceful. Each tone and word and gesture contributed to the picture of a man who is destroyed as his two strangely ambiguous love-hate relationships with Desdemona and Iago disintegrates, the process in which he is both actor and victim.

Maralin Miska took the role of Desdemona. She has a vibrant but clear soprano about which there is something pleasingly fleshy. She plays musically and sings with a rare and enviable ease and elegance. She hasn't much temperment and she is mushy with words (and seems so especially in a performance in which Cassilly and Milnes are setting the standards), and I found her performance not completely interesting.

Rose Taylor did well with the visable, but not often audible, role of Emilia, and Joaquim Romaguera was an effective Cassio when high, though dull when sober. The other roles were competently by Richard Taylor (Montano), Luther Enstad (Roderigo), Ara Berberian (Lodovico), Ryan Edwards (Sailor), and Eugene Rabine (Herald).

The Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, Framingham Choral Society Chorale, and Berkshire Boy Choir, with Charles Wilson. John Oliver, and Allan Wicks all involved in the preparations, sang excellently though with distinctly American-Italian. Charles Wilson conducted the Cypriots' off-stage serenade to Desdemona, and provided the kind of animation of pharsing and rhythmic vitality that was so depressingly missing from most of the performance.

Laurence Thorstenberg's English horn solo in the Willow Song was beautifully played (the candy-eating chatterbox behind me loudly whispered "Gonberg!" to her husband at that point), but much of the Boston Symphony's playing was roughly unattentive and out of tune.

Given the highly theatrical nature of "Otello", Andrew Raeburn was probably right to devise more action for the singers than is usual in concert performances of opera — and this did provide exciting opportunities for Cassilly and Milnes — but it also looked a bit like a rehearsal in formal evening dress, and that was rather peculiar.

52.

the village VOICE, July 31, 1969

FESTIVAL 'OTELLO'

Over the next couple of weeks, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, with the help of the Fromm Foundation and under the guidance of Gunther Schuller, will feature a good deal of new or almost new music. In this series, there will also be two classics from the early part of this century, Berg's "Wozzeck" (August 11 and 17) and Stravinsky's "Histoire du Soldat," both with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the professional-student forces of the Berkshire Music Center.

Otherwise, Tanglewood goes its usual, staple-materpiece way, only occasionally relieved by something seldom heard like Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw," or a couple of operas done with more musical care than is customary in opera houses. The value of this last category was emphasized on the evening of July 26, when Mr. Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony and a gathering of strong singers in Verdi's "Otello."

It's not every decade that an orchestra the size and class of the BSO gets to perform this supremely powerful and subtle score, and, by way of adding to the special interest at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Massachusetts, none of the singers had ever been heard in New York in his or her role.

Richard Cassilly, formerly of the New York City Opera and now singing big tenor roles in Hamburg and elsewhere in Europe, sang the title role. He had been handicapped by some kind of allergy and at the rehearsal two days previous his voice had been almost entirely knocked out from under him. The recovery, by performance time, was substantial, if not complete. There was a little spreading here and there, including the fearsome "Esultate" entrance, where the singer has to sound like a trumpet, and there was some off-pitch singing during the first half of the opera. But Mr. Cassilly improved mightily in voice as the evening went on.

Of his acting there could be no reasonable quibble. His concept of the character had been carved to heroic dimensions. Mr. Cassilly is a big man. He is also a big artist, and his version of the Shakespeare-Boito-Verdi Moor towered. This was a real Renaissance leader, combining, in the lightly compact pages of Act One, a lifetime of moral strength and tenderness. And as it should happen in the best performances of both the play and the opera, his destruction, by himself as well as by Iago, was like the explosion of a volcano. How often have you seen an Othello, or Otello in the Italian opera, enacted in the final scene 90 per cent with the eyes?

Getting back to Cassilly's singing, not only were the great monologues greatly realized in terms of music and tragedy, but his share of the first-act duet with Desdemona had a vocal lyricism uncommon among most present-day singers of the part.

The Tanglewood Desdemona was Maralin Niska, acting intelligently and singing with a smooth brilliance and poignant intensity typical of only the best sopranos who have tried this role. She carried the top of the huge ensemble (uncut in all its complexity) in Act Three, and her "Salce, salce" will haunt me for a long time with its breathtaking arch of soft, silky sound.

Sherrill Milnes, the young baritone powerhouse, has not yet captured the full musicodramatic dimension of Iago, neither the huge fury nor all the dazzling subtleties, yet there was a lot to admire musically, especially in his scrupulous observance of Verdi's mezza-voce indications. Rose Taylor, as Emilia, made a very important thing musically as well as dramatically, of the final confrontation, and Ara Berberian was a sonorous, imposing Lodovico, giving the Venetian Establishment a rich, virile base voice. Joaquin Romaguera seemed beyond his depth as Cassio, but grateful mention should be made of Ryan Edward as a serenading sailor, substituting for the group of baritones called for in the score.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted it all with much power and more sensitivity. If there was not the constantly fed fire of Toscanini, there was an almost constant orchestral and choral finesse the Met's most recent attempts at unapproached by a few miles in "Otello." (The outdoor Tanglewood Music Shed's mellow, diffusive acoustics may also have dampened the fires a bit.) The combined Berkshire Chorus, Tanglewood Choir, Framingham Choral Society Chorale (redundant in name only) and Berkshire Boy Choir gave us Verdi music rather than Met barking, and the orchestra provided such excellences as luminous violins, super-smooth cellos (Jules Eskin, their leader, especially), the strings-with-harp pizzicati that lauched Otello's farewell to glory, the mandolins and guitars that serenaded Desdemona and the mellow flutes with other winds that ushered her to her last song and prayer.

A further nice word is due Andrew Raeburn's mostly successful attempt at a sceneryless, costumeless staging on a high platform behind the orchestra. At any rate, Verdi was the kingpin of the evening, as he should have been.

—Leighton Kerner

Tanglewood: Moor in the right mood

by James J. Stark

Erich Leinsdorf's production of Verdi's Otello at Tanglewood on July 26 must rank as a landmark in his seven-year association with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Seldom on the stage at Tanglewood or at Symphony Hall in the last few years has Leinsdorf been so at home in his medium or so expert in his direction. With Sherrill Milnes as Iago and Richard Cassilly as Otello, a well trained chorus and a superbly responsive orchestra, Leinsdorf held the large audience spellbound for three hours.

"Otello" is different from earlier Verdi in that the libretto is so totally important: the dialogue is fast-paced and continuous, with only occasional "set" pieces; even these are not arias in the traditional sense. Arrigo Boito reworked and cut Shakespeare's tragedy extensively in creating what is regarded as one of the masterpiece librettos of all time. It is often succinct where Shakespeare was flowery and allows the music to do a great deal of the explaining and setting of mood. Nonetheless, and contrary to the misconceptions of many, "Otello" is not Wagnerian, despite stylistic innovations which resemble Wagner superficially.

Leinsdorf's appreciation of this difference in styles is terribly important to the success of this performance. In "Otello," singing is the important business; orchestral music exists only to complement the singer, never to achieve the independence of form and conception that is so crucial to Wagner. The orchestral dynamics set the tone for mood changes but never stole the show. The colors were expressive but never showy.

The singers were the essence and majesty of the performance. Sherrill Milnes has such a rich natural quality that he was never forced to try to create depth to his voice by covering his tone. His soliloquy in the second act, Iago's famous speech about the cruelty of existence, was majestic yet not overblown. The rich natural baritone flowed. Richard Cassilly's "Otello" was sung with poise and assurance. His tenor voice has a brilliant focus without the piercing harshness that one often hears in lesser operatic voices. This was terribly important here: it is difficult at the outset to imagine the robust Moor as a tenor (Verdi's choice, governed partially at least by convention); Cassilly comes across where a lesser voice would have botched the whole thing. Maralin Niska (Desdemona) was not quite the actress nor singer to match Cassilly's Otello, but she was very good: her voice is lovely in the midrange and high when she sings softly, but she seems a little unsure of what to do with it in the loud high emotional moments. The supporting cast, including five fellows of the Berkshire Music Center, was adequate; there was really not much opportunity for distinction in these lesser parts. Joaquin Romaguera as Cassio and Ara Berberian as Lodovico (the Venetian ambassador) were two of the best supporting singers.

The staging for the performance was limited to an unimaginative series of platforms for the singers and separate risers for the off-stage children's chorus. Complete with mandolin accompaniment, the Berkshire Boy Choir charmed the audience in the lovely children's interlude in Act II.

Two outstanding innovative young pianists provided the other attractions for the July 25-27 weekend at Tanglewood. On Friday evening Andre Watts played Brahm's B-flat piano concerto (No. 2). The twenty-three year old discovery of Leonard Bernstein, in his seventh year on the concert circuit, provided the audience with some electrifying moments. His exciting, brash interpretation roused most of the audience to a frenzy, but left some people cold. It was certainly on the showy side, emphasizing the technical feats associated with playing difficult passages at breakneck speed. Vladimir Ashkenazy played the Emperor Concerto of Beethoven on Sunday. His interpretation was also novel — romantic and aggressive — with marked rubatos and big dynamic contrasts. His technique was impeccable — clean, beautifully articulated. Unfortunately, the orchestra, led by Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson, was very erratic and sloppy, and marred an otherwise exciting performance.

Watts and Ashkenazy are dynamic young artists with new ideas. The tendency to exciting innovation in music by young performers is something to watch.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JUL 28 1969

LEINSDORF OFFERS 'OTELLO' CONCERT

Title Role Is Sung by Cassilly at Berkshire Festival

By ALLEN HUGHES
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 27 — Erich Leinsdorf, whose resignation as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra becomes effective at the end of the current Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, seems to have had opera very much in mind during his final season with the orchestra. Some months ago, he offered Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos," a few weeks ago he did Mozart's "Abduction From the Seraglio" and on Saturday night he presented Verdi's "Otello," all in concert versions.

This last was the occasion of another triumph for Mr. Leinsdorf. Under his direction, Verdi's score was revealed anew as a masterpiece of dramatic composition in which every phrase is packed with descriptive and expressive detail. The conductor allowed nothing to go by unnoticed, yet everything was arranged so skillfully in his interpretation that the performance was one of unbroken artistic unity.

Niska Sings Desdemona

The cast was of special interest. The title role was sung by Richard Cassilly, a former New York City Opera tenor, who has been performing and living in Germany, Iago was portrayed by Sherrill Milnes and the part of Desdemona was taken by Maralin Niska. They may have sung their respective roles somewhere before, but not in our bailiwick.

Mr. Cassilly, a giant of a man who makes the sizable Mr. Milnes look small, has a lot of vocal strength and the ability to communicate well through his singing. In this performance, his vocalism was not outstanding, but he may not have been in his best form. In any case he produced at times a rather curious tone that sounded as though it might be coming through some kind of filter. At other times, the tone seemed full, robust and free of the strain that showed on some high notes.

Although there were no sets or costumes, the basic action of the opera was staged tellingly by Andrew Raeburn on raised platforms behind the orchestra. Mr. Cassilly's bulk made him an imposing Otello, and he contributed to the portrayal with acting that was tasteful and helpful.

Lacking in Intensity

Mr. Milnes is almost a natural for the part of Iago. A baritone voice of darker hue than his might lend itself more easily to expression of Iago's villainy, but Mr. Milnes's performance was very good and indicated that he might become a great Iago someday. On this occasion, however, his interpretation did not grow in intensity.

Many of his phrases were masterfully turned for the purposes of characterization, but there were also many that were beautiful vocally without being particularly expressive. It will not always be thus.

Miss Niska was, in a way, the big surprise of the evening, for, in this important assignment, she looked and sounded like an important artist. She has done an admirable job with the New York City Opera in a variety of leading roles, but in "Otello," her art seemed to take on a new dimension. Her singing was almost perfectly poised throughout the performance, and the range of color and dynamics was impressive. The "Willow Song" and "Ave Maria" in Act IV were inspired and eloquent.

Ara Berberian was effective in the part of the Venetian ambassador. His rich bass contrasted aptly with the lighter, higher voices of the other principals.

The other members of the cast were from the Berkshire Music Center and included Joaquin Romaguera, Luther Enstad and Rose Taylor. The performance also benefited from the singing of the Berkshire Chorus, the Tanglewood Choir, the Framingham Choral Society Chorale and the Berkshire Boy Choir.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 28 1969 New England

'Otello' Concert Tops Tanglewood's Weekend

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The much trumpeted concert performance of Verdi's opera, "Otello," at Tanglewood Saturday night was top item of the Berkshire Music Festival's fourth weekend, in spite of contradictions in production.

Boston Symphony was conducted by Erich Leinsdorf Saturday night. Yesterday afternoon's conductor was Charles Wilson. Total attendance for the weekend was 22,294.

Leinsdorf's orchestral conducting in "Otello" was at concert pitch, sometimes giving the impressioon of vocal accompaniment instead of instrumental.

A startling contrast in approach existed between Richard Cassilly's full-fledged dramatic presentation of the title role and other principals who restricted themselves to singing without histrionics.

Dazzling Ensemble

It was an evening of dazzling ensemble result, especially from orchestra and chorus of 200 men, women and children who delivered great swells of solidly-set, balanced sound. The off-stage chorus of Act II was made tonally resplendent with the supplement of guitars and mandolins.

Had the rest pursued Casilly's demonstrative style, it would have been opera minus only costumes and scenery. Principals sang from an elevated platform above the orchestra and the chorus was stationed at stage right.

Main incongruity was Cassilly's impassioned performance of Otello, surrounded by placidly played roles. In this docile setting, his tirades seemed more like tantrums.

Maralin Niska was the sleekest Desdemona that ever stood up to Otello. Her voice approached the breadth of dramatic soprano and her treatment of the role carried credence.

Sherrill Milnes sang Iago with spirit and splendid voice. Rarely breaking with concert restraint, he managed to communicate the character's treacherous and vicious hypocrisy.

The important role of Cassio (Otello's lieutenant) did not materialize in the voice or person of Joachin Romaguera. He offered little for Otello to be vengefully moved.

Swan Song Aug. 19

Yesterday's concert was Wilsons next-to-last appearance with the Boston Symphony as guest conductor. His swan song will be Tuesday, Aug. 19, when he conducts for comedian-narrator Sam Levenson at the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade.

This fall, Wilson becomes resident conductor of New York City Opera Company.

The program offered a wide spectrum of Wilson's abilities with a full-sized orchestral tapestry and adaptability to a solo pianist's needs.

Sibelius Symphony

In Sibelius' Second Symphony, Wilson maintained a constant melodic flow, bucolic mood, and fast-changing motives. The slow movement was less organized and gave a patch-work effect. Lost time was made up in the tumultuous third movement and the finale.

It's saying a good deal that Vladimir Ashkenazy didn't steal Wilson's thunder with Beethoven's Fifth Piano Concerto, the "Emperor." In fact, Wilson contributed heavily to a performance that brought thunderous applause to Ashkenazy.

Traces of Nonconformity

This was a Boston Symphony debut for the 32-year-old Russian pianist. It gave a clear disclosure of technical security, singing tone, deep sonorities without banging, and minor traces of nonconformity.

Ashkenazy relied on a certain rigidity to sift out any trace of romanticism in his Beethoven, except in the slow movement which purred with unfeigned sentiment.

Following yesterday's concert, Finland and its national airline honored the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, and Wilson, "in bringing recognition of the outstanding efforts in bringing the music of Sibelius throughout America."

The orchestra received a citation. Wilson was given a vase, and Mrs. Koussevitzky accepted a vase on behalf of her late husband. Yesterday was the 95th anniversary of his birth.

The presentations were made by Russell Tornio, Boston representative of Finnair, at Seranak, the Koussevitzky summer residence in Lenox.

Saturday Night

Otello	Verdi
Montano	Richard Taylor
Cassio	Joaquin Romaguera
Iago	Sherrill Milnes
Roderigo	Luther Enstad
Otello	Richard Cassilly
Desdemona	Maralin Niska

Tanglewood Choir
Berkshire Chorus
Framingham Choral Society Chorale
Berkshire Boy Choir
Boston Symphony
Erich Leinsdorf

Sunday Afternoon

Program

Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 43
Piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat major, Opus 73	Beethoven

Vladimir Ashkenazy
Boston Symphony
Charles Wilson

B.A.D. 8/6-13/69

VLADIMIR ASHKENAZY is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest pianist on Sunday, July 27 at Tanglewood.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

JUL 23 1969 New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 29 1969 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood weekend: 'Otello' and Ashkenazy

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

There was varied and at times exciting fare offered over the weekend at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony: Two brilliant young pianists, André Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy, made their first al fresco appearances with the orchestra—for the dazzling Russian, it was a long overdue debut with the Boston; and the growing list of operas in concert form appearing on the symphony's program was supplemented by Erich Leinsdorf's and the orchestra's first performance of Verdi's "Otello."

The "Otello" on Saturday night was done with all the elements short of scenery that this towering work demands. Besides the orchestra, there were Richard Cassilly in the title role, Sherrill Milnes as Iago, Maralin Niska as Desdemona, and Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center in other roles; three adult choruses and the Berkshire Boy Choir; and an elevated platform behind the orchestra on which the singers suggested with varying degrees of conviction what was happening plot-wise.

On the shelf

Erich Leinsdorf bound all these forces together with a firm and experienced hand, which, in this instance covered an area of Cinerama proportions. The orchestra stormed, shimmered, and glowed on cue—thrilling to hear this music played with such virtuosity.

The principals on their upstage shelf did their best under the circumstances. In the case of Sherrill Milnes, the burgeoning Metropolitan Opera baritone, the best was indeed superlative. Not only were Iago's "Credo" and the "Dream" aria delivered with sumptuous sound, but vocal color and incisive diction sent them over the orchestra with chilling effect. A staged performance should put Mr. Milnes among the top interpreters of this role.

Mr. Cassily has the voice to make Otello's music listenable without flinching—no mean gift—and perhaps time will add depth to his characterization. It was rather flamboyant the other night as opposed to a concept that builds from innate refinement to flailing rage.

Of Miss Niska it must be said that she sings well, and has a full-throated, dark-hued voice that would be ideal for many spinto or dramatic roles. However, Desdemona just doesn't seem to be one of them. Qualities of warmth and fragility weren't there when needed, if the stronger characteristics were. Her singing of the last act "Salce" and "Ave Maria" was handsomely done, but both were more admirable for their technical accomplishment than emotional impact.

The choruses which are so vital in "Otello" were of top quality, and of the other singers, Rose Taylor as Emilia and Ara Berbarian as Lodovico were the most impressive.

Finnish citations

On Sunday afternoon, which was the 95th birthday anniversary of Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra was heard in Sibelius's Second Symphony, under the direction of Charles Wilson, its assistant conductor. At later ceremonies, Mrs. Koussevitzky, Mr. Wilson, and Kauko Kahila, a member of the orchestra, accepted citations from the government of Finland and Finnair, the national airline, in recognition of their dissemination of Sibelius's music.

Mr. Wilson's direction of the symphony was perhaps more interesting for its potential than its realization. His control of the orchestra and his power to hold the attention of the audience were accomplished by the sparest of technical show, and the time is coming when Mr. Wilson will really be on top of this ample work.

Standing ovation

Last but by no means least of the weekend's attractions was the debut on the second half of Sunday's program of Vladimir Ashkenazy in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5. Everyone brings something of his own to the "Emperor" and the young Russian's thoughts and their result poured forth in sound that was the very essence of Beethoven. With the meticulous accompaniment of Mr. Wilson and the orchestra, the Ashkenazy performance became one of the most beautiful and soul-satisfying of this great music to be heard anywhere today.

The audience gave Mr. Ashkenazy a standing, shouting, waving ovation of the kind that must have sent mourners for the future of live music running for cover.

Tanglewood Quality

By BYRON BELT

LENOX, Mass. — Quality and variety are the twin keys to the continued vitality and success of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf, the retiring music director, was in charge of two of the programs we attended in the great music shed.

In the Beethoven-Brahms program the diminutive maestro directed taut yet lyrical performances of the dramatic Overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven, and the master's youthful First Symphony. Andre Watts was the throng-attracting solist in the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 2 by Brahms.

Watts, as he has amply demonstrated in the past, has become one of the few box office super-stars of today, and he justifies his approval with performances of tremendous power, poetry and pianistic beauty. He not only drew one of the season's top crowds, but he was given a hero's reception by both the audience and the orchestra.

* * *

AS IF ONE GREAT pianist were not enough, Tanglewood offered three keyboard masters within 36 hours. In a special one hour recital Earl Wild dazzled several thousand cheering partisans with rarely heard music by Mendelssohn, Medtner, d'Albert and Balakirev, as well as works of Bach, Brahms and Chopin. Wild is breaking out of his Gershwin stereotype and at least is gaining the recognition he deserves as the finest romantic virtuoso pianist of our day.

Vladimir Ashkenazy performed the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto with Charles Wilson, the BSO's superb associate conductor (happily rejoining the N.Y. City Opera this season as principal resident conductor.) The young Soviet artist found even the orchestra cheering him during the rehearsal, and although I felt his playing was a bit bland following the fireworks of Wild and Watts, the audience and orchestra obviously did not agree.

Opera is part of the Tanglewood scene each summer, and this year Verdi's "Otello" was given a semi-staged presentation under Leinsdorf.

Richard Cassilly, one of America's under-appreciated singing actors, performed the title role for the first time in his native land. The performance amply capitalized on Cassilly's powerful physique and trumpeting voice, as well as his unique capacity for expressive, compassionate singing. His Otello has the makings of the finest interpretation since Martinelli. (Mr. Bing, Miss Fox, Mr. Adler and opera producers everywhere, please take note!)

* * *

SHERRILL MILNES was the vocally magnificent Iago, and Maralin Niska the Desdemona. Miss Niska continues to trouble me as a rising opera star, for the voice is as frequently edgy and ugly as it is beautiful. In the more quiet passages, she sang exquisitely, and her characterization was most sympathetic.

The large cast, the excellent Tanglewood Choir prepared by Charles Wilson, and the outstanding Berkshire Boy Choir, prepared by Allan Wicks, and most especially the Boston Symphony, performed Verdi's glorious score at white heat intenslty under Leinsdorf's demanding baton.

It will be a great night when Erich Leinsdorf returns to conduct Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" at the Met. Meanwhile, through Aug. 31, every night at Tanglewood seems to be a great one!

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 411,951 SUN. 423,790

JUL 31 1969

RUSSIAN PIANIST — Vladimir Ashkenazy, noted Soviet pianist, was soloist yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144

JUL 28 1969

Ashkenazy's Electric Intensity, Sibelius' Substance Please

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Vladimir Ashkenazy is a pianist with electricity. He was shooting off sparks Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood, where he played the solo part for Beethoven's fifth Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, the orchestra's regular assistant conductor, was leader.

Ashkenazy is only 32, but he has been cutting a deep furrow through the world's concert territory for about 13 years . . . and he still plays with youthful enthusiasm and agility.

Sunday the colorful concerto with its myriad arpeggios and glittering swirls was played with Ashkenazy's usual incisive, almost steely, touch.

He leans over the keyboard with intensity, and he strikes the keys with machine-like accuracy and clarity. This diamond-sharp approach was reflected in the musical atmosphere.

The crowd loved it. There were 6304 in the audience, nearly all of them under the shed's protection because the elements defied my demand for sun issued Sunday morning and spread a light drizzle across the spacious lawns.

The audience brought the week's total to 22,294, which including four open rehearsals, three Tuesday trend concerts and 12 regular orchestra concerts brings the total attendance at the half-way mark of the festival to 117,385.

Before today's music lovers heard Ashkenazy however, there was Sibelius.

Sibelius Substantial

An essential difference for me between Beethoven's concerto and Sibelius' Second Symphony, which it must be admitted was composed by a man whom history has placed a notch or two under Beethoven, is that the symphony is all lean, meaty substance and the concerto indulges in a bit of space-stuffing here and there.

In spite of its expansive nature (it filled the first half of the program with ease), it has no fat in it. Thereareno empty gestures for the technical sake of filling some space with sound between passages of music.

It is cumulative music which builds an emotional response gradually with deep sonority from the basses and drums, and rafter-shaking stentorian pronouncements from the brasses.

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

JUL 26 1969 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Finland and its National Airline, FINNAIR, will salute the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Conductor, Charles Wilson on the occasion of the presentation of Symphony No. 2 by Sibelus at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood on July 27. The late Serge Koussevitsky whose anniversary is on the same day, will also be honored for his remarkable contribution in bringing the music of Sibelus to American audiences. His wife, Mrs. Kousevitsky will accept the tribute at Sernak, the Koussevitsky residence.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 28 1969 New England

At the Concert

53.

Russian Pianist 'Dynamic'

By EDWARD FRENCH

Saturday night at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf eschewed conventional symphonic fare in favor of a concert version of one of Verdi's finest opera, "Otello," the libretto by Arrigo Boito based on Shakespeare's tragedy. It was sung in Italian.

In "Otello", composed in the sunset of Verdi's career, his melodic fecundity still flows in abundance, enhanced by a subtly transfiguring harmonic foundation and containing a sense of dramatic psychology very different from the theatrical artifice of even so fine a work as "Aida".

Here the dramatic action is skillfully suggested in the orchestra which plays a much more significant role than it did in his early operas.

For this major undertaking Mr. Leinsdorf used the orchestra, a cast including Richard Cassily, Maralin Niska, Sherrill Milnes, Ara Berbarian, Joaquin Romaguera and Rose Taylor, the Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, the Chorale from the Framingham Choral Society and the Berkshire Boys Choir.

IN PARTICULAR this listener was impressed with the singing of Richard Cassilly as Otello. A real dramatic tenor his singing had a fine legato line, his voice full and rich from top to bottom with the top having the clear ringing quality so essential for Italian Opera.

The Iago, baritone Sherrill Milnes, a Metropolitan Opera star had the vocal capability and projection expected from an artist of his reputation. He was outstanding in his singing of the famous "Credo," a soliloquy on the futility of life and the glory of evil.

Maralin Niska was a most satisfactory Desdemona both aurally and visually. Her lyric soprano voice has splendid range and quality, and most important, she is able to color it to suit the text. Her "Willow Song and Ave Maria" in the fourth act had great emotional appeal.

A most important artistic contribution was made by the well prepared choral groups, especially in the second act "Mandolinata" charming with its rhythmic lilt and touch of Italian folk melody.

However, to many listeners the best part of the evening was the superlative playing of the orchestra. One of the most potent arguments for such operatic presentations as this is the quality of orchestral playing that a major orchestra is able to bring to such a score as "Otello" with its need for infinite variety of color, flexibility and intensity.

ERICH LEINSDORF again showed why he is considered one of the better operatic conductors on today's scene. His pacing was superb, the grand Verdi melodies sang with the necessary warmth and eloquence and the salient points of the musical drama were properly emphasized. A truly splendid musical performance!

Sunday afternoon found Charles Wilson conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program consisting of the Symphony No. 2 in D major by Sibelius and the Concerto No. 5 in E flat major for piano and orchestra by Beethoven with the Russian pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy, as soloist.

Much interest was centered on this, the first appearance of this fine young pianist at Tanglewood. While only 32 years old, he now is considered to be one of the top ranked pianists with an international reputation and who is in the enviable position of selling out Carnegie Hall for his solo recitals.

His vehicle, the "Emperor Concerto" is a work which brought fame to such past piano greats as Josef Hofmann, Artur Schnabel, and Paderewski among others.

It usually is not played by young pianists, but Mr. Ashkenazy performed it with remarkable maturity of style and insight.

THE BRAVURA passages were tossed off with the greatest ease and clarity and his comprehension of the structure of this grand concerto was always apparent. Scales, arpeggios, and trills were wonderfully even and controlled while his power in the forte sections was remarkable for such a slightly built person.

His control of dynamics was shown in the long octave passage in the first movement which begins double forte and diminishes gradually to a piano.

The Adagio was distinguished by some incredibly beautiful soft playing of unusual grace and delicacy. In the bridge passage that leads from the Adagio to the Rondo there is one of the magical moments in music, the forecast of the outline but not the vital rhythmic character of the coming Rondo. This was done with unusual beauty of tone. The Rondo had the propulsion and rhythmic bite to bring the concerto to a brilliant conclusion.

The Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major is by a composer who never made any pretense, even in his later works, to the rank of revolutionary. But it does not on that account lack the interest Sibelius strove to give his works, the interest of emotion generated by experience.

Under the direction of Mr. Wilson the orchestra maintained the high standard of performance established this season. The symphony was played with a clarity of detail and regard for its romantic style and content that won warm applause from the large and enthusiastic audience.

In spite of the poor weather conditions over 23,000 people were at Tanglewood this weekend.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

JUL 28 1969

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 28 1969 New England

Whitestone

SIBELIUS PERFORMANCE by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood yesterday was marked by presentation of Finnish vases to Madame Olga Koussevitzky and Charles Wilson, at left, conductor of the symphony. Plaque was presented to the BSO by Finair representative Russell Tornio, right. It was accepted by BSO member Kauko Kahila, second from left, a Finn himself. The ceremony took place at the Koussevitzky home.

VLADIMIR ASHKENAZY is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest pianist on Sunday, July 27 at Tanglewood.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,205 (S) 298,557

JUL 23 1969 New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 29 1969 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Quality

By BYRON BELT

LENOX, Mass. — Quality and variety are the twin keys to the continued vitality and success of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Erich Leinsdorf, the retiring music director, was in charge of two of the programs we attended in the great music shed.

In the Beethoven-Brahms program the diminutive maestro directed taut yet lyrical performances of the dramatic Overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven, and the master's youthful First Symphony. Andre Watts was the throng-attracting solist in the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra No. 2 by Brahms.

Watts, as he has amply demonstrated in the past, has become one of the few box office super-stars of today, and he justifies his approval with performances of tremendous power, poetry and pianistic beauty. He not only drew one of the season's top crowds, but he was given a hero's reception by both the audience and the orchestra.

* * *

AS IF ONE GREAT pianist were not enough, Tanglewood offered three keyboard masters within 36 hours. In a special one hour recital Earl Wild dazzled several thousand cheering partisans with rarely heard music by Mendelssohn, Medtner, d'Albert and Balakirev, as well as works of Bach, Brahms and Chopin. Wild is breaking out of his Gershwin stereotype and at least is gaining the recognition he deserves as the finest romantic virtuoso pianist of our day.

Vladimir Ashkenazy performed the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto with Charles Wilson, the BSO's superb associate conductor (happily rejoining the N.Y. City Opera this season as principal resident conductor.) The young Soviet artist found even the orchestra cheering him during the rehearsal, and although I felt his playing was a bit bland following the fireworks of Wild and Watts, the audience and orchestra obviously did not agree.

Opera is part of the Tanglewood scene each summer, and this year Verdi's "Otello" was given a semi-staged presentation under Leinsdorf.

Richard Cassilly, one of America's under-appreciated singing actors, performed the title role for the first time in his native land. The performance amply capitalized on Cassilly's powerful physique and trumpeting voice, as well as his unique capacity for expressive, compassionate singing. His Otello has the makings of the finest interpretation since Martinelli. (Mr. Bing, Miss Fox, Mr. Adler and opera producers everywhere, please take note!)

* * *

SHERRILL MILNES was the vocally magnificent Iago, and Maralin Niska the Desdemona. Miss Niska continues to trouble me as a rising opera star, for the voice is as frequently edgy and ugly as it is beautiful. In the more quiet passages, she sang exquisitely, and her characterization was most sympathetic.

The large cast, the excellent Tanglewood Choir prepared by Charles Wilson, and the outstanding Berkshire Boy Choir, prepared by Allan Wicks, and most especially the Boston Symphony, performed Verdi's glorious score at white heat intensity under Leinsdorf's demanding baton.

It will be a great night when Erich Leinsdorf returns to conduct Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde" at the Met. Meanwhile, through Aug. 31, every night at Tanglewood seems to be a great one!

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 411,251 SUN. 423,790
JUL 31 1969

RUSSIAN PIANIST — Vladimir Ashkenazy, noted Soviet pianist, was soloist yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Schenectady Union-Star
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 30,144
JUL 28 1969

At the Concert

Russian Pianist 'Dynamic'

By EDWARD FRENCH

Saturday night at Tanglewood Erich Leinsdorf eschewed conventional symphonic fare in favor of a concert version of one of Verdi's finest opera, "Otello," the libretto by Arrigo Boito based on Shakespeare's tragedy. It was sung in Italian.

In "Otello", composed in the sunset of Verdi's career, his melodic fecundity still flows in abundance, enhanced by a subtly transfiguring harmonic foundation and containing a sense of dramatic psychology very different from the theatrical artifice of even so fine a work as "Aida".

Here the dramatic action is skillfully suggested in the orchestra which plays a much more significant role than it did in his early operas.

For this major undertaking Mr. Leinsdorf used the orchestra, a cast including Richard Cassily, Maralin Niska, Sherrill Milnes, Ara Berbarian, Joaquin Romaguera and Rose Taylor, the Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, the Chorale from the Framingham Choral Society and the Berkshire Boys Choir.

IN PARTICULAR this listener was impressed with the singing of Richard Cassilly as Otello. A real dramatic tenor his singing had a fine legato line, his voice full and rich from top to bottom with the top having the clear ringing quality so essential for Italian Opera.

The Iago, baritone Sherrill Milnes, a Metropolitan Opera star had the vocal capability and projection expected from an artist of his reputation. He was outstanding in his singing of the famous "Credo," a soliloquy on the futility of life and the glory of evil.

Maralin Niska was a most satisfactory Desdemona both aurally and visually. Her lyric soprano voice has splendid range and quality, and most important, she is able to color it to suit the text. Her "Willow Song and Ave Maria" in the fourth act had great emotional appeal.

A most important artistic contribution was made by the well prepared choral groups, especially in the second act "Mandolinata" charming with its rhythmic lilt and touch of Italian folk melody.

However, to many listeners the best part of the evening was the superlative playing of the orchestra. One of the most potent arguments for such operatic presentations as this is the quality of orchestral playing that a major orchestra is able to bring to such a score as "Otello" with its need for infinite variety of color, flexibility and intensity.

ERICH LEINSDORF again showed why he is considered one of the better operatic conductors on today's scene. His pacing was superb, the grand Verdi melodies sang with the necessary warmth and eloquence and the salient points of the musical drama were properly emphasized. A truly splendid musical performance!

Sunday afternoon found Charles Wilson conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program consisting of the Symphony No. 2 in D major by Sibelius and the Concerto No. 5 in E flat major for piano and orchestra by Beethoven with the Russian pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy, as soloist.

Much interest was centered on this, the first appearance of this fine young pianist at Tanglewood. While only 32 years old, he now is considered to be one of the top ranked pianists with an international reputation and who is in the enviable position of selling out Carnegie Hall for his solo recitals.

His vehicle, the "Emperor Concerto" is a work which brought fame to such past piano greats as Josef Hofmann, Artur Schnabel, and Paderewski among others.

It usually is not played by young pianists, but Mr. Ashkenazy performed it with remarkable maturity of style and insight.

THE BRAVURA passages were tossed off with the greatest ease and clarity and his comprehension of the structure of this grand concerto was always apparent. Scales, arpeggios, and trills were wonderfully even and controlled while his power in the forte sections was remarkable for such a slightly built person.

His control of dynamics was shown in the long octave passage in the first movement which begins double forte and diminishes gradually to a piano.

The Adagio was distinguished by some incredibly beautiful soft playing of unusual grace and delicacy. In the bridge passage that leads from the Adagio to the Rondo there is one of the magical moments in music, the forecast of the outline but not the vital rhythmic character of the coming Rondo. This was done with unusual beauty of tone. The Rondo had the propulsion and rhythmic bite to bring the concerto to a brilliant conclusion.

The Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major is by a composer who never made any pretense, even in his later works, to the rank of revolutionary. But it does not on that account lack the interest Sibelius strove to give his works, the interest of emotion generated by experience.

Under the direction of Mr. Wilson the orchestra maintained the high standard of performance established this season. The symphony was played with a clarity of detail and regard for its romantic style and content that won warm applause from the large and enthusiastic audience.

In spite of the poor weather conditions over 23,000 people were at Tanglewood this weekend.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 59,628
JUL 28 1969

Tanglewood weekend: 'Otello' and Ashkenazy

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

There was varied and at times exciting fare offered over the weekend at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony: Two brilliant young pianists, André Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy, made their first al fresco appearances with the orchestra—for the dazzling Russian, it was a long overdue debut with the Boston; and the growing list of operas in concert form appearing on the symphony's program was supplemented by Erich Leinsdorf's and the orchestra's first performance of Verdi's "Otello."

The "Otello" on Saturday night was done with all the elements short of scenery that this towering work demands. Besides the orchestra, there were Richard Cassilly in the title role, Sherrill Milnes as Iago, Maralin Niska as Desdemona, and Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center in other roles; three adult choruses and the Berkshire Boy Choir; and an elevated platform behind the orchestra on which the singers suggested with varying degrees of conviction what was happening plot-wise.

On the shelf

Erich Leinsdorf bound all these forces together with a firm and experienced hand, which, in this instance covered an area of Cinerama proportions. The orchestra stormed, shimmered, and glowed on cue—thrilling to hear this music played with such virtuosity.

The principals on their upstage shelf did their best under the circumstances. In the case of Sherrill Milnes, the burgeoning Metropolitan Opera baritone, the best was indeed superlative. Not only were Iago's "Credo" and the "Dream" aria delivered with sumptuous sound, but vocal color and incisive diction sent them over the orchestra with chilling effect. A staged performance should put Mr. Milnes among the top interpreters of this role.

Mr. Cassily has the voice to make Otello's music listenable without flinching—no mean gift—and perhaps time will add depth to his characterization. It was rather flamboyant the other night as opposed to a concept that builds from innate refinement to flailing rage.

Of Miss Niska it must be said that she sings well, and has a full-throated, dark-hued voice that would be ideal for many spinto or dramatic roles. However, Desdemona just doesn't seem to be one of them. Qualities of warmth and fragility weren't there when needed, if the stronger characteristics were. Her singing of the last act "Salce" and "Ave Maria" was handsomely done, but both were more admirable for their technical accomplishment than emotional impact.

The choruses which are so vital in "Otello" were of top quality, and of the other singers. Rose Taylor as Emilia and Ara Berbarian as Lodovico were the most impressive.

Finnish citations

On Sunday afternoon, which was the 95th birthday anniversary of Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra was heard in Sibelius's Second Symphony, under the direction of Charles Wilson, its assistant conductor. At later ceremonies, Mrs. Koussevitzky, Mr. Wilson, and Kauko Kahila, a member of the orchestra, accepted citations from the government of Finland and Finnair, the national airline, in recognition of their dissemination of Sibelius's music.

Mr. Wilson's direction of the symphony was perhaps more interesting for its potential than its realization. His control of the orchestra and his power to hold the attention of the audience were accomplished by the sparest of technical show, and the time is coming when Mr. Wilson will really be on top of this ample work.

Standing ovation

Last but by no means least of the weekend's attractions was the debut on the second half of Sunday's program of Vladimir Ashkenazy in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5. Everyone brings something of his own to the "Emperor" and the young Russian's thoughts and their result poured forth in sound that was the very essence of Beethoven. With the meticulous accompaniment of Mr. Wilson and the orchestra, the Ashkenazy performance became one of the most beautiful and soul-satisfying of this great music to be heard anywhere today.

The audience gave Mr. Ashkenazy a standing, shouting, waving ovation of the kind that must have sent mourners for the future of live music running for cover.

Ashkenazy's Electric Intensity, Sibelius' Substance Please

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Vladimir Ashkenazy is a pianist with electricity. He was shooting off sparks Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood, where he played the solo part for Beethoven's fifth Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Wilson, the orchestra's regular assistant conductor, was leader.

Ashkenazy is only 32, but he has been cutting a deep furrow through the world's concert territory for about 13 years . . . and he still plays with youthful enthusiasm and agility.

Sunday the colorful concerto with its myriad arpeggios and glittering swirls was played with Ashkenazy's usual incisive, almost steely, touch.

He leans over the keyboard with intensity, and he strikes the keys with machine-like accuracy and clarity. This diamond-sharp approach was reflected in the musical atmosphere.

The crowd loved it. There were 6304 in the audience, nearly all of them under the shed's protection because the elements defied my demand for sun issued Sunday morning and spread a light drizzle across the spacious lawns.

The audience brought the week's total to 22,294, which including four open rehearsals, three Tuesday trend concerts and 12 regular orchestra concerts brings the total attendance at the half-way mark of the festival to 117,385.

Before today's music lovers heard Ashkenazy however, there was Sibelius.

Sibelius Substantial

An essential difference for me between Beethoven's concerto and Sibelius' Second Symphony, which it must be admitted was composed by a man whom history has placed a notch or two under Beethoven, is that the symphony is all lean, meaty substance and the concerto indulges in a bit of space-stuffing here and there.

In spite of its expansive nature (it filled the first half of the program with ease), it has no fat in it. Therearenoempty gestures for the technical sake of filling some space with sound between passages of music.

It is cumulative music which builds an emotional response gradually with deep sonority from the basses and drums, and rafter-shaking stentorian pronouncements from the brasses.

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800
JUL 26 1969 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Finland and its National Airline, FINNAIR, will salute the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Conductor, Charles Wilson on the occasion of the presentation of Symphony No. 2 by Sibelus at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood on July 27. The late Serge Koussevitsky whose anniversary is on the same day, will also be honored for his remarkable contribution in bringing the music of Sibelus to American audiences. His wife, Mrs. Kousevitsky will accept the tribute at Sernak, the Koussevitsky residence.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 28 1969 New England

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 28 1969 New England

Whitestone

SIBELIUS PERFORMANCE by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood yesterday was marked by presentation of Finnish vases to Madame Olga Koussevitzky and Charles Wilson, at left, conductor of the symphony. Plaque was presented to the BSO by Finair representative Russell Tornio, right. It was accepted by BSO member Kauko Kahila, second from left, a Finn himself. The ceremony took place at the Koussevitzky home.

54.

Reviews of Tanglewood

Friday, July 25
by S.L.

Tonight's major concert, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, opened with a performance of the awe-inspiring Overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven. Earlier in the evening, virtuoso pianist Earl Wild performed various selections on the Baldwin Electro piano.

Mr. Leinsdorf chose Beethoven's "Symphony no. 1 in C, op. 21" for the second work. This symphony follows the classical pattern to a much greater extent than do the later symphonies. Consequently the themes in this symphony, especially in the first and third movements tend to become a bit redundant since Beethoven did not know the art of classical development the way that Haydn and Mozart did. The second movement is highly underdeveloped, and serves only as a means of displaying the woodwinds. Leinsdorf's reading of the score was, as usual, exciting, and he managed to bring the work to an exciting peak.

In the final work, pianist Andre Watts performed the Brahms Piano "Concerto no. 2 in B flat, op. 83" with true brilliance and clarity. The work itself is beautiful, especially in the fourth movement, where there are poignant cello and oboe solos. Mr. Watts, who is, in this reviewer's opinion, the best pianist so far this season, outplayed the fine orchestra.

Saturday, July 26
by A.C.S.

Verdi lovers who missed this performance have perhaps cheated themselves of the definitive reading of the composer's most effective work, "Otello." Hopefully, the recording made this evening will be released at a later date.

Sherrill Milnes, as Iago, was perfect both as singer and as actor in the limited space available. (Thanks to the stage direction of Andrew Raeburn and the effectiveness of the singers, dramatic movement was realized with immense impact.) Every gesture, physical and vocal, was projected with authority by Milnes, who showed anew his tremendous artistry.

Matching performances were given by Richard Cassilly in the role of Otello and Maralin Niska as Desdemona. Miss Niska's final act, with the breath-taking "Willow Song" and prayer, will long be remembered. Cassilly, an enormous man both physically and vocally, portrayed the Moor with understanding.

The effectiveness of the performance could not have been brought to fruition without the inspired leadership of Erich Leinsdorf. One only regrets that he has waited so late in his tenure of the Boston Symphony to bring us such a treasure.

Sunday, July 27
by S.L.

Assistant conductor Charles Wilson led the Boston Symphony this afternoon. The performance in general was not quite up to par, partially due to the cold, damp weather and to the taxing work, "Othello," so exquisitely played last night.

The opening work was Jean Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 43." The work itself is tumultuous with its many mounting themes, especially in the third and fourth movements; in addition there is a great amount of drama evident throughout. In comparing Mr. Wilson with Mr. Leinsdorf, one has the feeling that the orchestra is much more at home with the latter. Mr. Wilson, who tries to imitate Leinsdorf in his conducting movements, cannot somehow create the precision and excitement that the Music Director strives for and attains.

The second and final work was the "piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat" (more commonly known as the "Emperor") by Beethoven. In this performance, Soviet-born pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy was the featured soloist. Although the work tends to become a bit stale because of the occasional military rigidity and the extensive performance of it as an "old favorite," Ashkenasy nevertheless gave a fresh reading.

*****

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 31 1969 New England

Rain Is Plaguing Summer Festivals

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Summer festivals have headaches. This year, the biggest one has been rain.

Sometime during each recent weekend, Tanglewood has had to move its supplementary wooden benches in under the shed, out of the downpour. Box office losses on a wet night mount into thousands of lawn customers at three dollars a head.

Blossom Music Center (Cleveland Orchestra) has been hit hard, also Saratoga, and Meadow Brook in Michigan has come to expect a short shower as part of the program.

There are other acts of nature; for instance, mosquitoes. New England Conservatory's summer audiences in Ipswich have long endured these pests. The otherwise glorious nine-week series at Meadow Brook Music Festival, Oakland University, Rochester, Mich., is so plagued.

Four sprayings

Jim Hicks, manager (many of us recall him as genial assistant at Detroit) ordered four sprayings before the July 3 opening concert, three on the ground and one from the air.

One happy woman journalist said, "Nary a mosquito. "But two music critics soon reported the pests bigger and more active than ever.

Another headache: crowds.

Meadow Brook's pavilion seats 2,138. Its managers have limited the lawn audience to 6,000 to keep spectator comfort up and danger down.

Labor Troubles

Labor troubles popuup regularly. The Detroit Symphony had a terrible time from late April to early June, losing 30 school concerts entirely and salvaging the summer season (at Michigan State Fairgrounds, Belle Isle and Meadow Brook) just in time with a desperate "compromise contract" which pleased neither party.

Boston Symphony costs went up months ago, in the form of increased salaries for players. The Philadelphia Orchestra has recently set astonishing new minimum pay levels.

Saratoga prices average the same as 1968, and Meadow Brook (which the Detroit Symphony by the way does not own or control) has modest seat and lawn prices.

Boston, which owns Tanglewood and Symphony Hall, has quietly inched prices upward at both places. Potential Music Shed "capacity" income has been increased about ten percent, but less-than-capacity audiences are the rule.

The popular Tuesday concerts of rock, soul, folk and jazz have been increased to five this year and are pulling well.

Tanglewood has added a ninth week, presumably for budget help, in which Arthur Fielder will conduct "Pops" concerts on Auust 30 and 31.

Acoustic Problems

Acoustical problems at Meadow Brook, Tanglewood and Saratoga are seldom encountered. All have splendidly engineered shells.

Saratoga does have (like War Memorial Auditorium in Boston's Prudential Center) some seats from which parts of the July ballets are not visible. Ballet (a fifty-fifty element in Saratoga's season) is just getting a foothold at Tanglewood and Meadow Brook.

Tanglewood is not only catering to youth in week-night programs: — it has gotten a new look and format into program books and publicity, more readable and informative. It has also added a French touch to the lunchbox cuisine at its cafeteria.

Headaches, yes, but summer festivals are surmounting them, and the music is superb.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 31 1969 New England

Rain Dampens Attendance At Tanglewood Concerts

By JOHN KYES
Gazette Music Critic

Gazette Review

LENOX — Tough weather took its toll of lawn audiences at Tanglewood this weekend, offsetting the appeal of excellent programs. Friday's creditable attendance of 7,417 for brilliant 23-year-old Negro pianist Andre Watts dwindled to 6,240 for the Saturday concert version of Verdi's opera, "Otello," and 6,304 for yesterday's Sibelius - Beethoven concert, directed by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and starring Vladimir Ashkenazy, 31-year-old leading Soviet pianist.

Last Tuesday's attendance of 9,187 at the popular "Tanglewood Trends" concert was by far the largest so far at this summer festival.

To complete the week's record: Saturday's open rehearsal of the orchestra drew 2,333.

Yesterday's hearers evinced mild enthusiasm for the music of Sibelius, as interpreted by Wilson, with two stage recalls at intermission, but at the end of the program demanded five returns to the stage of the short, powerful soloist, and added especial warmth to the applause when Wilson joined Ashkenazy.

The Sibelius "Symphony No. 2 in D" offers a worthy panorama of the methods and moods of the famed composer. Love of nature, including its bleaknesses and loloneliness, pervades the opening movements, and deeply-felt, personal reactions sweep through the orchestral pictures of struggle and achievement, voiced by such contrasting means as eloquent use of brasses and an odd pulsation in the strings.

Nuisance Coughing

Wilson's reading was leisurely but highly competent and intense. His directives were lucid and simple. He dared to keep some passages so soft that persistent coughing by several in the audience became a public nuisance.

Wilson, who leaves Boston this fall to become principal resident conductor of the New York City Opera Company, built the finale of the Sibelius symphony to a glorious conclusion.

Ashkenazy brought dazzling energy to the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, matching the huge orchestra easily in the climaxes, and turning with ease to moments of poetic lyricism. Wilson watched him closely at each important change of pace, and the two men seemed in perfect accord. Ashkenazy was allowed free rein in shaping phrases, and showed his musicianship (even above his towering virtuosity) at every turn.

Beethoven's "Concerto No. 5" is a good show-piece, but not even an Ashkenazy could give it the message or weight of a symphony.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 28 1969 New England

Vladimir Ashkenazy

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 1 1969 New England

Tanglewood Review

Fourth Weekend Of Concerts Attracts More Than 22,000

BY MARTHA deB. BEAVER

Attendance at the Berkshire Festival's fourth weekend of concerts and Saturday rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra totaled 22,294, the greatest so far this season. Rain-threatened lawnsters are offered shelter in the Big Shed, which seems to prevent a too-great decline in attendance during wet weather.

It was a weekend of alternatingly satisfying performances. Friday's Prelude (bonus) at 7, was eminently satisfying, a romantic and classically appealing potpourri of compositions by Bach-Tausig, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Medtner, D'Albert, finishing with a unique Fantasy on Glinka's Life for the Czar by Balakirev. All were played by the all-popular and prodigious pianist Earl Wild with encompassing mastery and musicianship.

The evening's concert had even fresher appeal, with the first appearance at Tanglewood of Andre Watts, young (age seems to vary between 21 and 23) pianist with his beautifully sensitive reading of Brahms' Second Concerto in B flat, op. 93. He seemed to lack assertiveness at the beginning, but confidence grew with his gradual absorption into the musical intricacies and technical demands (met with ease). Interpretive balance suffered occasionally, but with Leinsdorf's very sympathetic direction, Watts and the orchestra offered some transcendant moments. Of course, the third movement, so reminiscent of Brahms' songs, one written before and one after the concerto, hauntingly conceived with solo cello prominence (played by Jules Eskin), is always tenderly received, even with the most indifferent projection, which seldom happens, and this was a memorable moment.

Beethoven starred in the first half of the program, with his Egmont Overture and First Symphony, in C op. 21, its discordant introduction leading to a gay and sprightly movement, the whole work recalling Haydn and Mozart but with the innovative forward look of the composer, especially in the minuet, so readily discernible.

Saturday's concert was another first performance, at Tanglewood and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of Verdi's "Othello" in concert form, with Leinsdorf coordinating principals, choruses and musicians with vigorous direction and searching musicality. Richard Cassilly made an impressive Othello vocally and dramatically, as with Maralin Niska, an appealing and fragile Desdemona. The choruses, trained by Charles Wilson and assistant John Oliver, transmitted their vocal lines admirably, and included the Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, Framingham Choral Society and Berkshire Boys Choir, whose director is Allan Wicks.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the BSO, who will transfer his energies to the City Center Opera company this fall, selected Sibelius popular second symphony in D op. 43 and Beethoven's piano concerto No. 5 in E flat op. 73, better known as the Emperor concert, with Vladimir Ashkenazy, in his first appearance.

The Sibelius performance suffered from a lack of tonal variety and color, and an interpretation, more suggestive of gracious Berkshires in quality than the rugged fjords of Finland. It was not transcendant, but one could become enveloped by the obvious and impressive workings of the rather sparse musical material.

Ashkenazy presented a well-oriented and incisive reading of the Emperor Concerto, with rather heavily projected and at times too sharp entrances (for this reviewer). His technique is excellent and well-balanced; those trills the most effective we've heard this season. His aplomb, at all times, radiated an aura of disinterest, almost downgrading his professional and musical ability. It is an oft-played music-horse, and one that needs all the incipient drama underlined. Even under the Ashkenazy-Leinsdorf-BSO combination it sounded a little tired, or perhaps the weather was oppressively responsible, or this reviewer's mood. The audience went wild in repeatedly recalling the modest performer to center stage.

After Sunday's concert at Tanglewood, including Sibelius' second Symphony, directed by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, its late music director, and Wilson, were honored by Finland and Finnair, Finnish National Airline. The brief ceremony took place at Seranak, residence of Madame Serge Koussevitsky, in front of an almost life-size painting of her husband.

Accepted by Kauko Kahila, trombonist, for the Boston Symphony, was the framed scroll reading: In grateful recognition of the outstanding efforts in bringing the music of Sibelius to audiences throughout America, Finland and its national airline, Finnair, proudly salutes the Boston Symphony Orchestra on July 27, 1969."

Madame Koussevitsky accepted a handsome vase, suggesting the ruggedness of Finland, by Finnish designer Tapio Wirkila, with "humility, honor and gratefulness .. with reference to her Finnish ancestors .. the great esteem in which she holds the Finns and the music of Sibelius, which her husband Serge, interpreted and played here at Tanglewood .." It was the 95th anniversary of the late director's birth.

54

Reviews of Tanglewood

Friday, July 25
by S.L.

Tonight's major concert, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, opened with a performance of the awe-inspiring Overture to "Egmont" by Beethoven. Earlier in the evening, virtuoso pianist Earl Wild performed various selections on the Baldwin Electro piano.

Mr. Leinsdorf chose Beethoven's "Symphony no. 1 in C, op. 21" for the second work. This symphony follows the classical pattern to a much greater extent than do the later symphonies. Consequently the themes in this symphony, especially in the first and third movements tend to become a bit redundant since Beethoven did not know the art of classical development the way that Haydn and Mozart did. The second movement is highly underdeveloped, and serves only as a means of displaying the woodwinds. Leinsdorf's reading of the score was, as usual, exciting, and he managed to bring the work to an exciting peak.

In the final work, pianist Andre Watts performed the Brahms Piano "Concerto no. 2 in B flat, op. 83" with true brilliance and clarity. The work itself is beautiful, especially in the fourth movement, where there are poignant cello and oboe solos. Mr. Watts, who is, in this reviewer's opinion, the best pianist so far this season, outplayed the fine orchestra.

Saturday, July 26
by A.C.S.

Verdi lovers who missed this performance have perhaps cheated themselves of the definitive reading of the composer's most effective work, "Otello." Hopefully, the recording made this evening will be released at a later date.

Sherrill Milnes, as Iago, was perfect both as singer and as actor in the limited space available. (Thanks to the stage direction of Andrew Raeburn and the effectiveness of the singers, dramatic movement was realized with immense impact.) Every gesture, physical and vocal, was projected with authority by Milnes, who showed anew his tremendous artistry.

Matching performances were given by Richard Cassilly in the role of Otello and Maralin Niska as Desdemona. Miss Niska's final act, with the breath-taking "Willow Song" and prayer, will long be remembered. Cassilly, an enormous man both physically and vocally, portrayed the Moor with understanding.

The effectiveness of the performance could not have been brought to fruition without the inspired leadership of Erich Leinsdorf. One only regrets that he has waited so late in his tenure of the Boston Symphony to bring us such a treasure.

Sunday, July 27
by S.L.

Assistant conductor Charles Wilson led the Boston Symphony this afternoon. The performance in general was not quite up to par, partially due to the cold, damp weather and to the taxing work, "Othello," so exquisitely played last night.

The opening work was Jean Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 43." The work itself is tumultuous with its many mounting themes, especially in the third and fourth movements; in addition there is a great amount of drama evident throughout. In comparing Mr. Wilson with Mr. Leinsdorf, one has the feeling that the orchestra is much more at home with the latter. Mr. Wilson, who tries to imitate Leinsdorf in his conducting movements, cannot somehow create the precision and excitement that the Music Director strives for and attains.

The second and final work was the "piano Concerto No. 5 in E flat" (more commonly known as the "Emperor") by Beethoven. In this performance, Soviet-born pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy was the featured soloist. Although the work tends to become a bit stale because of the occasional military rigidity and the extensive performance of it as an "old favorite," Ashkenazy nevertheless gave a fresh reading.

*****

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 31 1969 New England

Rain Is Plaguing Summer Festivals

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Summer festivals have headaches. This year, the biggest one has been rain.

Sometime during each recent weekend, Tanglewood has had to move its supplementary wooden benches in under the shed, out of the downpour. Box office losses on a wet night mount into thousands of lawn customers at three dollars a head.

Blossom Music Center (Cleveland Orchestra) has been hit hard, also Saratoga, and Meadow Brook in Michigan has come to expect a short shower as part of the program.

There are other acts of nature; for instance, mosquitoes. New England Conservatory's summer audiences in Ipswich have long endured these pests. The otherwise glorious nine-week series at Meadow Brook Music Festival, Oakland University, Rochester, Mich., is so plagued.

Four sprayings

Jim Hicks, manager (many of us recall him as genial assistant at Detroit) ordered four sprayings before the July 3 opening concert, three on the ground and one from the air.

One happy woman journalist said, "Nary a mosquito. "But two music critics soon reported the pests bigger and more active than ever.

Another headache: crowds.

Meadow Brook's pavilion seats 2,138. Its managers have limited the lawn audience to 6,000 to keep spectator comfort up and danger down.

Labor Troubles

Labor troubles popuup regularly. The Detroit Symphony had a terrible time from late April to early June, losing 30 school concerts entirely and salvaging the summer season (at Michigan State Fairgrounds, Belle Isle and Meadow Brook) just in time with a desperate "compromise contract" which pleased neither party.

Boston Symphony costs went up months ago, in the form of increased salaries for players. The Philadelphia Orchestra has recently set astonishing new minimum pay levels.

Saratoga prices average the same as 1968, and Meadow Brook (which the Detroit Symphony by the way does not own or control) has modest seat and lawn prices.

Boston, which owns Tanglewood and Symphony Hall, has quietly inched prices upward at both places. Potential Music Shed "capacity" income has been increased about ten percent, but less-than-capacity audiences are the rule.

The popular Tuesday concerts of rock, soul, folk and jazz have been increased to five this year and are pulling well.

Tanglewood has added a ninth week, presumably for budget help, in which Arthur Fielder will conduct "Pops" concerts on Auust 30 and 31.

Acoustic Problems

Acoustical problems at Meadow Brook, Tanglewood and Saratoga are seldom encountered. All have splendidly engineered shells.

Saratoga does have (like War Memorial Auditorium in Boston's Prudential Center) some seats from which parts of the July ballets are not visible. Ballet (a fifty-fifty element in Saratoga's season) is just getting a foothold at Tanglewood and Meadow Brook.

Tanglewood is not only catering to youth in week-night programs: — it has gotten a new look and format into program books and publicity, more readable and informative. It has also added a French touch to the lunchbox cuisine at its cafeteria.

Headaches, yes, but summer festivals are surmounting them, and the music is superb.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 31 1969 New England

Rain Dampens Attendance At Tanglewood Concerts

By JOHN KYES
Gazette Music Critic

Gazette Review

LENOX — Tough weather took its toll of lawn audiences at Tanglewood this weekend, offsetting the appeal of excellent programs. Friday's creditable attendance of 7,417 for brilliant 23-year-old Negro pianist Andre Watts dwindled to 6,240 for the Saturday concert version of Verdi's opera, "Otello," and 6,304 for yesterday's Sibelius - Beethoven concert, directed by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and starring Vladimir Ashkenazy, 31-year-old leading Soviet pianist.

Last Tuesday's attendance of 9,187 at the popular "Tanglewood Trends" concert was by far the largest so far at this summer festival.

To complete the week's record: Saturday's open rehearsal of the orchestra drew 2,333.

Yesterday's hearers evinced mild enthusiasm for the music of Sibelius, as interpreted by Wilson, with two stage recalls at intermission, but at the end of the program demanded five returns to the stage of the short, powerful soloist, and added especial warmth to the applause when Wilson joined Ashkenazy.

The Sibelius "Symphony No. 2 in D" offers a worthy panorama of the methods and moods of the famed composer. Love of nature, including its bleaknesses and loloneliness, pervades the opening movements, and deeply-felt, personal reactions sweep through the orchestral pictures of struggle and achievement, voiced by such contrasting means as eloquent use of brasses and an odd pulsation in the strings.

Nuisance Coughing

Wilson's reading was leisurely but highly competent and intense. His directives were lucid and simple. He dared to keep some passages so soft that persistent coughing by several in the audience became a public nuisance.

Wilson, who leaves Boston this fall to become principal resident conductor of the New York City Opera Company, built the finale of the Sibelius symphony to a glorious conclusion.

Ashkenazy brought dazzling energy to the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, matching the huge orchestra easily in the climaxes, and turning with ease to moments of poetic lyricism. Wilson watched him closely at each important change of pace, and the two men seemed in perfect accord. Ashkenazy was allowed free rein in shaping phrases, and showed his musicianship (even above his towering virtuosity) at every turn.

Beethoven's "Concerto No. 5" is a good show-piece, but not even an Ashkenazy could give it the message or weight of a symphony.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 28 1969 New England

Vladimir Ashkenazy

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 11,900

AUG 1 1969 New England

Tanglewood Review

Fourth Weekend Of Concerts Attracts More Than 22,000

BY MARTHA deB. BEAVER

Attendance at the Berkshire Festival's fourth weekend of concerts and Saturday rehearsal by the Boston Symphony Orchestra totaled 22,294, the greatest so far this season. Rain-threatened lawnsters are offered shelter in the Big Shed, which seems to prevent a too-great decline in attendance during wet weather.

It was a weekend of alternatingly satisfying performances. Friday's Prelude (bonus) at 7, was eminently satisfying, a romantic and classically appealing potpourri of compositions by Bach-Tausig, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Medtner, D'Albert, finishing with a unique Fantasy on Glinka's Life for the Czar by Balakirev. All were played by the all-popular and prodigious pianist Earl Wild with encompassing mastery and musicianship.

The evening's concert had even fresher appeal, with the first appearance at Tanglewood of Andre Watts, young (age seems to vary between 21 and 23) pianist with his beautifully sensitive reading of Brahms' Second Concerto in B flat, op. 93. He seemed to lack assertiveness at the beginning, but confidence grew with his gradual absorption into the musical intricacies and technical demands (met with ease). Interpretive balance suffered occasionally, but with Leinsdorf's very sympathetic direction, Watts and the orchestra offered some transcendant moments. Of course, the third movement, so reminiscent of Brahms' songs, one written before and one after the concerto, hauntingly conceived with solo cello prominence (played by Jules Eskin), is always tenderly received, even with the most indifferent projection, which seldom happens, and this was a memorable moment.

Beethoven starred in the first half of the program, with his Egmont Overture and First Symphony, in C op. 21, its discordant introduction leading to a gay and sprightly movement, the whole work recalling Haydn and Mozart but with the innovative forward look of the composer, especially in the minuet, so readily discernible.

Saturday's concert was another first performance, at Tanglewood and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of Verdi's "Othello" in concert form, with Leinsdorf coordinating principals, choruses and musicians with vigorous direction and searching musicality. Richard Cassilly made an impressive Othello vocally and dramatically, as with Maralin Niska, an appealing and fragile Desdemona. The choruses, trained by Charles Wilson and assistant John Oliver, transmitted their vocal lines admirably, and included the Tanglewood Choir, Berkshire Chorus, Framingham Choral Society and Berkshire Boys Choir, whose director is Allan Wicks.

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the BSO, who will transfer his energies to the City Center Opera company this fall, selected Sibelius popular second symphony in D op. 43 and Beethoven's piano concerto No. 5 in E flat op. 73, better known as the Emperor concert, with Vladimir Ashkenazy, in his first appearance.

The Sibelius performance suffered from a lack of tonal variety and color, and an interpretation, more suggestive of gracious Berkshires in quality than the rugged fjords of Finland. It was not transcendant, but one could become enveloped by the obvious and impressive workings of the rather sparse musical material.

Ashkenazy presented a well-oriented and incisive reading of the Emperor Concerto, with rather heavily projected and at times too sharp entrances (for this reviewer). His technique is excellent and well-balanced; those trills the most effective we've heard this season. His aplomb, at all times, radiated an aura of disinterest, almost downgrading his professional and musical ability. It is an oft-played music-horse, and one that needs all the incipient drama underlined. Even under the Ashkenazy-Leinsdorf-BSO combination it sounded a little tired, or perhaps the weather was oppressively responsible, or this reviewer's mood. The audience went wild in repeatedly recalling the modest performer to center stage.

After Sunday's concert at Tanglewood, including Sibelius' second Symphony, directed by Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, its late music director, and Wilson, were honored by Finland and Finnair, Finnish National Airline. The brief ceremony took place at Seranak, residence of Madame Serge Koussevitsky, in front of an almost life-size painting of her husband.

Accepted by Kauko Kahila, trombonist, for the Boston Symphony, was the framed scroll reading: In grateful recognition of the outstanding efforts in bringing the music of Sibelius to audiences throughout America, Finland and its national airline, Finnair, proudly salutes the Boston Symphony Orchestra on July 27, 1969."

Madame Koussevitsky accepted a handsome vase, suggesting the ruggedness of Finland, by Finnish designer Tapio Wirkila, with "humility, honor and gratefulness .. with reference to her Finnish ancestors .. the great esteem in which she holds the Finns and the music of Sibelius, which her husband Serge, interpreted and played here at Tanglewood .." It was the 95th anniversary of the late director's birth.

55.

Tanglewood, a Musical Experience

By Joseph Kaye
(The Star's New York Correspondent)

Lenox, Mass.—A recent weekend at Tanglewood, our foremost summer music festival, brought such riches as a staged concert version of Verdi's opera, "Otello," and absorbing performances by pianists Andre Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy with the Boston Symphony.

The "Otello" may be ranked as probably the best performance of a Shakespearean work this season in and out of New York. What is rare in opera occurs in "Otello"—the music emphasizes the drama and frequently enhances its qualities. Thus a good performance of "Otello" became a good performance of Shakespeare's play, but the Tanglewood presentation was not only a good performance, it was a stunning performance.

The conductor was Erich Leinsdorf, retiring musical director of the Boston Symphony, which has its summer home and attached school here at the Berkshire Music Center. Richard Cassilly, formerly of the New York City Opera, sang the title role; Sherrill Milnes, of the Metropolitan Opera, was the Iago; the Desdemona was Maralin Niska, who did distinguished service with the late Metropolitan Opera National company. Leinsdorf really was the star, creating a performance of such impact that when the last note sounded an ovation exploded in the great shed where the opera was performed. It lasted at least 10 minutes, and must have rolled impressively through the Berkshire hills that ring Tanglewood.

SHERRILL MILNES had no difficulty making Iago the most interesting character in the opera, since Iago is an intelligent and purposeful villain, a competitive contrast to Otello, the befuddled husband who succumbs to a hanky-panky. Miss Niska was compellingly pathetic as the wailing Desdemona. All were in effective voice, quite a feat in the great shed against the big orchestra and massed choruses. Andrew Raeburn arranged skillful staging, with the principal singers enacting their roles on a platform set high at the back of the orchestra.

The two pianists began and finished the weekend. Watts, who has risen high as a concert attraction in the few years he has been before the public, is a less showy performer than Van Cliburn, to whom he could be compared, but a more sensitive artist. His delivery of some passages from the allegretto finale of the Brahms concerto he played had a pearly playfulness that was as delightful as it was understanding. Ashkenazy, soloist in the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, was the introspective Russian.

A MISSOURIAN was encountered at Tanglewood. Donna Precht, of Mexico, is a fellowship participant at the Berkshire Music Center, appearing in the Center's presentation of operatic scenes and entire operas. She will sing the role of Marie in Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" soon.

A tall and pretty soprano, Miss Precht has already had wide experience. She studied in France after graduating from the University of Missouri and later in New York, where she was chosen by the pioneer musical avant-gardist, Edgard Varese, to sing in his "Offrandes" and in the world premiere of "Nocturnal," for soprano solo and eight contrabasses. She has affectionate memories of the late French-American composer. "When he spoke of music," she recalled, "he came alive. Otherwise, he was a rather quiet and self-contained man." She has been a member of the New York City Opera company, and this fall she goes to Zurich, Switzerland on a private scholarship to study German opera. After that, it is expected that the world of high professional opera will open up for her.

Miss Precht was the only student in the area from Missouri, a fact which prompted some nostalgic thoughts. When I first came to Tanglewood some years ago there were seven or eight Missouri students. Then, year after year, there were fewer—five, four, three, and now just one.

Donna Precht, with conductor Charles Wilson.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 325,351 SUN. 396,682
AUG 3 1969

FREE PRESS
Phillipsburg Area's Picture Paper
Vol. 9 No. 26 Second Class Postage Paid at Phillipsburg, New Jersey, 08865 28 PAGES PHILLIPSBURG, NEW JERSEY 08865 AUGUST 8, 1969 Ten Cents

N.Q.K. REPORTS

You can lie on the beach miles from a concert hall and hear the glories of Beethoven through the magic of electronics encased in your transistor radio.

You can dispel the frustration of being in a traffic jam by flipping on a selection of magnificently rendered Bach and rock from your tape deck.

How great is this age of recorded music. How unerring its performances! How superlative its tone!

But for all the multiple-track tapes and stereophonic sound systems, recorded music remains one-dimensional.

The concert hall, on the other hand, offers delights for the eye as well as enchantment for the ear and some endearing mistakes withal. In the concert hall (or shed or dell or grass around the bandstand) all the drama of a live performance with the inevitable action-reaction of artists and audience adds a dimension to the music. So does the inability of the orchestra to delete its mistakes by splicing tapes, as for a recording.

For comic relief, there is an untapped lode of fun in watching the stage business of musicians at rest.

None of this, of course, comes through on record or tape or even television because you can watch only what the camera watches. But it all comes across with high fidelity to you out front.

On a recent rainy Sunday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the stirring Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts. After years of listening to the symphony on record, one knows as well as the conductor when the oboes come in, when the drums rumble.

But hearing it live was a whole new experience.

As the oboes and bassons played (one began off key), the violins rested. And as the violins rested, the violinists looked over the audience: three smiled at their wives or friends in the front section; two found something funny and nearly burst out laughing. With the noncha-lance or the real pro, all came in on cue, sawed away, then resumed their byplay.

A shiningly bald cellist attracted moths and mosquitos around his head and managed somehow not to slap at any. But his nose twitched a lot.

The damp air above the lake raised difficulties with the instruments and necessitated a retuning interlude between movements.

At the end, in the long, lush violin passages, the usually deadpan-when-playing musicians smiled. Their obvious enjoyment added to the sound of music.

The Russian pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is short but he plays big. When he played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, full of runs the length of the keyboard, his piano stool squeaked as he leaned -- one cacaphonous sound with the bass notes, another with the high notes.

During his nonplaying interlude, he tried vainly to adjust the stool so his feet could reach the pedals comfortably. He succeeded only in making the stool wobbly. But he appeared nonplussed.

It was beautiful to watch. And the "Emperor" never sounded so new.

On records, the flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer comes across as superhuman perfection. At Tanglewood, after playing a long, almost one-breath solo in a suite by Bach, she let the spittle out of her instrument, rolled her eyes at the first violinist and grinned like a 12-year-old who's just made it through his recital solo without a hitch.

Immediacy like this you don't get on records. Score another point for people over machines.

Tanglewood Double Brimful of Music

By BERNARD LOTH

TANGLEWOOD, Mass. — Tanglewood's regular Friday evening double feature presented a 45-minute piano recital by Earl Wild and a two-hour concert of the Boston Symphony, with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium and Andre Watts as piano solos. It was quite a fabulous evening of music.

Mr. Wild, famous for his Gershwin interpretations, played a varied program: Bach-Taussig, Organ Toccata and fugue in D minor, Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso, in B minor, Medtner's Improvisation, D'Albert's Scherzo in F sharp minor, Balakirev's Fantasy on "Life for the Czar" and a Chopin encore. His playing was enthusiastically received, more so than he deserved.

The Bach was tonally effective and very organlike. Mendelssohn's Rondo was a very familiar number played in rather hackneyed fashion and used as a showcase for speed. The Brahms is not familiar and not very effectively presented. The Medtner was a bit on the contemporary side with syncopation, flashy scales, tinkling sounds and wandering in thought. The Scherzo by D'Albert was a demanding piece rather well played and elicited much applause. Balakirev was just a potpourri of tunes from the Glinka opera.

Mr. Wild has great technical ability, a magnificent pianissimo, considerable clarity and speed, but he lacks a depth of interpretation and the little magic that makes all the difference.

In the main feature, the Boston Symphony was nothing short of magnificent. It was the finest orchestra in the world as it played Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C opus 21 and the Egmont Overture. The sound was silken, full, solid, tender, playful, round, shimmering. It was the product of a great conductor in complete control of 100 fine artists willing and anxious to be the palette through which the conductor paints his masterpiece, and this summer marks the end of the reign of Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony.

After the intermission, Andre Watts joined the orchestra in the Brahm's Second Piano Concerto and proved to be an electrifying pianist, wonderfully musical, with sparkling technique and, at age 23, with a magnificest future in store.

In this day when so many people are pushing for opportunity and advancement for the minority groups very often regardless of qualification, it is such a pleasure to see a young Negro who has made it completely on merit.

Watts is interesting to watch. He plays with fingers bent for sharp percussive or stacatto effect and sometimes with almost straight fingers stroking the keys. He snaps his fingers off the keys and into his lap at the end of a section with surprising speed, and he starts the next section as suddenly by snapping his hands up from his lap onto the keys without positioning his hands above the keyboard at all.

The extra rapid release of the keys has one unfortunate result. The size of the tone suffers probably because he is concentrating more the release than the chords themselves. In fact, heard in excellent seats about one third of the way back and almost center, the volume of piano tone seldom reached the size necessary for a good climax. The pianissimo, the octaves, the clarity, speed depth of interpretation and most of the other qualifications of a top artist were all there — all except size of tone.

Mr. Leinsdorf was unable to keep the orchestra at the same level of excellence set in the Beethoven works, but he did a fine job in keeping the orchestral sound down to let the softest piano notes sing through. His ability to memorize the score also gives him a bit more freedom to work with the soloist and to cue the orchestra.

The cello solo at the start of the third movement was played beautifully by first cellist Jules Eskin, but the horns which performed so perfectly in the Beethoven became a bit sloppy in Brahms.

The two-hour trip from Newburgh via Rt. 84, the Taconic and 20 cents worth of the Thruway to the Massachusetts border annd just a few miles beyond is a pleasant scenic drive.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE NEWS
Wednesday, July 30, 1969

55.

Tanglewood, a Musical Experience

By Joseph Kaye
(The Star's New York Correspondent)

Lenox, Mass.—A recent weekend at Tanglewood, our foremost summer music festival, brought such riches as a staged concert version of Verdi's opera, "Otello," and absorbing performances by pianists Andre Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy with the Boston Symphony.

The "Otello" may be ranked as probably the best performance of a Shakespearean work this season in and out of New York. What is rare in opera occurs in "Otello"—the music emphasizes the drama and frequently enhances its qualities. Thus a good performance of "Otello" became a good performance of Shakespeare's play, but the Tanglewood presentation was not only a good performance, it was a stunning performance.

The conductor was Erich Leinsdorf, retiring musical director of the Boston Symphony, which has its summer home and attached school here at the Berkshire Music Center. Richard Cassilly, formerly of the New York City Opera, sang the title role; Sherrill Milnes, of the Metropolitan Opera, was the Iago; the Desdemona was Maralin Niska, who did distinguished service with the late Metropolitan Opera National company. Leinsdorf really was the star, creating a performance of such impact that when the last note sounded an ovation exploded in the great shed where the opera was performed. It lasted at least 10 minutes, and must have rolled impressively through the Berkshire hills that ring Tanglewood.

SHERRILL MILNES had no difficulty making Iago the most interesting character in the opera, since Iago is an intelligent and purposeful villain, a competitive contrast to Otello, the befuddled husband who succumbs to a hanky-panky. Miss Niska was compellingly pathetic as the weakling Desdemona. All were in effective voice, quite a feat in the great shed against the big orchestra and massed choruses. Andrew Raeburn arranged skillful staging, with the principal singers enacting their roles on a platform set high at the back of the orchestra.

The two pianists began and finished the weekend. Watts, who has risen high as a concert attraction in the few years he has been before the public, is a less showy performer than Van Cliburn, to whom he could be compared, but a more sensitive artist. His delivery of some passages from the allegretto finale of the Brahms concerto he played had a pearly playfulness that was as delightful as it was understanding. Ashkenazy, soloist in the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto, was the introspective Russian.

A MISSOURIAN was encountered at Tanglewood. Donna Precht, of Mexico, is a fellowship participant at the Berkshire Music Center, appearing in the Center's presentation of operatic scenes and entire operas. She will sing the role of Marie in Alban Berg's "Wozzeck" soon.

A tall and pretty soprano, Miss Precht has already had wide experience. She studied in France after graduating from the University of Missouri and later in New York, where she was chosen by the pioneer musical avant-gardist, Edgard Varese, to sing in his "Offrandes" and in the world premiere of "Nocturnal," for soprano solo and eight contrabasses. She has affectionate memories of the late French-American composer. "When he spoke of music," she recalled, "he came alive. Otherwise, he was a rather quiet and self-contained man." She has been a member of the New York City Opera company. and this fall she goes to Zurich, Switzerland on a private scholarship to study German opera. After that, it is expected that the world of high professional opera will open up for her.

Miss Precht was the only student in the area from Missouri, a fact which prompted some nostalgic thoughts. When I first came to Tanglewood some years ago there were seven or eight Missouri students. Then, year after year, there were fewer—five, four, three, and now just one.

Donna Precht, with conductor Charles Wilson.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 325,351 SUN. 396,682

AUG 3 1969

FREE PRESS

Phillipsburg Area's Picture Paper

Vol. 9 No. 26 | Second Class Postage Paid at Phillipsburg, New Jersey, 08865 | 28 PAGES | PHILLIPSBURG, NEW JERSEY 08865 | AUGUST 8, 1969 | Ten Cents

N.Q.K. REPORTS

You can lie on the beach miles from a concert hall and hear the glories of Beethoven through the magic of electronics encased in your transistor radio.

You can dispel the frustration of being in a traffic jam by flipping on a selection of magnificently rendered Bach and rock from your tape deck.

How great is this age of recorded music. How unerring its performances! How superlative its tone!

But for all the multiple-track tapes and stereophonic sound systems, recorded music remains one-dimensional.

The concert hall, on the other hand, offers delights for the eye as well as enchantment for the ear and some endearing mistakes withal. In the concert hall (or shed or dell or grass around the bandstand) all the drama of a live performance with the inevitable action-reaction of artists and audience adds a dimension to the music. So does the inability of the orchestra to delete its mistakes by splicing tapes, as for a recording.

For comic relief, there is an untapped lode of fun in watching the stage business of musicians at rest.

None of this, of course, comes through on record or tape or even television because you can watch only what the camera watches. But it all comes across with high fidelity to you out front.

On a recent rainy Sunday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the stirring Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius at Tanglewood in western Massachusetts. After years of listening to the symphony on record, one knows as well as the conductor when the oboes come in, when the drums rumble.

But hearing it live was a whole new experience.

As the oboes and bassons played (one began off key), the violins rested. And as the violins rested, the violinists looked over the audience: three smiled at their wives or friends in the front section; two found something funny and nearly burst out laughing. With the noncha-lance or the real pro, all came in on cue, sawed away, then resumed their byplay.

A shiningly bald cellist attracted moths and mosquitos around his head and managed somehow not to slap at any. But his nose twitched a lot.

The damp air above the lake raised difficulties with the instruments and necessitated a retuning interlude between movements.

At the end, in the long, lush violin passages, the usually deadpan-when-playing musicians smiled. Their obvious enjoyment added to the sound of music.

The Russian pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is short but he plays big. When he played Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, full of runs the length of the keyboard, his piano stool squeaked as he leaned -- one cacaphonous sound with the bass notes, another with the high notes.

During his nonplaying interlude, he tried vainly to adjust the stool so his feet could reach the pedals comfortably. He succeeded only in making the stool wobbly. But he appeared nonplussed.

It was beautiful to watch. And the "Emperor" never sounded so new.

On records, the flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer comes across as superhuman perfection. At Tanglewood, after playing a long, almost one-breath solo in a suite by Bach, she let the spittle out of her instrument, rolled her eyes at the first violinist and grimaced like a 12-year-old who's just made it through his recital solo without a hitch.

Immediacy like this you don't get on records. Score another point for people over machines.

Tanglewood Double Brimful of Music

By BERNARD LOTH

TANGLEWOOD, Mass. — Tanglewood's regular Friday evening double feature presented a 45-minute piano recital by Earl Wild and a two-hour concert of the Boston Symphony, with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium and Andre Watts as piano solos. It was quite a fabulous evening of music.

Mr. Wild, famous for his Gershwin interpretations, played a varied program: Bach-Taussig, Organ Toccata and fugue in D minor, Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso, in B minor, Medtner's Improvisation, D'Albert's Scherzo in F sharp minor, Balakirev's Fantasy on "Life for the Czar" and a Chopin encore. His playing was enthusiastically received, more so than he deserved.

The Bach was tonally effective and very organlike. Mendelssohn's Rondo was a very familiar number played in rather hackneyed fashion and used as a showcase for speed. The Brahms is not familiar and not very effectively presented. The Medtner was a bit on the contemporary side with syncopation, flashy scales, tinkling sounds and wandering in thought. The Scherzo by D'Albert was a demanding piece rather well played and elicited much applause. Balakirev was just a potpourri of tunes from the Glinka opera.

Mr. Wild has great technical ability, a magnificent pianissimo, considerable clarity and speed, but he lacks a depth of interpretation and the little magic that makes all the difference.

In the main feature, the Boston Symphony was nothing short of magnificent. It was the finest orchestra in the world as it played Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C opus 21 and the Egmont Overture. The sound was silken. full, solid, tender, playful, round, shimmering. It was the product of a great conductor in complete control of 100 fine artists willing and anxious to be the palette through which the conductor paints his masterpiece, and this summer marks the end of the reign of Erich Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony.

After the intermission, Andre Watts joined the orchestra in the Brahms's Second Piano Concerto and proved to be an electrifying pianist, wonderfully musical, with sparkling technique and, at age 23, with a magnificest future in store.

In this day when so many people are pushing for opportunity and advancement for the minority groups very often regardless of qualification, it is such a pleasure to see a young Negro who has made it completely on merit.

Watts is interesting to watch. He plays with fingers bent for sharp percussive or stacatto effect and sometimes with almost straight fingers stroking the keys. He snaps his fingers off the keys and into his lap at the end of a section with surprising speed, and he starts the next section as suddenly by snapping his hands up from his lap onto the keys without positioning his hands above the keyboard at all.

The extra rapid release of the keys has one unfortunate result. The size of the tone suffers probably because he is concentrating more the release than the chords themselves. In fact, heard in excellent seats about one third of the way back and almost center, the volume of piano tone seldom reached the size necessary for a good climax. The pianissimo, the octaves, the clarity, speed depth of interpretation and most of the other qualifications of a top artist were all there — all except size of tone.

Mr. Leinsdorf was unable to keep the orchestra at the same level of excellence set in the Beethoven works, but he did a fine job in keeping the orchestral sound down to let the softest piano notes sing through. His ability to memorize the score also gives him a bit more freedom to work with the soloist and to cue the orchestra.

The cello solo at the start of the third movement was played beautifully by first cellist Jules Eskin, but the horns which performed so perfectly in the Beethoven became a bit sloppy in Brahms.

The two-hour trip from Newburgh via Rt. 84, the Taconic and 20 cents worth of the Thruway to the Massachusetts border annd just a few miles beyond is a pleasant scenic drive.

Wednesday, July 30, 1969

52

5th Week

Fifth Week-End At Tanglewood

PAGE ONE

The fifth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins Friday evening August 1 at 9 p. m. when Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts a program of three works: Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's A Survivor from Warsaw, and Brahms's Symphony No. 4. This will be Mr. Leinsdorf's only Berkshire Festival concert this weekend.

The following evening, Saturday, August 2 at 8 p. m., French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez leads music of Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok, with the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, as soloist in Bartok's two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra. Mr. Silverstein is joined by three of the Orchestra's principals, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Jules Eskin, cello, in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante, op. 84. Mr. Boulez, who makes his Tanglewood debut with this concert, was recently announced as the new Music Director of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

On Sunday afternoon, August 3 at 2:30 p. m., 26-year old Israeli conductor, Daniel Barenboim, conducts the Boston Symphony for the first time. His wife, English cellist Jacqueline DuPre, is soloist in the Elgar concerto. Mr. Barenboim's program opens with Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture and concludes with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

ATHENS, N. Y.
HERALD
W. 500

JUL 31 1969

RAVENA, N. Y.
NEWS-HERALD
W. 2,000

AUG 1 1969

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 27 1969 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf to Conduct Friday at Tanglewood

The fifth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins Friday at 9 p.m. when Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony, conducts a program of three works: Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," and Brahms's Symphony No. 4.

The following evening at 8, French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez leads music of Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok, with the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, as soloist in Bartok's two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra. He is joined by three of the Orchestra's principals, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Jules Eskin, cello, in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante, op. 84. Mrs. Boulez, who makes his Tanglewood debut with this concert, was recently announced as the new Music Director of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

On Sunday, Aug. 3, at 2:30 p.m., 26-year old Israeli conductor, Daniel Barenboim, leads the Boston Symphony for the first time. His wife, English cellist Jacqueline DuPre, is soloist in the Elgar concerto. Barenboim's program opens with Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blaz' Overture and concludes with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 27 1969

POUGHKEEPSIE JOURNAL
Sunday, July 20, 1969

Tanglewood To Feature Leinsdorf As Conductor

Lenox, Mass. — Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the orchestra in a concert at 9 p.m. Friday as part of the fifth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

The program will include three works, Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's A Survivor from Warsaw, and Brahm's Symphony No. 4.

On Saturday at 8 p.m. French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez will make his Tanglewood debut conducting works of Haydn, Debussy and Bartok. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, will be the soloist in Bartok's two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra.

Boulez recently was named music director of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Daniel Barenboim, 26-year-old Israeli conductor, will conduct the Boston Symphony for the first time in a concert at 2:30 p.m. next Sunday. The program will open with Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas' Overture and conclude with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The conductor's wife, English cellist Jacqueline DuPre, will be soloist in the Elgar Concerto.

The Berkshire Boys Choir will present the weekend prelude at 7 p.m. Aug. 1.

The weekend's open rehearsal for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund will be at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 2.

Music

Berkshire Festival. The fifth weekend of the festival begins Aug. 1 at 9 p.m. at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the Friday evening concert. Saturday at 8 p.m., French composer - conductor Pierre Boulez will conduct music of Haydn, Debussy and Bartok.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim will conduct the Boston Symphony for the first time. A Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m., will feature the Berkshire Boy Choir.

'Survivor from Warsaw' To Be Performed Friday

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass. — Erich Lansdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," and Brahms' Symphony No. 4 on Friday at 9 p.m. in the Berkshire Music Festival, his only concert here that weekend.

Saturday at 8 p.m., French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez will conduct music of Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok. The Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, will be soloist in Bartok's two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra. Silverstein will be joined by three of the orchestra's principals, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Jules Eskin, cello, in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante, Op. 84.

Boulez, who makes his Tanglewood debut with this concert, recently was announced as the new music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m. 26-year old Israeli conductor Daniel Barenboim, will conduct the Boston Symphony for the first time. His wife, English cellist Jacqueline DuPre, will be soloist in the Elgar concerto.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p.m. concert who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, will feature the Berkshire Boy Choir singing music by Tippett, Britten, and Vaughan Williams.

The weekend's open rehearsal, for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is Saturday morning at 10:30.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

AUG 1 1969

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 30 1969 New England

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

JUL 25 1969 New England Newsclip

5th Weekend at Tanglewood Features Boulez, Barenboim

The fifth weekend at Tanglewood features two foreign conductors directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Pierre Boulez, French composer-conductor who was recently appointed music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, will lead the BSO in a program of Haydn, Debussy and Bartok on Saturday, Aug. 2, at 8 p.m.

Wife Soloist

Daniel Barenboim, 26-year-old Israeli conductor, will direct the Boston Symphony on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 3 at 2:30. Mr. Barenboim will open with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and conclude with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. His wife, English cellist Jacqueline DuPre, is soloist in an Elgar concerto.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the BSO on Friday evening, Aug. 1 at 9. The program will consist of Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw" and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

Both Mr. Barenboim and Mr. Boulez are making their Tanglewood debut. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein will be violin soloist in Bartok's two rhapsodies in the Saturday performance. He will be joined by BSO musicians Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, and Jules Eskin, cello, in Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante, Opus 84.

The Berkshire Boy Choir, singing music by Tippett, Britton and Vaughan Williams, is featured in the weekend prelude Aug. 1 at 7 p.m. The regular open rehearsal is Saturday morning at 10:30.

Tuesday Trends

The Tuesday Contemporary Trends concert this week presents Joni Mitchell, Tim Hardin and the Butterfield Blues Band.

Joni Mitchell, a Canadian singer-songwriter, recently recorded "Both Sides Now." Paul Butterfield of the Butterfield Blues Band is acclaimed as one of the few white musicians who can authentically play the blues and soul music. He grew up near Chicago's Black district. Tim Hardin is a 26-year-old guitar and piano player. His recent songs include "If I Were a Carpenter."

Tickets for Tuesday's concert, which begins at 8 p.m., are available at the Tanglewood box office.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 19 1969

Eric Leinsdorf To Conduct Three Works At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The fifth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins Friday, Aug. 1 at 9 p.m. when Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony conducts a program of three works: Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's A Survivor from Warsaw and Brahms' Symphony No. 4. This will be Mr. Leinsdorf's only Berkshire Festival concert that weekend.

The following evening at 8 p.m. French composer conductor Pierre Boulez leads music of Haydn, Debussy and Bartok, with the Boston Symphony's concertmaster Joseph Silverstein as soloist in Bartok's two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra.

Mr. Silverstein is joined by three of the orchestra's principals, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon and Jules Eskin, cello, in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante, op. 84. Mr. Boulez, who makes his Tanglewood debut with this concert, was recently announced as the new music director of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

Sunday afternoon, Aug. 3, at 2:30 p.m. 26-year old Israeli conductor, Daniel Barenboim, conducts the Boston Symphony for the first time. His wife, English cellist Jacqueline DuPre, is soloist in the Elgar concerto. Mr. Barenboim's program opens with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and concludes with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The weekend prelude, Friday, Aug. 1 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p.m. concert who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the Berkshire Boy Choir singing music by Tippett, Britten and Vaughan Williams.

NEW ENGLAND

Boston Symphony Orchestra with Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, will perform at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. at 9 p.m., preceded at 7 p.m. by chamber music recital performed by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players on Friday. The Orchestra, with Pierre Boulez, conductor, will perform Saturday at 8 p.m. and with Daniel Barenboim, conductor on Sunday at 2:30 p.m. There will be an open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday at 10:30 a.m.

The Festival String and Woodwind Ensemble performs at Great Hall of "The Breakers," Newport, R.I. at 9:30 p.m. Friday. Also on that day, The Metropolitan Opera Studio performs at 5:30 p.m. and Frederick Hand at 11:30 a.m. at The Elms, Newport. On Saturday in Great Hall of "The Breakers," Raymond Lewenthal performs at 9:30 p.m., and The Metropolitan Opera Studio performs at 11:30 a.m. in The Elms. American Dance Company performs in Great Hall of "The Breaker" at 9:30 p.m. and a grand mechanical piano concert of legendary performers of the past will be presented at Newport Casino at noon Sunday.

A Soap Box Derby will be held Friday at 3 p.m. at Martin St., Berkeley, R.I.

Outdoor Art Show at Orleans Park, Orleans, Cape Cod, Mass. Friday from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Concert by students of the Bowdoin College Summer Music School at Smith Auditorium, Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Maine. Sunday at 8:15 p.m.

MOUNT VERNON ARGUS
Thursday, July 31, 1969

Modern Symphonies Display Transparency, Stark Anguish

By R. G. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The cumulative emotional potential of 20th-century music was effectively displayed Friday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood.

Stravinsky Light

Stravinsky's "Symphony in C" (30 minutes, 1940) was followed by Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," Op. 46 (seven minutes, 1947).

The symphony opens with a sprightly, light-footed, dancey movement of airy transparencies lightly sprinkled with spicy dissonances.

Each of the succeeding movements is increasingly serious and dark. The music becomes deeper and fuller, more and more substantial in mood, more and more angular and uneasy.

Logical Development

It is a transitional symphony, transitional in immediate mood as well as in musical style . . . neo-classical in structure, 20th-Century in timbre.

Its increasingly severe atmosphere Friday led logically into the anguished message of protest expressed by Schoenberg in "A Survivor from Warsaw," written in 1947 with his 12-tone method of composition.

That 12-tone system, so often disturbingly impenetrable, seems the ideal means of expressing the emotion in this cantata, the words of which were written by Schoenberg from reports he received from survivors of the terror in the Warsaw sewers during World War II when Jews were hiding there from Nazi soldiers with only partial success.

Clatworthy Narrates

The music starts with a screech from the trumpets and the words of a lone survivor are narrated in English (by David Clatworthy, Friday) with a kind of singsong called "sprechgesang."

The intensity of his voice increases with wails and shouts until in a deafening crash it leads into an irregularly chanted prayer (Shema Yisroel), done Friday by 15 male members of the Tanglewood Choir.

The performance was highly effective. It made Brahms' Symphony No. 4, admittedly a great and enduring work, seem almost anticlimactic when it was played after intermission.

Rain once more helped to diminish the Tanglewood audience. There were 4397 present.

Weekend Prelude

The weekend prelude program at 7 was presented by the Berkshire Boy Choir, which, now in its third year of summer life at Stockbridge, appears to have become throughly established.

There were 47 boys and 13 men in the group Friday. They sang a program of mild 20th century music by five British composers with a high degree of skill, especially high considering the short period of preparation. (But the boys are chosen by audition from all over the nation.)

They sang with a wide musical but narrow literate expressiveness. The music was well-phrased and well - controlled dynamically, but soft - edged verbally.

The intonation was secure, the articulation rounded. I have never been able to understand why contemporary coral groups are so frequently less than careful about clarity of diction while being exquisitely careful about musical nuance.

This lack is especially frustrating with narative songs like "The Ballad of Little Musgrave and Lady Barnard," by Britten, sung Friday. It is lively story about romantic passion and death which would have been entirely lost without the lyrics in the program and the overhead lights.

Best thing about the Berkshire Boy Choir Friday was the purity and clarity of its soprano tone . . . unusually full and warm for boys.

Tonight Pierre Boulez, celebrated French composer and conductor, will make his first appearance as conductor at Tanglewood. He program will include Haydn, Debussy and Bartok.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
JUL 31 1969 New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 2 1969 New England

WEEKEND MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

The fifth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins Friday evening August 1 at 9 p.m., when Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts a program of three works: Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," and Brahms's Symphony no. 4. This will be Mr. Leinsdorf's only Berkshire Festival concert that weekend.

The following evening, Saturday, August 2 at 8 p.m., French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez leads music of Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok, with the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, as soloist in Bartok's two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra. Mr. Silverstein is joined by three of the Orchestra's principals, Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and Jules Eskin, cello; in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante, op. 84. Mr. Boulez, who makes his Tanglewood debut with this concert, was recently announced as the new Music Director of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

On Sunday afternoon, August 3 at 2:30 p.m., 26-year old Israeli conductor, Daniel Barenboim, conducts the Boston Symphony for the first time. His wife, English cellist Jacqueline DuPre, is soloist in the Elgar concerto. Mr. Barenboim's program opens with Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture and concludes with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday, August 1 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p.m. concert who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the Berkshire Boy Choir singing music by Tippett, Britten, and Vaughan Williams.

On Your Radio Set

4:05—Weekend Carousel. (WROW)

5—The New Generation III. (WRPI)

5—Racing From Saratoga. (WGY)

5:05—Cocktail Hour. (WHRL)

6—Masterworks From France. A series from ORTF. (WAMC)

6—Saturday on WGY. (WGY)

6:05—Serenade in Blue. (WHRL)

6:30—The Multiversity Today. The complexities of today's large university as seen through the eyes of the student, the teacher, the employee and the alumnus. Today's topic is "We Run It," a program on administrators and trustees, their responsibilities, goals and problems. (WAMC)

7—Music From Finland. A series from the Finnish Broadcasting Company covering a wide range of music from folk and from solo instrumental and vocal performances to full symphony orchestra. Tonight's subject is an illustrated lecture from notes prepared by Erkki Ala-Konni. (WAMC)

7:30—NBC Monitor. (WGY)

7:30—Word of Life. (WJIV)

8—Group Therapy. Host Bill Noble. (WRPI)

8—Baseball. The New York Mets meet Atlanta. (WOKO)

8—Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Broadcast live from the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Mass. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, with Pierre Boulez conducting Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante, Op. 84, with violinist Joseph Silverstein, oboeist Ralph Gomberg, bassoonist Sherm Walt, and celloist Jules Eskin; Debussy's Jeux; Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra and Debussy's La Mer. (WAMC)

9—Golden Age of Radio. (WHRL)

Nightwatch. (WROW)

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, August 2, 1969

Financial Bind Plagues Tanglewood

57

By THEODORE STRONGIN
New York Times News Service

LENOX — Pierre Boulez ran into expensive ... the school attached to Tanglewood, said he wished that the symphony in ... Schuller, in order to ...

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
AUG 4 1969 New England

NEW YORK TIMES
New York, N. Y.
M- 910,000
S-1,700,000
AUG 4 1969

Financial Facts of Musical Life Haunt Tanglewood

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3—Pierre Boulez ran into expensive overtime while rehearsing for the Boston Symphony concert he conducted at Tanglewood last night, and eyebrows rose in upper management echelons.

Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned as music director of the Boston Symphony (this is his last year at Tanglewood), said today: "My concept that musical organizations should be run by musicians is no longer valid."

Gunther Schuller, head of the Berkshire Music Center, the school attached to Tanglewood, said he wished that the symphony, in its weekend concerts at the Shed, would "take more cognizance of what's going on in the world of music today."

"Musical policy is made by financial needs today," Mr. Leinsdorf said.

Financial Needs Obvious

Financial needs are evident to all. Tanglewood needs to continue to draw huge weekend audiences—this weekend was only average, 22,740, but the weather was bad Friday and Saturday—in order to exist. Financial questions and questions of keeping up with what's musically new are being discussed here this summer, now that Mr. Leinsdorf is leaving. Mr. Schuller and Seiji Ozawa will share the artistic directorship of Tanglewood starting next season.

Mr. Ozawa will not arrive to discuss next summer with Mr. Schuller until Aug. 20. Mr. Ozawa's position is unusual. Next season William Steinberg will be music director of the Boston Symphony, so for the first time one conductor will decide artistic policy during the regular winter subscription season and another during the summer at Tanglewood.

In the past, the summer and winter directors have been the same man.

"If the conductor here has to continue to base his programs on the repertory accumulated during the regular season, Tanglewood is in trouble," Mr. Leinsdorf said. Mr. Boulez, for instance, had not worked with the orchestra before on Debussy's "La Mer" or "Jeux." Both were played last night.

Some Overtime Essential

"The man needed the time. He wanted to do it his way," Mr. Leinsdorf said of the Boulez overtime. Mr. Leinsdorf himself, when he does something new to the summer, such as Verdi's "Otello" a week ago Saturday, steals time, as he phrases it, from rehearsals of programs already done in Boston.

Mr. Schuller, in order to take more cognizance of the outside world, last season organized a series of Tuesday Tanglewood Trend concerts. This season there are five of them. The rock singer Janis Joplin, the gospel singer Mahalia Jackson, the folk-singer Joni Mitchell and the jazzman Ornette Coleman have appeared on trend concerts.

Those trends have already caused considerable resistance in some Tanglewood quarters. Mr. Schuller said:

"We must change, we must find a broader spectrum. It doesn't mean excluding the permanent elements of the past, the great traditions. But we must include the Tchaikovskys of today (I realize that some people don't think there are any)."

As to what Tanglewood audiences think, the three weekend concerts provided no kind of evidence. On Friday night, for a mostly modern program, attendance was 4,391.

Last night it rained heavily just before the concert. Attendance, 6,614: inconclusive.

This afternoon, Daniel Barenboim, the pianist, and his wife, Jacqueline duPré, the cellist, drew 8,728 for a standard, safe program. Was the attraction the charismatic Barenboims or the beautiful weather? No one knows.

Whitestone Photo
Erich Leinsdorf

Gunther Schuller

Boy Choir Delights Audience In Performance At Tanglewood

MARTHA deB. BEAVER

The fifth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood brought the appealing and very expressive Berkshire Boy Choir, directed by Allan Wicks, who doubles as accompanist and is assisted in this role by Lowell Lacey, for a delightful Weekend Prelude (bonus) at 7 Friday evening. The program consisted of unique 20th century works by Tippett, Britten, Williams and Ridout.

At 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducted his only weekend concert, including a first performance of Stravinsky's rather academic and classically styled Symphony in C. Another first was Schoenberg's atonal and chillingly moving "A Survivor from Warsaw" op. 46, narrated by David Clatworthy in Sprechgesand, inflected utterances, which with the music, evoked all the hopelessness and despair of those anguished and persecuted Jews hiding from the Nazis in Warsaw sewers. The final prayer, Shema Yisrael (Hear O Israel), sung by 15 male voices trained under Charles Wilson), comprises the first words recited as part of the daily Hebrew liturgy, we were informed.

Saturday's concert, conducted by the coming New York Philharmonic director, Pierre Boulez, also a renowned composer, didn't get much help from the wet and steamy weather. The opening Haydn Sinfonia Concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, op. 84 (played by the first chair musicians) sounded under-rehearsed, and the performers' instruments, probably affected by the dampness, led to much faulty intonation. Cohesion was lacking, too, and only became resolved in the more spirited-written third movement; on the whole a spirit-less reading.

Having looked forward with great expectations to this first hearing under the controversial Boulez's directions, we tried to become involved with the other numbers. Debussy's Jeux-poeme danse (1929) just before intermission, was well-played and formed; but without its inherent delicacy and compelling coloring, quite stark.

The unassuming Boulez's directions, without baton, (he says it hinders the expressive use of the hands) were limited spatially, wire-tight and flexible, holding the players in leash, but without involving them in the usual conductor-musician concert. If there is any personal or emotional involvement with the musical score, the suave Boulez keeps it well hidden.

The quite unique conductor used a score only with Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra, engagingly national, low-registered. Each of the works in much the same folk-dance vein, was displayed by Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein with his usual silk-soft tone jnd equally flexible technique, which didn't always reveal themselves above the orchestral sounds.

Debussy's La Mer (The Sea) had clearly defined form and meticulous shapeliness, but the moody, ever-changing sea was painted in cold colors, mostly mono-tonal, reaching an intensity (as it should) at the conclusion of the third prelude, anticipated (and not attained in smaller degrees before this), too often to be appreciated, bringing a sense of finality and not fulfillment, in the sense of eternal movement. But perhaps this is what Boulez desired, to strip a piece of music bare, leaving the structure exposed, without flesh to move or breath to warm that which is surrounds and penetrates. A dreary outlook and one which suggests the state of the contemporary compositional scene.

Sunday saw a distinct change in both weather and performers. The sun shone bright and warm, and 27-year old Daniel Barenboim, conductor and Israeli citizen, added his own zealous warmth and brilliance to the music of Mendelssohn's Overture to "Roy Blas" op. 95. He also brought an ever-broadening vigor to the tried and true Beethoven Fifth. Tempos were changed here and there, (the andante quite slow but impressive) and themes drawn out with great emphasis, lending a fresh and believable outlook to this over-played symphony.

Equally fervent was the playing of Barenboim's wife, 24-year old cellist Jacqueline De Pre, in the Elgar E minor concerto op. 85. It is a work she has performed often, and with other conductors, and one that must be as familiar as a favorite book, devourted with exploratory relish and deep pleasure. Complete possession was hers, with a technical and tonal mastery of her instrument that lessened (if not erased) the visual effect of many mannerisms, such as body-movement, mane-tossing (long and straight), pleading or pleased glances at the concertmaster, in aural pleasure at the rhapsodic and mystical qualities drawn from the music. The pianissimos, the harmonics, the most passionate tones, and whitest moderates, constrained vibratos, all were encompassed with devotion and dominance. Unacquainted with this concerto, we hesitate to denounce the many anticipatory slides which may well have been the composer's intent.

Barenboim isn't lacking in mannerisms, either, but these can be modified, certainly, with time and experience. For the Elgar, he handled the score with great sensitivity, subduing the orchestra effectively, and producing an excellent balance with players and soloist. But his tall, free-striding wife took center stage in this piece, as she should. The audience loved them both!

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900
AUG 8 1969 New England

AT TANGLEWOOD:
Pierre Boulez will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 2nd at 8 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000
JUL 31 1969 New England

Modern Symphonies Display Transparency, Stark Anguish

By R. G. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The cumulative emotional potential of 20th-century music was effectively displayed Friday night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood.

Stravinsky Light

Stravinsky's "Symphony in C" (30 minutes, 1940) was followed by Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," Op. 46 (seven minutes, 1947).

The symphony opens with a sprightly, light-footed, dancey movement of airy transparencies lightly sprinkled with spicy dissonances.

Each of the succeeding movements is increasingly serious and dark. The music becomes deeper and fuller, more and more substantial in mood, more and more angular and uneasy.

Logical Development

It is a transitional symphony, transitional in immediate mood as well as in musical style . . . neo-classical in structure, 20th-Century in timbre.

Its increasingly severe atmosphere Friday led logically into the anguished message of protest expressed by Schoenberg in "A Survivor from Warsaw," written in 1947 with his 12-tone method of composition.

That 12-tone system, so often disturbingly impenetrable, seems the ideal means of expressing the emotion in this cantata, the words of which were written by Schoenberg from reports he received from survivors of the terror in the Warsaw sewers during World War II when Jews were hiding there from Nazi soldiers with only partial success.

Clatworthy Narrates

The music starts with a screech from the trumpets and the words of a lone survivor are narrated in English (by David Clatworthy, Friday) with a kind of singsong called "sprechgesang."

The intensity of his voice increases with wails and shouts until in a deafening crash it leads into an irregularly chanted prayer (Shema Yisroel), done Friday by 15 male members of the Tanglewood Choir.

The performance was highly effective. It made Brahms' Symphony No. 4, admittedly a great and enduring work, seem almost anticlimactic when it was played after intermission.

Rain once more helped to diminish the Tanglewood audience. There were 4397 present.

Weekend Prelude

The weekend prelude program at 7 was presented by the Berkshire Boy Choir, which, now in its third year of summer life at Stockbridge, appears to have become throughly established.

There were 47 boys and 13 men in the group Friday. They sang a program of mild 20th century music by five British composers with a high degree of skill, especially high considering the short period of preparation. (But the boys are chosen by audition from all over the nation.)

They sang with a wide musical but narrow literate expressiveness. The music was well-phrased and well - controlled dynamically, but soft - edged verbally.

The intonation was secure, the articulation rounded. I have never been able to understand why contemporary coral groups are so frequently less than careful about clarity of diction while being exquisitely careful about musical nuance.

This lack is especially frustrating with narative songs like "The Ballad of Little Musgrave and Lady Barnard," by Britten, sung Friday. It is lively story about romantic passion and death which would have been entirely lost without the lyrics in the program and the overhead lights.

Best thing about the Berkshire Boy Choir Friday was the purity and clarity of its soprano tone . . . unusually full and warm for boys.

Tonight Pierre Boulez, celebrated French composer and conductor, will make his first appearance as conductor at Tanglewood. He program will include Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 2 1969 New England

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 31 1969 New England Newsclip

WEEKEND MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

The fifth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins Friday evening August 1 at 9 p.m., when Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts a program of three works: Stravinsky's Symphony in C, Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," and Brahms's Symphony no. 4. This will be Mr. Leinsdorf's only Berkshire Festival concert that weekend.

The following evening, Saturday, August 2 at 8 p.m., French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez leads music of Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok, with the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, as soloist in Bartok's two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra. Mr. Silverstein is joined by three of the Orchestra's principals, Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and Jules Eskin, cello; in Haydn's Sinfonia concertante, op. 84. Mr. Boulez, who makes his Tanglewood debut with this concert, was recently announced as the new Music Director of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

On Sunday afternoon, August 3 at 2:30 p.m., 26-year old Israeli conductor, Daniel Barenboim, conducts the Boston Symphony for the first time. His wife, English cellist Jacqueline DuPre, is soloist in the Elgar concerto. Mr. Barenboim's program opens with Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture and concludes with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday, August 1 at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p.m. concert who come early to enjoy the Tanglewood grounds, features the Berkshire Boy Choir singing music by Tippett, Britten, and Vaughan Williams.

On Your Radio Set

4:05—Weekend Carousel. (WROW)

5—The New Generation III. (WRPI)

5—Racing From Saratoga. (WGY)

5:05—Cocktail Hour. (WHRL)

6—Masterworks From France. A series from ORTF. (WAMC)

6—Saturday on WGY. (WGY)

6:05—Serenade in Blue. (WHRL)

6:30—The Multiversity Today. The complexities of today's large university as seen through the eyes of the student, the teacher, the employee and the alumnus. Today's topic is "We Run It," a program on administrators and trustees, their responsibilities, goals and problems. (WAMC)

7—Music From Finland. A series from the Finnish Broadcasting Company covering a wide range of music from folk and from solo instrumental and vocal performances to full symphony orchestra. Tonight's subject is an illustrated lecture from notes prepared by Erkki Ala-Konni. (WAMC)

7:30—NBC Monitor. (WGY)

7:30—Word of Life. (WJIV)

8—Group Therapy. Host Bill Noble. (WRPI)

8—Baseball. The New York Mets meet Atlanta. (WOKO)

8—Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Broadcast live from the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Mass. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, with Pierre Boulez conducting Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante, Op. 84, with violinist Joseph Silverstein, oboeist Ralph Gomberg, bassoonist Sherm Walt, and celloist Jules Eskin; Debussy's Jeux; Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra and Debussy's La Mer. (WAMC)

9—Golden Age of Radio. (WHRL)

Nightwatch. (WROW)

Albany Knickerbocker News
Saturday, August 2, 1969

Financial Bind Plagues Tanglewood

By THEODORE STRONGIN
New York Times News Service

LENOX — Pierre Boulez ran into expensive ... the school attached to Tanglewood, said he wished that the symphony in ... Schuller, in order to ...

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 4 1969 New England

NEW YORK TIMES
New York, N. Y.
M- 910,000
S-1,700,000

AUG 4 1969

Financial Facts of Musical Life Haunt Tanglewood

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3—Pierre Boulez ran into expensive overtime while rehearsing for the Boston Symphony concert he conducted at Tanglewood last night, and eyebrows rose in upper management echelons.

Erich Leinsdorf, who has resigned as music director of the Boston Symphony (this is his last year at Tanglewood), said today: "My concept that musical organizations should be run by musicians is no longer valid."

Gunther Schuller, head of the Berkshire Music Center, the school attached to Tanglewood, said he wished that the symphony, in its weekend concerts at the Shed, would "take more cognizance of what's going on in the world of music today."

"Musical policy is made by financial needs today," Mr. Leinsdorf said.

Financial Needs Obvious

Financial needs are evident to all. Tanglewood needs to continue to draw huge weekend audiences—this weekend was only average, 22,740, but the weather was bad Friday and Saturday—in order to exist. Financial questions and questions of keeping up with what's musically new are being discussed here this summer, now that Mr. Leinsdorf is leaving. Mr. Schuller and Seiji Ozawa will share the artistic directorship of Tanglewood starting next season.

Mr. Ozawa will not arrive to discuss next summer with Mr. Schuller until Aug. 20. Mr. Ozawa's position is unusual. Next season William Steinberg will be music director of the Boston Symphony, so for the first time one conductor will decide artistic policy during the regular winter subscription season and another during the summer at Tanglewood.

In the past, the summer and winter directors have been the same man.

"If the conductor here has to continue to base his programs on the repertory accumulated during the regular season, Tanglewood is in trouble," Mr. Leinsdorf said. Mr. Boulez, for instance, had not worked with the orchestra before on Debussy's "La Mer" or "Jeux." Both were played last night.

Some Overtime Essential

"The man needed the time. He wanted to do it his way." Mr. Leinsdorf said of the Boulez overtime. Mr. Leinsdorf himself, when he does something new to the summer, such as Verdi's "Otello" a week ago Saturday, steals time, as he phrases it, from rehearsals of programs already done in Boston.

Mr. Schuller, in order to take more cognizance of the outside world, last season organized a series of Tuesday Tanglewood Trend concerts. This season there are five of them. The rock singer Janis Joplin, the gospel singer Mahalia Jackson, the folk-singer Joni Mitchell and the jazzman Ornette Coleman have appeared on trend concerts.

Those trends have already caused considerable resistance in some Tanglewood quarters. Mr. Schuller said:

"We must change, we must find a broader spectrum. It doesn't mean excluding the permanent elements of the past, the great traditions. But we must include the Tchaikovskys of today (I realize that some people don't think there are any)."

As to what Tanglewood audiences think, the three weekend concerts provided no kind of evidence. On Friday night, for a mostly modern program, attendance was 4,391.

Last night it rained heavily just before the concert. Attendance, 6,614: inconclusive.

This afternoon, Daniel Barenboim, the pianist, and his wife, Jacqueline duPré, the cellist, drew 8,728 for a standard, safe program. Was the attraction the charismatic Barenboims or the beautiful weather? No one knows.

Whitestone Photo
Erich Leinsdorf

Gunther Schuller

Boy Choir Delights Audience In Performance At Tanglewood

MARTHA deB. BEAVER

The fifth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood brought the appealing and very expressive Berkshire Boy Choir, directed by Allan Wicks, who doubles as accompanist and is assisted in this role by Lowell Lacey, for a delightful Weekend Prelude (bonus) at 7 Friday evening. The program consisted of unique 20th century works by Tippett, Britten, Williams and Ridout.

At 9 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducted his only weekend concert, including a first performance of Stravinsky's rather academic and classically styled Symphony in C. Another first was Schoenberg's atonal and chillingly moving "A Survivor from Warsaw" op. 46, narrated by David Clatworthy in Sprechgesand, inflected utterances, which with the music, evoked all the hopelessness and despair of those anguished and persecuted Jews hiding from the Nazis in Warsaw sewers. The final prayer, Shema Yisrael (Hear O Israel), sung by 15 male voices trained under Charles Wilson), comprises the first words recited as part of the daily Hebrew liturgy, we were informed.

Saturday's concert, conducted by the coming New York Philharmonic director, Pierre Boulez, also a renowned composer, didn't get much help from the wet and steamy weather. The opening Haydn Sinfonia Concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, op. 84 (played by the first chair musicians) sounded under-rehearsed, and the performers' instruments, probably affected by the dampness, led to much faulty intonation. Cohesion was lacking, too, and only became resolved in the more spirited-written third movement; on the whole a spirit-less reading.

Having looked forward with great expectations to this first hearing under the controversial Boulez's directions, we tried to become involved with the other numbers. Debussy's Jeux-poeme danse (1929) just before intermission, was well-played and formed; but without its inherent delicacy and compelling coloring, quite stark.

The unassuming Boulez's directions, without baton, (he says it hinders the expressive use of the hands) were limited spatially, wire-tight and flexible, holding the players in leash, but without involving them in the usual conductor-musician concert. If there is any personal or emotional involvement with the musical score, the suave Boulez keeps it well hidden.

The quite unique conductor used a score only with Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra, engagingly national, low-registered. Each of the works in much the same folk-dance vein, was displayed by Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein with his usual silk-soft tone jnd equally flexible technique, which didn't always reveal themselves above the orchestral sounds.

Debussy's La Mer (The Sea) had clearly defined form and meticulous shapeliness, but the moody, ever-changing sea was painted in cold colors, mostly mono-tonal, reaching an intensity (as it should) at the conclusion of the third prelude, anticipated (and not attained in smaller degrees before this), too often to be appreciated, bringing a sense of finality and not fulfillment, in the sense of eternal movement. But perhaps this is what Boulez desired, to strip a piece of music bare, leaving the structure exposed, without flesh to move or breath to warm that which is surrounds and penetrates. A dreary outlook and one which suggests the state of the contemporary compositional scene.

Sunday saw a distinct change in both weather and performers. The sun shone bright and warm, and 27-year old Daniel Barenboim, conductor and Israeli citizen, added his own zealous warmth and brilliance to the music of Mendelssohn's Overture to "Roy Blas" op. 95. He also brought an ever-broadening vigor to the tried and true Beethoven Fifth. Tempos were changed here and there, (the andante quite slow but impressive) and themes drawn out with great emphasis, lending a fresh and believable outlook to this over-played symphony.

Equally fervent was the playing of Barenboim's wife, 24-year old cellist Jacqueline De Pre, in the Elgar E minor concerto op. 85. It is a work she has performed often, and with other conductors, and one that must be as familiar as a favorite book, devourted with exploratory relish and deep pleasure. Complete possession was hers, with a technical and tonal mastery of her instrument that lessened (if not erased) the visual effect of many mannerisms, such as body-movement, mane-tossing (long and straight), pleading or pleased glances at the concertmaster, in aural pleasure at the rhapsodic and mystical qualities drawn from the music. The pianissimos, the harmonics, the most passionate tones, and whitest moderates, constrained vibratos, all were encompassed with devotion and dominance. Unacquainted with this concerto, we hesitate to denounce the many anticipatory slides which may well have been the composer's intent.

Barenboim isn't lacking in mannerisms, either, but these can be modified, certainly, with time and experience. For the Elgar, he handled the score with great sensitivity, subduing the orchestra effectively, and producing an excellent balance with players and soloist. But his tall, free-striding wife took center stage in this piece, as she should. The audience loved them both!

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 8 1969 New England

AT TANGLEWOOD:
Pierre Boulez will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 2nd at 8 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 31 1969 New England

58.

Music Review

The Sun Shines on Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FIFTH WEEKEND of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood had two unusual advantages. First, for the first Sunday afternoon this season the weather was warm and sunny and conducive to lawn-listening, with the result that the largest audience so far this year filled the chairs in the great Shed and a good share of the adjacent inviting lawns. Secondly, the three weekend programs listed more 20th century music than had been heard in all the preceding weeks.

* * *

THE WEATHER yesterday should not be given undue credit for the attendance, however, for the artists, the cellist Jacqueline DuPre, and her husband, the conductor (and more properly pianist) Daniel Barenboim, were surely magnets of not inconsiderable pull. Miss DuPre, a tall, handsome girl with long, free-falling blonde hair, makes an entrance with a confident swift stride, and her playing of the fairly transparent but ingratiating Elgar concerto was as enchanting as it was impressive. She has certain mannerisms and postures during her performance which are individual and unusual, but a vibrant tone, produced with a vibrato she controls from a "white" tone in progressive degrees to an intense fervor, cannot be gainsaid. Her bow clings to the strings with viscid tenacity, even to the far tip, and her agile fingers are sure and secure. Even the thick ascending slides looked good on her. She throws herself body and soul into the execution of her solo and at proper times attains a graphic gland finale.

Twenty-seven-year-old Barenboim followed Pierre Boulez, his senior by 17 years, on the podium. An assay, unfortunately, is inevitable. The more youthful conductor is physically more involved and he also played music of a more vigorous nature. The Mendelssohn "Ruy Blas" overture and the Beethoven Fifth Symphony can be pretty noisy and, if the conductor pleases, can be assaulted. Debussy, whose "Jeux" and "La Mer" were Boulez' main choices, can be dreamily and distantly colorful, at times like Turner's paintings, and in the discerning hands of a master of quite another character.

* * *

BOULEZ is a disciplined leader, showing respect for the musicians before him by showing that he assumes they know their tasks full well. Barenboim in his more youthful manner assumes he must indicate many details to his players by gestures which become redundant. He allowed the oboe to play his short cadenza in the first movement of the Beethoven ad libitum, but held the cellos on a two-handed leash as they sang the opening theme of the second movement. Certain basic things can be prepared in rehearsal which do not need a nursemaid on stage.

Boulez is a master technician. Matters of balance fall into place. He is not demonstrative and only rarely allowed himself the exuberance of a full arm swing, but he demanded and was granted concentrated attention, a factor not so apparent in the other program.

We are inclined to tolerate some bit of exhibitionism in our conductors, or at least some sort of extravagance. It is therefore a satisfaction to observe that music can be conveyed so expressively with sanity and urbanity, by gestures which point the way to the performers and do not pretend to act out the message of the score on stage.

Whitestone

Pierre Boulez

* * *

THE DEBUSSY "Jeux" was written to be danced and some part of its synopsis is thus lost when used for a concert stage. "La Mer" breaks away from the idea of movements, as in a symphony, although it has three distinct pictures and there are no specific melodies or themes. Boulez realized them with thorough penetration.

Boulez began his evening with the Haydn Sinfonia concertante in B Flat for Oboe, Bassoon, Violin and Cello. Four principals from the orchestra stepped forward for this essentially chamber music piece: Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt, Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin, respectively. Silverstein later was soloist in the two Bartok rhapsodies for violin and orchestra. These require the assistance of a cimbalom, a prototype of the pianoforte, similar to a dulcimer, in which the strings are set in vibration by small hammers held in the hand. John Hosszu Long was the performer Saturday night.

Silverstein surmounted the hazards of the rhapsodies with his customary ease. His playing was particularly effective in the ranges of the lower strings where Bartok placed so much of his work, and yet it was not totally satisfactory always to discern the solo from the thick orchestral writing.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT, Erich Leinsdorf, the musical director of the Boston Symphony, took the reins for his sole weekend appearance. He played two premieres for Tanglewood: the Stravinsky Symphony in C and the Schoenberg "A Survivor From Warsaw." After intermission came the Brahms 4th Symphony, in E Minor, Opus 98.

The Stravinsky is an unusual return to more nearly classic form but the choppy idioms, alternating with more suave phrases, become more academic than inspired.

"A Survivor From Warsaw" is not a recital at first hand of the anguish of the Jews which began on April 19, 1943, when several thousand Jews in courage and despair said "no" to the Nazi keepers of the charnel house. Schoenberg had left Vienna in 1933 in the earliest days of the inexorable pressure, but his suffering vicariously was of an intensity that must have been only degrees less than the suffering of those who actually felt the blows and mercifully were delivered from the unspeakable brutality. It is this hopelessness that he tries to express in the music.

This may have been an instance (in 1947) when his own new musical vocabulary served as well as that of the traditional heritage of conformist if evolutionary composers. A narrator, the baritone David Clatworthy, was not called upon to vocalize but his role was to be expressed in a Sprech-stimme (a vocal speech) for which, however, Schoenberg designated the inflections. Clatworthy was superbly effective in the text which the composer himself wrote. The 15-voice male chorus from the Tanglewood Choir, trained by Charles Wilson, sang the final prayer, Shema Yisroel (Hear, o Israel) which are the first words, in Hebrew, recited as part of the Jewish daily liturgy.

Weather Helps Tanglewood Gate

Sunny skies helped the Tanglewood gate reach a total of 22,740 patrons for the weekend. There were 4,397 at Friday night's concert, 6,614 at the Saturday performance and 8,728 on Sunday. The open rehearsal Saturday morning drew 3,001.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 4 1969 New England

Pierre Boulez Leads BSO at Tanglewood

By JAKE SHERMAN

A humid post-rainstorm mist hung over Tanglewood Saturday night, and it seemed to dampen everything but the audience's enthusiasm for the performance of the Boston Symphony under guest conductor Pierre Boulez.

The crowd of about 7,000, which included a number of hardy folk who encamped on the water-sodden ground, was treated to a somewhat unusual program. Instead of the standard format of one weighty symphony and a concerto for soloist, relatively short works — one each by Haydn and Bartok and two by Debussy.

After at least two decades of revolt against the so-called French musical "Establishment," Boulez is coming into his own among the world's major conductors. Now 44, he will be replacing Leonard Bernstein as music director of the New York Philharmonic in 1971 and at the same time assuming the leadership of the BBC Symhony in England.

Unlike Erich Leinsdorf, whose repertoire of gesture is so subtle and wide-ranging as to make the music almost visible, Boulez is not an especially exciting conductor to watch. His movements are unemphatic and low-key, tough at the same time they indicate a precise and authoritative mind.

He provided a rather dry reading of Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, op. 84, taking tempos slow enough to insure that nothing was obscured, everything elucidated ruffy. One was reminded of a perfectionist carpenter tapping every nail in place and seeing that tolerances were cut extremely fine.

The music for Debussy's "Jeux," written in 1912 as the score for a then startling ballet by Nijinsky, is impish, mocking and a trace otherworldly. It also has a good deal of romance in a way. The Boston's performance was again finely crafted with Boulez eliciting an appropriate measure of witty detachment.

In its third and concluding section "Dialogue between the wind and the sea," Debussy's "La mer" reaches a crescendo of skittish excitement. Of the performance of this most remarkable of musical evocations of natural phenomena, one can only say that it captured completely the composer's intent.

Sunday afternoon, with the young Daniel Barenboim as guest conductor, the Boston Symphony was slated to perform Mendelssohn's 'Ruy Blas' Overture, Elgar's E minor Cello Concerto featuring soloist Jacqueline Du Pre, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, August 4, 1969

At Tangelwood

Boulez: Technique the Message

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

The most recent Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony were as excitingly good as the previous week's were not.

The prelude at 7 on Friday recalled the virtuosity of the Berkshire Boy Choir for the fourth time, still effectively trained by Allan Wicks, Organist and Choral Master at Canterbury Cathedral in England. Granted he gets the pick-of-the-crop by competitions all over the U.S.A. The musical result is still amazing. In a demanding modern program (Tippett, Britten, Vaughan-Williams and Ridout) he not only demonstrated that English composers still have roots in the old choral tradition, but that boy choirs still have validity. With Mr. Wicks' handling, these soprano voices had power without off-pitch forcing and of course the clean clarity of the unchanged vocal chords so impossible to mature women's voices. They can ride the great spaces of Cathedral and Music Shed as if voices of air itself. Along with the boys' agility and perfect pitch, the men's voices added depth and richness with a resonance like that of cellos.

In the last work—a Divertimento on Poems by Robert Burns by Ridout, Wicks joined accompanist Lowell Lucy at the piano and the five numbers were sung without a conductor to unanimous effect.

The Symphony at 9 found Mr. Leinsdorf magnificently successful with Stravinsky (Symphony in C), Schoenberg (A Survivor from Warsaw) and Brahms (Symphony No. 4).

The Symphony in C, coming after the dance-inspired music of Firebird, etc. still uses the reiteration of short motifs as building blocks, but shapes the whole of movements in a new version of "classic" integrity. It is brilliant and hard, with little shading, the colors are primary without blending, excitement provided, as in the ballets, by changing meters.

Stravinsky never did develop any deep sense of humanity in his effective Symphony of Psalms, but Schoenberg, beginning with a hyper-rich romanticism, never lost the sense of people, with all his experiments off the deep end of sound-form. As a lapsed Jew who proudly re-enlisted in Jewry under the Nazi evil, he celebrated the Warsaw tragedy with all-out vehemence of narrator, male choir and orchestra. After cruel trumpets and trembling woodwinds, the Narrator begins a reminiscence by one sufferer. In the middle of a "counting off" that will select the next batch for the gas, the Shema Yisoel (Hear, O Israel—The Lord is One) rises from the stricken crowd by a common impulse in despair. When this appears, the glorified movie music by which Schoenberg illustrates the tale of the Survivor gives way to the organized intensity of the song. The vocal inflections of pitch for the speaker, in order to raise speech for a "musical" emphasis on a par with orchestral sound, can sound forced and silly or nobly expressive—as it was with David Clatworthy.

After intermission, the Brahms made a greatly distinguished climax. Unhampered by unimaginative pianists (as in last week's concerto), Leinsdorf elicited the finest performance of the Eminon I have ever heard.

The first Allegro was really non-troppo, to allow for the wide swing of the opening melody (no introduction, just the iambic lift into sounding movement) and development through contrapuntal drama, moments of "Wagnerian" color. All the variety and depth of experience that Brahms (no symphonies until maturity at 40) could contrive—nothing was slighted in this performance and the conductor seemed to be freely at-home and imaginatively committed. The tempi of all four movements are fairly close—a sample of Brahms' desire for continuity in a world of variety. the Allegro-giocoso for speed-exicitement, but the rhythmic joy was still there. The Andante sang expressively without traditional drag and the last allegro, a tremendous passacaglia, was stirringly "energico passionato." The slow-growing, introspective Bavarian, student of the past and experimenter for the future, came into his own in this performance. Traditional criticism that stupidly found too pale a cast of thought or too confusing a technique, or a monotone of instrumental color, was forever denied on Friday night and I hope there was a tape to conserve this fleeting moment. Boston has done some great performances of the Fourth in the past, but none to surpass this.

BOULEZ GUESTS

Saturday night Pierre Boulez, the enfant terrible among composers and now the sought after conductor who jets to many (too many?) jobs, directed a fresh combination of Haydn (Sinfonia Concertante in B flat with oboe, bassoon, violin and cello soloing), two Debussy pieces (Jeux and La Mer) and Bartok (two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra).

The Haydn was a delightful reminder that the headliner of the new "classics" revolutionary wave made fine use of the older Baroque techniques. The sinfonia of soloists against the mass of strings has also the surprise and breadth of the late symphonies written in England at the height of his expanding powers. It was good to hear Gomberg's oboe and Walt's bassoon, as well as Silverstein and Eskin down at the heart of things.

Bartok's rhapsodies seem like one of his mistakes and yet worth hearing, for nothing he wrote is valueless. Silverstein played the solo violin, typically Hungarian rhapsodic excitement, with more intensity and color than usual, but it was continually being negated by acidulous passages in the orchestra, somewhat the way Bernard Shaw would puncture his own balloons of feeling to make the audience sit up and think. Bartok is much more convincing in simple folk settings or in the out-and-out originality of his quartets and concertos. A charming lady on my right, obviously attentive and responsive, asked me if the B.S.O. didn't seem to have moments when they rested on their oars with some complacency. I could only say that on Friday and tonight with Boulez exacting meticulous attention the score, it was probably some momentary dullness in Bartok's conception. But when Debussy's La Mer—that great expressionism from the composer's life-long fascination with the complex, inhuman forces of ocean—when Boulez had simmered the movement and color of that remarkable confession into "natural" realization, my momentary friend was jumping off the seat. "I can only judge by a tingle up my spine and I got it that time. Well, I got it, too and so did a large, restless, and noisy Saturday crowd.

There is no secret about Boulez magic. He just happens to be a hopped-up version of musical sensitivity who can "read" a score and imagine the sounds and relationships in great detail. His ear for tuning strange harmonies, for dynamics and for tempi to free the sound—all this is fabulous and convincing in performance; also galling to a proud orchestra. Boulez is great to visit, but you wouldn't want to live with him. He seems to think that the technique is the message and sometimes it is. But this behavioristic conception has its limitations, as he must well kno[illegible]s. Debussey Ballet [illegible] chanting sounds under the Boulez direction that seemingly could not have been made by the usual instruments. And yet LaMer, for all its great sweeps of color and momentary intensities, whi it was spine-chilling to my charming neighbor, in retrospect seemed to me without the tidal lift and glow of Koussevitsky or Munch performances when the orchestra was aroused, but on an easier tether.

It does no harm to a great orchestra to take such meticulous discipline occasionally, as it had to, earlier, with the advent of Leinsdorf (for once at Tanglewood I heard the flutes and oboes not too loud for that stage). A great orchestra needs continual revision, not to settle into the degenerating complacency of the old (pre-Bernstein) Philharmonic in New York, or the famous Vienna Philharmonic, where a player could sublet his chair for rehearsals. At any rate Tanglewood re-established its Festival claim on this weekend.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

AUG 7 1969 New England Newsclip

At the Concert

Pierre Boulez Debuts At Tanglewood Festival

By MICHAEL WIENER

NE

LENOX, Mass. — Pierre Boulez is a symbol to many of progressive musicianship. One of the leading composers of the post-war avant garde, he took up conducting in order to insure the performance of the music of this century.

In appointing him to succeed Leonard Bernstein as music director of the New York Philharmonic, the orchestra's board of directors has shown courage and foresight in their ecognition and support of Mr. Boulez's goals.

Mr. Boulez made his Tanglewood debut Saturday night with a program in which only one work cou'd be te med a standard. Following the opening Sinfonia concetante, Op. 84, of Haydn, Mr. Boulez conducted "Jeux," the last of Debussy's major orchestral scores. Although composed in 1913, it presents many of the same problems as music written since. Its constant shifts of meter and tempo require active concentration on the part of the listener before the work's logic can be grasped. By carefully articulating the score, Mr. Boulez helped the listener immeasurably.

Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra were performed after the intermission, and the concert concluded with Debussy's "La Mer."

Mr. Boulez' interpretation of the latter work, rather than being melody-oriented, stresses and thus elucidates the work's varied texture. The result struck this listener as mo e a ecture on the work than a recreation of it, but it is hard to deny the success with which Mr. Bou ez brought off his approach, or the finely-detailed ensemble playing he drew from the orchestra.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 4, 1969

Boulez Shows Steady, No-Nonsense Style At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Pierre Boulez, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, attracted many musicians into the shed Saturday night, among them Erich Leinsdorf and Daniel Barenboim with his wife, Jacqueline DuPre.

Replacing Bernstein

Boulez is the French avant garde composer and conductor recently appointed to replace Leonard Bernstein as music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in 1971.

His program included Haydn, Debussy and Bartok, a program of sharply differing styles and one useful to musicians interested in evaluating Boulez, podium manner.

It was a manner of calm deliberation and apparent absolute confidence. There wasn't a superfluous move; not a hint of a need to establish a theatrical display for the audience behind him.

No Frills

Tempos and meters were set with a steady right hand and occasional special instructions were delivered with an eloquent left. There was no fancy footwork.

The impression was one of serious, no-nonsense intent, sure control over the instrumental forces and economy and accuracy of communication.

The program opened with Haydn's "Sinfonia Concertante," Opus 84, a glowing little piece that uses the Baroque pattern of chamber music, in this case an oboe-bassoon-violin-cello quartet. It contrasted with the full 18th century orchestra, in this case about 40 members of the total complement of 106.

Boulez, a recognized champion of avant garde atonality, shaped the Haydn piece with graciousness as well as grace. A classical purist could hardly wish for a better balance of precision and fluency.

The Bartok on the program was a coupling of his two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra written in 1928, the first year he was in America.

They are craggy, densely complex works of high rhythmical difficulty. Nearly the whole of the orchestra's Saturday morning rehearsal time was spent on their more knotty problems.

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist. He once again displayed his aplomb and craftsmanship with the more abstruse examples of the 20th century musical literature.

The Debussy on the program was the ballet, "Jeux," and the masterpiece, "La Mer."

Boulez, of course, has a French musical education to prepare him for hearing as well as shaping French music . . . and it is the French who usually offer Debussy.

"LaMer" has been conducted at Tanglewood four times in the last seven seasons, all by conductors with a special feeling for French music. They were Munch in 1963, Burgin in 1964, Martinon in 1965 and now Boulez in 1969.

Boulez' busenesslike podium manner seemed to help Debussy's amorphous music Saturday. The washes of sound, the music's apparent indifference to exact rhythms, the liquid flow . . . the abstract reproduction of the sea's mists and moods were given form and shape by Boulez.

He is certainly a conductor of versatility and competence.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 3 1969

PIERRE BOULEZ . . . orchestra conductor who has been named conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and who will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for this Saturday evening's concert.

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

Boulez of Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass.—Pierre Boulez, Jacqueline Du Pre and music of the 20th century dominated the beautiful Tanglewood setting of the Berkshire Festival this past weekend.

Attention centered on the French-born maestro who will assume the musical direction of the New York Philharmonic in 1971, and the highly-charged London-born cellist, but there were many rewards.

Critics of Pierre Boulez are about to sour the public on him before he ever assumes his Philharmonic post. To read his admirers, one might gather that the conductor is really more of a scientist, determined to dissect every piece of music, expose it to the public, and then assume an aura of aloof detachment.

Such terms as "chairman of the board" which one leading critic applied to Pierre Boulez are not only inaccurate but completely mislead the public.

To be sure, Boulez is a meticulous musician, dedicated to music first and showy entertainment not at all. The result of his insistance on clarity, sensitive balance, accuracy of pitch (he devoted a quarter of an hour tuning every section of the great Boston Symphony prior to beginning his Saturday rehearsal) is music-making of the most exalted and exciting kind.

Looks deceive, and a flamboyant manner has substituted for musical integrity for far too long. It is my opinion, after hearing him conduct the Chicago, Cleveland, Boston and New York orchestras, as well as numerous recordings, that Pierre Boulez is a profound, emotional and deeply satisfying conductor. My only lament is that he will appear in New York so rarely until 1971, and not too often then.

Reportory is the area where most concern is voiced. But with his love of the major composers of the classics school, Wagner, Mahler, Schoenberg and their followers, and the major composers of the French school, particularly Debussy and Ravel (to say nothing of Boulez the composer, from whom we need to hear much more!) and with guest conductors to assume the music of those composers the maestro does not wish to conduct, there is nothing to fear from the advent of Pierre Boulez except the radical improvement and revitalization of our musical scene.

The Boston Symphony program was typical of current Boulez concerts.. It opened with the joyous Haydn Sinbonia Concertante in B-flat, continued with "Jeux" of Debussy, the Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra by Bartok and concluded with Debussy's "La Mer."

Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, were the expert soloists in the rather delicately performed Haydn and Mr. Silverstein was the brilliant soloist in a rip-snorting performance of the Bartok.

Debussy holds a special place in the affection of the conductor, and "Jeux" was given a ravishing performance that released all of the mysterious sensuousness within the music, while "La Mer" was a veritable kaleidoscope of stunning orchestral color.

Sunday's first Berkshire sun in weeks brought forth a tremendous throng which listened attentively to Jacqueline Du Pre's intensely subjective performance of Sir Edward Elgar's lyrical, introspective Cello Concerto. With her husband, Daniel Barenboim, conducting, the performance brought forth a standing, shouting ovation in which every member of the orchestra joined with rare enthusiasm.

Miss Du Pre plays not so much like the "angel" of her press material as a demonic genius who is probably the most emotional and technically assured string player since Niccolo Paganini. She is, in every wonderful sense of the word, incredible.

Barenboim is of the choreographic conductorial fraternity, and while the orchestra performed well, after Boulez it might be fair to pass judgment another time.

Space does not permit us to do justice to Friday's BSO concert for which Erich Leinsdorf was at his best in a high-spirited interpretation of Stravinsky's somewhat extended Symphony in C, and at his worst in a highly-strung performance of the Brahms' Fourth Symphony, whose frequently sour intonation must have determined Boulez to take nothing for granted.

Schoenberg's potentially moving "A Survivor from Warsaw" emerged as a pretentious exercise as read unctuously by David Clatworthy rather than the portentous experience the brief male chorus conclusion indicated it could be.

Leinsdorf will conduct Berg's "Wozzeck" on Aug. 11 and 17. The Tanglewood season continues through Aug. 31.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 4'1,961 SUN. 423,790

AUG 4 1969

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 230,965

AUG 4 1969

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 31 1969 New England

soloists silverstein, dupre

Tanglewood tingle: Boulez & Barenboim

59.

by Eleanor Weber

Every so often the power of music, the impact of its visceral and direct nonverbal communication, the pleasure of its language of emotion and color transcend the paltry attempt of words to confine it, and the concertgoer is left at the end of a performance on his feet applauding vigorously in an attempt to release the tingle the music has evoked, and all he can say is "wow!"

Such was the reaction of the happy crowd at Tanglewood Sunday, August 3, as a weekend of fine music reached its climax with the thunder of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5" under the vigorous direction of Daniel Barenboim.

The 26-year-old Israeli conductor marched a responsive Boston Symphony Orchestra through two very familiar pieces with a gusto and crispness that made them as fresh as on a first hearing. Impressive in his no-nonsense dignity and in the fact that he led the entire program without a score, Barenboim evoked a crisp, sturdy sound from the opening notes of Mendelssohns "Overture to 'Ruy Blas' " to the closing crash of the Fifth Symphony. He directed the Mendelssohn with sharp, martial commands that moved the piece along with a constant sense of vitality. He turned this same vigor to the Beethoven which made the well-known phrases of the "Allegro con brio" a source not of tedium but of excitement. The allegro pace of both the first and third movements were brisk, and even the heavy andante of the second movement avoided the pitfalls of sounding ponderous and became instead sweeps of grandeur.

But Barenboim, fortunately, is not a conductor with only one style of interpretation. Conducting the "Cello Concerto in E minor" by Elgar, which featured his wife Jacqueline Du Pre, he evoked a mellow, sustained sound from the orchestra through a more fluid direction and a talent for investing the pieces with subtlety and depth.

The Elgar is a musical disappointment, and it was memorable that Sunday less for the melodies than for the reading given it by Miss Du Pre. A tall, strong girl, the 24-year-old virtuoso charmed her audience as much by her personality as by her skill in the long cadenza passages which move the concerto. She played with a solid, capable touch, flourishing the bow to punctuate the rests, while filling the music with sensitivity. Miss Du Pre doesn't play the cello, she dances with it — hair rippling, body swaying, sharing smiles of joy and accomplishment with Joseph Silverstein (concertmaster), or her conductor-husband. At the conclusion of the piece, Miss Du Pre received a standing ovation for four calls, with even the orchestra stamping hearty approval.

Quite a different atmosphere was created the night before, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a delicate, romantic evening of primarily contemporary music under the baton of Pierre Boulez. The light melodies of the concert were evoked in a successful partnership of soloists, small orchestra, conductor and composers.

Opening the evening was Haydn's "Sinfonia concertante in B flat." There was a smooth weaving in and out between the quartet and the orchestra, with the larger group providing sensitive support for the former. The winds (Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon) balanced the sweetness of the strings (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello) with their clear voices in a warm, dancelike offering.

A change in mood was provided by the "Jeux, poeme danse" of Debussy, sinuous and oriental in feel. Without real choreography, the "plot" of "Jeux" was amorphous and somewhat difficult to detect in the tunes. The dance, therefore, was in Boulez's hands: at times gently patting the air to evoke largo sweeps of emotion, at others snapping sharp, exotic passages into place.

Silverstein returned as soloist in Bartok's "Two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra." The pieces were divided into two movements each: "lassu" (slow), and "friss" (fast). Although they were relatively indistinguishable from each other, the folk-based melodies provided pleasant vehicles for Silverstein's talent — in superb and exciting form Saturday night.

Boulez concluded the program with an effective reading of Debussy's "La Mer," making the music suitably picturesque without being sentimental, and avoiding cliches by handling the repetitious passages with either consistent intensity or varying dynamics, as appropriate.

It has been suggested that solo instruments are not sufficiently amplified to be heard clearly enough above the orchestra, and indeed there were passages both by Silverstein and Miss Du Pre that seemed less than these capable artists were offering. But, hopefully, that is an easy matter to correct.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

AUG 13 1969 New England

Boulez' Baton Brings Down Tanglewood House

Pierre Boulez, who was recently chosen to succeed Leonard Bernstein as regular conductor of the New York Philharmonic, made his first appearance at Tanglewood Saturday night.

Although he made his initial reputation as an avantgarde composer, surprisingly enough his program with the Boston Symphony on Saturday presented nothing more modern than Bartok and Debussy and even included Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante (Op. 84), which opened the musical agenda.

This conductor, who looked unusually trim, does not belong to the "glamor boy" category and indulges in none of the extroverted podium antics so often encountered. His gestures are vigorous and right to the point, for he knows exactly what he wants.

In the Haydn Sinfonia, which boasted the services of the Boston orchestra's first desk men (oboist Ralph Gomberg, bassoonist Sherman Walt, violinist Joseph Silverstein, and cellist Jules Eskin) as soloists, was given a warm, if not impeccable, run-through. Boulez did not seem as involved here as he did later in the program.

Debussy's "Jeux-poeme danse" was another story. This gorgeous splash of impressionistic color came alive under the meticulous ministrations of Boulez.

In Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra (1928) concertmaster Silverstein once again demonstrated remarkable technical fluency and interjected a great deal of gypsy fire into the performance of these engaging works. My only reservation was the lack of carrying power in the violinist's tone; it did not soar sufficiently at times.

Boulez added a cimbalom, that unmistakably Hungarian instrument, into the orchestra for this performance and it lent an authentic flavor to the music.

For the finale there was Boulez' justly framed interpretation of Debussy's "La Mer." And nothing at Tanglewood this summer has had the impact of this reviewer that this performance Saturday night had. Those who have heard his recording will understand.

The clarity of each of the choirs and the solo passages was something that has not been encountered since the heyday of Toscanini. And the Boston Symphony really put forth its best effort for Boulez and were roused from the comfortable professionalism we usually hear during the summer.

It deserved all the prolonged applause at the end.

— GWS.

JACQUELINE DU PRE is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood as guest cellist next Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 29 1969 New England

AT TANGLEWOOD: Daniel Barenboim will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 3rd at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 31 1969 New England

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

AUG 4 1969 New England

Boulez Shows Steady, No-Nonsense Style At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Pierre Boulez, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, attracted many musicians into the shed Saturday night, among them Erich Leinsdorf and Daniel Barenboim with his wife, Jacqueline DuPre.

Replacing Bernstein

Boulez is the French avant garde composer and conductor recently appointed to replace Leonard Bernstein as music director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in 1971.

His program included Haydn, Debussy and Bartok, a program of sharply differing styles and one useful to musicians interested in evaluating Boulez, podium manner.

It was a manner of calm deliberation and apparent absolute confidence. There wasn't a superfluous move; not a hint of a need to establish a theatrical display for the audience behind him.

No Frills

Tempos and meters were set with a steady right hand and occasional special instructions were delivered with an eloquent left. There was no fancy footwork.

The impression was one of serious, no-nonsense intent, sure control over the instrumental forces and economy and accuracy of communication.

The program opened with Haydn's "Sinfonia Concertante," Opus 84, a glowing little piece that uses the Baroque pattern of chamber music, in this case an oboe-bassoon-violin-cello quartet. It contrasted with the full 18th century orchestra, in this case about 40 members of the total complement of 106.

Boulez, a recognized champion of avant garde atonality, shaped the Haydn piece with graciousness as well as grace. A classical purist could hardly wish for a better balance of precision and fluency.

The Bartok on the program was a coupling of his two rhapsodies for violin and orchestra written in 1928, the first year he was in America.

They are craggy, densely complex works of high rhythmical difficulty. Nearly the whole of the orchestra's Saturday morning rehearsal time was spent on their more knotty problems.

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist. He once again displayed his aplomb and craftsmanship with the more abstruse examples of the 20th century musical literature.

The Debussy on the program was the ballet, "Jeux," and the masterpiece, "La Mer."

Boulez, of course, has a French musical education to prepare him for hearing as well as shaping French music . . . and it is the French who usually offer Debussy.

"LaMer" has been conducted at Tanglewood four times in the last seven seasons, all by conductors with a special feeling for French music. They were Munch in 1963, Burgin in 1964, Martinon in 1965 and now Boulez in 1969.

Boulez' busenesslike podium manner seemed to help Debussy's amorphous music Saturday. The washes of sound, the music's apparent indifference to exact rhythms, the liquid flow . . . the abstract reproduction of the sea's mists and moods were given form and shape by Boulez.

He is certainly a conductor of versatility and competence.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 3 1969

PIERRE BOULEZ . . . orchestra conductor who has been named conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and who will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for this Saturday evening's concert.

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

Boulez of Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass.—Pierre Boulez, Jacqueline Du Pre and music of the 20th century dominated the beautiful Tanglewood setting of the Berkshire Festival this past weekend.

Attention centered on the French-born maestro who will assume the musical direction of the New York Philharmonic in 1971, and the highly-charged London-born cellist, but there were many rewards.

Critics of Pierre Boulez are about to sour the public on him before he ever assumes his Philharmonic post. To read his admirers, one might gather that the conductor is really more of a scientist, determined to dissect every piece of music, expose it to the public, and then assume an aura of aloof detachment.

Such terms as "chairman of the board" which one leading critic applied to Pierre Boulez are not only inaccurate but completely mislead the public.

To be sure, Boulez is a meticulous musician, dedicated to music first and showy entertainment not at all. The result of his insistance on clarity, sensitive balance, accuracy of pitch (he devoted a quarter of an hour tuning every section of the great Boston Symphony prior to beginning his Saturday rehearsal) is music-making of the most exalted and exciting kind.

Looks deceive, and a flamboyant manner has substituted for musical integrity for far too long. It is my opinion, after hearing him conduct the Chicago, Cleveland, Boston and New York orchestras, as well as numerous recordings, that Pierre Boulez is a profound, emotional and deeply satisfying conductor. My only lament is that he will appear in New York so rarely until 1971, and not too often then.

Reportory is the area where most concern is voiced. But with his love of the major composers of the classics school, Wagner, Mahler, Schoenberg and their followers, and the major composers of the French school, particularly Debussy and Ravel (to say nothing of Boulez the composer, from whom we need to hear much more!) and with guest conductors to assume the music of those composers the maestro does not wish to conduct, there is nothing to fear from the advent of Pierre Boulez except the radical improvement and revitalization of our musical scene.

The Boston Symphony program was typical of current Boulez concerts.. It opened with the joyous Haydn Sinbonia Concertante in B-flat, continued with "Jeux" of Debussy, the Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra by Bartok and concluded with Debussy's "La Mer."

Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello, were the expert soloists in the rather delicately performed Haydn and Mr. Silverstein was the brilliant soloist in a rip-snorting performance of the Bartok.

Debussy holds a special place in the affection of the conductor, and "Jeux" was given a ravishing performance that released all of the mysterious sensuousness within the music, while "La Mer" was a veritable kaleidoscope of stunning orchestral color.

Sunday's first Berkshire sun in weeks brought forth a tremendous throng which listened attentively to Jacqueline Du Pre's intensely subjective performance of Sir Edward Elgar's lyrical, introspective Cello Concerto. With her husband, Daniel Barenboim, conducting, the performance brought forth a standing, shouting ovation in which every member of the orchestra joined with rare enthusiasm.

Miss Du Pre plays not so much like the "angel" of her press material as a demonic genius who is probably the most emotional and technically assured string player since Niccolo Paganini. She is, in every wonderful sense of the word, incredible.

Barenboim is of the choreographic conductorial fraternity, and while the orchestra performed well, after Boulez it might be fair to pass judgment another time.

Space does not permit us to do justice to Friday's BSO concert for which Erich Leinsdorf was at his best in a high-spirited interpretation of Stravinsky's somewhat extended Symphony in C, and at his worst in a highly-strung performance of the Brahms' Fourth Symphony, whose frequently sour intonation must have determined Boulez to take nothing for granted.

Schoenberg's potentially moving "A Survivor from Warsaw" emerged as a pretentious exercise as read unctuously by David Clatworthy rather than the portentous experience the brief male chorus conclusion indicated it could be.

Leinsdorf will conduct Berg's "Wozzeck" on Aug. 11 and 17. The Tanglewood season continues through Aug. 31.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 471,961 SUN. 423,790

AUG 4 1969

Newark Star Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 230,995

AUG 4 1969

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,013

JUL 31 1969 New England

soloists silverstein, dupre

Tanglewood tingle: Boulez & Barenboim

by Eleanor Weber

Every so often the power of music, the impact of its visceral and direct nonverbal communication, the pleasure of its language of emotion and color transcend the paltry attempt of words to confine it, and the concertgoer is left at the end of a performance on his feet applauding vigorously in an attempt to release the tingle the music has evoked, and all he can say is "wow!"

Such was the reaction of the happy crowd at Tanglewood Sunday, August 3, as a weekend of fine music reached its climax with the thunder of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5" under the vigorous direction of Daniel Barenboim.

The 26-year-old Israeli conductor marched a responsive Boston Symphony Orchestra through two very familiar pieces with a gusto and crispness that made them as fresh as on a first hearing. Impressive in his no-nonsense dignity and in the fact that he led the entire program without a score, Barenboim evoked a crisp, sturdy sound from the opening notes of Mendelssohns "Overture to 'Ruy Blas' " to the closing crash of the Fifth Symphony. He directed the Mendelssohn with sharp, martial commands that moved the piece along with a constant sense of vitality. He turned this same vigor to the Beethoven which made the well-known phrases of the "Allegro con brio" a source not of tedium but of excitement. The allegro pace of both the first and third movements were brisk, and even the heavy andante of the second movement avoided the pitfalls of sounding ponderous and became instead sweeps of grandeur.

But Barenboim, fortunately, is not a conductor with only one style of interpretation. Conducting the "Cello Concerto in E minor" by Elgar, which featured his wife Jacqueline Du Pre, he evoked a mellow, sustained sound from the orchestra through a more fluid direction and a talent for investing the pieces with subtlety and depth.

The Elgar is a musical disappointment, and it was memorable that Sunday less for the melodies than for the reading given it by Miss Du Pre. A tall, strong girl, the 24-year-old virtuoso charmed her audience as much by her personality as by her skill in the long cadenza passages which move the concerto. She played with a solid, capable touch, flourishing the bow to punctuate the rests, while filling the music with sensitivity. Miss Du Pre doesn't play the cello, she dances with it — hair rippling, body swaying, sharing smiles of joy and accomplishment with Joseph Silverstein (concertmaster), or her conductor-husband. At the conclusion of the piece, Miss Du Pre received a standing ovation for four calls, with even the orchestra stamping hearty approval.

Quite a different atmosphere was created the night before, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a delicate, romantic evening of primarily contemporary music under the baton of Pierre Boulez. The light melodies of the concert were evoked in a successful partnership of soloists, small orchestra, conductor and composers.

Opening the evening was Haydn's "Sinfonia concertante in B flat." There was a smooth weaving in and out between the quartet and the orchestra, with the larger group providing sensitive support for the former. The winds (Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon) balanced the sweetness of the strings (Joseph Silverstein, violin; Jules Eskin, cello) with their clear voices in a warm, dancelike offering.

A change in mood was provided by the "Jeux, poeme danse" of Debussy, sinuous and oriental in feel. Without real choreography, the "plot" of "Jeux" was amorphous and somewhat difficult to detect in the tunes. The dance, therefore, was in Boulez's hands: at times gently patting the air to evoke largo sweeps of emotion, at others snapping sharp, exotic passages into place.

Silverstein returned as soloist in Bartok's "Two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra." The pieces were divided into two movements each: "lassu" (slow), and "friss" (fast). Although they were relatively indistinguishable from each other, the folk-based melodies provided pleasant vehicles for Silverstein's talent — in superb and exciting form Saturday night.

Boulez concluded the program with an effective reading of Debussy's "La Mer," making the music suitably picturesque without being sentimental, and avoiding cliches by handling the repetitious passages with either consistent intensity or varying dynamics, as appropriate.

It has been suggested that solo instruments are not sufficiently amplified to be heard clearly enough above the orchestra, and indeed there were passages both by Silverstein and Miss Du Pre that seemed less than these capable artists were offering. But, hopefully, that is an easy matter to correct.

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

AUG 13 1969 New England

Boulez' Baton Brings Down Tanglewood House

Pierre Boulez, who was recently chosen to succeed Leonard Bernstein as regular conductor of the New York Philharmonic, made his first appearance at Tanglewood Saturday night.

Although he made his initial reputation as an avantgarde composer, surprisingly enough his program with the Boston Symphony on Saturday presented nothing more modern than Bartok and Debussy and even included Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante (Op. 84), which opened the musical agenda.

This conductor, who looked unusually trim, does not belong to the "glamor boy" category and indulges in none of the extroverted podium antics so often encountered. His gestures are vigorous and right to the point, for he knows exactly what he wants.

In the Haydn Sinfonia, which boasted the services of the Boston orchestra's first desk men (oboist Ralph Gomberg, bassoonist Sherman Walt, violinist Joseph Silverstein, and cellist Jules Eskin) as soloists, was given a warm, if not impeccable, run-through. Boulez did not seem as involved here as he did later in the program.

Debussy's "Jeux-poeme danse" was another story. This gorgeous splash of impressionistic color came alive under the meticulous ministrations of Boulez.

In Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra (1928) concertmaster Silverstein once again demonstrated remarkable technical fluency and interjected a great deal of gypsy fire into the performance of these engaging works. My only reservation was the lack of carrying power in the violinist's tone; it did not soar sufficiently at times.

Boulez added a cimbalom, that unmistakably Hungarian instrument, into the orchestra for this performance and it lent an authentic flavor to the music.

For the finale there was Boulez' justly framed interpretation of Debussy's "La Mer." And nothing at Tanglewood this summer has had the impact of this reviewer that this performance Saturday night had. Those who have heard his recording will understand.

The clarity of each of the choirs and the solo passages was something that has not been encountered since the heyday of Toscanini. And the Boston Symphony really put forth its best effort for Boulez and were roused from the comfortable professionalism we usually hear during the summer.

It deserved all the prolonged applause at the end.

— GWS

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

AUG 4 1969 New England

JACQUELINE DU PRE is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood as guest cellist next Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 29 1969 New England

AT TANGLEWOOD: Daniel Barenboim will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 3rd at 2:30 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 101,000

JUL 31 1969 New England

60.

Tanglewood guests

Cheers for Boulez and two Barenboims

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

The Boston Symphony was host to three distinguished visitors at its summer place over the weekend. On Saturday night, Pierre Boulez renewed his acquaintance at Tanglewood with the orchestra in a program of Haydn, Debussy, and Bartok, and on Sunday afternoon the young Israeli pianist-turned-conductor, Daniel Barenboim, and his cellist-wife, Jacqueline du Pré, made their first appearances with the BSO.

Mr. Boulez is obviously a musician with positive ideas, which he translates, with a minimum of outward show, into strong well-structured performances. His lack of obstentation on the podium comes as a surprise to one seeing him for the first time, and in complementary fashion, his regard for musicians as well as for the music they are producing together is projected in a warm and all embracing aura.

Saturday's program was not a calculated crowd-pleaser. The first two numbers, last performed in Boston in February were the Haydn Concertante in B flat for oboe (Ralph Gomberg), bassoon (Sherman Walt), violin (Joseph Silverstein), and cello (Jules Eskin) —done as one would expect by members of orchestral nobility — and Debussy's "Jeux," which brought back luminescent echoes of Boston sound of the Koussevitzky-Munch eras.

Sparks and shafts

Bartok's Two Rhapsodies for violin and orchestra had Mr. Silverstein as soloist, with John Hosszu Long playing the passages for cimbalom. One could only be overwhelmed by the tremendous vitality of the performance as well as its sense of containment, despite sparks that flew and shafts of sound that projected every whichway. While Mr. Silverstein is hardly to be thought of in the context of a gypsy violinist, it is doubtful if any Romany fiddler could have tossed off this music as he did.

It was Mr. Boulez's pulsating reading of Debussy's "La Mer," however, which really churned up the atmosphere. It is some special kind of gift that a conductor has who can move the attention of the listener unobtrusively from one choir to another of the orchestra, as sound splashes, ebbs, and crests again—transparent, seething, and strong., A dazzling performance, greeted with cheers that the audience had been waiting all evening to unleash.

Disarming pair

There were cheers on Sunday afternoon, too, particularly after the Elgar Cello Concerto in E minor, which introduced Miss du Pré to Berkshire audiences with her conductor-husband, Mr. Barenboim, who had just made his local bow with the opening Mendelssohn "Ruy Blas" overture.

Handsome was as handsome did—in this case, some superlatively warm and technically amazing cello playing by Miss de Pré; and a careful, properly restrained orchestral background maintained by Mr. Barenboim. The audible gasp that followed the spectacular end of the first Adagio, and the rapt attention that prevailed throughout the rest of the concerto, were indicative of audience participation in this memorable collaboration between a disarming musical couple and a demonstrative admiring orchestra.

While Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is no one's private property, the newcomer tackles it with many memories and preconceptions of titans crowding him. Mr. Barenboim met it as David did Goliath, full steam ahead, and emerged with great credit if not with a legendary reading to call his own. Not yet, and who could expect it at age 27? At least he seemed not out to innovate, although where he took tempi somewhat slower than usual—in the Andante, for instance—it was not without effect. Most important, he was in charge.

The musicians played for him as they have played for the titans, and the audience's loud response to them and to Mr. Barenboim patently acknowledged this.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
AUG 5 1969 New England

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169
AUG 1 1969

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
AUG 5 1969 New England

The Sound of Music

Married Bliss, Musical Style

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — Daniel Barenboim, 27, is a pianist and conductor. Jacqueline du Pre, 24, his wife, is a cellist. Together they shared center stage at Sunday afternoon's Tanglewood concert by the Boston Symphony.

Both were making their first appearance with the orchestra on a sunny afternoon before 8,728 people. While Daniel conducted, Jacqueline, a big girl with flowing blonde hair and a radiant grin, was soloist in Edward Elgar's Cello Concerto in e minor. (Later this season, another husband and wife team — Henry Lewis and mezzo-soprano Marilyn Horne — will be featured; earlier, the duo of Lilian Kallir and Claude Frank played two-piano works at a weekend prelude.)

Barenboim made a good impression; Du Pre, a sensation. She has not only a formidable technique, but enormous musicality and temperament to go with it, and her playing of the lovely Elgar concerto was an emotional experience. She plays with tremendous intensity, attacking with such abandoned force one thinks she might saw the instrument in two.

Alive and Well

Her tone is positively cavernous in the lower regions of the instrument, firm and vibrant in the upper. Yet her playing is more than a sound-feast, it is always alive and expressive, and produced at every conceivable dynamic scale. The Elgar concerto has opportunity for display (such as the scurrying second movement), but its finest moments are those of lyric pathos in the adagio and in the latter pages of the finale — and here Miss Du Pre's playing was most noble, in throbbing legato passages.

She received poetic, somewhat subdued accompaniment from her husband. But that was the only thing subdued about his appearance. Short, dark and stocky, he directs with sharp decisive gestures, evoking the propulsion and brusque accents of youth. One senses he likes a lot of sound and motion, well-ordered but brisk and hard. At any rate, these were the qualities of Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

The formula worked well for the Mendelssohn and reasonably so for the Beethoven until the last movement, though the first was somewhat driven. The third movement, before the bridge to the concluding allegro, had some imaginative touches, but in the finale Barenboim pushed too hard, the orchestral intonation went awry and the symphony ended in a tangle.

DANIEL BAREMBOIM
. . . youthful movements

Still on the run, Barenboim took his final bows, then dashed offstage into a car waiting to whisk the young couple to Hartford.

Good Conduct

Saturday night was Pierre Boulez' turn on the podium. Musician's musician, newly-appointed music director of the New York Philharmonic, acerbic polemicist, former avant-garde composer, this gifted Frenchman within a few years has become a conductor of major international rank.

On the podium, Boulez is not a gaudy personage, neither in appearance, nor gesture nor in whipping up an orchestra to a frenzy of sound. He is rather a musician who excels in clarity of structure and detail, in nuance, in the precise rendering of rhythmic figures. He has a connoisseur's ear for sound — not just blotches of color but intonation, timbre, placement.

On a muggy evening which held the Tanglewood gathering to 6,614, Boulez demonstrated these qualities most successfully in two works of Claude Debussy — "Jeux" and "La Mer."

"Jeux", a ballet written for Diaghilev in 1912 and premiered two weeks before Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," is an advanced and challenging score. Boulez has called it "one of its composer's most remarkable achievements" whose "structure is rich in inventions and of flowing complexity."

Yet Boulez, directing from memory and without baton, makes it sound like flowing simplicity, with extraordinary rhythmic suppleness, attention to sound quality (the sensitivity of the percussion playing, for example), and amazingly lucid textures from such a large orchestra.

The same features generally apply to "La Mer," one of Boulez' acknowledged triumphs. Charles Munch used to make it a grand emotional experience, with big splashes of sonority; Boulez makes it an intellectural experience, with gentle washes of sound, a reduced dynamic scale (he rarely wants a forte — and when he does, the effect is startling), and rather slow tempi. It is a virtuoso performance, not in the usual spectacular sense, but in its mastery of material.

Hidden Haydn

Also on the program were Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B-flat, with oboist Ralph Gomberg, bassoonist Sherman Walt, violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin making up the solo quartet, and Bela Bartok's two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra, with Silverstein as soloist.

The Haydn was a soggy affair, often shapeless and with variable results from the solo quartet. The cello and violin had pitch problems; Silverstein's playing was irritatingly coy and his tone cloyingly super-sweet. In all, tedious Haydn.

The Bartok rhapsodies went better for Silverstein — a difficult workout for the violinist and indeed for the orchestra. They are in dual movements: a slow, melancholy dialogue for violin and orchestra, followed by a more rapid and accelerating dance. Bartok's use of instrumental color and dissonance is effective in these Magyar flavored pieces, and there is apparent use of polytonality. The performances, however, seemed rather bookish — and needed a strong dash of Hungarian paprika.

IMPRESSIVE REPERTORY

Barenboim at 27 Touted for Talent

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

LENOX—Long past playing the child prodigy, Daniel Barenboim at 27 is being touted as the major musical talent of his generation, and already he has built an impressive recorded repertory, both as pianist and conductor, of solid standard fare. He made his podium debut with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood this past Sunday, and if the concert was an exciting one, it was keenly disappointing as well.

About Barenboim's gifts there can be no doubt. He is an enormously musical person, and his work with the orchestra was carefully and sensibly, if not elegantly, phrased, and highly rhythmical. On the surface he knew his scores completely and knew how to rehearse the orchestra economically, getting quickly what he wanted.

Yet there were several ways in which his youth showed. First, there were certain oddities of interpretation. In Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, for instance, why was the horn picked out of the texture when it played the first two measures in augmentation (just before the final statement of the initial theme)? The notes are in the score, all right, but it's hard to believe that Beethoven wanted them blared forth so, since he wasn't given to this sort of play with time (though later in life he was). It seems a detail, and very much a background detail, that contributes to the inner continuity of the score, and is heard wrongly when emphasized as emphatically as in Barenboim's reading.

And in the Elgar Cello Concerto, in which Jacqueline Du Pre was soloist, why, in the first movement, were several bars beat exactly twice too slow (two bars before the second theme entrance and the penultimate measure of the movement)? In neither case was a slowdown specified, and here, as in the Beethoven, Barenboim's choices seemed conceits, personal quirks that didn't help explain the scores.

Also, more fundamentally, and although the above performances and that of Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture were well put together and led with admirable energy, I felt the interpretations never got very far beneath the surface. The readings were never dull, for Bareboim is too animated and lively and intelligent a character for that, but though they were more than sound and fury, they didn't touch as deeply as they might have.

Miss Du Pre, since her American debut four years ago has lost much of the freshness and youthfulness that then made her playing so remarkable and such an unrivaled joy. This loss was apparent two seasons ago when I heard her Schumann concerto, and on Sunday, as well, with the Elgar.

She still has a great flair for the instrument and is as wonderful to watch as ever, but in ways the playing is technically less good (I can't imagine, four years ago, such hair-raising slides as those we got in the second movement), and temperamentally a bit lazy.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
AUG 6 1969 New England

TWO FESTIVALS—Cellist Jacqueline du Pre will appear at both the Tanglewood and Saratoga festivals within the next week. On Sunday, with her husband Daniel Barenboim conducting the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, she will perform the Elgar Cello Concerto. Next Thursday, with Barenboim leading the Philadelphia at Saratoga, she will play the Saint-Saens Cello Concerto No. 1.

Workmanship, Drama Partners at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Calm workmanship and dramatized podium tactics were partners of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the final two concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival's fifth weekend at Tanglewood.

Pierre Boulez was the quiet artisan on Saturday night. Yesterday afternoon it was Daniel Barenboim.

Ttotal attendance for the weekend was 22,740.

Widely known as an iconoclast, Boulez might have been expected to put on quite a show. He did, musically.

Extravagance

Stylistic extravagance was Barenboim's stock in trade yesterday afternoon. The 27-year-old bushy-haired Argentinian sought drama in every nook and corner of his scores.

Boulez addressed the orchestra with simple gestures. No baton. The man was so concerned with musical matters that there was no time for theatrical display.

He's a perfectionist. The orchestra found that out Saturday morning at the rehearsal which lasted for nearly three-and-a-half hours. A record for Tanglewood.

Boulez turned a basically tepid program into a memorable experience.

Pretty Effects

Hayden's Sinfonia Concertante for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello is a surgery morsel with all the classic fivings for flighty dialogue and pretty effects.

The orchestra gave him note perfection even if the soloists did not. Phrasing was finely turned and dynamic boundaries solid as conrete.

Boulez' Debussy, compared to most other conductors, is the difference between cloudy lens and clear focus. It naturally happened that he made a "coup" of "La Mer." But the more amazing deed was the life and sense Boulez injected into Debussy's neglected "Dance Poem."

Loosely-strung episodes were not pastel splashes on canvas but pulled together like indispensable components.

It's no wonder that Boulez was selected as regular conductor of the New York Philharmonic beginning in 1971. After Leonard Bernstein, New York is in for guite a jolt.

Violinist Joseph Silverstein gave a brilliant account of two Bartok rhapsodies that progressed systematically from tender soliloquies to Slavic-typed hoe-downs.

Solists

The soloist's technique and temperament were top order. John Hosszu Long's cimbalom background contributed to the glamor.

Cellist Jacqueline DuPre (Mrs. Barenboim) had a big success yesterday with the Elgar Concerto. After the first movement, the orchestra broke with their usual reserve and cheered the soloist.

Some of her phrasing was slurred, but Miss DuPre consistently produced sounds of full radiance. The correct notes were played in large majority, bowing was firm. To these assets was an attractive person and personality.

Excepting the slow movement of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, distended and lingered over, the work had brilliant sound added to its traditional traits.

Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture was pounced on and disposed of. Barenboim found a bodily movement for every note. The conductor made a point of letting the audience know exactly where the action was. His cues were prompt, vigorous and tailored to dynamics and speed.

Solos were particularly mellifluous from the cello section. Barenboim reacted in kind.

Saturday Night

Sinfonia Concertante in B flat major, Opus 84 — Haydn
Ralph Gomberg, oboe
Sherman Walt, bassoon
Joseph Silverstein, violin
Jules Eskin, cello
Jeux-poeme danse — Debussy
Two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra — Bartok
Le Mer — Debussy
Pierre Boulez, conductor

Sunday Afternoon

Overture "Ray Blass" — Mendelssohn
Cello Concerto in E minor, Opus 85 — Elgar
Jacqueline DuPre, cello
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67 — Beethoven
Daniel Barenboim, conductor

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
AUG 4 1969 New England

Barenboims Score 50-50

BY HARRY WEINTRAUB

It rained Friday and Saturday nights at Tanglewood, but Sunday afternoon was beautiful for Daniel Barenboim, the Israeli pianist and conductor, and his wife, 'cellist Jacqueline DuPre. It was Barenboim's conducting debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it attracted the largest crowd of the season.

Mr. Barenboim is known foremost as one of the more promising young pianists, and it is only within the last two or three years that he has wielded the baton. Miss DuPre is recognized as something of a phenomoneon on the 'cello, an instrument few women have mastered well enough to be recognized as major concert artists. She was a student of the great Russian 'cellist, Mistlav Rostropovich, and she proved it with a big, warm tone. The damp weather was slightly unkind to her and muffled the sound a bit, but one could tell the power was there. She displayed a man-size technique but a prima donna's dramatics with much swaying and tossing of her hair, which she wears long and blond.

The program was uninteresting. Barenboim's repetoire is not large and can be divided into two main groups, conductor's display pieces to show off his talents and 'cello concertos to show off his wife. Tanglewood has been known for varied and often challenging programming, but Sunday's concert was a display for the Barenboims.

Things got off to a loud start with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture. Barenboim obviously enjoys conducting this kind of music because it is a crowd-pleaser, noisy with bounce. Next came the Elgar 'Cello Concerto. It is a difficult piece for the soloist—but more difficult for the audience. Miss DuPre overcame all difficulties with ease. Barenboim's accompaniment was thoughtful and dovetailed beautifully with his wife's playing. The applause was enthusiastic.

The program ended with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Barenboim showed good control of the orchestra and a good command of the score. Performances of this symphony tend to run into each other, leaving the steady concert-goer with an aural blur where a distinct musical impression should be. Barenboim took it at a good clip, which surprised me. From his recordings of some Mozart concertos and his set of the Beethoven Piano Concertos with Klemperer, I expected a heavy, Germanic C Minor from him. It was not that at all. The performance did not have the brilliant clarity and drive of, say, Toscanini's performances with the NBC, but it was precise and clean. Barenboim resisted the temptation to overstate yet showed little of the concern for fine detail and definition of inner structures which mark a great conductor.

The Barenboims can be heard today (Thursday) and Friday at Saratoga in two concerts with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

ALBANY, N.Y.
JEWISH WORLD
W. 5,200

AUG 7 1969

Barenboim, DuPre Complement Tanglewood's Warming Sun

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The warming sun finally came to Tanglewood Sunday afternoon and then, you might know, the temperature was raised higher by that high-tension, young, romantic team, Daniel Barenboim and Jacqueline Du Pre.

Romantic Duo

Barenboim is 27, already established internationally as a first-class pianist and fast becoming established as a conductor. His wife, Jacqueline, 24, is known as one of the world's ranking solo cellists.

They are romantics, musically as well as really. Barenboim demonstrated it early when he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the opening piece on the program, Mendelssohn's overture to the Victor Hugo play, "Ruy Blas."

The play is a full-blooded melodrama disliked by Mehdelssohn; but he wrote a full-blooded, theatrical piece for it, and Barenboim and Boston's musicians gave it a virorous workout.

Impassioned Expression

Miss DuPre demonstrated her romanticism in two ways; with warm, soft tones and lyrical, impassioned musical expression, and with an uninhibited, exuberant, earthy stage presence.

She is a large girl, taller than her energetic husband, with long, straight, blonde hair that flings about as she sways and shakes her head with her eyes shut as she plays.

She played the solo part of Elgar's Opus 85 cello concerto while her husband kept the orchestra carefully and gently subdued in support of her low-toned cello.

Orchestra Applauds

It was an electric collaboration, one that enticed applause from members of the orchestra, as well as the audience, following the first movement.

There were many passages of great beauty drawn from Elgar's traditional music, and the soloist won a kiss from the conductor when it was finished. The audience liked her, too. There were 8728, largest number of the season so far.

The closing work on the program was Beethoven's famous Fifth Symphony, which is not as overworked as most people seem to think. It has been played at Tanglewood three times in seven seasons.

Barenboim's youthful bounce filled it with sparkle and drama, more than most conductors have been giving it lately. He is a boisterous fellow on the podium; he exhorts the orchestra with wide-sweeping arm motions and incisive thrusts and chops.

The orchestra was responding Sunday with wide-sweeping, boisterous music.

* * *

The weather was warm and sunny for the fifth Sunday morning chamber music concert (at 10) in the theater, and half of the program was delightfully appropriate to the change in the weather.

A sextet for piano and woodwind quintet by Poulenc and a Mendelssohn string quartet (Opus 44, No. 2) reflected the benevolence of the weather and the informality of the audience.

Before intermission there were a contemporary trio for trumpet, trombone and horn called "Sonate a Trois" by Quinet and Bartok's third string quartet.

Both were heavy stuff for a leisurely Sunday morning audience of languorous music lovers and casual tourists in plaid shorts.

The Poulenc and Mehdelssohn were performed with greater grace, also, or seemed to be; the quintet was tonally blunt and harmonically dense, and the Bartok was without the gutsy strength it needs for emotional impact. The Mendelssohn was beautiful.

* * *

Next weekend Karl Ancerl and Josef Krips will visit Tanglewood Friday night and Sunday afternoon as guest conductors, and Van Cliburn will be here Saturday night to play Brahms' First Piano Concerto.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 4 1969

Festival season continues

LENOX, MASS. — The sixth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins Friday at 9 p.m. when Karel Ancerl, music director of the Toronto Symphony, conducts the complete tone-poem cycle, "Ma Vlast" ("My Country"), by the Czechoslovakian composer, Bendrick Smetana.

The following evening at 8, Eric Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 with Van Cliburn as soloist. The remainder of the program includes Debussy's "Three Nocturnes" with the women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir and Kurt Weill's "Suite from the Threepenny Opera."

Next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Josef Krips, renowned music director of the San Francisco Symphony, conducts Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Schubert's Symphony No. 9.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m., Symphony Chamber Players, an ensemble made up of the principals of the Orchestra and guest artists, playing music by Blacher and Thuille.

The weekend's Open Rehearsal for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is Saturday morning at 10:30.

SYRA[illegible] HERALD-AMERICAN
S[illegible] 1969

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 3 1969

At Tanglewood

Van Cliburn, is appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest pianist at Tanglewood, Saturday at 8 p. m.

Karel Ancerl is guest conductor when the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in concert at Tanglewood, Friday at 9 p. m.

6th Week

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 2 1969

As I Hear It

All in the Family

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THERE HAVE BEEN many households where both parties of the menage, or their children, have been distinguished in the same or a related sphere, as individuals or as partners in artistic or scientific collaboration. One inevitably asks if there could not spring up some sort of rivalry or competition which might disrupt, or at least undermine, the foundations of amicable relations.

As an example of such a domestic situation, there comes to mind that of Pierre and Marie Curie, the French physicists whose research and discoveries brought them such immortal renown. In the theatre, there have been many such couples, including Lynn Fontanne and Alfred Lunt on the stage and Richard Burton and Elizabeth Taylor on the screen.

In music there have been several husband and wife teams, some working in pairs, such as the duo-pianists Vronsky and Babin, Bartlett and Robinson, and Luboshutz and Nemenoff. The Russian cellist Matislav Rostropovich and his wife, the vocalist Galina Vishnevskaya, are another example.

There have been brother and sister acts—the Menuhins, the Iturbis, and Joe and Lillian Fuchs. And the Casadesus family, with father, mother and son all pianists, played often together. The De Pasquale four-brother string quartet can probably be beaten in that respect only by the famous family of circus acrobats, the flying Walendas.

* * * *

THE BUSCH FAMILY, violinist Adolf, (father-in-law of Serkin), conductor Fritz and cellist Herman, rates inclusion in such a compendium. And who will ever surpass the family Stein? Gert Ep- and Ein-.

Johann Sebastian Bach and his sons were prime examples of what, at one time, looked like the start of a dynasty. Sebastian's genealogy reveals a numerous ancestry of musicians. Five sons from among his 20 children became distinguished composers and organists.

Poor Michael Haydn suffered all his life by being obliged to remain in the shadow of his older brother Joseph. The Rubinstein brothers of the 19th century were both evidently vastly endowed, but the scholar was always partially obscured by the virtuoso. There were two Wieniawskis, Henri and Jozef, two Ysayes, Eugen and Theodor, and probably many more.

Clara and Robert Schumann were a unique pair. Clara in her public appearances concentrated on and introduced many of her husband's compositions. Siegfried Wagner started to carry on his father's operatic career but the epigonous attempt dwindled with time.

Ruth Posselt, the wife of the previous Boston Symphony Orchestra concertmaster, Richard Burgin, is a superior violinist in her own right. Pianist Eugene List and his violinist wife Carol Glenn go their own way artistically, as do soprano Irmgard Seefried and her violinist husband Wolfgang Schneiderhan.

* * * *

A RATHER SPECTACULAR team which has recently appeared on the horizon is performing at Tanglewood tomorrow. This is the young English cellist, Jacqueline Du Pre, and her Israeli husband, pianist Daniel Barenboim. They have appeared with brilliant eclat in Europe and in this country. Their latest engagement was at the Casals Festival in Puerto Rico and, from Lenox, they go to Saratoga.

Retrospection discloses that, so far as the public knew, potential rivalry never disturbed the harmony of the hearth of such homes as that of Josef and Rosina Lhevinne or, in the dramatic world, of actress Helen Hayes and her playwright husband Charles MacArthur. Eugen d'Albert and Teresa Carreno, both famous pianists of the late 19th century, could be cited as an example of the failure of such unions. However, since d'Albert had a half-dozen wives, and Carreno, from her vantage point, some four husbands, it can be seen than neither was distinguished for stability in wedlock.

That the spouses of some celebrated artists have been unhappy in their comparative eclipse is undoubtedly true, but this does not necessarily apply only to music. There may have been cases where the mediocrity of one mate may have provoked disapprobation and resentment in the mind of the one left disgruntled in umbrage. What is the proper prescription in such situations?

* * * *

FELIX MENDELSSOHN'S grandfather was the famous philosopher Moses Mendelssohn. He was a hunchback. Moses was invited to visit the Guggenheim family and was struck by the daughter Gromet. She was frightened and shocked by his appearance.

When Moses spoke to her, she did not raise her eyes from her sewing. He brought up the old proverb that marriages are made in heaven. "Yes, at the birth of a child," he told her, "the word is cried out in heaven, 'This man will receive that woman.' Now when I was born, my wife's name was cried out to me, but at the same time the message came that, unfortunately, she would be a hunchback.

"Then I said, 'Dear God, a girl who is misshapen will have a hard and bitter time of it; a girl ought to be beautiful. Dear God, give me the hump and let the girl grow up tall and straight.' "

As soon as Moses had spoken these words, Gromet threw her arms around his neck. She gladly became his wife and their marriage was a most happy one.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 8 1969

Weekend Events At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins tomorrow at 9 pm when Karel Ancerl, music director of the Toronto Symphony, conducts the complete tone-poem cycle, "Ma Vlast" (My Country), by the Czechoslovakian composer, Bendrick Smetana.

Saturday, at 8 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orshestra, conducts Brahms "Piano concerto No. 1" with Van Cliburn as soloist. The remainder of the program includes Debussy's "Three nocturnes" with the Women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir and Kurt Weill's "Suite from the Threepenny Opera."

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Josef Krips, music director of the San Francisco Symphony, conducts Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony, Strauss' "Til Eulenspiegel" and Schubert's "Symphony No. 9."

62.

At Tanglewood: Karl Ancerl will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Aug. 8th at 9 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 7 1969 New England Newsclip

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 8 1969

GUEST CONDUCTOR — Karel Ancerl will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood tonight at 9 p.m. as he leads the orchestra in a performance of Smetena's "Ma Vlast." The weekend prelude concert at 7 p.m. tonight at Tanglewood will feature the Berkshire Boy Choir.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 7 1969 New England Newsclip

Van Cliburn Piano Concerto

047

The sixth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins Friday evening at 9 p.m., when Karel Ancerl, music director of the Toronto Symphony, conducts the complete tone-poem cycle, Ma Vlast (My Country), by the Czechosolovakian composer, Bendrick Smetana.

The following evening, Saturday, at 8 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts Brahms' Piano concerto No. 1 with Van Cliburn as soloist. The remainder of the program includes Debussy's Three Nocturnes with the women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir and Kurt Weill's Suite from the Threepenny Opera.

On Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m., Josef Krips, renowned music director of the San Francisco Symphony, conducts Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and Schubert's Symphony No. 9.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p.m. concert, features the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, an ensemble made up of the principals of the orchestra and guest artists, playing music by Blacher and Thuille.

Van Cliburn . . . who will appear as guest pianist with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood this Saturday, Aug. 9, at 8 p.m.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 7 1969 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD—Saturday, Aug. 9: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Debussy's "Three Nocturnes" with Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir, Weill's Suite from "The Three Penny Opera," and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 with Cliburn, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Sunday, Aug. 10: BSO conducted by Krips in Haydn's "Surprise Symphony," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Schubert's Symphony No. 9, 2:30 p.m., Shed . . . Friday, Aug. 15: Weekend Prelude with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, 7 p.m. BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Eroica" symphonies, 9 p.m., Shed . . . Saturday, Aug. 16: BSO conducted by Rudolf in Haydn's Symphony No. 91, Bartok's Dance Suite, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Sunday, Aug. 17: BSO conducted by Lewis in Berlioz's "Corsaire" Overture and Nuits d'été, Mozart's Parto from "La Clemenza di Tito," K.-621, Rossini's Cruda Sorte from "L'Italiana in Algeri" with Horne as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Francesca da Rimini, 2:30 p.m., Shed.

MARLBORO MUSIC FESTIVAL — Off Vermont Route 9 between Wilmington and Brattleboro, Vt. Weekend concerts by resident musicians, through Aug. 17. Saturday concerts at 8:30 p.m., Sundays at 3; Friday concerts at 8:30, Aug. 8 and 15.

MOHAWK VALLEY MUSIC FESTIVAL—Rowe, Mass., opera and chamber music, Saturday, Aug. 15, 8 p.m.

MUSIC MOUNTAIN—Falls Village, Conn. Saturday, Aug. 9: The Berkshire Quartet plays Mozart's Quartet in C, K.170, Debussy's Sonata for Violin and Piano, and Dvorak's Piano Quintet, with guest artist Sidney Foster, concert time, 3 p.m. . . . Saturday, Aug. 9: The Berkshire Quartet performs Verrall's Quartet No. 7, Schubert's Duo for Violin and Piano in A with Ward Davanny, guest artist, and Brahms' Piano Quartet in A, concert time, 3 p.m.

NORFOLK MUSIC SHED—Yale Summer School of Music and Art, Norfolk, Conn. Friday, Aug. 15: The Yale Quartet and Keith Wilson in Bethoven's Quartet, Opus 135, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, and Debussy quartet 8:30 p.m., Music Shed . . . Sunday, Aug. 17: The Litchfield County Choral Union sings, with John Wiley conducting the Yale Summer Orchestra in Beethoven's Archduke Trio, Brahms' Tragic Overture, and Hindemith's Der Schwanendreher for Viola and Orchestra, 3:30 p.m., Music Shed.

RED FOX MUSIC BARN—New Marlboro. Chamber music at 8:30 p.m. Saturdays.

SOUTHERN VERMONT ART CENTER—Manchester, Vt. . . . Sunday, Aug. 10: Quadro Parnasse Concert Artists, 3:30 p.m. . . . Sunday, Aug. 17: Boston Sinfonietta, 8:30 p.m.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 9 1969 New England

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 5 1969

★ ★ ★

Van Cliburn performs Saturday at 9 p.m. with the Boston Symphony at Tanglrwood in Brahms First Piano Concerto. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, will replace Max Rudolf as guest conductor on Aug. 16 at Tanglewood. Mr. Rudolf, retiring music director of the Cincinnati Symphony, has withdrawn from the concert on the advice of his physician.

★ ★ ★

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, August 9, 1969

Krips to Be Guest At Tanglewood

Special to Buffalo Evening News

TANGLEWOOD, Mass.—Former Buffalo conductor Josef Krips, now of the San Francisco orchestra, will make a guest appearance tomorrow afternoon in the Berkshire Music Festival.

Dr. Krips will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Haydn "Surprise" Symphony, the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel", and Schubert Symphony No. 9. The noted maestro recently conducted two programs in the Blossom Music Festival of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 7 1969 New England

AT TANGLEWOOD: Josef Krips will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 10th at 2:30 p.m.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. presents following program: 10:30 a.m. today: Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal in Music Shed; 8 tonight, Boston Symphony Concert with Leinsdorf conducting; Van Cliburn, featured pianist; 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Boston Symphony, Krips conducting. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50. Admission to lawn, $3, unreserved, available day of concert. All children, regardless of age must have a ticket. 8 p.m. Tuesday Trends Concert features Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King, Joshua Light Show and The Who ($4-$6.50); $3 lawn tickets available two-hours before concert. Further information: Lenox, Mass., 1-413-637-1600.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 9 1969 New England

At Tanglewood: Van Cliburn will be guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 9th at 8 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 3 1969 New England

62.

At Tanglewood: Karl Ancerl will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday, Aug. 8th at 9 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 7 1969 New England Newsclip

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 145,169

AUG 8 1969

GUEST CONDUCTOR — Karel Ancerl will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood tonight at 9 p.m. as he leads the orchestra in a performance of Smetena's "Ma Vlast." The weekend prelude concert at 7 p.m. tonight at Tanglewood will feature the Berkshire Boy Choir.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 7 1969 New England Newsclip

Van Cliburn Piano Concerto

047

The sixth weekend of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins Friday evening at 9 p.m., when Karel Ancerl, music director of the Toronto Symphony, conducts the complete tone-poem cycle, Ma Vlast (My Country), by the Czechosolovakian composer, Bendrick Smetana.

The following evening, Saturday, at 8 p.m., Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts Brahms' Piano concerto No. 1 with Van Cliburn as soloist. The remainder of the program includes Debussy's Three Nocturnes with the women of the Berkshire Chorus and the Tanglewood Choir and Kurt Weill's Suite from the Threepenny Opera.

On Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m., Josef Krips, renowned music director of the San Francisco Symphony, conducts Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel and Schubert's Symphony No. 9.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m., one of the short concerts presented each week for ticket holders for the 9 p.m. concert, features the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, an ensemble made up of the principals of the orchestra and guest artists, playing music by Blacher and Thuille.

Van Cliburn . . . who will appear as guest pianist with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood this Saturday, Aug. 9, at 8 p.m.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 7 1969 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD—Saturday, Aug. 9: BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Debussy's "Three Nocturnes" with Berkshire Chorus and Tanglewood Choir, Weill's Suite from "The Three Penny Opera," and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1 with Cliburn, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Sunday, Aug. 10: BSO conducted by Krips in Haydn's "Surprise Symphony," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Schubert's Symphony No. 9, 2:30 p.m., Shed . . . Friday, Aug. 15: Weekend Prelude with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, 7 p.m. BSO conducted by Leinsdorf in Beethoven's "Pastoral" and "Eroica" symphonies, 9 p.m., Shed . . . Saturday, Aug. 16: BSO conducted by Rudolf in Haydn's Symphony No. 91, Bartok's Dance Suite, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony, 8 p.m., Shed . . . Sunday, Aug. 17: BSO conducted by Lewis in Berlioz's "Corsaire" Overture and Nuits d'été, Mozart's Parto from "La Clemenza di Tito," K.-621, Rossini's Cruda Sorte from "L'Italiana in Algeri" with Horne as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Francesca da Rimini, 2:30 p.m., Shed.

MARLBORO MUSIC FESTIVAL — Off Vermont Route 9 between Wilmington and Brattleboro, Vt. Weekend concerts by resident musicians, through Aug. 17. Saturday concerts at 8:30 p.m., Sundays at 3; Friday concerts at 8:30, Aug. 8 and 15.

MOHAWK VALLEY MUSIC FESTIVAL—Rowe, Mass., opera and chamber music, Saturday, Aug. 15, 8 p.m.

MUSIC MOUNTAIN—Falls Village, Conn. Saturday, Aug. 9: The Berkshire Quartet plays Mozart's Quartet in C, K.170, Debussy's Sonata for Violin and Piano, and Dvorak's Piano Quintet, with guest artist Sidney Foster, concert time, 3 p.m. . . . Saturday, Aug. 9: The Berkshire Quartet performs Verrall's Quartet No. 7, Schubert's Duo for Violin and Piano in A with Ward Davanny, guest artist, and Brahms' Piano Quartet in A, concert time, 3 p.m.

NORFOLK MUSIC SHED—Yale Summer School of Music and Art, Norfolk, Conn. Friday, Aug. 15: The Yale Quartet and Keith Wilson in Bethoven's Quartet, Opus 135, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, and Debussy quartet 8:30 p.m., Music Shed . . . Sunday, Aug. 17: The Litchfield County Choral Union sings, with John Wiley conducting the Yale Summer Orchestra in Beethoven's Archduke Trio, Brahms' Tragic Overture, and Hindemith's Der Schwanendreher for Viola and Orchestra, 3:30 p.m., Music Shed.

RED FOX MUSIC BARN—New Marlboro. Chamber music at 8:30 p.m. Saturdays.

SOUTHERN VERMONT ART CENTER—Manchester, Vt. . . . Sunday, Aug. 10: Quadro Parnasse Concert Artists, 3:30 p.m. . . . Sunday, Aug. 17: Boston Sinfonietta, 8:30 p.m.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 9 1969 New England

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

AUG 5 1969

★ ★ ★

Van Cliburn performs Saturday at 9 p.m. with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood in Brahms First Piano Concerto. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

David Zinman, conductor of the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra, will replace Max Rudolf as guest conductor on Aug. 16 at Tanglewood. Mr. Rudolf, retiring music director of the Cincinnati Symphony, has withdrawn from the concert on the advice of his physician.

★ ★ ★

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS
Saturday, August 9, 1969

Krips to Be Guest At Tanglewood

Special to Buffalo Evening News

TANGLEWOOD, Mass.—Former Buffalo conductor Josef Krips, Maestro of the San Francisco Orchestra, will make a guest appearance tomorrow afternoon in the Berkshire Music Festival.

Dr. Krips will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Haydn "Surprise" Symphony, the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel" and Schubert Symphony No. 9. The noted maestro recently conducted two programs in the Blossom Music Festival of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 7 1969 New England

AT TANGLEWOOD: Josef Krips will guest conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Aug. 10th at 2:30 p.m.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. presents following program: 10:30 a.m. today: Boston Symphony Open Rehearsal in Music Shed; 8 tonight, Boston Symphony Concert with Leinsdorf conducting; Van Cliburn, featured pianist; 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Boston Symphony, Krips conducting. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50. Admission to lawn, $3, unreserved, available day of concert. All children, regardless of age must have a ticket. 8 p.m. Tuesday Trends Concert features Jefferson Airplane, B.B. King, Joshua Light Show and The Who ($4-$6.50); $3 lawn tickets available two-hours before concert. Further information: Lenox, Mass., 1-413-637-1600.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 9 1969 New England

At Tanglewood, Van Cliburn will be guest pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on August 9th at 8 p.m.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

AUG 3 1969 New England

Tanglewood Audience Stirred By Program of Czech Music

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — "Ma Vlast" is exciting music, even for those who don't know why it exists or what its special meanings are.

Czech Patriotism

It is colorful and full of variety. It is a fervent declaration of Czech patriotism composed between 1874 and 1879 by Smetana It made up the wsole program at Tanglewood Friday night.

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Karel Ancerl. He was guest conductor of the Czech philharmonic last year and was in the United States when Russia invaded his country. He elected to stay and will become conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra next year.

The large work, "Ma Vlast," which translates to "My Fatherland," is seldom heard wholly. It consists of six programmatic symphonic poems which dramatize Bohemia's history, legends countryside and attitudes.

Audience Enthusiastic

Best known of the six in this country is the second, "Mildau." The first is about the ancient castle-home of Bohemian kings, the third about a legendary Amazon, the fourth about Bohemia's fields and woods, the fifth and sixth about the fortress and mountain where Hussite warriors live.

They are, in sequence, 10, 13, nine, 12, seven and 15 minutes long.

Ancerl led the Boston players through them with loving care and received an especially enthusiastic response from the 3585 listeners. Perhaps the audience had a high percentage of Czechs.

Relaxed Direction

Ancerl is a slender man whose silver hair adds to his air of elegance. He used a wide-sweeping motion to inform the players of his wishes and presented an attitude of easy benevolence and relaxed fluidity rather than one of precision.

The music of "Ma Vlast" is fully and brightly orchestrated, is full of folk tune, dances and marches, visions of ruddy, chubby cheeks, bright eyes, swirling dirndl skirts quick tempers, and sudden smiles.

It is soothing and exciting, placid and stormy like the Lenox weather which began the concert benignly and broke into a thunderstorm during the second half.

It is often like the music so popular with the Boston Pops audiences and it drew plenty of applause Friday.

Prelude Program

The Boston Symphony Chamber Players were given responsibility for the weekend prelude program at 7 and they came up with a trio for trumpet, trombone and piano by Boris Blancher, Opus 31, and a sextet for piano and wood wind quintet by Ludwig Thuille, Opus 6.

The trio is a light, salty, spicy, perky piece of about 12 minutes which includes moments of soft trombone a la Tommy Dorsey, piano dirge a la Chopin and big band jaziness of, say, 1940 as well as coltish, contemporary, serious dissonance.

The Thuille piece (28 minutes) is a symphonic, late-19th century work of sweet, limpid lyricism and lush orchestration. . . only occasionally beautiful, often pretty and sometimes saccharine ensemble music. Last summer they played at Tanglewood every Sunday morning. I wish they would again.

Tonight Van Cliburn is scheduled to play the solo part of Brahms' First Piano Concerto with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 9 1969 New England

tanglewood

Ancerl evokes homeland

by Rodney N. Myrvaagnes

Friday night, August 8, at Tanglewood, was an orgy (in the WHRB sense) of Czech nationalism. Karel Ancerl conducted Smetana's cycle of six tone poems, "Ma Vlast" (My Country) which were germinal pieces in his effort to develop a Czech national style of composition. While one might, after a century, question the point of such an effort, he must be counted successful on his own terms, sonically at least. The orchestral colors as he uses them sound like none of his associate and the effect of his or Dvorak's music is readilly identified as Czech even if the piece is unfamiliar.

Within this stylistic framework, these tone poems share much with "pictorial" tone poems of other composers. There are, for example, printed words on the score to tell you what extramusical ideas (scenery, battles, storms, etc.) are supposed to be conjured up. These may be helpful to the conductor, and are essential to a listener who wants the references, as they are never self-evident. One might easily think for instance, that the rapids at St. John's in the Moldau (which is a river), is a storm scene, but as such it would be greatly inferior to Beethoven or Rossini.

Mr. Ancerl's performance suggested an emphasis on musical coherence, rather than literal rendering of the pictorial matters, and he succeeded admirably. The orchestra was easily up to all demands and everything held together until a violent thunderstorm (real) wrecked the quieter parts of the last two pieces. The conclusion was a loud, accelerated company which brought the small but enthusiastic audience t oits feet.

Earlier in the evening the Weekend Prelude was given by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players with Gilbert Kalish, piano. Both pieces were unfamiliar. The first, trio for trumpet, trombone and piano, by Boris Blacher, incorporated seven short movements using various combinations of solo and accompaniment, which displayed the skills of Messrs. Ghitalla and Gibson to great advantage. The music had some resemblance to "L'Histoire du Soldat" but had a much greater affinity for the big band jazz styles of the thirties, and as such, needed far more swing than it got. One found oneself wishing for Newton Wayland at times, whose hammed up approach might be just what this piece needs.

The Ludwig Thuille sextet for wind quintet and piano is a late 19th century piece bearing casual resemblance to Shumann at times. As with the Blacher, it is a display piece which passes the solo around from part to part. The players were all in good shape except for Mrs. Doriot A. Dwyer, whose tone was so breathy as to obscure what she was playing.

Boston After Dark
8-20-69
